CHURCH PARADE IN THE BRITISH ARMY

DIVINE SERVICE ON A FRENCH WARSHIP

EMPEROR FRANZ JOSEF AT A SERVICE AT VIENNA

Divine Worship in the Armies...

THE · RELIGION · OF · A · SOLDIER

Memorable Services on the Field . . .

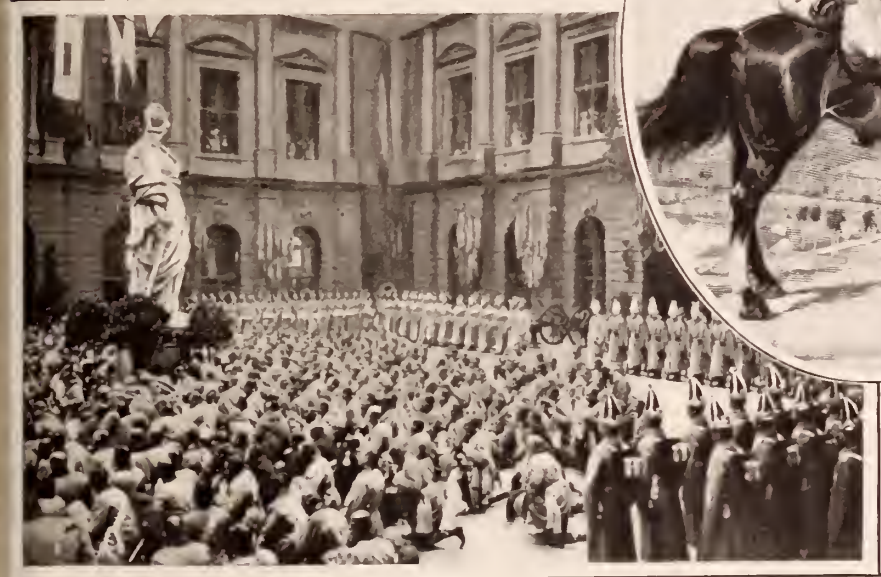
EVERY great nation, especially in war time, provides for the spiritual, as well as the physical welfare of its soldiers and sailors. With the British Army, in the Transvaal, for instance, there are no less than forty-three chaplains, of whom twenty-five are of the Church of England, six Presbyterian, eight Roman Catholic and four Wesleyan. British army leaders do not insist that their men shall attend divine service: but none know the power of example, where the fighting man is concerned, better than such Generals as Roberts, Buller, Methuen, Baden-Powell and MacDonald, who themselves attend Sunday service so regularly that their men feel morally bound to fall into line when the trumpeter sounds "church call."

Lord Roberts has distributed among his men a prayer composed specially for the soldier at the front, by the Archbishop of Armagh. Furthermore, every soldier, with his kit, receives a small-sized Testament, regarding which Lord Wolseley wrote: "In my opinion there could be nothing more suitable for the spiritual comfort of a soldier on active service than this Testament. The size permits him always to carry it in his khaki jacket pocket, and each soldier who possesses a copy will have something of far higher value to him than the proverbial marshal's baton." Thus the British War Office, perhaps unconsciously, adopted an idea which was put to excellent use by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the Spanish-American war, when it provided a large proportion of our own soldiers in the field with a "Vest Pocket" edition of the New Testament.

In the American army, church attendance is not compulsory. A chaplain simply addresses those who attend voluntarily, laying upon the consciences of his hearers admonitions against vice and strong drink. The American army chaplain has a wide and varied field. On board a transport bound to our new possessions in the far East, he comes in contact, for a whole month, with the command with which his lot is cast, and may be helpful to many. He will conduct services at many places throughout the ship, and he will appeal as much to the mind of his hearer as to his soul. Some of these services have become historic, as in the case of the prayer service on San Juan Hill, in sight of Santiago, which was the first Protestant military service ever held in Cuba.

In the German Army, attendance at religious services is almost compulsory, yet no government is more tolerant of the religious convictions of its soldiers. Each man is given a tiny gray volume, the title of which is Gebetbuch fur Soldaten — the Soldier's Prayer-Book. It is supplied from the Berlin depot of the Head Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge in Germany, and is a compendium of war-prayers for almost every conceivable situation, with one significant exception—there is no prayer in defeat. No man is more scrupulously careful in his religious duties and in the example he sets his army, than the Emperor William.

KAISER WILLIAM AT A MILITARY SERVICE



"CHURCH CALL," AMERICAN CAMP

SPANISH TROOPS WORSHIPING AT PONCE

A "YAHRZEIT" SERVICE AMONG JEWISH SOLDIERS, GERMAN ARMY

Sunday morning invariably finds him at the garrison church wherever he may be, and he rarely lets an opportunity pass without personally saying something religious to his troops.

One of the interesting pictures herewith shows a religious observance of Jewish soldiers, at the front, during the Franco-German war. "Yahrzeit," among the Jews, is the anniversary of the death of a parent, and, though neither of Biblical nor Talmudic origin, is one of the religious customs of Judaism which most strongly appeals to the sentiment of affectionate remembrance as well as to the spiritual conviction of the Israelite. The Kaddish, or sanctification prayer, which every dutiful son or daughter repeats upon the occasion, cannot be properly pronounced unless there is a religious quorum present—at least ten male adults of the faith. This ceremony is so highly regarded by Jews, and the affectionate remembrance of their parents is so fully developed and instilled in every Jewish heart that strenuous efforts are always made under every circumstance and condition of life, whether on the battle-field or at sea, to obtain the necessary Minyan or religious quorum of ten, to observe the anniversary.

On the sea, too, among the civilized nations of the earth, religious services are observed and one of the pictures shows a Te Deum upon a French warship in Chinese waters, a thanksgiving service for a victory won in a shallow and narrow river, against a strong fort and hundreds of Chinese war junks.

In Austria, the most solemn religious ceremony attended by the military is that on Corpus Christi Day. Annually, on this day, all Vienna is astir at dawn to see the great procession start from the Hofburg on its way to St. Stephens. This year Franz Josef was present in general's uniform, his head bared to the sun.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

An Exile's Diet

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Daniel 1: 5:

And the king appointed them a daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank: so nourishing them three years, that at the end thereof they might stand before the king.

MY text opens the door of a college in Babylon, and introduces you to a young student seventeen years of age, Daniel by name. Be not surprised if in the college you find many hilarities. Put a hundred young men together and they are sure to have a good time. There is no harm in that. God does not write out the trees and the grass and the blossoms in dull prose. The old robin does not sit moping in the nest because of the chirpings and the lively adventures of the fledglings that have just begun to fly. Do not come into an orchard looking for winter apples on a May morning.

But Daniel of the text is far from being gay. What oppressive thoughts must have come over him as he remembered that he was a captive in a strange land! The music that came into his study window was not the song of Zion, but the sound of flute, sackbut and dulcimer in the worship of the heathen god. Moreover, he had no hope of ever getting back home again and meeting those who had missed him long and missed him bitterly, wondering if he were still alive, and finding many a luxury tasteless because Daniel might be lacking bread.

When you and I were in school or college, and the vacation approached, we were full of bright anticipation, and we could not study the last day. The lexicon and the philosophical apparatus were transparent, so we could see right through them into the meadows and the orchards. Not so with poor Daniel. He did not know that he should ever escape from captivity, or escaping, he did not know but when he got home the loved ones would be dead, and he would go wandering and weeping among the sepulchres of his fathers. Besides that the king tried to make him forget his home and forget his country; for that purpose, actually changed his name. The king wanted him to be a prodigy in and so he ordered meat and wine sent from his own table to Daniel; but Daniel refuses all this, and puts himself upon the humblest diet, the poorest of all herbs, called pulse, and plain water. His attendants cry out against this, and tell him he will perish under such a diet. "No," he says, "you try us for ten days, and if at the end of that time we are not full-cheeked and robust as any, it will be surprising." Ten days pass along and the students come up for examination, and all declare that none are so ruddy and robust as Daniel and his fellow-captives. The days of industrious pupilage and the years pass by, and the day of graduation has come, and Daniel gets his diploma, signed by the king and reading as follows: "In all matters of wisdom and understanding that the king inquired of them, he found them ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm." And so Daniel took the first honor, and here the story ends, for Daniel the student hereafter will be Daniel the prime minister.

The first thought suggested to me by this subject, is that young men may be carried into captivity by their enemies. There is a captivity more galling than the one in which Daniel was transported; it is the captivity of evil habit. Men do not go into that wittingly. Slyly and imperceptibly are the chains forged upon them, and one day they wake up to find themselves away down in Babylon. Cyrus afterward consented that some of his captives should return, and fifty thousand of them accepted the opportunity; but tell me what evil habit ever consented to let a man go. Men talk of evil habits as though they were light and trivial; but they are scorpion whips that tear the flesh; they are spikes; they make the poisonous robe of Nessus; they are the sepulchres in which millions are buried alive. The young are in more peril because they are unsuspecting. The lions are asleep in their soul, and their power is not suspected. The time when a ship's company makes mutiny is when the watchman is off his guard. When a spider meets a fly, it does not say, "Go down with me to the place where I murder insects." No; it says: "Come and take a bright morning walk with me on this suspension bridge of glittering gossamer." Oh, there is a difference between the sparkle of a serpent's eye and the crush of its slimy folds. There is a difference between the bear's paw toying with a kid, and the crackling of the bones in the terrific hug. Are there those around whom suspicious companions are gathering? Do their jests and their entertainments make the hours go blithely by when you are with them? Have you taken a sip from their cup of sin, or gone with them in one path of unrighteousness? Turn back. From Babylon they came and to Babylon they would carry you.

Early Training

My subject also impresses me with the fact that early impressions are almost ineffaceable. Daniel had a religious bringing up. From the good meaning of his name I know he had pious parentage. But as soon as he comes into the possession of the king, his name is changed, all his surroundings are changed, and now, you say, will begin the demoralization of his character. Before, his name was Daniel, which means "God my judge;" now, his name is to be Belteshazzar, which means "the treasurer of the god Bel." Now you expect to see him overthrown amid all these changed circumstances. Oh, no! Daniel started right, and he keeps on right. When I find what Daniel is in Jerusalem, I am not surprised to find what he is in Babylon. I wish I could write upon all parents' hearts the fact that early impressions are wellnigh ineffaceable. When I see Joseph, a pious lad, in the house of his father, Jacob, I am not surprised to see him acting so nobly down in Egypt. David planned the Temple at Jerusalem, and gathered the materials for its building; but Solomon, the son, came and put up the structure, and that goes on in all ages. The father plans the character of the child, and its destiny for time and eternity; then the son completes the structure. You might as well put down a foundation ten feet by five and expect to rear on it a great cathedral, as to put down a contracted character in a child's soul and yet rear upon it something extensively grand and extensively useful.

Let me say to those Christian parents who are doing their best in the education of their children:

Take Good Heart;

your sons to-day may be far away from you and in a distant city, but God, to whom you dedicated them, will look after them. The God of Daniel will take care of them far away in Babylon. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." He may wander away for a while and fall into sin, and break your heart; but before he is done with this life, you having commended him to God, he will come back again; for I put the emphasis in the right place and on the word "old," when I repeat that passage and say, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." May you all have the glorious satisfaction of seeing your children walk in paths of righteousness and peace! One with them on earth, may you be one with them in heaven!

But I learn also from this subject the beauty of Christian sobriety. The meat and the wine that were to come to Daniel's table were to come from the king's table. Well, Daniel had no right to take that food. The king was a heathen, and, like all the heathens, was accustomed to ask a blessing before he partook of food, and in that blessing they always dedicated the food to the gods. So that if Daniel had taken this food he would have broken the law which forbade the taking of food dedicated to idols. He chose pulse. It was a miracle that he did not dwindle away. There is nothing in pulse, such a poor herb, to make a man ruddy and healthful. Some people talk as though that were a kind of diet which would make a man swarthy and competent to do the duties of this life. That is not the lesson at all. He went through that self-denial because the food offered him was idolatrous food. When I see God filling the earth with all varieties of food I have not much confidence in the teaching of those who would put us on severe regimen. But oh, how many Temptations to Dissipation!

With so many nice things to tempt the appetite, how many temptations to gluttony! With so many sparkling beverages, how much temptation to drunkenness! Could I bring before you this morning the mothers and the wives and the sisters who have wept at the graves of the inebriate, your soul would be overpowered with the spectacle. Could I show you the manly forms robbed of their beauty, the eye-flashings quenched in the wine cup, the ruddy cheek from which rum has wormed the rose, your souls would recoil with horror, and you would rise up and cry, "Begone, thou dream of hell!"

Charles Lamb, who made all the world laugh at his humor, and then afterward made all the world weep at his fate, who outwitted everybody, and was at last outwitted of his own appetites, wrote thus: "The waters have gone over me; but out of the depths, could I be heard, I would cry out to all those who have set a foot in the perilous flood. Could the youth to whom the flavor of the first wine is delicious as the opening scenes of his life, or the entering upon some newly-discovered paradise — could he look into my desolation, and be made to understand what a dreary thing it is when a man shall feel himself going down a precipice with open eyes and a passive will; to see his destruction and have no power to stop it, yet feel it all the way emanating from himself; to see all godliness empty out of him, and yet not able to forget the time when it was otherwise; to bear about the piteous

Spectacle of His Own Ruin

— could he see my feverish eye, feverish with last night's drinking, and feverishly looking for to-night's repetition of that folly — could he but feel the body of the death out of which I cry hourly with feeble outcry to be delivered, it were enough to make him dash the sparkling beverage to the earth in all the pride of its mantling temptation."

Are you fond of pictures? Here is one drawn by Solomon: "Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it moveth itself aright in the cup. At the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

My subject also impresses me with the beauty of youthful character remaining incorrupt away from home. If he had gone through all the rounds of iniquity, it would have cast no shadow on his early home. There were no telegraphs, there were no railroads. But Daniel knew that God's eye was on him. That was enough. There are young men not so good away from home as at home. Frederick tending his father's sheep among the hills, or threshing rye in the barn, is different perhaps from Frederick on the Stock Exchange. Instead of the retiring disposition, there is bold effrontery; instead of an obliging spirit, there is perhaps oppressive seifishness; instead of open-handed charity, there is tight-fisted stinginess; instead of reasonable hours, there is midnight revel. I speak to many young men on this matter —you who may have left your father's house, and others who, though still under the parental roof, are looking forward to the time when you will go forth to conflict, alone in this world, with its temptations and its sorrows, and when you will build up your own character. Oh, that the God of Daniel might be with you in Babylon!

I think the most thrilling passage of a young man's life is to make his fortune. The novelty and the romance of the thing may keep him from any keen sorrow, but the old people who have seen the destruction of so many who started with high hope, cannot help but be anxious. As long as he was in his father's house his waywardness was kindly chided, and although sometimes he thought the restraint rather bitter and rather severe, in his calmer moments he acknowledged it was salutary and righteous. Through the influence of metropolitan friends, the father has obtained a situation for his son in the city. The comrades of the young man come the night before his departure to bid farewell to the adventurer. The morning of his going away he walks around the place to take a last look at things — perhaps comes upon some object that starts a tear, some old familiar place, but no one sees the tear. The trunk is put upon the wagon, the young man is off for the city. He is set down amid excitements and amid associates who are not over-careful about their words and thoughts and actions. Morning comes. No family altar. Sabbath comes. No rural quiet. The sanctuary comes, but all the faces are strange, and no one cares whether he comes to church or does not come. On his way home from the store he sees a placard announcing a rare and a vicious amusement. He has no greeting at the door of the boarding-house. He has no appetite for the food. No one cares whether he eats or does not eat — rather he would not eat — it is cheaper! After the tea he goes into the parlor, takes up a book, finds it dull, no sister to look over it with him. Goes upstairs to his room in the third story, finds it cold and uninviting, and in despair he rushes out, caring for nothing but to get something to make him stop thinking. He is caught in the first whirl of sin. He has started out on the dark sea where the gleam of the joy is the flashing of the pit, and the laughter is the creaking of the gate of the lost. Oh, how many graves there are in the country churchyard which, if they could speak, would tell of young men who went off with high hopes and came back blasted and crushed to disgrace the sepulchre of their fathers!

And yet this exodus must go on. As from distant hills the rivers are poured down through tunnels to slake the thirst of our great cities, so from distant country-places the streams of incorrupt population must pour down to purify our great cities. To-morrow morning, on all the thoroughfares, in every steamboat, and in every rail-car will be young men going forth to seek their fortunes in our great towns. O Lord God of Daniel! help them to be as as they were at Jerusalem. Forget not, young friends, in the great seaports the moral and religious principles inculcated by parental solicitude, and if to-day seated in the house of God, you feel the advantage of early Christian culture, forget not those to whom you are most indebted, and pray God that as old age comes upon them and the shadow of death, the hope of Heaven may beam through the darkness. God forbid that any of us through our misconduct should bring disgrace upon a father's name or prove recreant to the love of a mother. Oh! that God would help every one of you as parents and as young people to take to heart the lessons of this important subject; and if we shall learn that there is danger of being carried into captivity, and that early impressions are almost ineffaceable, and that there is something beautiful in Christian sobriety, and that there is great attractiveness in piety away from home—then it will be to you and to me a matter of everlasting congratulation that we considered how Daniel behaved when he became a college student at Babylon.

HOW THEY PRAYED IN PEKIN

Mrs. Conger Tells the Story of Suffering During the Siege

SINCE the siege of Lucknow there has been no more thrilling chapter in history than that of the besieged legations in Pekin and their deliverance after two weary months of peril and suspense by the arrival of the relieving armies. Now that the full account comes through Mrs. Conger and Miss Pierce, wife and niece of the American Minister to China, of the hard and perilous times endured by the legationers and those who sought refuge within the compounds, it seems, indeed, as if God, mindful of the prayers going up daily and hourly from many lands and from the sufferers themselves, had almost wrought a miracle for the relief of the Christians in Pekin. Mrs. Conger's and Miss Pierce's narratives are in the form of letters to relatives and friends in this country, penned during the siege, after the manner of a diary.

Mrs. Conger's letter, dated June , speaks of the tottering Chinese government, the weakness of the army, which either fears or sympathizes with the Boxers; of ineffectual pleas of foreign ministers to the Tsung-li-Yamen for protection and of their final demand that they be permitted to bring their own guards into the city. Mrs. Conger says:

"Several days of deep interest and intense anxiety have passed. Rumors upon rumors have been coming in. All foreign nations here represented stand as one family in these times. Men of all classes are showing their strength of character. The office will not take or send any more foreigners' messages. They say the wires are down. We cannot know the truth of it just now, but we know that messages are not received or sent."

She refers to the bringing in of supplies, the filling of jars with water which has to be bought outside the legation), the faithfulness of her Chinese servant, and affirms her own confidence in God, in spite of the fact that danger is in the air. Legationers cannot tell what is taking place in or outside of the imperial city. Of the murder of Baron Von Ketteler, Miss Pierce says:

"The German Minister's life was sacrificed for all those in Pekin, for it showed the sentiment of the people and just how dangerous it was to go outside our lines. Baroness von Ketteler was an American from Detroit, and the German secretaries asked Aunt Sarah (Mrs. Conger) to tell her of her husband's death. It was a sad duty to perform."

"The American guards hold the most dangerous place on the wall," Mrs. Conger writes. "Our United States Captain Myers decided to charge the Chinese behind their barricade. He said to his men: 'Men, when I say go, every one of you go. Remember over there in the British legation are three hundred women and children, whose lives depend upon our success. If we fail, not only our lives are lost, but theirs also. Now go!' They did go, and in five minutes the barricade was taken. We have buried six of our marines in the Russian legation, across the street. One night when Mr. Conger was helping, a Russian soldier was there, too. He was a rough-looking man, but had a big heart. He got into a grave, and helped to cut the dirt from under the feet and head of a United States soldier. Looking up, with tears in his eyes, he said: 'He is my brother. We have fought together on the wall.'

"Missions are sacked and burned; guards go out to bring in missionaries; stores in the city where foreign goods are kept are fired, and legationers on the walls watch spreading flames devour acres of the best section of the capital. Terrific din is heard outside. Boxers perform horrible incantations in sight of the compound. Food gets low, horses and dogs are eaten, and the heat is terrible. Babies are dying, hospitals are filled with the sick." Later: "Rejoice! rejoice!" writes Mrs. Conger, "word from our troops, 40,000 strong, only forty miles away.' Aug. 14: "Our troops are here! Such joy and warm greetings you never saw!"

The Blind Poet's Grandest Gospel Song

FANNY CROSBY'S NOBLEST TRIBUTE TO THE CHRISTIAN FAITH

THERE is perhaps no name in the modern annals of Christian song that is more widely known and loved than that of Fanny Crosby, the blind poet. Many of her most famous compositions have appeared from time to time in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the aged poet has become a familiar figure to our readers. To-day we print on this page her latest and most remarkable hymn—the crown of her long Gospel minstrelsy. "Blessed Rock" is the new song of the Cross, and ere long it will be sung by congregations, Sunday Schools and religious gatherings, as well as in Christian homes, wherever the Gospel of Jesus Christ is preached and the English language is spoken. The words are matchless in their description of the emotions of the soul that has found the sure Refuge, and the spiritual fidelity of the picture which the poet draws will at once be recognized.

Mr. Hubert P. Main's musical setting of the hymn is worthy of the theme—the grandest that can appeal to the soul of man.

Among the hymns by Fanny Crosby that have attained world-wide fame are the following, which are probably more widely sung than those of any other living religious poet: "Blessed Assurance," "Blessed Homeland," "Every Day and Hour," "Jesus is Calling," "All the Way," "Near the Cross," "Pass Me Not," "Rescue the Perishing," "Saved by Grace," "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," and "We are Going." They have moved multitudes of souls, and have been the means of leading many to the mercy seat. If the new hymn of the Cross, which she has given as the last beautiful offering of her genius, and which was written exclusively for this journal, should be made the instrument of Divine grace to sinful souls, leading them to Christ, it will not have been written in vain.

BLESSED ROCK

FANNY J. CROSBY. HUBERT P. MAIN.

1. 'Mid the wild and fear-ful blast, I have reached the Rock at last;
2. Wreck'd by sin, by tem-pest tossed, Com-pass, chart and an-chor lost,
3. Rock, that hides my trem-bling soul From the storms that dark-ly roll;
4. When be-yond the vale of night I shall soar to realms of light;
Help-less, weak and sore dis-mayed, To the cross I'll cling for aid.
He whose power a-lone can save, Lulls the wind and stills the wave.
While be-neath, the sur-ges dash, Thunders roar, and lightnings flash.
When mine eyes be-hold the King, Heart and soul and tongue shall sing.
CHORUS.
Bless-ed Rock,... where faith di-vine Fills with love.... this heart of mine!
Bless-ed Rock,
Fills with love
Cross of Him.... who died for me, Ev-er-more I'll cling to Thee!
Cross of Him

A MILLIONAIRE'S BIBLE CLASS

J. D. Rockefeller, Jr., Leads Over One Hundred Young Men in the Study of the Book

PERHAPS the largest young men's Bible class in New York is the one of which John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is leader. It is the Young Men's Bible Class of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church. The class is composed of students, business and professional men, numbering in all something over one hundred and twenty-five. Its sessions are held on Sunday mornings at ten o'clock, in a room especially provided for the purpose. The first meeting this season was held on October 7. All young men are invited to join this class, for all are welcome, regardless of party, creed or residence. The only question which the members of the class consider of importance in receiving a newcomer, is not where such an one comes from, but whither he is spiritually bound.

Once a month there is a social gathering, either in the parlors of the church or in the home of some one of the officers of the class. The object of these gatherings is to give the men an opportunity of becoming better acquainted with one another and to promote good fellowship. The programmes are varied, sometimes consisting of addresses by men of prominence in business or the professions, while at other times part of the evening is given up to a general discussion of some subject of special interest. Once a year a dinner is given, which is inexpensive, but thoroughly enjoyable.

The class was organized in 1896 by J. M. Forbush, with fifteen members. The first leader, or teacher, was Mr. Chas. E. Hughes, lawyer, formerly professor of law at Cornell University. Young Mr. Rockefeller joined the class in 1897, soon after leaving college, and was given the leadership in February of this year. The class this year is making a consecutive study of the Old Testament, beginning at Genesis, the lesson for October 7th having been "Heredity and Environment. Joash, the Boy King of Judah." (II. Chron. 24: 15–23).

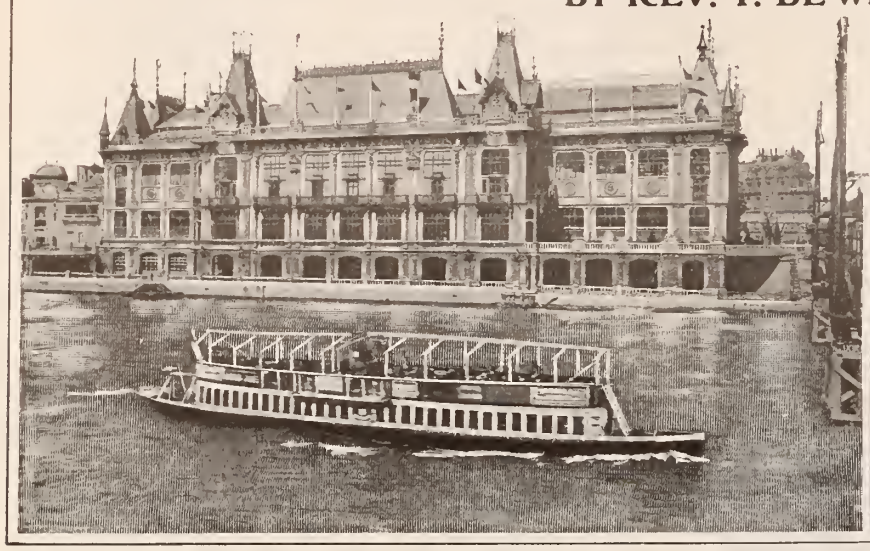
Regarding Bible study, Mr. Rockefeller recently said in speaking to some young men: "I prefer a consecutive study to taking scattered portions of it. In my class, after a statement of the setting of the passage under study by the leader, any member of the class tells of the particular points that strike him forcibly, and there is a general discussion. It is difficult to lay down a regular form for Bible study. One man may find interest in the historical setting of the passage, another in its political aspect, and still another in the customs of the people, and each in his own way grasps the spiritual truths the lesson presents.

"In Bible study there are four points to follow: 1. Study earnestly; we must work for everything we get, and we must make it a point to study earnestly. 2. We must study prayerfully. 3. We must study consecutively, not in scattered parts of the Bible or in scattered moments. 4. The study of the Bible, or, in fact, the Christian religion, is useless unless it is made practical. We must apply it."

The honorary members of the class include such well-known men as Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Sr., E. Benjamin Andrews, D.D., LL.D., Dr. Wm. W. Keen, LL.D., Mr. Robert J. Burdette, Major-General Wm. R. Shafter, Major-General O. O. Howard, Mr. D. A. Waterman, Mr. Colgate Hoyt, Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., Mr. Robert C. Ogden, Mr. Andrew Carnegie, Hon. Charles Miller, Hamilton W. Mabie, LL.D.

WHAT I SAW IN PARIS

BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.



THE PAVILION OF THE CITY OF PARIS

THE SMALL PALACE OF FINE ARTS

THE peroration of the 19th century is the World's Fair at Paris. A century of such wondrous achievements in art, in science, in swiftness of locomotion, in invention of all kinds, in capacity to study other worlds, ought to have a brilliant closing. The last sound from its bell-tower ought to be a chime of victory.

Sure enough in Paris we have the grandest exhibition of this century, and of all centuries. There has been a steady advance from the first fairs recorded in history: those mentioned by Ezekiel, the prophet, as occurring 600 B.C.: Fairs at Tyre, Horse Fair, Mineralogical Fair, and Agricultural Fair mentioned in the Bible, on and on, until the Fair at Dagobert in the time of Louis VI., and the Fair on Bartholomew's Day, the Hungarian Fairs at Pesth, and Easter Fairs at Leipsic, and the Scotch Fairs at Perth, and Vienna Fair, and New Orleans Fair, and the Sydenham Palace Fair at London, and New York World's Fair, and Chicago Fair, and Omaha's Fair. But the ocean of progress has reached its high water mark at Paris. Others may have excelled in this or that feature, but take it all in all, the Parisian Exhibition is unparalleled. Those who have seen the great fairs of the last thirty years say there have been no illuminations like those which have set the summer nights in Paris into a blaze; that there has been no such rich decoration of pavilions and palaces; no such splendor of silk manufactures; no such presentation of the poetry of costume; no such Street of Nations. The whole Exposition is a glory beyond that which any finite mind can grasp or fully appreciate. The most interesting and best managed department is the American exhibit. General Peck, the Commissioner-General, brought with him his experience at the Chicago World's Fair, and after three years of hard work in Paris, and with a tax upon his patience and endurance that would have destroyed an ordinary man, has completed the work that ought to be the exultation of all Americans, and should win for him the congratulation of the Congress of the United States. Of course, he is criticised. He has many hundred exhibitors to deal with, and they cannot all have first place, or second place, or third place for their exhibits. Each exhibitor naturally thinks he has the most important exhibit, and a more difficult position no man ever had than that occupied by General Peck. It is easy enough to find fault. It requires no genius to do that. But I do not think any other American could have done as well. If he comes out of his crushing work with any nerves left, or any capacity of mind and soul unexhausted, he will be as wonderful as anything in the American Department, of which he is commander-in-chief.

As a specimen of the injustice to which thousands have subjected him, many have asked, "Why are not our American industries in one cluster of buildings, so that you could walk through consecutively instead of having American machinery here, and American pictures a half mile out yonder, and botanical display in some other direction?" These critics do not understand that the French Government made the classification, and General Peck had no more to do with saying where the different exhibits should be located than he had with deciding that Paris should stand where it is, instead of being on the seacoast, or how many rings Saturn should wear, or how high should be the mountains in the moon: yet thousands of people have joined in that senseless gabble. It seems that crossing the Atlantic Ocean does not cure the spirit of fault-finding and hypercriticism, and as soon as a man becomes conspicuous for useful achievement, he becomes a target to be shot at. Failure never likes success. But the French classification is wisest: the industries of all nations are put side by side, and as most people will be guided by their taste or their occupation, to look more especially at the condition and progress of those things in which they are most interested, the mineralogist will find minerals of all nations; the farmer will find the agriculture, the machinist will find the machinery of all nations side by side. What a helpful and instructive classification.

To augment our appreciation of the greatness of our American exhibit, we need to call to mind that while the Commissioner Generals from Russia, Germany, Belgium and Austria were empowered by their governments to take whatever they wished and display it at Paris, our American Commissioner General had no such power, but must have the consent of the owner, and so had less opportunity than other Commissioner Generals, who could command what picture, what statuary, what machinery, what textile, he wished to put before the world. We should also appreciate the fact that while other countries could, with comparative ease, send their products to this Fair, many of our American industries had first to cross the American Continent, and then cross 3,000 miles of sea, and again take freight train for long distance before reaching destination. The extent and splendor of our American Department is five times more and better than anyone had a right to expect.

But many are asking on this side of the sea whether this Fair will close with a deficit. I suppose it will. Nine out of ten national expositions do not meet expenses, and he who invests in them with the idea of gettting back his money is mentally deficient, and ought to be taken care of by sympathetic relatives. I stood a few days ago at Vienna, Austria, in the only building left standing of its World's Fair of ten or fifteen years ago, and I asked one who had much to do with that exhibition, whether it had paid its investors. He replied: "We were 17,000,000 florins out of pocket." But while this Parisian exhibition, like its predecessors, may have more outgo than income, it will bring large reward in the wealth it will pour into the lap of Paris. The receipts at the gates of the Fair are no indication of its success or failure; a man may pay during his visit here no more than $5 at the Fair, but while he stays in the city with his family he may pay $500 or $1,000. The whole earth is at this moment pouring its millions of gold into the exchequer of the city of Paris. No city under the sun ever received so much monetary advantage from an exposition as this city will receive.

"But," say some of the correspondents, "the city is full of extortion, and you must give three times what a thing is worth." We have not found it so. We have this summer twice crossed the continent of Europe, going and coming, and the place we have found most reasonable in its charges is Paris. If you want to get skinned alive, go to Denmark or Norway, or Russia, or Germany, or Austria as summer tourists. The story of disappearing roubles and florins is more startling than the story of escaping francs and crowns. But the only really economical thing a summer tourist can do is to go home. There is no maxim one oftener quotes to himself while traveling abroad than the saying which the Sunday School boy quoted as, marching in procession with other children, he put his pennies into the missionary box, supposing he was quoting an appropriate passage of Scripture: "A fool and his money are soon parted." How many people in traveling spend much of their time clear out of temper about their baggage, or their board, or their being crowded. The trouble is, that when they pack their trunks and valises for their journey, while they put in plenty of clothing and such articles as they will surely need, they forget to put in a large amount of good, old-fashioned patience. The amount of patience which Job had did very well for the slow time in which he lived, but would not be sufficient to see one safely through in a nineteenth century world's exhibition. The fact is, that the hardest task we shall ever be called upon to undertake is the management of ourselves, and he who succeeds in that deserves a prize as fine as any awarded a few days ago at this Parisian fair.

As we passed through the different departments, only one building saddened is, and that was the one constructed by Spain. The walls have a few specimens of apestry, probably loaned by some of the old castles in Spain, and here and there s a specimen of ancient armor, but the hing that most impressed me was the lestitution of the country there represent-d. Poor Spain! She has been fighting progress and enlightenment for centuries, and drowned her last prospect of better-nent in the waters before Santiago. We are sorry for any individual or for any ation that is down, by whatever pro-ess he or it came down. Would that Spain, by turning her back upon her ruelties and her superstitions, and her ace to the light, might come to political, and moral, and religious prosperity, and hat at the next World's Fair in Europe. she might have an exhibit in painting, and sculpture, and textile, and literature. equal to any country east of the Pyrenees.

The vacant places which I have seen his summer in the Art Galleries of Berlin, Dresden, Germany and St. Petersburg, made me especially desire to see the Art Gallery of the Paris Exposition. When I asked in the Holland, Danish, German and Russian cities the reason of the ab-sence of certain great pictures, and con-cerning the unoccupied pedestals of cer-ain statues, I was told that the painting or sculpture had been loaned to the World's Fair at Paris. Rubens and Murillo and Titian and Raphael had gone to France. Indeed, the Departments of Painting and Sculpture in this Exposition are the heaven of the fine arts. I can imagine nothing more inspiring than a walk amid the sculpture of all nations as here you see it. Even that which is done in cast of plaster skilfully gives the thought of the great artist. If you want to find genius exalted, here behold Victor Hugo enthroned on the rocks, his great forehead hovering over the scene, while a figure representing music, hands up to him a harp, and another form holds a mask, suggestive of the drama, for which he did such matchless things: and another lifts a lash, to suggest the chastisements with which he struck upstart monarchy and sham, while the winged angel of fame stands with trumpet to lip, ready to sound his praises through all time. If you would see grief of parting wrought in stone, here it is in "Emigrants' Adieu." Would you find devotion? Here it is in "Pater-noster"—showing a girl at prayer. Would you see savagery about to rend and devour—look at Gardell's "Tigress." Would you see a child's glee—look here at the boy carrying a goose. Would you realize the agony of those on a wreck at sea, hailing a ship in the distance—study the way Robert Stigal freezes it into bronze. Would you behold a specimen of the sublimest impudence—yonder is Marc Antony in gilded chariot drawn by three lions, he leading the fourth. Would you know how heaven-sent charity illum-ines the countenance—look at the statues of those philanthropists. Would you see the spirit of play—there it is in Guillon-net's "Foot-ball." Would you have il-lustrated how human intelligence can triumph over brute force—look at that "Hungarian Horse-Breaker." Would you have demonstrated, so that you can never forget it, helpful sympathy for the wound-ed—look at Sicard's "Good Samaritan." Would you learn the terror of an offended conscience—stand a while before that "Cain and Abel." Would you realize what Christian eloquence can accomplish—listen, for standing there you can hear as well as see, Bossuet in a burst of holy oratory, which moves his audience till some are ready to spring to their feet and others swoon into tears. In one hour you can in this congregation of the world's sculpture see all the passions, rage or triumph, and all the grandeurs unroll. Coming down from amid the statuary, one feels that he has descended from Mont Blanc, the snow-white heights of the world's sculpture.

If you have time, go up and down all the buildings of this World's Fair and see the life insurance exhibits, illustrating in the most radiant way the best tem-poral blessing which ever came to benefit households, and feel the enchantment of ceramics, and mineralogy, and horticul-ture, and optics, and tapestry, and metal-lurgy, and hydraulics, and machinery and lithography, and engraving, and book-bindery, and the printing presses, one of which can print in one hour 45,000 copies of a sixteen page paper, and fold and count them; and electography, and com-pare all the industries of the world's brain, and the world's eye, and the world's hand, and the world's foot, but somehow manage to come out at the close of your last visit through the doors, over and be-side which are the four gigantic figures representing Architecture, with its com-pass and scroll; Music, with its bow and violin; Painting, with its pencil and easel; and Sculpture, with its mallet and chisel; so among all your impressions of the World's Fair, your last impression may be the grandest, most thrilling, and most lasting of them all.

What a good thing to have this object-lesson of peace at a time when three wars are raging. There are swords in this exposition, but they are all sheathed, or hung up, or asleep on cushions of dam-ask. There are guns here, but none of them loaded. There are warriors here riding into battle, but they are in saddles of bronze or marble. Germany and France, Russia and China, but in peace. This whole scene is a tableau of the mil-lennium. Is not the nineteenth century too late an age for wholesale cut-throatery and diabolism?

This Exposition Universal is a mighty move in the right direction. Among the most unique things to be found within its walls is the gift from the Czar of Russia to this Republic. It is a map of France in colored marble, and the chief cities of France are designated by precious stones, and the rivers are of rock crystal, and the provinces are of gold. May the time soon come when a map of another sort will be appropriate at some World's Fair in America or Europe. I would make it out of the marble of many lands on both sides of the sea. All styles of precious stone should represent the nations in brotherhood. Austria and Spain and Switzerland should be indicated by the amethyst, and topaz, and opal, and Italy should be a pearl of the sea, and Ger-many should be the sapphire, and Russia the diamond, and Great Britain the em-erald, as green as her Emerald Isle, and the United States the ruby, not crimson as with the carnage of battle, but with the full blush of the morning of universal peace. It is time that the cavalry horses stop eating out of the manger in which Christ was born.

THE CELEBRATED FRIEZE AT THE GREAT ENTRANCE ARCH, PARIS EXPOSITION

A Little Hero of the Storm

Twenty-five days after the storm, two little lads were found in the ruins at Avenue R and Thirty-seventh street, Galves-ton. They would never speak again, and so with their lips they could not tell of the horrors that overtook them when the awful cyclone swept down upon them, as away from their parents, and turning, perhaps from childish play, they met its horrors. Yet, a part of that story was plain. The smaller lad, a little fellow of four, was clasped tightly in the rigid right arm of the elder, whose left arm was shattered, and whose whole body gave evidence that he had suffered painfully before death overtook him. He had died trying to shield his little brother. This twelve-year-old hero was identified as Scott Mc-Closkey, son of Captain McCloskey, a well-known seafaring man of Galveston. The little brother bore the name of Earl. "I lost my wife and three children," said the Captain, when the little lads were shown to him. "I did not get ashore un-til after the storm. When I went to where my house had been there was nothing left but the brick piers. I haven't found the body of my wife. It's an awful blow, seeing these little lads. But I'm glad Scott died a hero's death. He was manly and lovable, brave as a boy could be."

RETRIBUTIVE JUSTICE

IN one sense all justice is retributive; springs from the wrong done. The sentence, "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die," was not an arbitrary sentence. Death was certain, was in the nature of things, provided the conditions of death were set up. Disobedience to God in Eden converted Eden into a moral Golgotha. With disobedience came expulsion from Eden; that was retributive. But the conditions of this expulsion had been already set up.

"The soul that sinneth, it shall surely die," is just as much a law as the law of gravitation. "He that walketh uprightly, walketh surely." What does a man do when he falls to the ground? Only loses his balance: only situates himself so the law of gravitation takes him to the ground. This is the law which insures the order of the solar system; binds the stars and the planets to the sun. The Prodigal Son asked of his father a dangerous and improper thing: "Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." That request granted was sure to bring retribution. The squandering of the young man's living, beggary, hunger, nakedness; this was all retributive; tended to punishment, such as he deserved. He was only made to eat the fruit of his doings, and filled with his devices. He was only made to possess the sins of his youth; to be an heir to himself. He had written and executed his own will. That was retributive justice.

ROUGHING IT

THE best way to start life is astride a farm horse with a rope halter. In that way you learn to rough it. You are prepared for hard bounces on the road of life; you learn to hold on; you get the habit of depending on your own heels and not upon other people's stirrups; you find how to climb on without anybody to give you a boost. It does not hurt you so much when you fall off. And some day, far on in life, when you are weary with the rush and din of the world, in your imagination you call back one of these nags of pleasant memory. You bring him up by the side of your study, or counting-room table, and from that you jump on, and away you canter through the old-time orchard, and by the old-time meeting-house, or down the lane in front of the barn, dashing into the cool, sparkling water of the meadow, where he stops to take his morning dram, or you hitch him up to the rocking chair in which you have for ten years sat rheumatic and helpless; and he drags you back some Sunday morning to the old country church, where many years ago he stood tied to the post, while you, with father and mother at either end of the pew, was learning of the land where there is no pain, and into which John looked and said

"I saw a white horse!"

OPPORTUNITIES OF JOURNALISM

WE state a fact which all know when we say that where the pulpit touches one person, the press touches five hundred. The vast majority of people do not go to church, but all intelligent people read the newspapers. While, therefore, the responsibility of the ministers is great, the responsibility of editors and reporters is greater. Come, brother journalists, and get your ordination, not by the laying on of human hands, but by the laying on of the hands of the Almighty. To you is committed the precious reputation of men and the more precious reputation of women. Spread before our children an elevated literature. Make sin appear disgusting and virtue admirable. Believe good rather than evil. While you show up the hypocrisies of the Church, show up the stupendous hypocrisies outside the Church. Be not, as some of you are, the mere echoes of public opinion; make public opinion. Let the great roll on which you write be a message of light and liberty and kindness, and an awakening of moral power. But who is sufficient for these things? Not one of you, without divine help. But get that influence, and the editors and reporters can go up and take this world for God and the truth. The mightiest opportunity in all the world for usefulness to-day is open before editors and reporters and publishers, whether of knowledge on foot, as in the book, or knowledge on the wing, as in the newspaper. I pray God, men of the newspaper press, that you may rise up to your full opportunity, and that you may be divinely helped and rescued and blessed.

A SLANDERED WORLD

THERE has been a great deal of wholesale slander of this world. People abuse it, the traveler on the mountain cursing the chill, and the voyager on the deep cursing the restlessness; and there are those who say it is a mean, old, despicable world; and from pole to pole it has been calumniated. If the world should present a libel suit for all those who have slandered it, there would not be gold enough in the mountains to pay the damages, or places enough in the penitentiaries to hold the offenders. The people not only slander the world, but they slander its neighbors, and they belabor the sun, now because it is too ardent and now because it is too distant; but by experience I have found out when there is anything wrong the trouble is not with the sun or the moon or the stars or the meteorological conditions; the trouble is with myself.

Judging from the reports that come from the astronomical observatories, I believe that in all the universe, excepting heaven, this is the most comfortable and convenient world to live in. Some of these other worlds are all water, others are all rock, others are all fire. Some are swept with electric cyclones and others are upheaved by volcanoes that toss whole continents into the air with one jerk. If you hunt up the rough history of other worlds, you will stop denouncing this world.

SHAPE OF PULPIT

THERE has been too great a distance between pulpit and pew, a great gulf fixed. The heart of the preacher and the heart of the hearer have not struck each other in pulsation. The distance has been so great that our arms are not long enough. Nothing could be more preposterous than for a preacher to stand at an elevation of five or six feet, and behind a barricade four feet through, crying in words of Scripture, "Give me thy hand!" Daniel Webster said that one of the best evidences of the divinity of our holy religion was the fact that it had lived, notwithstanding the clumsy architecture of the pulpit.

LENGTH OF DAYS

MOST certainly we want human longevity improved. We want the average of human life, instead of thirty, one hundred and fifty. Why not? In olden times they lived two hundred, three hundred, four hundred, five hundred, six hundred years. The world ought to be as healthy now as it ever was. Many of the marshes have been filled up. Medical science has gone forth and crippled and balked and destroyed many diseases, and why not the average of human life now something like what it used to be? But you know now the way it is. By the time we get our education or learn our trade and get fairly started we have to quit because we are emeritus. We fall at the opening of the great war of existence instead of at the close—at Bull Run instead of Gettysburg.

OUR FAMINE ORPHAN WORK

AT a meeting of the Interdenominational Missionary Committee, representing all the denominations, held at Bombay, Sept. 4, 1900, the following resolution was adopted unanimously, It is of the utmost interest to all who are associated in this, the greatest charity of the century:

"Considering the letter from Dr. Louis Klopsch, dated July 25th, 1900, regarding the proposal of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, UNPRECEDENTED IN THE HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN CHARITY, to endeavor to raise the support for TEN THOUSAND FAMINE CHILDREN of this famine, and to pledge the support of at least five thousand for at least one year, it was decided that we most gratefully accept the same, and, FIRST, to respect the preferences of donors regarding sex, and denominational training; SECOND, that we will urge upon all receiving this aid for famine children to send a quarterly report direct to the donor, understanding that some blank form of report properly filled in, with some added information concerning the individual child, will be acceptable; THIRD, we understand that all such contributions are to be sent by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through this Committee for division according to the plan; FOURTH, that this Committee agrees as a Committee, to act in this matter EXCLUSIVELY for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and in case contributions should be sent by other parties to the Committee, such parties will be requested to send any further contributions to the Committee through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

(Signed) "REV. E. F. FREASE, Secretary."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A girl reader, Huntington, writes:

I promised if I received an answer to my prayer, to acknowledge it through the columns of your paper. Part of the answer has been received, and I acknowledge it at this the first opportunity, that others may know that God hears and answers prayer.

M., Aylett, Va., writes:

It is always good and right to give God praise. I promised to acknowledge through your columns my faith in prayer, and the belief that he heard and answered my petition for the relief of my daughter who had passed all hope of recovery. I feel it my duty to pay my vow. I thank God she is better.

N. B., Collins, Mich., writes:

I had been ill a long time and prayed for health, promising if my prayers were answered to acknowledge the same in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I am so far recovered now that I write to redeem my promise and to give God the glory.

A Constant Reader writes:

I have felt that I should return thanks to our heavenly Father by recording the following: A member of my family left home one day to attend to necessary business, was taken very sick, and we felt he might never return. I prayed all day for him. He came home in the evening better than he had been for weeks. I give God the glory.

Reader, S. C., writes:

My brother was seriously hurt in an accident. I prayed to the Lord to restore him to health. He is now well.

A Constant Reader, Lancaster, Pa., writes:

I always felt faint and weak when asked to speak to a gathering, such as a Sunday School. It became my duty to speak in the capacity of superintendent. I asked the Lord for help and he strengthened me far beyond my expectations. I write this to redeem a promise.

Mrs. E. H. T., Milldale, Ct., writes:

At a critical time I prayed to my Heavenly Father to remove my trouble, if it was his will, promising to acknowledge it publicly. My trouble has somewhat disappeared, and I give him the glory.

Mrs. O'K., Colorado, Texas, writes:

I have had many prayers answered. I asked God to answer a prayer about three weeks ago, and promised I would acknowledge it publicly if answered. My prayer was answered inside of three days. I give him the glory.

Reader, Pittsburg, Pa., writes:

I promised that if a prayer I offered (asking for a personal blessing) was answered, I would acknowledge it publicly. The answer has come, although it was such as seemed to human eyes to be impossible. I know that God is able to do all things if we will only trust him.

Girl Reader, Villa Rica, Ga., writes:

God has most wonderfully answered two of my prayers, and I want to acknowledge it before men, as I promised him.

B. A. D., Lebanon, Ind., writes:

Reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last Sabbath, and seeing so many prayers answered, I promised the Lord if my prayer was answered I also would acknowledge it publicly. "He hath heard the voice of my supplication," and I desire to acknowledge his goodness.

Reader, New York, writes:

In the restoration of two very dear ones in answer to prayer, I desire to make acknowledgment and to give God the glory.

Mrs. ———, Cedarville, Pa., writes:

I want to acknowledge God's love, in answering prayer for the restoration of a dear one, seemingly ill unto death. Now I ask God's people to join me in prayer that the life given back may be dedicated to his service.

Mrs. A. S. M., Roachdale, Ind., writes:

I wish to acknowledge a recent answer to prayer. God has answered part of my prayer, and I have faith to believe he will answer the rest. I give him all the glory.

Devoted Reader, Washington, D. C., writes:

God has been so good to me in answering one of my most earnest prayers that I want to publicly acknowledge my thankfulness to him.

A Subscriber, Missouri, writes:

I have had poor health for a number of years and also a very deep sorrow. I had been praying for a long time, and had almost given up, when I saw in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of so many answers to prayer. I took fresh courage, making the vow that when my prayer was answered I would acknowledge it publicly. Now my health is greatly improved, as I firmly believe, in answer to my prayer, for which I give the praise to God.

Subscriber, Enfield, Mass., writes:

For years I have been praying for the object dearest to me in life, the reformation of a loved one. Last week I promised God that when that prayer was answered I would acknowledge it publicly. To-night I have received word that that one has within the week begun to lead a changed life.

Chinese Duplicity

PROOF has been discovered in the Imperial Archives of China that, as all along suspected, the government was in league with the Boxers and actively encouraged them in murder and outrage. Receipts have been found, signed by Boxer officers, for money paid for the heads of foreigners and for other money with which to provide arms and rations for the Boxer forces. This discovery indicates such gross duplicity on the part of Chinese statesmen that little confidence will be felt in any promises they may make, or in any treaty they may sign. The Emperor and Empress Dowager, however, have apparently been convinced that some concessions must be made to the foreign powers. They have ordered the degradation of Prince Tuan, the head of the Boxers, and the most influential statesman in China, and have directed that his way be stopped and he be handed over to a court which shall decide on an appropriate punishment for him. A similar edict has been issued relating to several lesser offenders. In view of these orders, Germany has modified her demands, which did not receive the support of the other powers, and has agreed to wait an answer to three questions which have been submitted to the representatives of the powers who are directed to investigate before answering. These questions are: 1. Whether the list of offenders to be punished is complete and accurate. 2. Whether the punishments are adequate. 3. In what way the foreign powers can control the penalties imposed. When answers to these questions have been received, negotiations for peace will be commenced. Efforts have been made to induce the Emperor and Empress Dowager to return to Pekin, but hitherto without success. Indeed, an announcement bearing the Emperor's signature has been made of a withdrawal to a still greater distance. He recalls the fact that Singan, in the Province of Shensi, was the former seat of the Imperial Court, and declares his intention of proceeding thither. The Emperor points out that the town has the advantage of being "defended by nature," which is true, for it is surrounded by lofty mountains and is almost inaccessible to a hostile army. The decision to remove there has the appearance of an intention to defy the powers. So long a journey would not be undertaken except on serious grounds. The removal of the court is an arduous undertaking, as there are no roads, and when the court moves it does so in a leisurely manner and with banners and paraphernalia that only a large retinue could transport. It is a pity that China's rulers do not see that their interests will be promoted by submission rather than by defiance. The blood of the missionaries whom they have killed calls to God for punishment, and unless they repent and give pledges for future good behavior, God may use the foreign powers as his instruments for executing judgment upon them.

I will set my glory among the heathen and all the heathen shall see my judgment that I have executed and my hand that I have laid upon them (Ezek. 39: 21).

A Disputed Heirship

A curious problem has been submitted to the Surrogate of New York. Early this year a widow died, leaving property valued at nearly half a million dollars. In her will, she directed certain legacies to be paid aggregating about one-half of the whole. The balance she left to two unmarried ladies on condition that they left Chicago where they were living and took up their permanent residence in the home in which she had spent her life, and maintained the home in the condition in which it was when she died. If the sisters failed to fulfil the condition the property was to go to certain other persons who were named. The sisters promptly occupied the house and claimed the property. The executors, however, were afraid to pay the money because they had been notified by the other heirs that the sisters intended to return to Chicago as soon as they had received it. In the event of their doing so, the condition on which they were to have the property would be violated, and it would belong to the heirs designated by the widow. It would appear that the sisters will not be able to substantiate their claim so long as they live, inasmuch as there will always be the possibility of their return to Chicago. The executors have appealed to the Surrogate to find out what constitutes the permanent residence contemplated in the will. Perhaps a compromise may be adopted by giving the sisters the income of the property while they reside in the house, the executors holding the principal for them to dispose of by will, if they secure it by fulfilling the condition of living in the house till they die; or if they fail to fulfil the condition, the executors would have the principal to hand over to the other heirs. It is so that God treats his children. They enjoy the blessedness of religion while they live, but the full glory is held in reserve for those who are faithful unto death.

Who will render to every man according to his works: to them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life (Rom. 2: 7).

THE IMPERIAL HOUSEHOLD OF CHINA ON A JOURNEY

Spinal Anæsthesia

A remarkable discovery, claimed by a New York physician and by German specialists in Berlin, promises to be of great value in critical operations. It is that it is possible to produce insensibility to pain without depriving the patient of consciousness. The agent used is cocaine, and it is injected into the spinal canal. In an operation on a patient at Oakland, Cal. recently, the cocaine was thus used. The patient was a lady who had been injured in a railroad accident and it was necessary to amputate both her feet. The doctors found that owing to the condition of her heart it would be fatal to administer either ether or chloroform. Resort was therefore had to the cocaine injected directly into the spinal canal. Ten minutes after the injection the lower limbs were so completely benumbed that the patient though perfectly conscious could not feel the knife, and the operation was successfully performed. In another case in Chicago the right leg of a man was amputated under the same conditions. He never lost consciousness, but did not suffer any pain in the operation and it was an hour and a half before the numbness disappeared. This discovery is likely to prove very valuable, relieving the patient of the weird dread of stupefaction, as well as of the danger of death from anæsthetics. If science can thus permit the patient to retain consciousness while making him impervious to even the pain of mutilation, why should we doubt the possibility of God keeping alive our consciousness even after we leave the body altogether?

Without my flesh shall I see God (Job 19: 26, R.V.)

Three Useless Marriages

A woman was arrested at New Haven, Conn., a few days ago on a charge of bigamy that appears likely to involve her in serious consequences. She was the wife of a citizen of Memphis, Tenn., and had been married ten years. Her health broke down two years ago and she became an invalid. A physician who attended her and succeeded in reestablishing her health after prolonged treatment, became infatuated with her and persuaded her to leave her husband. She went to Oklahoma and procured a divorce. But Oklahoma divorces of that kind are not recognized by the Tennessee courts. However, she marrried the physician and they went to live in New Jersey. Some doubt entered the minds of the pair about the legality of the marriage, so they went through another ceremony before a magistrate. Hearing that the husband she had deserted in Tennessee was searching for her, the woman went to Connecticut, where another wedding was held. She has now been arrested in spite of her three marriage ceremonies and has been held for trial. She does not appear to have realized the real difficulty in her case. The question at issue was whether she was legally divorced from her first husband, and that question could not be decided by repeating her marriage ceremony with another. People sometimes make the same mistake in religion. When they sin after being converted they think they need another conversion, whereas what they really need is to break completely with sin in order to be united to Christ in holiness of life.

That ye put off the old man which is corrupt and be renewed in the spirit of your mind and that ye put on the new man which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness (Eph. 4: 22-24).

A Long Search for a Child

A press dispatch from Port Jervis, N.Y., announces that the search of a father for his six-year old daughter is likely to be successful. The child has been lost for more than two years. She was left at home in charge of two other children, while their parents went on a short journey. When they returned the little girl was missing and the children could not tell where she had gone. The woods and the western slope of the Shawangunk Mountains were searched for her, but no trace of her was found. Inquiries were made in all directions, but in vain. Recently, however, the father met a man, who in passing through the country near Hawley, Pa., had spent some hours at a gypsy camp where there was a white child of about the age of the missing girl. He had spoken to her and had noticed certain scars on her face and neck which he described. They tallied exactly with marks on the missing child. The father overjoyed at this first intelligence he has had of the daughter he has sought so long, started immediately to find her. The gypsies had broken camp when he reached the place indicated, but he has no doubt of being able to trace them and recover his child. The little girl is too young to understand her father's anxiety on her account, or to send him any clue to her whereabouts, but she will doubtless be glad to see him when he appears and will willingly quit her degraded associates. That does not always happen with God's wandering children. Though they are told that he is longing for their return, they would rather stay in the paths of sin than go to him:

The Lord your God is gracious and merciful and will not turn his face from you, if ye return unto him (II. Chron. 30: 9).

BRIEF NOTES

The American Baptist Missionary Union announces that all of its missionaries in China are known to be safe, and are either out of the country now or in seaport towns.

At a meeting of Zionists held recently in New York, Rev. Joseph Seff, of Vienna, a member of the Central Committee, announced that a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine would soon be a realty. The money necessary for the first payment to the Sultan of Turkey has all been pledged. An American auxiliary society was organized.

The problem of the down town church has apparently been solved by the University Presbyterian Church in New York, of which Dr. Alexander is pastor. It has a membership of 2,230, of whom 150 were received last year. The endowment fund of the church amounts to $80,603. When merchants and professional men grow rich and move to the suburbs, they may help to keep their old church at its work by thus providing an income for church work.

Rev. J. F. Carson, of Brooklyn, N. Y., called attention in a recent sermon to ominous religious statistics. He said that the number of conversions in the Presbyterian Church during the past year had been 53,883, which was an average of only seven to each church. One-fifth of the Presbyterian churches reported no conversions during the year. In the Congregational Church the average was four to a church. In the Baptists also the average was four.

The Christian and Missionary Alliance held its seventeenth annual convention, Oct. 5 to 15, in the Gospel Tabernacle, New York. There were eight meetings each day, beginning with an early morning prayer-meeting. As usual, one day was devoted to prophecy and another to divine healing. Each day there was a missionary meeting at which the missionaries of the Alliance now home on furlough delivered addresses. Rev. A. B. Simpson presided, and several eminent clergymen and Christian workers participated in the exercises.

THE WAY TO SORROW AND THE WAY TO JOY

THE PRODIGAL SON

International S. S. Lesson for October 28: Luke 15: 11-24.

"HIS FATHER SAW HIM AND HAD COMPASSION AND RAN AND FELL ON HIS NECK"

....By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT, Luke 15: 18: "I will arise and go to my father."

THIS lesson, which shows us the bitter dregs in the cup of sinful pleasure, is very timely, for a period of luxury has brought to our country the usual consequence, namely, undue devotion to selfish pleasures, which easily pass into sin. Americans of earlier days, with little wealth, almost universally worked six days in the week, and took their rest on the seventh in the Church and the home. Now, with fifty-two holiday Sundays and at least as many more summer holidays, and many more days devoted to carnivals, contests, conventions and other celebrations, during which for days multitudes of men and women play the child, if not the beast, we have almost as many holidays a year as Rome had when it fell amid the cries of "Bread and games"; almost as many as the "child nations" of to-day, which are forever in the nursery in the care of kings and queens because they have turned their multitudinous "saints' days" into play days and devil's days. Those who think only of "bread and games," of business and amusement, miss not only their high calling as sons of God, but even the selfish enjoyment, which is their highest aim. Pleasure seekers in the long run are not pleasure finders. Happiness eludes not alone those who seek it sinfully, but even those who seek it selfishly, and is won by those who seek it to please God, instead of themselves, and to bless others—in doing which bliss comes to themselves in coy surprises. There is a profound truth in Isaiah's saying that in order to win higher "delight," we should turn away from selfish "pleasure" (Isa 58: 13, 14). He said it for the Sabbath, but it is true of every day. The prodigal story shows it is preeminently true that sinful pleasure is but the pleasing froth of a cup whose dregs are headache and heartache.

1. Sin is the way to sorrow.
2. Repentance is the way to joy.

These are the teachings, not of the parable only but of history.

God the Father Even of Prodigal Sons A certain man had two sons. This greatest of parables is devoted to picturing the greatest of truths, namely, that God is the loving Father, not alone of the upright, but even of sinful men. In its deepest import, it is the parable of the "prodigal's" Father. There is a special sense in which only those who have been born of the Spirit are "sons of God," while others are "children of the devil" (John 1: 12; Rom. 8: 14; John 8: 44); but in this parable Jesus expressly teaches that Gentiles, as well as Jews; the wayward, as well as the worthy, are sons of God, loved even when not loving. The wandering sheep is still a sheep, not a goat; the lost coin is still a coin, though the king's image upon it is hidden with mud. One of these two sons, though his sins have not yet burst out in acts, is already a sinner at heart, plotting to get away from the moral restraints that a loving father puts on him "for his good always." But the son who is planning vice and the son who prides himself on his morality, unlike as they are in character, are both alike sons.

A Bad Start in Life The younger son took his journey into a far country. It seems incredible that to-day, as in this parable, beings endowed with affection can be so ungrateful and beings endowed with reason can be so foolish as to run away from love, human and divine, expecting to be happier in escape from the restraints of affection and wisdom. Why should anyone suppose that God's laws are given to make us miserable, and that we can get more joy by colliding with them? The railway engineer might as well suppose he would bring about a happier time for himself and his passengers also by jumping the track. Only on the smooth track of God's laws can life run smoothly.

Usually the prodigal does not start out for a life of sin, but only for one act of sin—"just this once." But one wrong act may wreck a whole life, as one wrong turn of the helm wrecks a ship or one wrong turn of a switch wrecks a train. One act of dishonesty has launched many a life into a career of crime. One glass may start or revive an appetite that shall hold its victim enslaved for life in body and soul. Joy or sorrow, heaven or hell may be in a "Yes" or "No," or even in a moment of silent consent, as Waterloo was lost to Napoleon by a peasant's lying nod.

It is usually after yielding to single acts of sin and tasting their deceptive pleasure that one concludes to get away from the watchful eye of parents and from whatever would keep conscience awake, and devote his energies to sinful pleasures. The foolish ostrich, hiding his head in the sand, thinking his pursuers cannot see him because he cannot see them, is an embodiment of wisdom compared to the man who tries to run away from God and conscience. In the words of the prodigal Byron, who tried it in vain:

> No exile from himself can flee:
> To lands though more and more remote,
> Still, still pursues where'er I be
> The blight of life—the demon thought.

The "far country" that the prodigal sought, where sin can be indulged without reproach, is beyond the River Lethe, the river of forgetfulness—a delusive mirage that no mortal ever reached in this world or any other.

The Wastes of Sin Wasted his substance in riotous living. Rum wastes property like a Galveston tidal wave, only more so. It would take many Galveston disasters to work as much destruction of life and property as dissipation produces in its total of blasted lives every year. Health is given us as a means of happiness as well as usefulness, but sin wastes that. Patients are largely prodigals in various stages of wandering, some not yet very far gone, that God is seeking to bring back to the fold through his faithful watch-dog, Pain. Wealth is also given as a means of happiness, partly to supply those who hold it with wholesome luxuries; most of all, as an instrument of doing good. But sin wastes that—makes it a blasting curse to ourselves and others; almost every one knows of some once rich man, now a drunken beggar. And sin wastes reputation and character, the very diamonds of life, throwing them into the mud-banks of evil-doing.

Boys and girls should be taught, not in classes, but one by one, by parents and teachers, that God has given them godlike powers which they cannot waste in vice without most disastrous consequences. It is a difficult question to talk about and may be best introduced by the aid of two skilfully written W. C. T. U. books, Almost a Man, Almost a Woman, supplied at 25 cents each by Dr. Mary Wood Allen, Ann Arbor, Mich.

The Prodigal Way is the Way to Poverty He began to be in want. Want is very largely the bitter fruit of wickedness. Poverty sometimes causes intemperance, but in a much larger number of cases drink causes poverty. The "new charity" gives to the poor "not alms but a friend," and that "friend" should devote himself chiefly to cutting off the vice roots of poverty by the preventive charity of moral reform.

A CHINAMAN'S CONCEPTION OF THE PARABLE OF THE PRODIGAL SON

In a wicked life hunger is sometimes God's rudder to turn a wandering life about. A Christian life may begin in even so low a motive. The prodigal was now caught in the "mighty famine" of sin, and was ready to cry for help. That saying is worth repeating, "The lack of goods for the higher wants is not so sad as the lack of wants for the higher goods." The most pitiful prodigals are those who want no better life. Blessed are they, however sinful, that "hunger and thirst after righteousness." Their case is less hopeless than that of the self-satisfied Pharisee.

Prodigals Not Promoted in Business He sent him into his fields to feed swine. Rather than starve, the prodigal sold himself to slavery on such hard terms that, although he escaped starvation, he was not allowed to satisfy his hunger, even with the pods with which he fed the swine. To a Jew, this was the most repulsive of all occupations. The Jews, being prohibited to eat pork, particularly abhorred the swineherd. Any honest occupation is really honorable, far more so than idleness, and especially if it is the best a man can do. But it is surely dishonorable to lose promotion and go the other way because of vices. To-day many a man is losing his place on the railroad or elsewhere because he drinks beer or smokes cigarettes, and so risks his employers' interest by fuddling his brains or weakening his strength. A recent report of the United States Bureau of Labor declares that more than half the employers in the United States, judging by wide inquiries made, discriminate in employing men in favor of those who do not drink, or at least will not while on duty. Some months ago the Weather Bureau refused to employ longer those who smoke cigarettes, and this example is spreading to railroads and other fields of work. Sin prevents promotion in many ways. As a prisoner put it: "God Almighty has fixed this world so that it pays to do right." Attempts to get ahead in this world sometimes seem to succeed for awhile, but in the long run it is safest not to fight against omnipotent laws. In the words of Dr. Washington Gladden:

> And fierce though the fiends may fight,
> And long though the angels hide,
> We know that the truth and right
> Have the universe on their side.

No doubt this slave feeding swine in the parable was intended to picture men who have become the slaves of their own animal passions. He had left home for greater "personal liberty," and, like so many since, had found instead personal slavery. He would find freedom only when his character had become so changed that the thing he was permitted to do would be the thing he wanted to do, and the thing he was forbidden to do would be the thing he had no wish to do.

The Insanity of Sin He came to himself. This implies that in sinning he had been beside himself. When one really comes to himself he also comes to the Father, from whom it is insanity to turn. If a million people had attempted to reach the city of Washington by traveling westward across the continent only to find, when they had spent all their money, that to succeed in their quest they must turn about and beg their way back, we might reasonably expect that those who had seen and read of this folly would not make the same costly mistake. But millions of prodigals have vainly sought a happy life in going from God, only to learn in hunger and shame that it is by turning about and going to God that the greatest joy is secured, and yet millions more who have seen or read of these tragedies are at this very hour starting on this same "fool's errand," in pursuit of the "fool's gold" of sinful pleasure.

"He came to himself." Repentance is a return to reason. Reason is not the antagonist of Faith but the asker at her door. Surely it is a "reasonable service" to put our bodies under the laws of their Creator (Rom. 2: 1). When one's life has been marred with sin Wisdom cries, "Come now and let us reason together; though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow." A Christian life is the personified Wisdom which brings us "length of days in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor." The insurance tables and tax lists of to-day echo Wisdom's ancient cry.

Under the Evening Lamp

The Fisherman's Life

HOW much life and motion, how much poetry and happiness are associated in our minds with the sea. Its waves ever restless, and often turbulent, sweep around the habitable globe, and across its furrowed track the great ships pass to and fro, carrying the passengers and the freight which make lands acquainted with and dependent upon lands, far off as men measure distance, but near to one another in these days of steam.

The life of the fisherman who gains his bread by deep sea toiling is never one of ease. He encounters rough weather, long cold nights, days of absence from his home and dear ones. But the home-coming is always very happy. The wife has a light in the window if night has fallen. Its clear shining is as a beacon to the sailor's heart, and he knows it means a loving welcome, a clean hearth, and a comforting supper. In the morning the old mother and the bairns are waiting to greet the boat as it comes gallantly in to the shore. And if the sea was smooth and the wife went on the little voyage which may have been only for a few hours, then the baby in the grandmother's arms and the boy playing with his toy ship are just as glad as they can be, and the parents will be hugged and kissed, and the wee one will put up little dimpled arms in greeting and those people need not envy a monarch on his throne. The father may exclaim:

"King, king, crown me the king,
Home is the kingdom and Love is the king."

Peasant in a foreign country or New England sailor, the experience will be the same, of joy and gladness when the boats come home.

WHEN THE BOATS COME HOME

Children and Beauty

A love of beauty is discernible in children at a very early age. The baby grasps the bright ball, or attempts to clutch the orange which attracts his gaze. Every home circle and nursery should cater to the dawning love of beauty in a little child's mind, and its walls should be adorned with a pretty paper and hung with a few good pictures, which need not be costly. A child likes to see its mother in clothing of soft and bright colors, and is often repelled by sombre black.

I was very much touched when meeting Mrs. Birney, President of the National Congress of Mothers, soon after she had sustained a very severe bereavement, to find her wearing in her home a purple gown. "My children are saddened by crape and deep black," she explained, "and so in their presence I seldom appear in deep mourning." A lady told me that several years after her husband's death, she overheard her little son talking to a neighbor's child. "My mama would be as pretty as yours," he said. "if she did not have to wear such ugly frocks, that they make her look queer and cross." The mother respected the child's insight, and put on a white gown soon after for his sake, laying off her gloomy garments altogether.

A child likes an orderly and attractive school-room, and many a teacher has a happier time with her classes, and brings them on more successfully than she otherwise could, by the simple method of giving them a beautiful background, with growing plants in the room, and objects of art where the children can enjoy them. These things do not teach the pupils Latin and mathematics, but they help to educate them, in the true sense of education which is a leading out, a development in the child of the best in his character and possibilities.

A Family Necessity

An indispensable household appendage is the family medicine cabinet which should be conveniently located for the mother's use, in case of an emergency. She should not omit to keep on hand absorbent cotton, strips of linen for bandages, adhesive plaster for cuts, linseed oil and lime water for burns and scalds, and such time-honored remedies as camphor, ginger, mustard, paregoric, aromatic ammonia, quinine and cholera mixture. Listerine should be on the shelf, and if there be a favorite family cough mixture it may as well be kept where it can easily be found. This medicine cabinet is for precaution and for sudden exigencies and slight ailments. When there is decided illness always send for the doctor at once.

The Tool-Chest

Among useful presents for your boy on his birthday, none takes precedence of a tool-chest. Facility in the handling of tools is an accomplishment most desirable for the men of the house, and he may as well begin to acquire it while he is a lad. A great many pennies may be saved by the householder who can perform small odd jobs of mending and making without recourse to a mechanic, while it is delightful to live in a certain indifference to the carpenter and the plumber. The boy does not live who does not feel an inch taller, with a real, not merely a toy, tool-chest of his very own.

Dead on the Field of Honor

In a very entertaining book, The Recollections of a Missionary in the Great West, the Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady tells of a cyclone incident which was very touching. Many of our readers are familiar with cyclones and tornadoes, and know how terrific is the onslaught of a dreadful storm of wind, wrecking churches, houses, shops and whatever man-made edifice stands in its way, uprooting trees, destroying crops, doing an immensity of damage in the space of a few brief moments.

"One Sunday," says Dr. Brady, "I was called upon to preach a memorial sermon for a young woman who had been killed in one of these cyclones. She was a schoolmistress and was boarding around. (That phrase may need explanation to townspeople, but in country places it used to be very common for the different families to entertain the teacher a fortnight at a time, usually as part of her salary.) With something like a dozen people she was caught in a large house which stood on the edge of a high bluff, by a tremendous cyclone. The house was completely wrecked and every inmate of it except one was killed immediately, or died within an hour or so. The one who survived, though badly injured, said the family were at supper when the storm struck the house; that the little schoolmistress happened to sit next the omnipresent baby at the table in its high chair. When they found the poor girl that night she was still alive, though unconscious, and she died almost instantly. The awful force of the wind had torn from her person everything she had on, including two rings, except one shoe. Her hair was actually whipped to rags. She had been driven through several barb wire fences and every bone in her body was broken. In her arms, however, and clasped tightly to her breast was the dead body of that little infant; womanlike, she had seized the child when she felt the shock of the storm, and not even the tornado itself had been strong enough to tear the baby from her arms. It was a splendid example of that altruistic instinct of womanhood upon which religion and society depend.

"Dead on the field of honor, little mistress of a larger school. Blessed is her name among those who knew her."

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-all

—HUSBAND. Try the plan of showing your wife more attention. Save her steps; bring home little presents to surprise her, and see that she has money in her purse.

—DORA. Send your mother's card with your own to the young gentlemen whom you wish to invite to your house. Your mother should assist you by her presence in receiving any friends at their first call. We hold mothers socially in great honor now.

—MARJORIE. Even very small children are in these days taken to the dentist regularly. The first teeth should be carefully looked after and filled, so that there will be no nights of crying with toothache; and if they are too crowded, the dentist will remove them to make room for the second teeth.

—JOHN. President Angell, of Ann Arbor, said the other day that one reason a man went to college was that he ought to be more of a man. Go by all means, if you can. No, a manly fellow loses no caste by working his way through college. But he needs a fine physique to stand the double labor, bodily and mental.

—INSOMNIA. Try eating a piece of thin bread and butter, or a biscuit when you are wakeful. Even the most innocent sedatives are dangerous if their use becomes habitual. I think that you should retire at a regular hour, and sleep in a very dark room, with plenty of fresh air. Do not be afraid of thorough ventilation.

Dollie's Reverie

HER voice was raised in singing
Praises to God that day;
Her head was bent in reverence
When the pastor knelt to pray.

Her little hand was clasping
A coin so round and bright,
That she had earned by rocking
A babe to sleep at night.

Her childish mind was busy
As she bowed her sunny head;
She thought of far-off Hindus
In need of Christ and bread.

"I wonder," she was musing,
"If there's a child like me,
That has a dear, good mama
And papa, too, you see.

"I wonder if at evening
She rocks the babe to sleep,
And sings to it about the woods,
Of shadows long and deep.

"I wonder if her brother
Is as jolly as can be.
I wonder if he teases her
As Tommy teases me.

"I wonder if, when mama says
'To bed, my sleepy dears,'
They kneel, and humbly thank the Lord
For stilling all their fears.

"I wonder"—here she looked dismayed,
For just beneath her nose
The contribution-box was poked,
Her wonderings found a close.

Oh, Dollie, though your gift was small,
The Lord did surely see
The sacrifice so sweetly made.
His blessing rest on thee!

—KATE HAYES.

About the . . . Sunday School

IT is confidently asserted by some observers that among what may be called the better classes, presumably the educated and comfortably housed and clothed classes, the Sunday School is on the wane. We are pointed to the very small numbers of children in the schools of city churches located in the fashionable quarters, and are informed that there is a return to the original theory of the Sunday School which limited it to children who at home had no Christian nurture.

We hardly think there is any decline outside our large cities in the numbers or interest of the Bible school. If decline there be, we fear it is not a token for good. The mother who does not send her children to Sunday School because she takes them regularly to church, and also because she devotes a certain period of time on week days and on the Sabbath to their religious instruction, to their study of the Word of God, and to the catechism and hymn-book, is not to be blamed. She is doing for her children what her duty indicates.

But in too many instances if the children do not attend the Sunday School they receive no religious training of any kind. To thousands upon thousands of our young people growing up the Bible is an inoperative book, because they know as little about it as of Homer or Plato. They have not been taught to regard it as of binding authority, and of its pages they are densely ignorant. This could not be if once a week they sat in a little circle around the teacher, and read a portion of Scripture, talking it over, and coming into contact with one who longed to bring them to Christ.

The Sunday School should be the adjunct at once of the home and of the church. In the ideal school the whole family attends, the parents either teaching or forming part of a Bible class, the little ones enjoying the infant class, and the whole group entering into the current of the school, as they all engage in the work of the church itself.

We need the next generation for Christ. By whatever means they are to be brought to Him, they must be led now. To-morrow may be too late. If they are to be saved from the miasma of doubt and the curse of indifference to God, they must be trained as the forefathers were in the knowledge of God, in reverence for the Bible, and in the habit of prayer.

SAMANTHA AT CARLSBAD

THE Emperor felt my talk deeply, I knew by his looks; he looked completely wore out; it wuz from admiration and or I knowed—they're real fatiguin'when carried to a length.

Sez I: "It is a dretful thing to have all the beasts of the world git mixed up and a-fightin' and chankin' each other up, as they have seemed to, whilst the Powers have sot and looked on. Jest now it looks to me as if the Russian Bear is gittin' the best on't, though the Lion has generally come out on top, and the Eagle has done noble work a-shriekin' and fightin' and protectin' her young.

"It seemed to me and Josiah that the Powers took things pretty easy for quite a spell, and loitered along the way when their ministers and missionaries wuz chased into a corner and the Boxers ready to take their heads off. It makes a sight of difference in such things whose heads are in danger. If it wuz the Powers' own heads, for instance, there would probable been more hustlin' round.

"But things are in a dretful state in China. It is a great pity I hadn't knowed what wuz comin' when I wuz there; I could probable done lots of good advisin' the Empress and tryin' to make her do as she ort to, though my pardner thinks the blame hain't all on China. He argys wrong, but is sot on it. He sez spozen he wuz slow with his spring's work and didn't keep his fences up, or hustle round so and mebby didn't pay Ury so big wages as the Loontowners did in their factory, and wuzn't what they called sound on the doctrines. You know they are seven-day Baptisses over in Loontown and Shackville; but Josiah sez if them two Powers got together and tried to force Loontown and Shackville civilization and ways onto Jonesville, which is a older place and glad to be kinder settled down and mind its own bizness; and if they should try to build roads through Jonesville medders and berry lots and set up their tabernacles and manufacturys there and steal right and left and divide Jonesville into pieces and divide the pieces amongst 'em, why, sez he, 'I would arm myself and Ury and fight to the bitter hind end.'

"Sez Josiah: 'Why do we want our pleasant woods and fields turned into noisy bedlams by the whirrin' of wheels, creakin' of engines and the roar and smoke and dust of traffick. Spozein' we should make more money and dress better and own more books; money hain't everything in life, nor hustlin' in bizness; peace and comfort and mindin' your own bizness is sunthin'.'

The Alcoholic "Powers"

" 'And wheresoever them noisy manufactories go, there goes whiskey,' sez Arvilly. A neighborin' woman who wuz by and jined in: 'What good duz it do to try to settle which is the right Sunday if at the same time them proselyters brings pizen that crazes their converts so they can't tell Sunday mornin' from Friday midnight, bring the preachin' of love and peace and the practice of hatred and ruin, the creeds and catechism packed on with opium and whiskey.'

" 'Yes,' sez Josiah, 'let me catch the Loontown and Shackville Powers tryin' to divide Jonesville into pieces and grabbin' the pieces and dividin' 'em up amongst 'em and turnin' us out of house and hum, I guess them powers would find they had got hold of a Boxer when they come to cut up my paster and divide it and the medder back of the house where grandfather Allen's grandpa and great-grandma lays with a white railin' round 'em, kep' up by the Allens two hundred years. I guess they'd think they had got holt of a Boxer—yes indeed!' and Josiah Allen breathed hard and looked warlike.

" 'But,' I sez, 'Josiah, you haint got it right; there is more to it.'

"And he sez fiery red in the face and sithin' hard, 'There is generally more to everything.' And I sez, 'So there is, Josiah.' "

"YOU CAN GET A CART AND A DONKEY AT CARLSBAD"

I see the Emperor lookin' round anxiously and he seemed to be on the very pint of startin' away. I mistrusted he wanted to go and git more folks to hear my wonderful eloquence, but I couldn't wait and I sez, "Time and Josiah are passin' away and I musn't detain you; you Powers will have to do the best you can with what you've got to do with. Wisdom is needed here, and goodness, piles and piles of goodness and patience and above all prayer to the God of love and justice for help. He is the only Power that can bring light into the dark problem confrontin' the nations. He can settle the question and will, if you Powers trust Him and try to foller his teachin's."

"Id'no what you are goin' to do with Mr. Lie and his folks, the only receipt I can give you is what I told you. Seekin' earnestly for patience and wisdom from on high, payin' no attention to the blue light that rises from the low grounds lit by Greed, Ambition and Revenge, follerin' from day to day the light that filters down from heaven through the winders of the mind and soul, and keepin' them winders as clean as possible so the light can shine through. Brushin' away as fur as your powers can, the black cob-webs from your own civilizations whilst you are tacklin' the scrubbin' brush to cleanse older and dirtier ones, and don't for mercy sake in the name of freedom take away freedom from any race or nation. I d'no what else you can do."

Agin he looked anxiously round as much as to say, oh why, why don't somebody else come to hear this remarkable talk?

Farewell to Emperor Franz Joseph

And sez I, "I will say in conclusion for your encouragement, fur off over the hills and dells of the world and Jonesville there will be one follerin' you with earnest good wishes and prayers and will help you Powers all she can and may God help you and the other Powerses and farewell."

He looked dretful relieved as he shook my hand and I passed on. I guess he had worried for fear it would be out of sight, out of mind with me, and I rejoined my pardner. The rest of our party had passed on into another gorgeous apartment but my faithful pardner had waited for me. He wuz rejoiced to see me I knowed, though his words wuz:

"What under the sun wuz you hangin' round and preachin' to a Emperor for? I believe you would dast anything."

"I hope I would," sez I, calmly, "upheld by Duty's apron strings." I wouldn't have it knowed in Jonesville for a dollar bill that right there in the Emperor's palace Josiah demeaned himself so, but he did say:

"I don't want to hear any more about them infarnal strings."

And a gorgeous official looked round at him in surprise and rebuke. Well, we didn't stay a great while after that. We walked round a little longer through the magnificent rooms, and anon we met Arvilly. She wuz lookin' through a carved archway at the distant form of the Emperor and unfastenin' the puckerin' strings of her work-bag, but I laid holt o' her arm and sez:

AT THE "BUBBLING WELL," CARLSBAI

"Arvilly, for pity sake help me fin Robert and Dorothy. She turned with me, and my soul soared up considerable t think I had already begun to help th powers and lighten their burdens. An pretty soon the rest of our party jined us and we returned home to our tar ven.

Miss Meechim wanted to visi Carlsbad, the great Bohemian wa tering place. She said it wu a genteel spot and very gentee folks went there to drink the wate and take the mud baths. And s we took a trip there from Vienna It is only a twelve-hours' journe by rail. Our road lay along th valley of the Danube, and seeme to be situated in a sort of a valle or low ground, till we reached th frontiers of Bohemia, but it wuz al interestin' to us, for novelty is a refreshin' to older ones as to chil dren. Cheerful, clean-lookin' littl villages wuz scattered along th way, flourishin' orchards and lon fields of grass and grain, and no a fence or hedge to break th peaceful beauty of the picture.

Anon we entered a mountainous country with blue lakes and forest of tall pine trees and knowed we had entered Bohemia. We see gyp sy tents anon or oftener, for wha are gypsies but true Bohemians wanderers at will, hither and yon.

Josiah mentioned the idee of our leavin' the train for an hour or two and havin' our fortunes told by a real gypsy, but I told him sotey vosey that my fortune come along about as fast as I wuz ready for it, and I didn't know as I wanted to pay these swarthy creeters for lyin' to me. And he didn't contend for it, for which I wuz thankful.

All along the way we see shrines with the faces of our Lord and Mary and Joseph lookin' out of 'em. And anon a little hamlet would appear, a meetin'-house with five or six dwellin' houses clustered round it like a teacher in the midst of half a dozen scholars. Flowering shrubs and fruit trees almost hid the houses of the quiet little hamlets, and then we'd go by a village with forty or fifty houses, and as I told Arvilly, in all these little places so remote from Jonesville and its advantages, the tragedy of life wuz goin' on just as it did in bigger places.

A Land of Orchards

And she said she wondered if they drinked; sez she, "If they do there is tragedies enough goin' on."

Bohemia is a country of orchards. I should say there was fruit enough there so every man, woman and child there could have bushels and bushels of it to spare after they had eat their fill. Even along the highways the bending trees wuz loaded with fruit. A good plan, too, and I told Josiah I would love to introduce it into Jonesville. Sez I, "How good it would be to have the toil-worn wayfayers rest under the shady branches and refresh themselves with good fruit."

And he said "He didn't want to toll any more tramps into Jonesville than there wuz already."

And I spoze they would mebby find it so handy to have all the good fruit they wanted hangin' down over their heads as they tramped along—I d'no but it would keep 'em from workin' and earnin' their fruit.

Anon the good car would whirl us from peaceful country into mountain scenery, huge ledges of rock would take the places of the bending fruit trees, and then jest as we got used to that we would be whirled out agin, and see a peaceful-lookin' little hamlet and long, quiet fields of green.

In the harvest fields we see a sight that made me sad and forebode, though it seemed to give Josiah intense satisfaction. We see as many agin wimmen in the harvest field as we did men, and in Carlsbad we see young girls carryin' brick and mortar to the workmen who wuz buildin' houses. I thought as I looked out on the harvest fields and see wimmen doin' all the hard work of raisin' grain and then havin' to cook it after it wuz made into flour and breakfast food it didn't seem right to me, it seemed as if they wuz doin' more than their part. But I spozed the men wuz off to the wars fightin' and gittin' killed to satisfy some other man's ambition, or settlin' some other men's quarrels.

Arvilly Warns Josiah

Josiah sez, smilin' happily, "Wouldn't I look uneek to see Philury mowin' in our oat and wheat fields, and you and Sister Bobbett rakin' after and loadin' grain and runnin' the thrashin' machine?"

"Yes," sez I, "when I foller a thrashin' machine, Josiah Allen, or load a hay rack I will look uneeker than will ever take place on this planet, I can tell you to once."

But Arvilly sez, "Don't be too sure, Josiah Allen's wife; with three wars bein' precipitated on our country durin' one administration, and the conquered contented legions havin' to be surrounded by our soldiers and fit all the time to keep 'em from laughin' themselves to death, you don't know how soon all of our men will be drafted into the army and we wimmen have to do all the farm work."

"Yes," sez Josiah, "that is so, and you would be a crackin' good hand to pitch on a load of hay or mow away, you are so tall."

"And you," sez she with a defiant mean, "would be a good hand to put in front of the battle field; you're so short, the balls might not hit you the first round."

She put a powerful emphasis on the "might not," and Josiah looked real agitated, and I sez:

"Such talk is onprofitable, and I should advise you, Josiah, to use your mans influence to try to make peace for the country's good, instead of wars for the profit of Trusts, Ambition, etc., and you can escape the cannon's mouth, and Arvilly keep on sellin' books instead of ploughin' and mowin'."

Robert Strong and Dorothy enjoyed Carlsbad the best that ever wuz. I don't think they sot so much store by the water as they did the long mountain walks. Everybody here becomes a mountain climber. The doctors here agree that this exercise is a great means of cure, and they make the climbing easy and delightful. There are over thirty miles of good roads over the mountains and around Carlsbad, and as you climb upwards anon or even oftener you come to pretty little pavilions where you can rest and look off onto the delightful scenery, and every little while you'll come to a place where you can git good refreshments to refresh you.

The Famous "Sprudel"

The Sprudel, or Bubbling Well, bubbles over in a stream of almost boiling hot water five or six inches in diameter. It is so hot that you can't handle the mugs it is served in with your naked hand, you hold it by a napkin and have to take it a little sip at a time if you don't want to be scalded.

Josiah had disputed with me about the waters being so hot. He said it didn't look reasonable to him that bilin' hot water would flow out of the cold ground, and he knowed they had told stories about it. "Why," sez he, "if it wuz hot when it started it would git cooled off goin' through the cold earth."

But I sez: "They say so, Josiah—them that have been there."

"Well," sez he, "you can hear anything. I don't believe a word on't."

And so in pursuance of his plan and to keep up his dignity he wouldn't take a napkin with his mug of water, but took holt on't with his naked hand and took a big swaller right down scaldin' hot.

He sot the mug down sudden and put his bandanna to his mouth, and I believe spit out the most on't. He looked as if he wuz sufferin' the most excruciating agony, and I sez:

Samantha's Sympathy Wasted

"Open your mouth, Josiah, and I will fan it."

"Fan your grandmother!" sez he. "I didn't like the taste on't, Samantha; it most sickened me."

But I sez: "Josiah Allen, do you want some liniment on your hand and your tongue? I know they pain you dretfully."

Sez he, smilin' a dretful wapeish smile: "It is sickish tastin' stuff." And he wouldn't give in any further and didn't, though I knew for days his mouth wuz tender, and he flinched when he took anything hot into it.

As I would look dreamily into the Bublin' Well I would methink how I do wish I knowed how and where you come to be so hot, and I'd think how much it could tell if it would bubble up and speak so's we could understand it. Mebby it wuz het in a big reservoir of solid gold and run some of the way through sluice ways of shinin' silver and anon over beds of diamonds and rubies. How could I tell! but it kep' silent and has been mindin' its own bizness and runnin' stiddy for over six hundred years that we know on and can't tell how much longer.

Exceptin' in the great earthquake at Lisbon about a hundred and fifty years ago it stopped most still for a number of days, mebby through or, or fright, but after a few days it recovered itself and has kep' on flowin' stiddy ever since. It wuz named for Charles IV., who they say discovered it, Charle's Bath or Carlsbad. His statute stands in the market-place and looks quite well. Carlsbad has a population of twenty or thirty thousand, and over fifty thousand people visit Carlsbad every summer to drink of the waters. Drinking and walking is what the doctors prescribe and I d'no but the walking in the invigorating mountain air does as much good as the water. The doctor generally makes you drink a glass about seven in the morning, then take a little walk, then drink another glass, and another little walk and so on until about eight, when you can go to the Swiss bakery and get the zwiebach or twice baked bread, which is handed you in a paper bag, and then you can go to some cafay on the sidewalk and get coffee or tea and boiled eggs and make out your breakfast. No butter is given you unless the doctor orders it. That madded Josiah and he said they kep' it back because they wuz clost and wanted to save. He is a great case for butter.

The Donkey Carts of Carlsbad

And then after resting for an hour, you go for a walk up the mountains, or if you are too weak to walk, you can get a cart and a donkey, the driver walking alongside; up the shady paths you will go, resting anon or oftener at some pleasant summer house or cafay. At one you have your dinner, you can get it anywhere along your way or go back to your tarven for it; Josiah and I generally went back and got our dinner at the tarven and rested for a while. After dinner, folks generally go for another walk, but Josiah and I and Tommy used often to go to the Sprudel Corridor and listen to first-rate music or to a garden concert nigh by.

It wuz a sight to set in the Sprudel Corridor and see the crowds of people go by, each one bearin' a little mug in their hands or strapped over their shoulders. All sorts of lookin' folks, handsome and humbly, tall and short, thick and thin, thousands and thousands of 'em a-goin every morning for their drink and walk, drink and walk. There are six or eight little girls at each of these springs who hand the water to the guests and they have to work spry to keep 'em all supplied.

It wuz a remarkable coincidence that royalty so soon after havin' the advantage of a interview and advice from Josiah Allen's wife should agin' have the privilege of listenin' to her invaluable precepts. But not so remarkable when you come to study on it philosophically. For it seems to be a law of nater that if one thing happens, another similar thing follers on and happens too, such as breakin' dishes, onexpected company, meetin' royalty, etc., etc.

I wuz settin' alone in the Sprudel Corridor one day, for my pardner had gone with Tommy to see a little donkey that had took the child's fancy and we meant to let him have a ride up the mountain on it and the rest of our party had driv out to Mentoni's Spring, about two milds from Carlsbad.

I see a real sweet pretty girl coming along carrying her little mug just like the rest of the folks. She wuz attended by a good lookin' lady, who seemed to be her shaperone and looking out for her, and I hearn a bystander say:

"That's the Queen of Holland."

Run Down

That is the condition of thousands of people who need the stimulus of pure blood—that's all.

They feel tired all the time and are easily exhausted.

Every task, every responsibility, has become hard to them, because they have not the strength to do nor the power to endure.

William Ross, Sarnia, Ont., who was without appetite and so nervous he could not sleep, and Leslie R. Swink, Dublin, Pa., who could not do any work without the greatest exertion, testify as many others have done to the wonderful building-up efficacy of

Hood's Sarsaparilla

It purified their blood, gave them strength and vigor, restored their appetite and made their sleep refreshing.

It is the medicine for all debilitated conditions.

IN HIS VALISE

A Doctor Carries Grape-Nuts Food.

A physician in McDade, Tex., who cured himself by the use of Grape-Nuts food, says "Lagrippe left me a physical and nervous wreck, with indigestion, dilated stomach, constipation and neurasthenia. I tried electricity, vapor baths, traveling, camping, and medicines, ad nauseum.

"Finally I put myself on Grape-Nuts food and before the first package was gone, I made such an improvement that it seemed difficult to believe. I finally got to carrying Grape-Nuts in my valise, and in my pocket when I didn't have a valise. Yesterday I secured a new case of two dozen packages.

"The facts are that I could eat, and did eat, digest and assimilate the food and gained remarkably in strength. I am now regularly attending to my practice. I have been twenty years in practice, and am free to say that Grape-Nuts food is the most perfectly and scientifically made food I have ever known. My name, for professional reasons, should not be published." It can be given privately to those who care to inquire, by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

GALVESTON
STILL NEEDS HELP

VARIOUS relief measures for Galveston and neighboring territory are still going forward, for there is yet pressing need of assistance. It is true that the various expeditions, carrying medicines, nurses and tents are returning, the Salvation army being the last to leave the field, and this fact is cause for much general gratification because it argues that such aid is no longer in demand; that the sick are well or on the road to recovery. The city is being rapidly restored and the citizens able to look after themselves, as far as personal service is concerned. But Texas needs to be kept for many weeks before a generous and prayerful public. Such an awful tragedy as that which swept the gulf coast, devastating Galveston, destroying homes, crops, cattle, poultry, everything, and sweeping away all implements of labor, is not a misfortune which admits of swift recovery.

Our own readers have done a noble part in relieving the desolated section. Gifts continue to come for the widow, the orphan, the destitute and the desolate. The spirit in which these gifts are made is indicated in many letters, of which we quote from a few below:

E. H., Chicago, Ill., $5. I pray that you may receive enough to meet the urgent needs of the suffering and destitute ones in Texas.—M. S. W., Deep River, Conn., $10. In memory of my dear father. Two weeks ago he was sitting here with me and said: "I will send a check to the Galveston sufferers." A few days after, I laid him away, "asleep in Jesus."—H. M. E., Ashland, Ky., $2. May God bless the many offerings towards this cause.—Mrs. S. M. T., $2. In the name of the Master.

THE CORONATION OF THE LAMB

I.

BEHOLD the royal diadem,
Behold the Prince arrayed,
Behold the sovereignty of God
Upon the Lamb was laid!
He stands a conqueror evermore
Whom all the host of heaven adore.
Majestic, sweet, in glory bright,
They crowned him Saviour, Lord of light.

II.

Before the great celestial throne,
Before the throne of God,
Before the Seraphim, who there
In shining vesture plod.
That marshaled throng, what glory sway
Upon that great triumphant day.
Rejoice, ye heavens, the chorus rings,
The Christ is Lord and King of kings.

III.

Beyond the broad uplifted arch,
Beyond the azure blue,
Beyond the glitt'ring stars that shine
With all their brilliant hue.
Victorious Lamb, who came to bear
So meekly all that mortals share,
Art now enthroned, O Son of light,
Installed with God's authentic might.

IV.

Beneath the canopy so high,
Beneath the drifting cloud,
Beneath thy fulgent light, O moon,
Let voices thunder loud.
Sing forth the glories of his name;
Let every tongue his love proclaim.
To Christ, the Lamb, let praises rise
To hail the Monarch of the skies.

Lawrence, Mich. MRS. J. ROSEBOOM ADAMS.

GOOD READING FOR OUR SOLDIERS

Recent messages received by the International Committee Young Men's Christian Associations from its representatives with the army in China and the Philippines, report the supply of good reading matter to be inadequate to meet demands from the three hundred or more stations of the army. Gifts in quantities to enable the Secretaries to send supplies to every post should be sent at once. Books, late numbers of standard illustrated papers and magazines are specially desirable, and will be forwarded without further expense to the givers, if sent with express or freight prepaid to the office of International Committee Young Men's Christian Association, No. 3 West Twenty-ninth street, New York City.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is a wonderful blood purifying medicine. It is the enemy of all disease, and the friend of mankind. If you have never taken Hood's Sarsaparilla, you should try it.

The dictionary says success means prosperity; good fortune; a wished-for result. The success of Pearline means more. It means that Pearline has proved itself the easiest, quickest, safest, most economical thing to use in washing and cleaning. It means that women have found this true, and haven't been slow to tell others the truth about it. There's nothing odd about the success of Pearline. It does so much and saves so much. 595

Cleanliness is next akin to Godliness.

AMONG THE CLERGY.

Coffee Being Replaced by Postum Food Coffee.

"I am the wife of a minister. About three years ago a warm friend, an exemplary mother and the conscientious wife of a minister, asked me if I had ever tried giving up coffee and using the Postum Food Coffee. I had been telling her of my excessive nervousness and ill health. She said: 'We drink nothing else for breakfast but Postum Food Coffee, and it is a delight and a comfort to have something that we do not have to refuse the children when they ask for it.'

"I was surprised that she would permit the children to drink even the food coffee, but she explained that it was a most healthful beverage and that the children thrived on it. A very little thought convinced me that for brain work, one should not rely upon a stimulant such as coffee is, but should have food and the very best of food.

"My first trial of Postum was a failure. The maid of all work brought it to the table, lukewarm, weak, and altogether lacking in character. We were in despair, but decided on one more trial. At the second trial, we faithfully followed the directions, used four teaspoonful to the pint of water, let it boil full fifteen minutes after the real boiling began, and served it with rich cream. It was delicious and we were all won.

"I have since sung the praises of Postum Food Coffee on many, many occasions and have induced numbers of friends to abandon coffee and use Postum, with remarkable results. The wife of a college professor said to me a short time ago that nothing had ever produced so marked a change in her husband's health as the leaving off of coffee and the use of Postum Food Coffee." Edith Smith Davis, Appleton, Wis.

TO GUIDE "WANDERING BOYS"

A NEW DEPARTMENT OF RESCUE WORK BEGUN AT THE BOWERY MISSION : : : :

WEDNESDAY evening, October 3d, witnessed a new departure at the Bowery Mission. For several months past it has been noticed that a larger proportion of young men have been attending the meetings than at any previous period in the history of the mission, and it has become necessary to direct special attention to their interests. Growing out of this, the suggestion has arisen of making an endeavor to bring even younger boys, hundreds of whom crowd the streets in the lower section of the city, under the influence of the Gospel as it is proclaimed in this place. Mrs. S. J. Bird, "The Mother of the Bowery," has become especially interested in the question, and when the idea was first broached promptly offered to provide a free meal once a week for as many boys as could be gathered together in the hall. Arrangements having been perfected, several of the workers, and especially the new converts, started out with cards of invitation and instructions from the superintendent to find boys who were not connected with any other boys' work, church or mission.

This task was undertaken with great enthusiasm, and for several evenings previous to the meeting, these workers of the mission might have been seen down at the entrance of the Brooklyn Bridge among the newsboys, at the gallery doors of theatres, or seeking on the benches of the parks for sleeping boys, and presenting them with an invitation to attend this meeting. Musical friends most gladly acceded to the request of the superintendent to furnish an entertaining musical programme, while several experts in boys' work signified their interest in the experiment by being present, among them Mr. G. Hamilton Dean, President of University Place Boys' Club; Mr. R. H. Swartwout, of St. George's Church Boys' Club; Superintendent B. W. Tice and Prof. J. D. Holmes, of the West Side Boys' Home; Superintendent Hodge, of the Remington Gospel Settlement, Buffalo; Superintendent Theodore G. White, of the Church of the Holy Communion Boys' Club, and International Secretary E. M. Robinson, of the Y. M. C. A. It was a mixed and motley crowd that clamored at the doors for admittance. The old mission had never witnessed such a scene, and, notwithstanding the noise, it was perfectly refreshing for once to hear the merry shouts and laughter of young boys. After the programme was fairly started, these East-Side, down-town children showed that they knew how to behave themselves. The chief part of the entertainment was provided by youthful performers. One of them, Willie Rannie, son of one of the converts of the mission, delighted his neighbors with a pianoforte solo. Then other three boys joined him in singing. The mission organist, Mr. Benke, played several selections on the great pipe organ, the children showing their partiality for Sousa's marches by uniting their shrill voices to the sonorous tones of the organ. Mr. Josten, Secretary of the Greenpoint Y. M. C. A., not only rendered some exquisite violin solos himself, but brought over with him a mandolin band of six performers who did splendid service. Mr. Wilbur Unger, from Montclair, N. J., and Miss Grace Hildebrand, the brilliant soloist from Metropolitan Temple also performed, and their efforts were enthusiastically received. Dr. Klopsch delivered a practical address to the boys on the necessity of embracing every opportunity that might come in their way for living an honorable and useful life. Mr. Dean and Mr. Swartwout also spoke.

One pleasant feature of the gathering was the large number of young men who attended, of the ages of from sixteen to twenty, and who, after the smaller children had been dismissed, remained behind to hear the discussion on the subject of permanently establishing a Young Men's Association in connection with the mission. This after-meeting was addressed by Dr. Klopsch, Prof. Holmes and others, and there is little doubt but that, with such a beginning, a most valuable work will be accomplished in the future among young men of this character. The mission, so long famous for its rescue work, may now be considered fairly launched in the direction of a still more interesting and valuable work—that of prevention. Every week many "mother's boys" find their way down into this dark and sinning section of the city, and it will be more than ever the aim of the workers to reach them before they have taken many steps in a career of sin. These boys, many of whom are mere children, find their way to New York City and to the Bowery from every State in the Union. Only last week a youth, scarcely more than eighteen, who had tramped and beaten his way on freight cars from San Francisco, came to the mission. It was the first place he visited on arriving in the city, and of course he was at once taken in hand and cared for. All around this great country there are mothers and fathers, whose hearts are almost breaking with anxiety for their wandering boy. Let them write to the Bowery Mission, for very often just these boys come in here, and thousands of mothers' prayers have been answered within these hallowed walls by the recovery of the lost ones. The beautiful village of Cazenovia, one of the most charming in central New York, is the home of a man who overcomes a natural reluctance to publicity in order that those who are kept from work or business by illness, or who are weak and suffering, may know the remedy which will restore them to health and strength. The man is John H. Riley, a blacksmith of skill and integrity, who, with his brother, succeeded to the business founded by their father. In reply to questions Mr. Riley said:

"About two years ago I was taken down with inflammatory rheumatism and was flat on my back, racked with pain and as helpless as a child for fourteen weeks. During these weeks I suffered as only those who have had inflammatory rheumatism can suffer. I had the best medical attendance but without avail.

"Before I was taken sick I had seen advertisments of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People which stated that they were good for rheumatism. I was willing to try anything for relief so I got some and was benefited almost immediately. I had taken but six boxes when I was able to return to my work at the forge, but I continued taking them till nine boxes were used up. I have had no return of the trouble since. I consider Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People a wonderful remedy, and I have recommended them to a great many people."

THE Annual Missionary Convention of the Disciples of Christ is now in session in Armory Hall, Kansas City, Mo., and is one of the largest gatherings yet held by this denomination, noted for its missionary and evangelic spirit. The Foreign Christian Missionary Soety celebrated this year its silver jubilee. ecretary A. McLeon, in an instructive ldress, recited the main features of the ciety's history. Secretary Rains presentl an excellent financial exhibit; Rev. lbert Buxton retold the story of Adonim Judson; Prof. L. M. Sniff spoke on Stewardship," and Rev. S. T. Willis adessed the convention on "The Spiritual xpansion of Christendom." "The Gospel's Unceasing Aggressiveness" was the eme of Rev. J. M. Van Horn. Rev. A. . Horvout spoke on "Children's Day," d Dr. W. T. Moore read a poem on The Heroes and Heroines" of the mison fields. Among the missionaries atnding the convention are: James Ware, hanghai, China; F. E. The evening session of Thursday was occupied entirely by the returned missionaries, and was full of interest and enthusiasm.

The Kaiser's Rebuke to China

During the present troubles in China, the German Emperor on several occasions has addressed his troops departing from Berlin or Potsdam for the front in strong terms, reminding them of their duty as Christian soldiers. In his reply to the letter of the Chinese Emperor Kwang Su, promising a libation as a peace offering in memory of Germany's murdered Ambassador, Emperor William evinces the spirit of a Cromwell, who makes no half measures with the enemies of Christianity. He wrote:

I have observed with satisfaction that Your Majesty is anxious to expiate according to the custom and precept of your religion the shameful murder of my Minister which set at naught all civilization. Yet, as the German Emperor and a Christian, I cannot regard that abominable crime as atoned for by a libation. Besides my murdered Minister there have gone before the throne of God a large number of our brethren of Christian faith, bishops and missionaries, women and children, who, for the sake of their faith, which is also mine, have died the violent death of martyrs and are accusers of Your Majesty. Do the libations commanded by Your Majesty suffice for all these innocent ones? I do not make Your Majesty personally responsible for the outrage against the Legations, which are held inviolable among all nations, nor for the grievous wrongs done so many nations and faiths and to the subjects of Your Majesty of my Christian belief. But the advisers of Your Majesty's throne and the officials on whose heads rests the blood-guilt of a crime which fills all Christian nations with horror must expiate their abominable deed. When Your Majesty brings them to the punishment they have deserved, that I will regard as an expiation which will satisfy the nations of Christendom. If Your Majesty will use your imperial power for this purpose, accepting to that end the support of all the injured nations, I, for my part, declare myself agreed on that point. I long for peace, which atones for the guilt, which makes good wrongs done and which offers to all foreigners in China security for life and property, and, above all, for the free service of their religion.

Bible Study at Northfield

Northfield Seminary and Mount Hermon School have opened with more students than ever before. In the former there are enrolled 402 students, and in the latter 434. The Northfield Bible Training School will hereafter be open to both men and women. Rev. C. I. Scofield, D.D., the well-known Bible teacher, has accepted the position of President, made vacant by the death of Mr. Moody. Among the new features is the opening of the Bible classes and lectures to persons who do not contemplate devoting their lives distinctively to mission work, but who wish to become more efficient in their work for Christ in their own churches and communities.

REGISTERED TRADE MARK

SKIRT BINDINGS

Ladies' tailors advertise to rebind dress skirts with S. H. & M. Bindings at prices ranging from $1.25 up to $1.75. At these prices it will be seen that the tailors charge in the neighborhood of one dollar for the work.

If you use inferior bindings you will have to have them replaced twice or more during the life of a skirt and will be obliged to expend a dollar or two in money or your own time. This shows how unwise it is to use any but the best bindings. S. H. & M. Bindings will last as long as the skirt and will always look better and give you far more satisfaction than any other bindings made.

The S. H. & M. Bindings are the only bindings accurately fitting the curves of a skirt and present that elegant and distinctive appearance which is the pride of every well gowned woman.

The next time—and every time—you buy skirt bindings, look on the back or on the label of every yard of Bias Velveteen or Brush Edge Bindings for the S. H. & M. registered trade mark. If you insist upon buying no other bindings you will always be sure that you have the best that are made, or can be made, and will save time, money and annoyance.

HOW ENGLAND TREATS HER ISLANDS

PROHIBITION FOR NATIVE RACES EVERYWHERE..

REV. WILBUR F. CRAFTS, PH.D

WHEREAS the supplying of intoxicating liquors to the aboriginal natives is productive of serious mischief to the said aboriginal natives and is the cause of numerous crimes against life and property; and whereas it is expedient to prohibit the supplying of such intoxicating liquors, etc.—From the laws of New South Wales.

In prosecuting some special studies, I have just secured from Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, British Colonial Secretary, a golden sheaf of British prohibitory laws, one of which is as follows:

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c., &c.

A REGULATION

(Made in the name and on behalf of Her Majesty under the provisions of the Western Pacific Order in Council, 1879.)

TO PROHIBIT THE SUPPLY OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS TO NATIVES OF BRITISH NEW GUINEA AND ADJACENT ISLANDS.

1. If any British subject in British New Guinea and adjacent islands comprised in the British Protectorate sells or gives or otherwise supplies to any native of New Guinea or adjacent islands aforesaid, or to any native of any island in the Pacific Ocean resident in British New Guinea and adjacent islands aforesaid, any wine, spirits, or any other intoxicating liquor, he shall, on conviction thereof before the Court of Her Majesty's High Commissioner, be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds or to imprisonment with or without hard labor for any period not exceeding three months.

2. If it shall appear to the Court that such wine or spirits have been given bona fide for medicinal purposes, or other cause which shall, in the judgment of the Court, be reasonable and sufficient, it shall be lawful for the Court to dismiss the charge.

Done at Suva, Fiji, this fifth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six.

By His Excellency's Command,
WILFRED COLLET,
Secretary to the High Commissioner.

It has long been Great Britain's wise policy to protect her colonies against political "spoilsmen." Spain and other powers have found it a costly plan to allow their colonies to be exploited by political favorites—a fact which our country, a novice in colonizing, should ponder, and also England's new policy of prohibition for native races, both of opium and liquors, learned in the hard school of experience from the disastrous consequences of her former contrary policy. The nation that vetoed a Chinese Emperor's prohibition of opium in 1840-2 with a bayonet dipped in blood, has in her newest eastern colony, Burma, recently proclaimed prohibition, to be achieved gradually but surely. The nation which, with our own, made West Africa "one long bar-room and graveyard," has adopted the policy of prohibition for the Soudan, conquered by Kitchener's victorious abstainers, and for other new colonies of East Africa, just when we were turning the other way, abandoning in the Philippines the policy of prohibition for native races which we had so long maintained in the Indian Territory and Alaska.

Rev. Henry Richards, Baptist missionary in the Congo, in a recent letter to me, makes the following statement which we commend to our Congress and Chambers of Commerce:

"When the extra heavy tax was imposed on foreign spirits imported into West Africa, the region recently purchased by the English government from the Royal Niger Company, the trades complained that these heavy dues interfered with the trade. The Colonial Secretary replied that it was the intention of the government to discourage the drink traffic, as it ultimately destroyed all trade by destroying the population."

In the laws for Basutoland, South Africa, I find the following provision:

"The sale or gift, or disposal in any way, of wine, beer and spirituous liquors is hereby prohibited."

In Bechuanaland liquors may be sold to whites, but the following strong prohibitory law—we suggest it for the Philippines—protects the natives:

"Whoever, whether licensed or unlicensed, shall sell, exchange or give to or procure for any native in the said Territories any beer, wine or spirituous, or partly spirituous liquor in any quantity whatever, shall be liable, in addition to any penalty in respect to the sale thereof without a license, to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds sterling, and in default of payment to imprisonment with or without hard labor for a term not exceeding six months," etc.

Exception is made for a bona fide use as a medicine, the burden of proof of which rests on buyer or seller, and for native beer if unmixed with forbidden beer, wine or spirits. In this connection it should also be remembered that the British Government, prompted by united action of its missionary and temperance societies, which have given an example to the societies in this country, was the leader, with Belgium, in securing exclusion of spirituous liquors from the Congo region and more recently from a larger zone of Central Africa, by international treaties of sixteen great nations, in 1892 and 1899, the second of which is still pigeon-holed where the former was jeopardized by two years' delay—in the United States Senate.

But I wish especially to speak of Great Britain's exemplary course among the island peoples of Oceanica, to whom, not only in her own islands but in independent islands as well, she forbids her merchants to sell intoxicants, opium, firearms and dynamite, and that too without waiting for the cooperation of other nations, many of whom, including our own, allow their merchants to continue the crime against civilization which such traffic involves. A document on our "Foreign Relations" (52nd Congress, 2d Session, Ex. Doc. 1, Part 1), which I have secured through our State Department, contains a proposed international law for the extension of this British prohibition, by the cooperation of the French, German, Austrian, Italian Russian, Hawaiian, and American governments, to the traders of all these countries, which was submitted to them in 1884 and again in 1892, without result, though Dr. John G. Paton and his host of friends urged then and again this year that our government should at least do what England has done in the restraint of its own merchants, one of whom is the only trader in one of the New Hebrides islands, where his rum and guns are working an awful havoc.

Surely, when our people realize that conscience and commerce call us to this crusade for the protection of native races, we shall no longer lead the rear end of the international procession, pulling the other way. The law given herewith in facsimile, is in force in British New Guinea, and adjoining islands, over which the British Government exercises only a "protectorate," corresponding with our present relation to Cuba, whose liquor traffic we have increased rather than diminished, with no protection whatever for the native races against our American saloons. The same law has been enacted in separate statutes for the islands of Tonga, Rotumah and Savage Island. Let us secure from the Congress that meets at the portals of a new Christian century, the enactment of such a law for all merchants under American control, whether in our own islands or upon the high seas. We are loudly called to such action by the awful statement in the world survey of the liquor traffic presented to the British Parliament in February of this year, that the use of intoxicants is increasing in nearly all the countries of the world.

The Church of God has the ability, and it has also the responsibility, to turn that awful tide, and we believe will do it, if ministers and missionaries will give to her these facts that ring like fire bells.

A Remarkable Remedy for Rheumatism

Mr. J. F. Brookfield writes from Salisbury, N. C.: "While in Knoxville, Tenn., last December, I met an elderly gentleman, a professor of music, who had been troubled for several years with rheumatism. I told him I would send down, before I left town, a bottle of Tartarlithine, which I believed would help him if it didn't entirely relieve him. While in Montgomery, this trip, his son told me it did his father so much benefit that they had written to you to send their father half a dozen bottles. The benefit given to the old gentleman is very remarkable, after exhausting all the physician's skill, and the legion of remedies advertised for his complaint had been used."

Tartarlithine is supplied in bottles containing 50 doses at $1.00, and can be obtained of all druggists or post-free by mail. Pamphlets with Testimonials sent free.

DO NOT WORRY*

Christ's Injunction Against Useless Foreboding as Dishonoring to God

MORE injurious to human life, physical and spiritual, than work or hardship, is worry. It wears out the energies and ends in incapacity for usefulness. Careful forethought, prudent preparation for ills which may befall is commendable. No man is justified in neglecting his future nor the future of his family. Sickness may come; death is sure to come, and he ought to the full extent of his ability to provide for their coming. It is a grievous thing when in the hour of storm and stress there is no reserve on which to fall back. Christ's injunctions do not apply to foresight and prudence. They are directed against the habit of foreboding, of nervous apprehension, and of despondency in the face of possible misfortune. When he bids us take no thought for the morrow, he does not mean make no preparation for the engagements or calls of the morrow, but do not be harassed or cherish gloomy and depressing fears of coming ill. It is a good wholesome rule that would, if observed, lift the burden from many shoulders. The wise man is he who when he sees trouble approaching, sets himself to discover the best means of averting it, or mitigating it, and having made every preparation in his power goes forward to meet it with a brave heart, determined to bear manfully the worst it can do.

Christ cites several reasons for not worrying about material things. First, they are of small account compared with the soul. It is usually about the physical needs that men worry. "Shall I be clothed? Shall I be destitute? Shall I come to want bread?" These are the questions which make many men miserable. Do not dwell on them, Christ says. They concern the body only. It is the soul that is the essential thing and it is as much more important than the body as the body is more important than the food that nourishes it and the raiment that covers it. What they are to the body the body is to the soul. "The life is more than meat and the body than raiment." If the soul be developed, if it is kept pure and if it is resting securely in God's keeping, there is little reason to worry about whether the needs of the body will be always provided for. Many a man has tested this philosophy and has found it true. One who has tasted the bitterest dregs of poverty, who has seen his household treasures scattered under the auctioneer's hammer, and has known what it is to go without food because he had not the money to pay for a meal, testified recently: "I was happier in those days with my conscience clear, and conscious that the fault was not mine, than I have been when I had plenty of money and sin lay heavily on my soul." Poverty is not the worst calamity that may befall a man. If he has a manly spirit he can endure all that it can make him suffer, but who can bear remorse?

Another reason that Christ gives for not worrying is that God certainly cares for us. The birds teach us a lesson in this matter. They have foresight in their autumnal migration and in the building of their nests; but they are blithe and cheerful though they have not provision for a day ahead. God makes provision for them and surely we may trust him to make provision for his children. This does not mean a reckless disregard of future needs but a depression and a harrass which take all the joy out of life. Trust in God, Christ advises, and be sure that our confidence will be honored.

Christ reminds us of still another reason for not worrying. In the majority of instances it is not the necessaries of life that cause anxiety, but its superfluities. It is the modest fare, the shabby coat, the humble home that cause a foolish shame. Yet what matters it? The utmost that any one could do would not secure more than appearance. The lilies are beautiful in themselves and it is possible to lead a beautiful life in the most sordid surroundings.

Finally, he reminds us that the man who worries is no better that a heathen. We may not wonder that a heathen who knows nothing of God should worry; but he who has learned to say, "Our Father," should show more trust and should set a better example. To seek the highest spiritual good should be the first and chief concern; to all such the other meaner things are of little moment and God will take care that they are supplied.

Lord Roberts Knew Them

Lord Roberts has given his imprimatur to the collection of hymns popularly known as "Sankey's." When opening one of the Soldiers' Christian Association tents at Bloemfontein he inquired, "Whose hymns are these?" He was told, "Moody and Sankey's." "That's all right, then," was his reply.

Artistic Monuments COST NO MORE THAN PLAIN ONES in White Bronze Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. These Questions Will be Answered Nov. 21

1. Name a word that serves in the Bible as a metaphor for sorrow, a snare and the grave.

2. Is piano playing a really desirable accomplishment for any but persons of pronounced musical talent or for those who are professionals?

3. How can Paul's statement at Antioch (Acts 13:20) that the time of the Judges continued four hundred and fifty years, be reconciled with received chronology?

4. Would it be wrong for a Christian who is diffident and forgetful to make a prayer and learn it, so that it could be repeated when called upon to do so at a prayer-meeting?

5. When two persons quarrel and their friends are unable to reconcile them, should the friends be expected to espouse one side or the other, when the cause of the quarrel is purely personal to the two concerned?

6. Why is it that women complain so much more frequently than men do of lack of leisure?

7. Is a Christian business man who is quite solvent, but is aware that failure may come through some of his speculations, justified in putting some of his property beyond the reach of his creditors—say in his wife's name?

8. What remedy can be found for the isolation so frequently experienced in country farmhouses?

9. What should a church do when the minister, who has served it through a long period, is too old for acceptable preaching, if it is too poor to pay him a pension in addition to paying the salary of a younger minister?

10. What is the origin of the expression, to "take the cake?"

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

Questions of the Week

1. The Bible teaches that a wife should be "subject to her husband" in all things. Does such subjection imply implicit obedience even if it should lead on her part to a life of hopeless, slavish toil, that would wreck both mind and body, while the husband takes life more easily and apparently cares little for the consequences to his partner?

Certainly this teaching of the Bible does not mean blind, implicit obedience. Eph. 5:21-33 shows that the thought of subjection as used in Gen. 3:16 really means a yielding disposition. These verses also show that the compliance of husband and wife should be mutual and should come from hearts filled with love. In a home where the husband exacts unreasonable demands from the wife—demands which will injure her both bodily and mentally—it is not right for her to yield to his requests; for are not our bodies God's temples, and has he not commanded us to care for them as unto him? IVY D. SNIDER.

2. A certain animal is occasionally mentioned in Scripture as a type of wicked persons. Give five passages in which the resemblance appears.

The dog is mentioned as a type of wicked persons in the following passages: II. Kings 8:13, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" Psalms 22:16, "Dogs have compassed me; the assembly of the wicked have inclosed me;" Isaiah 56:10, "His watchmen are blind: they are all ignorant; they are all dumb dogs;" Philippians 3:2, "Beware of dogs; beware of evil workers;" Rev. 22:15, "Without are dogs and sorcerers." In justice to the dog, it ought to be said that only in the Orient is he the type of wicked persons; there, now as formerly, he roams about, fierce and hungry and semi-wild. But in other lands where he has become domesticated he is often faithful, sagacious, affectionate.

AMELIA HOYT.

Wolves are the animal referred to. 1. Zephaniah 3:3, "Her princes within her are roaring lions; her judges are evening wolves; they gnaw not the bones until the morrow." 2. Matt. 7:15, "Beware of false prophets which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves." 3. Matt. 10:16, "Behold I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves; be ye therefore as wise as serpents and harmless as doves." 4. Luke 10:3, "Go your ways; behold I send you forth as lambs among wolves." 5. Acts 20:29, "For I know this, that after my parting shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock." A. M. WARTHMAN, JR.

3. Is it our Christian duty to forgive one who has defrauded us, even though he neither asks, nor desires our forgiveness?

Yes. In Luke 33:34 we read, "Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Had there been no other distinct reference or command in the Bible, in regard to forgiveness, this last prayer of our Saviour, uttered in the midst of the climax of his sufferings, would alone clearly demonstrate the duties of his true followers in this particular respect. Can there possibly be a larger offense than defrauding one of his own life? And yet we find that under no less severe a trial, Christ has set us the example. But aside from this, he has repeatedly instructed his disciples and hearers, in such decisive language that his words can hardly be misconstrued. Mark 11:25, Luke 6:13, Matthew 6:14, 15, and also in the epistles we find in special reference to this question Col. 3:13, Eph. 4:2-32. Moreover, this act of forgiving, even when the offender has not asked forgiveness, has such an ennobling influence on the forgiver that this fact in itself must be sufficient recompense for any Christian man or woman. A magnanimous soul and a truly Christian spirit can lead one to no other course. Besides, it affords one even greater pleasure if he forgives ere an offender has shown repentance and be able to say, when he does ask his forgiveness, "Brother, I have already forgiven thee." Thus he not only will have done the noblest and best thing, but will also have kept our dear Lord's command, as he says (Mark 11:25): "And when ye stand in prayer, forgive, if you have ought against any." Not if he asks your forgiveness, but "if ye have ought against any."

A. J. KEMALYAN.

"Ask and ye shall receive," "Come unto me," "Whosoever cometh," and many similar expressions prove that Christ stands ready to forgive the sinner who turns from his sin. Were he to grant forgiveness unsought, to bestow it as a gift upon the sinner who is still steeped in wickedness and careless of the consequences, the gift would lose value and the divine attribute would soon cease to be exercised in such cases. God gives his mercy to "whom he will," but the heart first is moved before forgiveness comes. Christ's example teaches us to be in the attitude of forgiveness and to seize every opportunity for exercising that spirit towards those who may have wronged us; but we are not told anywhere in Scripture to send our forgiveness where it is not desired and where it might even be contemptuously treated. For one to tell a robber who had just plundered him, a swindler who had stripped him of his property, a thug who had waylaid and brutally assaulted him, "Sir, you have plundered, swindled, assaulted me; but I freely forgive you with all my heart," would be to put a premium on crime, to make society defenceless, and to make forgiveness worthless. The heart of the forgiven, as well as that of the forgiver, must be touched and responsive, else the forgiveness is wasted. This, however, does not imply that we are not to be ready to forgive; on the contrary, we should be quick to grasp the first opportunity to extend the gift of pardon to any one who has offended us and who realizes his offense, even in the slightest degree. ROBERT VYSE.

4. Is the gloomy picture of old age in Ecclesiastes 12, a portraiture of old age in general, or only of the old age of those who have not remembered their Creator in the days of their youth?

The picture, though it represents failing powers by natural exhaustion, is not gloomy except to one who "goeth to his long home" unprepared. It portrays the physical side of old age in general, which all shall see who do not die sooner, and is assigned as a reason for a spiritual preparation which shall give the soul a brighter prospect. C. P. ATKINSON.

5. Where, when and how did the expression to "keep under one's thumb" originate?

It originated in Rome at the time of the gladiatorial contests. When a gladiator was vanquished, it rested with the spectators to decide whether he should be slain or not. If they wished him to live, they shut up their thumbs in their fists. If to be slain, they turned out their thumbs. Hence, to be under one's thumb means to be under the influence or power of the person named, and to be controlled by his will.

EDITH C. ROBINSON.

6. Is a Christian business man justified in selling a particular article at cost price, with the object of causing the public to think that all his goods are below the market prices?

If his object is to create an impression that is not true, certainly not. But it is entirely possible to adopt the course mentioned above with no unworthy object. Every merchant knows the importance of attracting attention to his store and stock. Business breeds business. The smallest trade may lead to that which is larger. Hence, the custom adopted by many wise merchants of putting a particular article forward as a "leader," and selling it at so low a price as to draw shrewd buyers. Even though it be sold at cost, or below, it may be profitable in preparing the way for the sale of other things at normal prices. It is simply a species of advertising, and, in itself, and apart from the object stated above, is entirely justifiable. J. K. WILSON.

7. Why are bells tolled for the dead, and when was the custom introduced?

The custom is thought to date back to the time of Constantine (303 A.D.), who, after becoming a Christian and making Christianity the state religion, caused bells to be rung to call to worship, and to be tolled at the death of one of the faithful, not merely to announce the same, but rather that Christians might offer prayer "for the safe passage of such a one into Paradise." The somewhat superstitious custom of tolling the bell while persons were dying, prevalent in England and western Europe as early as the sixth century, was rather for the purpose of driving away evil spirits supposed to be lurking about at such a time ready to pounce upon and carry away the soul as it leaves the body. The origin of this custom among these barbaric tribes is unknown; it is not thought to have been directly due to the efforts of Constantine. It is quite certain, however, that our custom of tolling at death, and of striking a number of strokes equivalent to the age of the person, thus practically announcing his identity, have their origin in this barbaric custom.

CAROLINE SCHNEIDER.

8. Is a father wise in opposing the early marriage of his children when he has no objection to the particular marriages on their merits?

The father is not wise to oppose such a marriage as is personally satisfactory to him on the ground of youth, except under specific conditions. If there is physical immaturity he should guardedly seek to secure a proper season of delay. If the parties are of such temperament as that they are very apt to make shipwreck of their own happiness through youthful ignorance and inexperience, he should quite firmly insist on postponement. Or, if there is such disparity between the two persons in mental and moral development that uncongeniality, in spite of their love, may reasonably be expected to develop in the future, parental caution would be wise. A wise father will be very slow in interrupting the marriage of one of his children on grounds of youth when the match is satisfactory on its merits. There is too much risk of doing great harm to a whole life if such a thing is ever done violently. C. P. ATKINSON.

9. In what sense is the dragon associated with China's religion and history?

The belief in dragons in early times was as common in China as among other nations. The Chinese supposed the dragon to possess superhuman power; in fact, to be a sort of deity, and consequently made it the symbol of divinity. In traditional history, the dragon is associated with the lives of some of the earlier emperors, who are represented as having taken the form of flying dragons. The dragon in later years became the most prominent part in the heraldry of the Chinese coat of arms. G. A. HAURY.

10. Ought the sacrament to be refused to persons who, having been divorced, have married again?

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper, to which reference is probably made in the question, should not be refused to any one who comes to the table of the Lord in an humble, contrite spirit. No one has ever appointed us a judge over our fellow creature in this matter; besides this, it is the Lord's supper, not ours. Opinions of Christians with reference to the marriage of those who have been divorced differ so widely that the question of making it a bar to the sacrament cannot be seriously entertained. JOHN D. MEESE.

Miscellaneous Questions

Mrs. Wm. R., Beverly, Mass. Could not some of the nude figures of the Indian orphans be clothed next year? It is heartrending to see the poor things.

We trust that before many months, thousands of them will be clothed. Christian people are responding widely to our appeal for their support, but there are so many of these poor little famine waifs that the task is a vast one. Every child of God should help.

P. M., Russia, N. Y. Is it conceivable that a person would be happy in heaven if he knew that his father and mother, and all he loved on earth were lost and he knew it?

It is difficult, in view of the very little we know about heaven and the life of those admitted there, to conceive of their feelings and condition. All that we do know indicates a condition of happiness; that is certain. It may be that in the presence of God righteousness becomes so paramount a consideration, and sin is seen to be so dreadful and heinous a thing that the redeemed and purified soul shrinks from it as utterly loathsome, even when it exists in persons he loved in his earthly life. Pure souls may seem nearer to one in heaven than impure souls, though they may have had an earthly relationship. Christ being told that his mother and brethren desired to speak to him, said (Matt. 12:50): "Whosoever shall do the will of my father the same is my brother and sister and mother," as much as to say that spiritual likeness counted for more with him than physical relationship. Redeemed souls, in becoming like him, therefore, may not suffer such poignant sorrow as to us now seems inevitable.

Inquirer. In the several Gospel narratives of the talks of Jesus with his disciples, he assured them that whatever they asked the Father in his name would be granted. Assuming these were to be in the nature of reasonable requests, do they apply to believers and followers of the present day, or did they only apply to his disciples and in force only during their lifetime?

It is clearly to be presumed, from the character of many other passages, that the promise of an answer to the prayer of faith was made to believers generally. See Matt. 7:7, 8; Luke 11:9, 10; John 14:13, 14; Eph. 3:6; I. Tim. 4:8; Jas. 4:2; I. John 3:22, and 5:10.

K., Philadelphia, Pa. Has a religious body, without a charter, the right to perform the marriage ceremony, and if not, are all such marriages invalid? Also, can parties performing such marriages be liable to prosecution? What is the law governing this matter in the different States?

We have submitted this question to Mr. G. H. Crawford, a well-known lawyer, 37 Wall St., New York, who furnishes the following answer:

Religious bodies, with or without charters, do not perform marriage ceremonies. A marriage ceremony is performed by an individual, a priest, a clergyman, minister or magistrate. As marriage is in law merely a civil contract, no ceremony whatever is essential to its validity. Probably K refers to a marriage taking place in the presence of members of a religious body having no charter, and without the participation of a minister or priest. In such a case, if the parties are qualified to marry and agree to live together as husband and wife, the marriage is valid. Everything else, though usual and desirable is non-essential in law. There is no liability to prosecution in the case supposed in New York or any state, so far as we know. In some states there may be a penal law against a person who pretends to be a minister or magistrate and performs the ceremony of marriage as such. But the case put involves no deception and has no criminal element, therefore no prosecution would lie.

Subscriber, Corning, Calif. Two young people of different denominations, and who are active workers in, and love their respective churches and societies connected with them, are engaged to each other, and of course wish to be united in church work when married, but neither like to give up the church home they have been brought up in, and wish you to suggest what is the best to do under the circumstances. All things being equal, should the gentleman go over to the young lady's church, or vice versa? Or would you advise both joining another church?

All things being equal, if a sacrifice of preference is decided upon, it should be made by the gentleman. Mere denominational lines should not be permitted to stand in the way of mutual happiness and concord. He will probably never regret the concession, and she will love him the better for it.

M. Beardwood, M.D., Philadelphia, writes to correct a statement by W. Ray Burroughs in a recent issue of this paper that nicotine is found in tea and coffee. Mr. Beardwood states that "theine" in tea and "caffeine" in coffee are the only alkaloidal bodies found in these beverages.

MEMBERS OF THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF THE Y. M. C. A., RAILROAD BRANCH, PHILADELPHIA

THE GREAT Y. M. C. A. GATHERING IN PHILADELPHIA

THE tenth International Conference of the Railroad Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, which took place October 11–14, at the Pennsylvania R. Y. M. C. A. Building, Forty-first street and Westminster avenue, Philadelphia, goes on record as one of the most interesting and hopeful events of the present year. Over 1,000 delegates, including all classes of railroad men from presidents to brakemen were in attendance; 150 associations, with a membership of 37,000, found representation in the gathering; and Canada, England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Germany and Russia were officially present. The Czar, who takes a warm interest in this peculiar phase of work among men, and who is giving his personal attention to similar organizations throughout his empire, and particularly along the line of the Siberian Railway, sent two commissioners, M. Reitlinger, Assistant Manager of the Railway Pension Committee of the Russian Government railways, and M. Shidlovski, Chairman of the Mutual Help Society of Moscow-Kursh and the Nijhni-Novgorod Railways.

The Czar of Russia Interested

It will be remembered that, at the invitation of the Czar of Russia and Minister of Ways and Communication, Prince Hilkoff, Mr. Clarence J. Hicks, of New York, one of the six secretaries of the International R. Y. M. C. A. Committee, visited Russia last year, traveled over its chief railways, and made a report to the imperial government upon the condition of relief work among employees, commending much that he saw, but advising the adoption of some American ideas. The presence of the Czar's two commissaries at the Philadelphia Conference is the result, in part, of Mr. Hicks' recommendations. Germany directed Herr Paul Glasenapp, of the Embassy in Washington, to attend the Conference, and to later accompany the Russians on a tour of inspection over the railroads of our country.

A Great Army of Workers

That such a large concourse of men, earnest, intelligent and conscientious, should gather together from all parts of the globe to plan ways and means of advancing the moral, intellectual and spiritual interests of the world's vast army of railroad employees is full of promise. This army, moving from post to post and coming in daily touch with the traveling public, may be likened to a great itinerant force, wonderfully effective, according to its morale for good or ill. Since its organization at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1872, the development of the railroad branch of the Y. M. C. A. has been marvelous. At the first international conference, which took place in the same city in 1877, eighty delegates, representing eighteen Associations, were present; at the ninth, held two years ago, at Fort Wayne, Ind., 117 Associations were represented by 643 delegates.

Fighting the Saloon Evil

The creation of this department was for the sole purpose of guarding railroad men from the evils of the saloon and kindred temptations besetting them at every point; and this point, according to much testimony, is being admirably served. Sixty-eight separate buildings and more than eighty rented rooms or apartments located at as many division points, and combining the ideas of chapel, reading-room, library, and club-house, now minister to the social and spiritual life of the man of the rails, and hold him true to his better nature in many places and conditions where he must find himself on trial. It is the aim of the organization to extend the number of separate associations and to put up buildings specially planned for the convenience and comfort of railroad men, until every terminal and division point in every great railroad system is covered.

The opening address at the recent Conference was made by Mr. Charles E. Pugh, Second Vice-President of the Pennsylvania railroad, and among his most significant utterances was this:

"Your Association makes men better, and I believe more and more that the Y. M. C. A. has great power to keep the men straight, and that any financial aid we have given you is a good investment. You give our men the twin sisters—morality and education—all necessary to the successful man and a successful business. As the voice of the officers of the road I welcome all of you from far and near."

Many Prominent Speakers

Dr. Lucien C. Warner, of the International Committee, was chairman of the meeting; and Mr. C. B. Willis, of Milwaukee, conducted the music. Among the many prominent speakers were Rev. Theodore Cuyler, ex-Gov. Beaver, Col. John McCook, John P. Green, Vice-President of the Pennsylvania Railroad, W. H. Baldwin, President of the Long Island Railroad, and various members of the International Committee, John R. Mott, Geo. A. Warburton, and Evangelist "Jim Burwick." The presence and inspiring words of such men as A. J. Cassatt, President of the Pennsylvania; B. D. Caldwell, Traffic Manager Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, and C. M. Hobbs, of the Denver & Rio Grande, was substantial evidence of the interest taken, from a business standpoint, in the work of the R. Y. M. C. A. Mr. Walter C. Douglas, General Secretary of Pennsylvania Department, voiced the opinion of many when he said that "as a consequence of Y. M. C. A. work, America has given to the world in her railroad men the finest type of working men that the world knows to-day." He followed this with a tribute to Miss Helen Gould, the typical American woman and the "railroad man's best friend."

Miss Helen Gould Present

Miss Gould, whose large benefactions to every branch of the Y. M. C. A. are well-known, notwithstanding her earnest effort to keep them hidden, occupied with Mrs. Russell Sage, Mrs. A. J. Cassatt, Mrs. Reitlinger, Mrs. Shidlovski and other ladies, a position on the platform, and responded with a modest bow when the whole house rose to its feet in ratification of the compliment. It was not the first evidence this philanthropic lady had received from the gathering of the esteem in which she is held.

Saluting Miss Gould

Upon her entrance, the audience had risen and greeted her with ringing cheers and the Chautauqua salute. The reception to delegates by the Ladies' Auxiliary was one of the most delightful features of the Conference. A large company of prominent ladies, assisted by a number of railroad officials, made the hour a most pleasant one for the visitors. The Conference was marked by many interesting meetings for testimony, prayer and song, and every delegate, doubtless, went away inspired with the purpose to make true Dr. Cuyler's injunction: "As the trains you manage and work go out to carry a streak of sunshine everywhere, let your lives go out to carry light to others."

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

Hidden Royalty

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: II. Kings 11: 2, 3:

Jehosheba, the daughter of King Joram, sister of Ahaziah, took Joash, the son of Ahaziah, and stole him from among the king's sons which were slain; and they hid him, even him and his nurse, in the bedchamber from Athaliah, so that he was not slain. And he was with her hid in the house of the Lord six years.

GRANDMOTHERS are more lenient with their children's children than they were with their own. At forty years of age, if discipline be necessary, chastisement is used; but at seventy, the grandmother, looking upon the misbehavior of the grandchild, is apologetic and disposed to substitute confectionery for whip. There is nothing more beautiful than this mellowing of old age toward childhood. But here, in my text, we have a grandmother of a different type.

I have been at Jerusalem, where the occurrence of the text took place, and the whole scene came vividly before me while I was going over the site of the ancient temple and climbing the towers of the king's palace. Here in the text it is old Athaliah, the royal murderess. She ought to have been honorable. Her father was a king. Her husband was a king. Her son was a king. And yet we find her plotting for the extermination of the entire royal family, including her own grandchildren. The executioners' knives are sharpened. The palace is red with the blood of princes and princesses. On all sides are shrieks, and hands thrown up, and struggle and death-groan. No mercy! Kill! kill! But while the ivory floors of the palace run with carnage, and the whole land is under the shadow of a great horror, a fleet-footed woman, a clergyman's wife, Jehosheba by name, stealthily approaches the imperial nursery, seizes upon the grandchild that had somehow as yet escaped massacre, wraps it up tenderly but in haste, snuggles it against her, flies down the palace stairs, her heart in her throat lest she be discovered in this compassionate abduction. Get her out of the way as quick as you can, for she carries even a young king. With this youthful prize she presses into the room of the ancient temple, the church of olden time, unwraps the young king, and puts him down, sound asleep as he is, and unconscious of the peril that has been threatened; and there for six years he is secreted in that church apartment. Meanwhile old Athaliah smacks her lips with satisfaction, and thinks that all the royal family are dead. But the six years expire, and it is time for young Joash to come forth and take the throne, and to push back into disgrace and death old Athaliah. Now Joash, half affrighted at the armed tramp of his defenders, scared at the vociferation of his admirers, is brought forth in full regalia. The scroll of authority is put in his hands, the coronet of government is put on his brow, and the people clapped and waved and huzzaed and trumpeted. "What is that?" said Athaliah. "What is that sound over in the temple!" And she flies to see, and on her way they meet her and say: "Why, haven't you heard? You thought you had slain all the royal family, but Joash has come to light." Then the royal murderess, frantic with rage, grabbed her mantle and tore it to tatters, and cried until she foamed at the mouth: "You have no right to crown my grandson. You have no right to take the government from my shoulders. Treason! treason!"

While she stood there crying that, the military started for her arrest, and she took a short cut through a back door of the temple, and ran through the royal stables; but the battle-axes of the military fell on her in the barnyard, and for many a day, when the horses were being unloosened from the chariot, after drawing out young Joash, the fiery steeds would snort and rear passing the place, as they smell the place of the carnage.

The first thought I hand you from this subject is that the extermination of righteousness is an impossibility. Superstition says: "I will put an end to pure religion." Domitian slew forty thousand Christians, Diocletian slew eight hundred and forty-four thousand Christians. And the scythe of persecution has been swung through all the ages, and the flames hissed, and the guillotine chopped, and the Bastile groaned; but did the foes of Christianity exterminate it? Did they exterminate Alban, the first British sacrifice; or Zwingli, the Swiss reformer; or John Oldcastle, the Christian nobleman; or Abdallah, the Arabian martyr; or Anne Askew or Sanders or Cranmer? Great work of extermination they made of it. Just at the time when they thought they had slain all the royal family of Jesus, some Joash would spring up and out, and take and wield a very sceptre of Christian dominion.

Infidelity says, "I will exterminate the Bible," and the Scriptures were thrown into the street for the mob to trample on, and they were piled up in the public squares and set on fire, and mountains of indignant contempt were hurled on them, and learned universities decreed the Bible out of existence. Thomas Paine said: "In my Age of Reason I have annihilated the Scriptures. Your Washington is a pusillanimous Christian, but I am the foe of Bibles and of Churches." Oh, how many assaults upon that Word! All the hostilities that have ever been created on earth are not to be compared with the hostilities against that one Book. Said one man, in his infidel desperation to his wife: "You must not be reading that Bible," and he snatched it away from her. And though in that Bible was a lock of hair of the dead child—the only child that God had ever given them—he pitched the book with its contents into the fire, and stirred it with the tongs and spat on it and cursed it and said: "Susan, never have any more of that damnable stuff here."

How many individual and organized attempts have been made to exterminate that Bible! Have its enemies done it? Have they exterminated the American Bible Society? Have they exterminated the British and Foreign Bible Society? Have they exterminated the thousands of Christian institutions, whose only object it is to multiply copies of the Scriptures, and spread them broadcast around the world? They have exterminated until instead of one or two copies of the Bible in our houses we have eight or ten, and we pile them up in the corners of our Sabbath School rooms, and send great boxes of them everywhere. If they get on as well as they are now going on in the work of extermination, I do not know but that our children may live to see the millennium! Yea, if there should come a time of persecution in which all the known Bibles of the earth should be destroyed, all these in our pulpits and in our families extinguished—in the very day that infidelity and sin should be holding jubilee over the universal extinction there would be in some closet of a backwoods church a secreted copy of the Bible, and this Joash of eternal literature would come out and come up and take the throne, and the Athaliah of infidelity and persecution would fly out the back door of the palace. You cannot exterminate Christianity! You cannot kill Joash!

The second thought I hand you from my subject is, that there are opportunities in which we may save royal life. You know that profane history is replete with stories of strangled monarchs, and of young princes who have been put out of the way. Here is the story of a young king saved. How Jehosheba, the clergyman's wife, must have trembled as she rushed into the imperial nursery and snatched up Joash! How she hushed him, lest by his cry he hinder the escape! Fly with him, Jehosheba! you hold in your arms the cause of God and good government. Fail, and he is slain. Succeed, and you turn the tide of the world's history in the right direction. It seems as it between that young king and his assassins there is nothing but the frail arm of a woman. But why should we spend our time in praising this bravery of expedition when God asks the same thing of you and me? All around us the imperiled children of a great king. They are born of Almighty parentage, and will come to a throne or a crown if permitted. But sin, the old Athaliah, goes forth to the massacre.

Murderous Temptations are out for the assassination. But, blessed be God, there is such a thing as delivering a royal soul! Who will snatch away Joash?

This afternoon, in your Sabbath School class, there will be a prince of God—some one who may yet reign as king forever before the throne; there will be some one in your class who has a corrupt physical inheritance; there will be some one in your class who has a father and mother who do not know how to pray; there will be some one in your class who is destined to command in Church or State—some Cromwell to dissolve a parliament, some Beethoven to touch the world's harpstrings, some John Howard to pour fresh air in the lazaretto, some Florence Nightingale to bandage the battle wounds, some Miss Dix to soothe the crazed brain, some John Frederick Oberlin to educate the besotted, some David Brainerd to change the Indian's war-whoop to a Sabbath song, some John Wesley to marshal three-fourths of Christendom, some John Knox to make queens turn pale, some Joash to demolish idolatry, and strike for the kingdom of heaven. There are sleeping in your cradles by night, there are playing in your nurseries by day, imperial souls waiting for dominion, and whichever side the cradle they get out will decide the destiny of empires. For each one of those children sin and holiness contend—Athaliah on the one side, Jehosheba on the other. But I hear people say, "What's the use of bothering children with religious instruction? Let them grow up and choose for themselves. Don't interfere with their volition." Suppose some one had said to Jehosheba, "Don't interfere with that young Joash. Let him grow up and decide whether he likes the palace or not, whether he wants to be king or not. Don't disturb his volition." Jehosheba knew right well that unless that day the young king was rescued, he would never be rescued at all. I tell you, my friends, the reason we don't reclaim all our children from worldliness is because

We Begin Too Late

Parents wait until their children lie before they teach the value of truth. They wait until their children swear before they teach them the importance of righteous conversation. They wait until their children are all wrapt up in this world before they tell them of a better world. Too late with your prayers. Too late with your discipline. Too late with your benediction. You put all care upon your children between twelve and eighteen. Why do you not put the chief care between four and nine? It is too late to repair a vessel when it has got out of the dry-docks. It is too late to save Joash after the executioners have broken in. May God arm us all for this work of snatching royal souls from death to coronation.

The third thought I hand to you is that the Church of God is a good hiding-place. When Jehosheba rushes into the nursery of the king and picks up Joash, what shall she do with him? She knows that Athaliah and her wicked assassins will not bother the temple a great deal; they are not apt to go very much to church, and so she sets down Joash in the temple. There he will be hearing the songs of the worshipers year after year; there he will breathe the odor of the golden censers; in that sacred spot he will tarry, secreted until the six years have passed, and he come to enthronement.

Would God that we were all as wise as Jehosheba, and knew that the Church of God is the best hiding-place! Perhaps our parents took us there in early days; they snatched us away from the world, and hid us behind the baptismal font and amid the Bibles and psalm-books Oh glorious inclosure! We have bee breathing the breath of the golden cer sers all the time, and we have seen th Lamb on the altar, and we have handle the vials in which are the prayers of a saints, and we have dwelt under the wing of the cherubim. Glorious inclosure When my father and mother died, an the property was settled up, there wa hardly anything left; but they endowe us with a property worth more than an earthly possession, because they hid us i the temple. And when days of tempta tion have come upon my soul I have gon there for shelter; and when assaulted o sorrows, I have gone there for comfort and there I mean to live. I want, lik Joash, to stay until coronation.

O men of the world outside there betrayed, caricatured and cheated of th world, why do you not come in through the broad, wide-open door of Christia communion? I wish I could act the par of Jehosheba to-day and steal you awa from your perils, and hide you in th temple. How few of us appreciate th fact that the Church of God is

A Hiding-Place

There are many people who put th Church at so low a mark that they be grudge it everything, even the few dol lars they give toward it. They make n sacrifices. They dole a little out of thei surplusage. Oh, that God would remode our souls on this subject, and that w might appreciate the house of God as th great refuge! If your children are t come up to lives of virtue and happiness they will come up under the shadow o the Church. If the Church does not ge them, the world will.

Ah, when you pass away—and it wil not be long before you do—when yo pass away it will be a satisfaction to see your children in Christian society. You want to have them sitting at the holy sac raments. You want them mingling i Christian associations. You would like t have them die in the sacred precincts When you are on your dying bed, an your little ones come up to take your las word, and you look into their bewildered faces, you will want to leave them under the Church's benediction.

More than that, you yourself will want the Church for a hiding-place when the mortgage is foreclosed; when your daughter, just blooming into womanhood, suddenly clasps her hands in a slumber that knows no waking; when gaunt trouble walks through the parlor and the sitting-room and the dining-hall and the nursery, you will want some shelter from the tempest. Ah, some of you have been run upon by misfortune and trial; why do you not come into the shelter? I said to a widowed mother after she had buried her only son—months after—I said to her: "How do you get along nowadays?" "Oh," she replied, "I get along tolerably well, except when the sun shines." I said: "What do you mean by that?" when she said: "I can't bear to see the sun shine; my heart is so dark that all the brightness of the natural world seems a mockery to me." O darkened soul! O broken-hearted man, broken-hearted woman! why do you not Come into the Shelter?

I swing the door wide open; I swing it from wall to wall. Come in! Come in! You want a place where your troubles shall be interpreted, where your burdens shall be unstrapped, where your tears shall be wiped away.

Church of God, be a hiding-place to all these people! Give them a seat where they can rest their weary souls. Flash some light from your chandeliers upon their darkness. With some soothing hymn hush their griefs. Oh, Church of God, gate of heaven, let me go through it! All other institutions are going to fail; but the Church of God—its foundation is the "Rock of Ages," its charter is for everlasting years, its keys are held by the universal Proprietor, its dividend is heaven, its president is God!

Sure as thy truth shall last,
To Zion shall be given
The highest glories earth can yield,
And brighter bliss of heaven.

God grant that all this audience, the youngest, the eldest, the worst, the best, may find their safe and glorious hiding-place where Joash found it—in the temple!

RUSSIAN WAR CARTS ON THE SIBERIAN RAILROAD GOING TO THE FRONT

RUSSIAN OFFICERS ON THE AMOOR, WITH WHOM MR. NORTH TRAVELED

War's Terrible Havoc in the Amoor Valley

ACROSS SIBERIA IN WAR TIME

A Perilous and Remarkable Journey of 27,000 Miles

ONE of the most remarkable journeys ever undertaken, even in these days of improved facilities for travelers, has just been completed by Mr. Frederick A. North, Superintendent of Schools, Ocean county, N. J. He has now returned to New York, after covering a total distance of over 27,000 miles, his route taking him across the Atlantic, through England, continental Europe, Russia, Manchuria, China, Japan, and home, via the Pacific Ocean and Canadian Pacific Railroad.

Early last summer, Mr. North, who has already traveled extensively, resolved to make a journey over the great Trans-Siberian Railway which Russia has now nearly completed. Asia was then peaceful. On reaching Moscow, the traveler learned that the great Boxer rebellion had broken out in China, but he courageously proceeded. His route, for thousands of miles, lay through the very heart of the theatre of war in Manchuria, and there was peril on every side; but with implicit faith in Providence and under Russian protection he came through it all safely. A 1,500-mile voyage down the Amoor river took him through all the scenes of the recent sanguinary battles between the Russians and Chinese, about which very little has come to us by the cable. The account of his travels, which he has prepared for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be read with universal interest, as it sheds a flood of light on recent events in the war. Few travelers have ever passed through such an experience, and it is safe to assert that not even in Pekin or Tien-Tsin, have the horrors of war been so frightfully manifest as in the scenes Mr. North describes along the Amoor, with its blackened, silent villages, and its turbid stream, filled with the bodies of thousands of its slaughtered population.

His real story opens with this letter, written on his arrival in Moscow:

"Moscow, July 12.

"I have decided to attempt to cross Siberia. I shall meet with difficulties and hardships. War between earth's greatest empires—Russia and China—will render my journey of seven thousand miles to the shores of the Pacific, perilous if not absolutely impossible. For more than six thousand miles the territories of these two empires lie side by side, and for at least one-half that distance, my proposed route of travel will be on the border line. Mr. Smith, our American Consul at Moscow, advised me not to go to Siberia. The proprietor of my hotel said it was presumptious for a man unable to speak Russian or Chinese to attempt the journey at such a perilous time. These, with other discouraging influences, had well-nigh persuaded me to abandon the Siberian expedition. Some railroad men and a few others, however, say that my undertaking is possible. The Siberian railroad is taxed to its utmost with the transportation of soldiers, officers, horses, artillery, and munitions of war. Conflicting reports of Chinese atrocities, of mustering armies, and battles about to be fought prevade the city of Moscow. War clouds grow thicker every day. He who noteth the sparrows when they fall will keep me.

"I must now repair to the great South Eastern depot and at three o'clock take the train which goes two hunded versts (a verst is 3,500 feet, not quite three-quarters of a mile), directly south to Tula, thence directly east one thousand versts to Samara thence northeast four hundred versts to Ufa, thence across the Ural mountains into vast Siberia."

"UFA, July 15, 1900.

"After three days and nights of pleasant travel from Moscow, we have now arrived at Ufa, a city of fifty thousand inhabitants, at the western base of the Urals.

"My pleasant quarters are in a four-berth state room with gentlemanly and kind Russian army officers. There are six such apartments in this car, each containing four berths, in some respects like our American Pullmans. Every birth is occupied; nearly all in my coach are army officers, fully equipped, going to the Chinese War. They cannot speak a word of English and I communicate with them in German or French. They have just received a telegram that the Russians and Chinese are fighting at several different places. All of these officers are very anxious to get to the front.

"We have crossed more than a thousand miles of the great grain fields of Russia, passed through the cities of Tula, Penza, and Samara. We crossed the mighty Volga on a lofty iron bridge, a mile in length, supported by the most massive piers I have ever seen. To-night we go up into the Urals and to-morrow morning descend into Siberia."

"TCHELIABINSK,
"Siberia, July 16.

"We have just come down from the Urals and are now 2,500 versts from St. Petersburg, not quite half way to the city of Irkutsk, which is near Lake Baikal, in the centre of Siberia. We have just changed cars in the rain and taken comfortable quarters in the Siberian train which will be our home for seven days until we reach Irkutsk, two thousand miles away. Trains on the new Siberian railroad are run slow, about 300 miles a day, including frequent and protracted stops."

The traveler still further describes the various stages of his journey; Omsk, Tija, Irkutsk. At the latter city he writes:

"Here we have remained twenty-four hours to rest and get a proper understanding of hostilities in the country through which we shall endeavor to pass. The news from the border of China is ominous. Soldiers and officers fill the streets of Irkutsk. The Siberian reserves have been called out, and martial law has been proclaimed all along the border. I went to the bank to get a 100-ruble note exchanged for smaller sums, and the president of the bank, who I found could speak English, tried to persuade me to keep away from the contending armies, saying he had just received a telegram from Blagovechtchensk stating that the Chinese were tearing up the railroad, sinking the passenger steamers on the Amoor river, and killing Russian citizens along the border. I have now come 3,700 miles from St. Petersburg, am half way across Siberia, and cannot be persuaded to turn back until I find it absolutely impossible to proceed. I carry no weapon other than a little two-inch penknife with which to sharpen my pencil. No amount of weapons would avail me anything, but only make me an object of suspicion.

"Two or three days ago when our engine stopped to wood up and take water from one of the octagon tank-houses which are so prominent all along the line, some officers pinned a 6-inch white cap crown against a large fir tree, and not less than a dozen men with revolvers commenced bombarding it. Their bullets seemed to go everywhere and hit everything except the target. I could not withstand the temptation, for I knew that at that distance with a good revolver I could hit the cap cover every time, so I asked a Cossack captain to 'Let Americanski shoot once.' Since leaving Omsk the officers have called me nothing but 'Americanski.' I took the revolver and hit the bull's-eye the first time. They were surprised, but some said it was a chance shot and wanted me to try again. But when I made a second hole by the side of the first, they all shouted and demanded a third trial, which resulted as successfully as the first two. They were astonished; and since that time they have delighted to tell people how 'Americanski can shoot.' 'Can all Americans shoot like that?' they frequently ask.

"To-morrow forenoon we shall cross the deep, cold waters of that great inland fresh water sea surrounded by snow-capped mountains. It is 400 miles long and 10,000 feet deep. Thence we shall proceed through the wilderness, across rivers, over mountains, and across the treeless prairies, and then endeavor to force a steamboat passage down the Chilka and Amoor rivers to the Pacific."

"STRETENSK, Siberia, August 2.

"This little city is 6,750 versts from St. Petersburg, at the terminus of the railroad, on the Chilka River at the head of navigation on the Amoor system.

"Thousands of soldiers come and go daily here at Stretensk. Twenty flatboats, with a capacity of 1,000 soldiers each, are being built here to float troops down the river. The war has detained me here a week.

"This evening I shall be permitted to start by boat for Blagovechtchensk, five or six days distant, down the Amoor, where the most serious fighting is now going on. Plates of iron are being fastened on the right side of the pilot house."

On the boat journey he writes:

"During the last few days I have seen the fire, smoke and blackened ruins of many Chinese homes, villages and cities on the south banks of the Amoor. I have seen a Russian army of artillery, cavalry, and infantry pursue the Chinese as they fled from the smoking ruins of their homes and firesides, trampling in utter destruction the most carefully cultivated fields and gardens of vegetables, melons, vines, grain and fruit. This devastation has been so complete that now all along the border, from Potrovskya to Khabarovsk, a distance of one thousand miles, in which the great Amoor separates Manchuria from Siberia, not one Chinese habitation remains. I have seen the Amoor filled with the bodies of thousands of slain and drowned Chinese. I have seen thousands upon thousands of Russian and Cossack soldiers on their way to the conquest of Manchuria, many going down the river on steamers, barges, flatboats, floats and rafts, and other battalions over the mountains on horseback and afoot into the Chinese Empire, all singing war songs for 'God and our Father, the Czar.'

"Open hostilities were commenced here by the Chinese Boxers in the little city of Sakhalin, on the south side of the Amoor, shooting across the river into this city of Blagovechtchensk, thereby damaging property and killing a few of the people. As soon as a sufficient force of Russian soldiers could be collected, most of whom had been sent to other places, all of the Chinese living in Blagovechtchensk, to the number of three thousand, on suspicion that they were about to help their own people on the south side, were driven two miles above the city, and then told to cross the river. The Chinese replied, 'We have no boats.' 'Swim, then,' said the soldiers, and snatching away their money purses, forthwith drove the terrified Chinese into the river at the point of the bayonet. Only fifty Chinese reached the Sakhalin shore. The crows and Siberian wolves have fattened for the last two weeks on the river-stranded bodies.

"The Chinese in Sakhalin then dug trenches and rifle pits along the south bank of the Amoor, in front of their city, and replanted their cannon to withstand a river attack by the Russians. But the wily Cossacks went far above the city, crossed the river by night, and before the enemy were aware sprang upon them from the rear, applying the torch as they advanced. The Chinese soldiers fled.

"It is not my province to discuss here the right or wrong of Cossack war methods. My first duty is to give the unvarnished facts as they occurred, and allow the reader to draw his own inferences. It is true that many of the citizens of Blagovechtchensk told me that they were sorry that such acts of cruelty had been perpetrated by the Cossack soldiers. A man in the mechanical department of one of the Amoor steamboat companies, told me this morning that yesterday when he came up the river he saw a thousand bodies of Chinese floating in the river.

"All steamboats on the Amoor and its tributaries are now chartered by the Russian government at from 500 to 800 rubles a day and officers and soldiers only are allowed passage, except by written permission from Lieut. Gen. Gribski, governor of the province. He greeted me cordially and said: 'Americanski shall have permission.' To-night I shall leave by steamer Baron Korch to Khabarovsk, thence by rail to Vladivostok."

"VLADIVOSTOK, Aug. 22, 1900

"My journey of ten thousand versts from St. Petersburg in one unbroken stretch of Russian territory, is now ended, and although I shall yet visit the fortress of Port Arthur, the whole distance around there, about two thousand versts, will be made by sea. My daily life among the Russians, on the train, in their cities, and on the steamboats, has been exceedingly interesting if not at all times the most comfortable. While traveling by train or on steamboat, in daytime, I made it a practice of alighting or going ashore at stations, when there was sufficient length of stop, and mingling with the hungry crowd of from five hundred to two thousand passengers and soldiers, I strove like a good Russian to get to the Cossack women and children lined up with their supplies, to replenish my pint bottle with 'molako,' milk, my tin can with 'yaitsa,' eggs, my little grip with 'khlaib,' bread, 'ahgortsee,' cucumbers, 'reebuee,' broiled fish, 'tchai,' tea, 'sakhar,' sugar, 'seer,' cheese, 'patsolnich,' nuts, etc.

"On Monday, August 13, while steaming down the Amoor, I counted ninety-seven bodies of Chinese scattered along on the sand bars and lodged in the flood trash. There must have been many hundreds hidden in the bayous.

"From the time when I first entered Russia to the present, I have received only kind and considerate treatment. Some of my former ideas about the mysterious workings of this government and its people have been confirmed and some of my opinions based on the writings and sayings of other persons have radically changed. The geographies which show a desert in southern central Siberia are incorrect. Most of the statements about the inhuman treatment of criminals and Siberian exiles, and the use of the knout are untrue. It is not true that the Russian government desires to keep its subjects in ignorance. In some respects there is more liberty in Russia than in our republic, and the wise and good Czar is universally loved and revered by his subjects.

A NEW BRANCH OF THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION DEDICATED ON GOVERNOR'S ISLAND...

THE FIRST ARMY Y. M. C. A. BUILDING, NEWLY DEDICATED

PATRIOTISM takes many forms, and one of the best manifestations of it took practical shape in New York a few days ago. There are always a number of soldiers stationed on the island in the bay of New York, called Governor's Island. Their duties in time of peace are of a routine character, but in time of war they would be a very important element in our national defense. The Government and the officers take care that they shall be prepared for eventualities and be able to perform their part should some unhappy dispute bring a national enemy to our shores. The Christian, however, takes another view of the soldier. He is not simply a fighting machine, but is a man with a soul to be saved or lost. The result of this view is an effort on the part of the Young Men's Christian Association to reach the soldier and enlist him under the banner of the Prince of Peace. It accompanies him on the march, stays with him in camp, and makes a permanent abiding place of the garrison. Often the work is done under difficulties, for it is not easy to obtain a permanent home in a garrison. Yet here it is most needed, in order that the men be brought under good influences, be shielded from temptation and have the best substitute available for the comforts of home. Realizing this fact, and taking into account the chronic poverty of Christian workers, Mr. William E. Dodge, New York's eminent philanthropist, has come to the assistance of the institution and has provided a headquarters for the work on the island. The building is a neat frame structure of the Colonial style, and is situated on the water front near Castle Williams. All was finished ready for occupancy by Oct. 10, and on that day the building was formally dedicated by an appropriate service.

Many friends of the soldier and several famous officers were present at the exercises. A welcome guest was Miss Helen Gould, who had contributed to the usefulness of the institution by furnishing the library and by the gift of a number of pictures for the walls of the various rooms. She was not the less popular from the knowledge of the fact that she is erecting a similar building for the use of the Association in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge, son of the donor of the building, who is the President of the New York Y. M. C. A., occupied the chair.

Major-General John R. Brooke, commanding the Department of the East, in whose special domain the new work is located, gave a cordial reception to the institution. He said: "I first became acquainted with the Young Men's Christian Association at Helena, Mont. When I came into civilization I found Associations everywhere. I was glad to see on my arrival here this building going up. It has my most hearty approval. The superabundance of animal spirits which is the source of the enthusiasm of the soldier, sometimes leads him into places where he should not go. The influence of such an institution as this forms an excellent counter attraction and is most beneficial to his moral character. The soldiers understand the spirit that prompts these efforts in their behalf and they appreciate it accordingly. I have never known a finer set of men morally or intellectually than those that compose the regular army of the United States."

Gen. Joseph Wheeler, who followed Gen. Brooke, praised the men in the service, the work of the association, and of American women. "When good people make an effort to exercise an influence in the world," he said, "it often happens that they build higher than they think, and I have thought that those who are building up this work will have a greater sphere of influence than they anticipate.

"Upon the American soldier there rests a great responsibility, because to his keeping is entrusted the honor and glory of the American flag throughout the world. In heat or in hunger, in privation or suffering, he will follow that flag wherever it leads in this or any other country, with that dauntless courage of the American soldier that can face and meet death, but never defeat.

"Our country is now one of the world powers. A few centuries ago the Mediterranean was the centre of commerce, but, like the setting sun, it moved westward, and to-day America is the head of civilization, commerce, liberty, and Christianity.

"These forces are now speeding to the Pacific, and it seems to me that an act of Providence has decreed that this American Christianity, American civilization, and American liberty shall not be limited to the confines of our native land. Therefore, it is necessary that every American soldier who marches under the flag of our country shall understand and be taught that when he lands on distant shores the establishment of American Christianity, civilization, and liberty depends on his bearing in that far-off land."

After the addresses the ladies present, including Mrs. Brooke, Mrs. McAlpin and Miss Helen Gould held an informal reception, and congratulated Mr. E. H. Chapin, Secretary of the new branch, and the officers on the acquisition of their elegant home.

Saving "Somebody's Daughters"

MANY readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will remember the work of the Home of the Good Samaritan for fallen girls, which they aided some four years ago, and to which many of them have since contributed from time to time. This work was carried on in New York City, and was moved out of town with the idea that it would be a benefit to the women to take them as far as possible from the temptations which beset them in a large city. Mrs. Falke, who founded the work and is still in charge, has made the west side districts in New York a special field, more particularly the sections from West Broadway to Sixth avenue. On visiting these places, she found a startling condition of vice and degradation. She made an effort to reach these unfortunates, and in the last few months she has sheltered and cared for nearly two hundred of them. She found that some could neither read nor write and were absolutely friendless. Some she has succeeded in sending home to their friends in the country.

Since it was first opened, the Home of the Good Samaritan has sheltered more than five hundred women, and cared for them both spiritually and physically. The work has not been in vain. Many have been lead to better lives. Mrs. Falke's workers visit the "dives" and the slums, and reach many poor castaways. The Home is now situated at No. 64 Howard St., Newark, N.J., and has been placed under the jurisdiction of The Volunteers of America. There is pressing need of funds for the work, the raising of which rests on our efforts as heretofore.

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are interested in these efforts in behalf of the castaways of the great city, and who wish to be the means of saving "somebody's daughters," should write to Matron Falke, at the address given above.

WHEN IT IS FINISHED

IT is never safe to judge of anything before it is finished. Take a house, for example. While building it is a scene of rubbish; foundation-stones, lumber, bricks, lime scattered about indiscriminately. Take a single season in Nature, winter, for example, it is all snow and ice; spring, it is all confusion in the ploughed acres. A field of wheat, when it is full grown, is like a pattern of watered silk, swaying before the wind. As autumn comes on, it becomes a sea of gold, and is soon gathered into the garner. When it is finished! What does this mean in the verse, "And sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death"? There is only one legitimate and inevitable conclusion to sin. It does not come at once. Indeed, men often think that while this conclusion has overtaken others, they have escaped it. A young man's youthful indulgences may poison the very fountains of health. Evil men and seducers live not out half their days. Half their days would be a half of three-score years and ten. Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, at Lexington, Mass., has lived ninety years; Professor Park, of Andover Theological Seminary, ninety-two. When their lives are finished we shall see all the more clearly what we now see, that the path of the just shineth more and more unto the perfect way; that a hoary head is a crown of glory when found in the ways of righteousness.

BUILDING OF YACHTS FOR SPEED

IT is natural that Great Britain, who rules the ocean, should want to beat her trans-Atlantic daughter in a yacht race. It seems to her that a half century is long enough for the American cup to stay over this side of the great waters. We regard racing of this kind, as, perhaps, of every kind, of secondary importance. The question should never be, Who can build a yacht and sail it the fastest? but, Who can build a yacht that has the best yachting qualities, speed, strength and beauty, and so manage it as to win the cup from an antagonist that competes for the same qualities? With regard to the Columbia and the Shamrock, we think they were very nearly equal for speed, but that the Yankee management of the Columbia was superior to the British management of the Shamrock.

One good result has come from the races. The British nobleman has shown us how to be beaten gracefully. Indeed, Great Britain has had so many lessons from this side that all her people ought to have learned that art. Lord Tennyson has put the matter with grace and vigor in these lines:

Gigantic daughter of the West,
We drink to thee across the flood;
We know thee, and we love thee best,
For art thou not of British blood?
Should war's mad blast again be blown,
Permit not then the tyrant powers
To fight thy mother here alone,
But let thy broadsides roar with ours.

We were speaking of yachts and not vessels of war. We hope and pray that as to these we may enter into no competition with our mother; and so long as her cause is what Tennyson calls "the great cause of freedom," we are not likely to desert her.

HERESY-HUNTING

HERESY-HUNTING has been virtually laughed out of court. Lyman Beecher was tried and Albert Barnes was tried and Professor Swing was tried and what good did it do? This is what men say. Is there then, no difference between truth and error? Is there no such verse as that which warns us against bidding error Godspeed? We think ridicule of heresy-hunting may have dissuaded some of us from doing our duty. There is a line between truth and error which men ought sacredly to regard. On that line they ought to stand. The degree of an error, the importance of it, the question whether it may not be better to suffer it, than to agitate against it, these are questions of expediency. I may have strong convictions on a single doctrine. To me it may seem essential to vital Christianity. I could not doubt it or neglect to defend it without injury to my own soul. But it may not be my prerogative to judge whether it is essential to salvation, especially to the salvation of one who has never been taught to recognize its importance.

Doubtless, there was an old-time treatment of Christian doctrine, which has been improved upon. It magnified the letter above the spirit. There is certainly a way of treating difference in doctrinal belief, which implies charity toward those who differ from us. It may seem essential to my salvation from sin, that all the attributes of the Godhead be revealed to me in the Man Christ Jesus. The text most needful to me may be, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding." For my brother, it may be more important to remember that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life."

AWAY WITH PESSIMISTS

HERE part forever with all the cynical and saturnine. I do not want to live on the same street with them in heaven. They will always be singing out of tune, and searching for fractures in the amethyst, and finding fault with the country. Give them a world to themselves where they can have an eternity of pouting, a sky full of drizzle-drozzle, an owl in each tree to hoot away the hours, and a kennel of snarling rat terriers to nip the robe of every angelic intruder.

A ROBUST RELIGION

WE keep our religion too much indoors; it ought to be climbing rocks, or hewing forests—a stalwart religion, a robust religion, a religion able to digest the strong meat of the Word—instead of being kept on the pap and gruel of spiritual invalidism. It is high time that we threw off the Sunday clothes of sickly sentimentality, and put on the work-day dress of an active, earnest Christianity.

The Quality of Friendship

ONE of the most delightful adjuncts to personal happiness is the possession of a friend. We all take it for granted that we have friends, although, we constantly assert, that the rush and hurry of our era is fatal to the growth of friendship. It is said that there are no Davids and Jonathans now, that men and women are too unheroic, too selfish and too quarrelsome for true friendship. But Dr. Johnson, who lived before the new era, in his very longest words, pronounced his times equally unqualified for it.

It is true that friendship in its beginnings requires an amount of steady leisure that might in these busy days be called waste; for though friendship is proved by adversity, it is nursed in freedom, ease, and in long happy hours; so that no friend can be made without some such expenditure of time and personal interest as might in many cases be ignorantly called "waste."

But as people come into the stress and storm of life, our advanced civilization makes greater and greater demands on our time—we have not leisure to make friends. It must be noted also that great cities prevent those close friendships of barbaric ages—we are so far apart, that we neither spare the vitality, nor yet the time to cultivate a close intimacy. Yet, in spite of all these drawbacks, there is the same capacity for friendship in the human heart, the same craving for it, and the same delight in it that there was in the days of David and Jonathan.

It is often asserted that there are no friendships between women, and though this is a hard saying, most women will admit its truth. There is, however, a natural reason for this almost insurmountable fact—it is, that friendship needs diversity of character. A friend must not be a reproduction of ourselves; he or she must be something added to ourselves. If they are not so, there is no room for the process of mutual adaptation and mutual completeness. And it is just in this vital point that women are deficient. They are too much alike to be friends; that is, they don't differ from each other as men differ from men. Amid all their manifold diversities, there is that underlying resemblance—that something not to be accounted for or explained—which we call "a woman's way of looking at things." We may realize this quality by the common instinctive assertion of women that they understand a woman, simply because they are women. No man professes to know another man, because he is another man.

In all other respects women are of the stuff that friends are made of. They have self-sacrifice, great tenderness and tact, quicker sympathies, keener apprehensions than men, but there is too much underlying similarity for the best type of friendship between one woman and another woman. Hence there are few legends telling of women sacrificing themselves for women; but literature is full of stories of women doing heroic deeds for their fathers, brothers, sons, husbands and lovers. And it is remarkable in this consideration that the stories of men's devotion to men, without any tie of kindred, are also very numerous. It is evident, then, from the fact of kindred and sex entering so largely into women's deeds of heroism and self-sacrifice that they do not as women compliment each other; on the contrary, their intimacy strengthens all the weak points in their characters.

There is, however, a professed prejudice against friendship between the sexes; but the excellence of this relationship asserts itself above all cavillings and suspicions. No moral commonplace is so generally acknowledged as the value of a good woman's influence over man. Keeping this in view, we must also admit that there never was a time when early marriage was so difficult, except to the wealthy; never was a time when the sexes were so much thrown together on terms of equality; never was a time when greater intimacy was socially sanctioned. Now if this companionship is to be one altogether of complimentary and formal politeness, it will be a source of moral degeneration. If this intercourse is to be entirely one for frivolity and amusement, and if all the serious feelings are to be excluded from their life together, then these feelings will make for themselves irregular channels, or they will die out. If we never venture below the surface, we must necessarily become superficial.

It will be immediately said that friendship between the sexes never stops at friendship; it becomes love. What then? It is presumed that the friendship to begin with was in every respect a proper and suitable one; if so, is there any better stepping-stone to love than that esteem, which springs from a knowledge of each other's character; a sympathy in each other's tastes and an interest in each other's pursuits? Of course, there may be unjust misrepresentation and unkind criticism, and this to most women would be a formidable obstacle. For no woman can disregard social opinion, and indeed the very women who would make the noblest friends are just the women who would not disregard social opinion. But the world is not nearly as censorious as people imagine. It is far oftener impatient of absurdity than suspicious of evil. A friendship avowed without obtrusion, that is independent, without affectation, and which neither affects secrecy, nor thrusts itself into notice, will not produce ill-natured remarks from any one whose opinion is to be regarded. In most cases, when people are talked about, it is their own fault; if they respect themselves they have set the fashion of being respected.

As to the qualities necessary for a true friendship, we must first of all be sure that the feeling is one of disinterested affection. And if any one has the power to inspire this feeling, in man or woman, let them be proud of the ability, and grateful for it. There are many devoted husbands and wives that could not be a true friend; they don't "have it in them." Again, friendship is not formed till the need of it is felt. People who can tell everything to everybody, who can give the world a thoroughfare through their hearts and their lives, never feel this need. They have no sanctum for a friend. All they want is a listener.

A friend that is easily made is the best friend, and the most lasting. It is possible to take a great deal of pains to win a friend, who after all is found to be little worth the winning. There should be from the very first interview something of that happy sympathy which comes from two minds vibrating readily and truly together—the answering glance, the understanding smile, that shows approval; the subtle fusion of opinion and feeling, which implies liking and choice.

Friends should be equals. There can be no stooping in friendship, as there may be in love. Friends must walk on the same level, in all respects. No suspicion of interest, or of patronage, must chill the warm glow of mutual satisfaction in each other's society. No one can count a companion to be a friend, when there is a constant fear that they are going to be used, or a constant attitude of being on the defensive, for their self-respect.

But the most important fact about friendship is that it should develop and bring to the front the best and highest qualities of our natures. If it does not do this, it fails radically. We cannot make a friend of a man or woman if we find ourselves in their company duller, more irritable, more selfish than when we are alone. For it is the office of a true friendship to brighten our faculties, to make us more original, far-seeing and generous, and to touch our spiritual lives to finer issues than solitary reflection is capable of doing. For just as leaven by its mere presence in the meal changes every particle, so does the mere presence of another human being affect for good or evil those with whom they come in contact.

Considering these things, it is most important to our happiness that we make friends, not only because men are most just to those whom they love, but because in the multitude of our affections our hearts are enlarged, and the more ties there are binding us to others the better and the happier we shall be. People generally have friends who are capable of friendship; and as there is no more subtle and pleasant tincture in the composition of happiness than the thought that "we deserve it," such people may add this pleasant self-approval to their affection.

Lastly, we may be sure of one thing, that sincerity is the vital air of friendship. We must be true to our friends, and not say one thing with our lips, and another with our actions. Indeed, we could not do this wrong for any length of time, for the power of character arises from its truthfulness. In vain shall we profess to be what we are not, the mask will continually slip aside, and in the feeling of those we would deceive we shall be known for exactly what we are.

But, thank God! there are for all of us, if we deserve them, hearts that know how to love, great hearts that we shall find true and full of valiant tendernesses, though the earth quake, and the heavens melt, sincere hearts that have a woman's compassions to soothe our sorrows and a man's ambitions to stimulate our efforts—friends to whom our happiness will be very dear, and our worth dearer still. Friends like these are great treasures; and if God has given any of us, even one such a friend—man or woman—let us bind them to us with everlasting cords of love, and continually thank God for so great and good a gift, until "We come to the place of our rest,

Each traveler comes with his friend."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Welcome to Royal Explorer

ITALY has given a royal welcome to the Duke of the Abruzzi on his return from the Polar regions. The people are naturally proud of the courage and persistence of the young prince, who has placed the Italian flag, as mentioned in these columns on September 19th, in advance of the flags of all other nations, on the way to the Pole. They have crowded the streets of the cities through which he passed to his home, and have entertained him at civic banquets and in other ways expressed their enthusiastic admiration for him. The King and his family have also given him cordial welcome, but the recent tragic death of the young man's uncle, King Humbert, has, necessarily, prevented any court ceremonial rejoicings. The widowed Queen Margherita, however, could not allow the brave explorer to return without royal recognition. She invited him to the palace, and sent a royal gondola to bring him thither. On his way he received the joyous greetings of the citizens, and his reception by his sorrowing aunt, though private, was of the most hearty character. The Duke proposes to return to the Arctic next spring, and, in the meantime, his matrimonial projects go smoothly. He is seeking in marriage the Spanish Princess of the Asturias, but an opposition has unexpectedly developed in the Spanish royal family which, if the Duke is very much in earnest, may lead him to postpone his Arctic expedition while he works for its removal. It is not likely that he will wait long in any event, for he has set his heart on winning the glory of being the first to reach the Pole. The ovation he has received will doubtless strengthen his determination, as it shows him how the people appreciate his enterprise. If he succeeds, his fame will be still greater, and his nation still prouder of him. Yet the achievement will be barren of actual benefit to the country. Not so was that marvelous achievement which the Prince of Peace undertook for the glory of his Father in heaven. That meant not the discovery, but the salvation of a world.

For it became him for whom are all things and by whom are all things in bringing many sons unto glory to make the captain of their salvation perfect through suffering (Heb. 2 : 10).

A Puzzled Photographer

A photographic journal tells the story of a trick recently played on a portrait artist. A man came to the studio to have his portrait taken. The photographer's assistant attended him. Two plates were exposed, and then the assistant went into the dark room to develop them. Presently he returned and asked for another sitting, explaining that two spoiled plates had been accidentally used. Two more exposures were made and the assistant, after a few minutes in the dark room, came out with a pale face and hurriedly went in search of the photographer. On his arrival, he told the sitter that there was a peculiar mark on each of the photographs which his assistant had taken and asked him to sit again, when he would operate himself. The sitting was granted, but with no better success. The photographer was in despair. He showed the plates, each of which bore the same blemish. It was a well-defined skull and cross-bones on the forehead of the sitter. The photographer said he was not a superstitious man but that kind of thing frightened him, and he would not attempt to take another likeness of his patron. The explanation given of the matter is that the young man was a druggist and had been playing a joke on the photographer. Bisulphate of quinine is a chemical which is white in the naked eye, but seen black by the camera. Anything that is painted on the skin, therefore, with the chemical will be ordinarily invisible, but will come out prominently in a photograph. Probably the sitter had used this application to mystify the photographer. It would doubtless have vexed him if the photographer had retaliated on him for his waste of time and plates by printing the portrait with the emblem of piracy on his forehead. That, however, would have been a trivial matter compared with the consternation which will befall the men whom the Apostle John saw in vision whose eternal destiny will be fixed by the symbol of ownership which will be imprinted on their foreheads.

And he causeth all both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their foreheads (Rev. 13: 16).

Rescued From the Sea

A steamer which arrived at Boston, Mass., from Java a few days ago, had on board seventeen men who had been found during the voyage in a deplorable condition. They were on a water-logged ship, laden with lumber, which had sailed from Pascagoula, Miss., for Liverpool, England. During the first four days they had light winds, but on the fifth day encountered a gale which continued for three days. The vessel rolled fearfully in the sea, and one of the sailors was carried away by the high seas. The men fully expected that they would all go to the bottom. On the ninth day the masts were carried away, which relieved the ship and permitted of the wreckage being cleared away. But the ship lay utterly helpless, away from the regular track of the steamers. For ten days there was no help. Everything eatable on board had been consumed, and the supply of fresh water was exhausted. A little water had been obtained by condensing sea water, but this was not sufficient to allay the thirst of the exhausted crew. Day after day the men looked anxiously to the horizon for any sign of relief, but not until the morning of the eleventh day of waiting did help come. Then the British steamer Amana, bound for Boston, saw their signals, and took off the entire crew. The poor men needed no persuasion to go on board. They were not like the people who are in danger of perishing eternally, but do not accept the offer of salvation through Christ, though it is urged upon them with warnings and entreaties.

They would none of my counsel; they despised all my reproof: therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way (Prov. 1 : 30).

THE DUKE OF THE ABRUZZI WELCOMED BACK FROM THE ARCTIC

The Moon Photographed

Our acquaintance with the appearance of the moon has been extended through the assistance of the great telescope in the Paris Exposition. A huge photographic plate twenty-three and a half inches square, the largest ever used in astronomical observation, was brought into service, and a picture was taken surpassing in detail any previously existing. It was not taken at full moon, because then the mountains are so bathed in the direct light of the sun as to show none of their real ruggedness. It is believed that many of them are as high as the mountains on the earth. The spectacle when they are gradually lighted up by the sun's rays is brilliant in the extreme. The dark parts of the moon's surface are believed to be the bottoms of dried-up seas. Some of them are estimated to be four miles in depth. One, which astronomers call the Crisian Sea, is two hundred and eighty miles long and nearly four hundred wide. It is surrounded by high mountains which glow with light, in startling contrast to the waterless sea. Like the bottoms of the earth's oceans, those on the moon show great irregularity, and in some instances the hills rise high enough to catch the sun's beams. The ring-like appearances on some parts of the moon's surface are thought to be extinct volcanoes, the central dark spots being huge craters. Astronomers are still of the opinion that it is impossible that the moon has upon it creatures at all resembling ourselves, as there is neither air nor water. They believe, however, that it must once have had both, in which case it may then have been inhabited. Scientists tell us that if our world escapes destruction by other means, it, too, will become arid and frozen, like the moon.

THE MOON AS SEEN THROUGH THE PARIS TELESCOPE

The fact, however, need cause us no concern, for he who puts his trust in God has an eternal refuge.

The heavens are the work of thine hands: they shall perish; but thou remainest, and they all shall wax old as doth a garment .... but thou art the same and thy years shall not fail (Heb. 1: 10-12).

BRIEF NOTES

The treasurer of the Galveston Relief Fund announces that the money received up to the middle of October was $979,596. Such a record shows how quickly and generously the hearts of the people respond for the relief of suffering.

Twenty years ago China sent to Great Britain 126,340,000 pounds of tea, and India sent 35,716,000 pounds. Last year China sent only 17,000,000 pounds, while India's contribution to Great Britain's tea drinkers was 134,018,920 pounds.

The French Christian publishes in a recent issue the names of three vicars of important parishes in Marseilles who have abjured Romanism. The number of priests who have left the church during the past two years is said to be over three hundred.

A copy of Mr. Moody's life, by his son, W. R. Moody, has been given to every Free Church minister, probationist and catechist in the Highlands of Scotland by Mr. and Mrs. Peter Mackinnon, of Ronachan, with whom Mr. Moody traveled in Palestine.

The wife of Count von Waldersee (commander of the Allied Forces in China) attended the Blackenburg Conference in Germany. She is deeply interested in religious work and gave Rev. F. B. Meyer a donation towards his work at Christ Church, Westminster. Count Waldersee himself is a pronounced Protestant.

The Treasurer of the American Board of Foreign Missions is able to present a gratifying report for the year. The financial year just completed has registered an increase of $93,756.41 over the receipts of last year. Of this amount, $19,568.25 are an increase in donations for specific objects, leaving $74,188.16 net increase for the general work.

We deeply regret to learn from a cable despatch from Bombay that Rev. E. F. Frease has been prostrated by typhoid fever. Mr. Frease has been a most indefatigable and efficient secretary to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Inter-Denominational Committee, and has not spared himself in exertions for the relief of the famine-stricken people. There can be little doubt that constant service and attention to the sick during the weary months of famine are the real causes of his illness.

At the annual missionary service in the Gospel Tabernacle, New York, of the Christian and Missionary Alliance on Oct. 14, the contributions in money and pledges for the missionary work of the Alliance amounted to $52,259. Rev. A. B. Simpson made an earnest appeal for funds, based on the urgent need of aggresive work among heathen nations. He said that since the spring the Alliance had received in money and pledges $170,000, which was the largest offering that had been chronicled in the history of the Alliance.

Bishop Potter has lodged a protest with the Mayor of New York against police methods in the precinct in which the pro-cathedral is situated. Vice flaunts itself openly in Stanton street, Allen street, and other adjacent streets, and even on Sundays the law is openly defied. When Rev. Robert L. Paddock complained to the captain of the precinct that the police were encouraging rather than attempting to suppress disorder, the captain insulted him. The Bishop is now endeavoring to stir the mayor to a performance of his duty.

A remarkable scene was witnessed at Swansea on the occasion of Dr. Talmage's visit to that town. He had arranged to preach at the Countess of Huntingdon's Chapel, but the crowd which gathered to hear him was so large that adjournment was made to the Grand Theatre, the largest building in the town. That edifice failed to accommodate the people, so Dr. Talmage having preached inside the house went outside and addressed the crowd in the street from the steps of the theatre. He sailed for America on Oct. 18.

CHILDREN OF THIS WORLD WISER THAN CHILDREN OF LIGHT

THE UNJUST STEWARD . . .

International Sunday School Lesson for November 4th: Luke 16: 1-13.

"YE CANNOT SERVE GOD AND MAMMON"

. . . By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT, Luke 16: 13: "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon."

A REAL "Christian worker," seeking to arouse idle church members, exclaimed: "If you were good Christians, you would work like the devil!" The thought is the same as that of this lesson, that the devil and the devilish are more swift and bold and energetic and ingenious and persistent in using means to accomplish their low ends, than the "children of light" are in pursuing their higher aims. The perplexities commentators find in the fact that Christ used a wicked "hustler" to arouse and instruct pious idlers, are surprising in view of the fact that we are taught to learn wisdom even of venomous serpents, and industry from pestiferous ants, and boldness from roaring lions. In every age those who have moral interests in view, have needed to go to school to those who have money in view, to learn wise adaptation of means to ends. On this Sabbath before election, without introducing partisan debate, the church school should study not only the shrewd steward, or manager, of old, but also the shrewd "managers" of to-day, political and commercial—and the two kinds are now closely related—and contrast their methods with the listless soul-winning efforts in many of our churches, for which let every Christian, young and old, take his full share of blame, except any that are wise to win souls, working as hard to make some soul's election sure for eternity as the most enthusiastic politician to elect some man to office for two or four years.

Something to be Learned from the Publicans

He said also to his disciples, etc. Christ is still at the Pharisees' feast. What a study in immortal table talk remains for us centuries after the feast and feasters have disappeared! Jesus had spoken the parables of the lost sheep and the lost coin especially for the Pharisees, to teach them that they had missed the chief mission of the Church of which they were officers, in not seeing that its first work was to save lost men. The parable of the prodigal was especially directed to the publicans, who stood about looking on, to draw them back to God. And now, lest in his serving of spiritual truth any at the table should go away unfed, he turns to his own disciples to remind them that they may learn something even from the sinful tricks of the publicans, who used their brains more intensely in devising and executing plans to cheat men, than his disciples in efforts to save them.

Accused unto him that he had wasted his goods. The prodigal of the previous parable had wasted his own money. Here was a prodigal who was dissipating on trust funds, on his master's revenues, no doubt covering up his stealings by some trick of bookkeeping, perhaps, like city "rings," making out bills for larger sums than were really paid, and dividing the difference with all others who must share the secret. Probably he was found out by the fact that he was spending more than his salary. In this part of the story, the steward does not represent even worldly wisdom. The embezzler, who is also a prodigal, is soon found out. Even if self-restrained, the embezzler can seldom hide his frauds for long. The central truth of the book of Proverbs, the knave is a fool, finds many of its intensest illustrations in embezzlers who sacrifice life positions of honor and competence for the momentary enjoyments of the gambler, libertine or reveler.

Every Steward Called to Account

Give an account of thy stewardship. At any time God may send his messenger, Death, to us with the message: "Give account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward." Aye, God calls us to render account even in the midst of our stewardship, and it is especially fitting as the year and the century draw toward their end, that the Church and the individual Christian should see whether they are making a satisfactory use of the money, the time, the talents, and of the great modern facilities, school and press, mail and telegraph, wheel and train, with which God has entrusted us. It is not enough that we have been sincere and harmless and honest. God requires us to be efficient, to use brain and will as well as heart. Because many of God's stewards who are good, are also "good for nothing," Christ points them to the lively use that a bad steward made of his brains. Being accused, and called to account, knowing that when his master examined his accounts his proved dishonesty would cost him his place, he swiftly thought out his plan. He said: "I cannot dig; to beg, I am ashamed." He had never learned to do hard work, and saw himself shut up, he thought, to the choice of fraud or beggary. He was rightly ashamed to live on other people's earnings voluntarily given him as a beggar, but he was not ashamed to live on other people's earnings taken by fraud. Boys who despise beggars, often envy famous robbers. Teachers should show the consummate meanness of every man who, instead of earning money for himself, seizes the money that another man has earned, and kills the rightful owner if his mean demand is refused.

While we teach the shame of robbery, let us not lessen the shame of beggary. Those who have done their very best to help themselves, should not hesitate to receive or even ask help in some self-respecting way, usually in the form of pay for work or a loan to be faithfully paid. But the number of dependents in this country has dangerously increased of late. One-tenth of the people in one year in Brooklyn, in another in Chicago, received charitable aid from local relief societies, besides all that received unrecorded help from relatives and neighbors and from government, which would probably double the number. In some States, charitable aid is dealt out to a pauperizing degree. Let teachers cultivate the spirit of self-support and self-respect, and teach wise ways to help, without hurting others.

With only one swift thought as to his situation, this steward instantly resolved how he would provide for his future. He summoned his master's debtors swiftly, in the brief time allowed for making up his reports, and having full legal authority and discretion to act for his master, told the first one, who owed $5,000, that he might settle for just half that. Bills were expressed in Hebrew letters, and this change was like erasing the bottom of a

RIGHTLY OBTAINED

MONEY

RIGHTLY USED

P and making it D. The next man owed eleven hundred bushels, and the steward struck off only two hundred and twenty, probably because the letters used could not be changed in that case for a larger reduction without danger of legal difficulties. No doubt the steward in both cases made the debtors give him half the sum deducted and a promise of a future home for awhile or employment or some other return for the balance. Or he relied on the general feeling that such a "favor" should be reciprocated.

His master, having himself gotten his wealth, no doubt, by sharp practices, notwithstanding he was the victim this time, applauded the shrewdness with which his steward had robbed him without making himself liable under the law. He had accomplished his selfish and sinful ends by the use of means best adapted to that end, and had done it with "nerve" and speed. It was a case of "get there" regardless of principles, and proved the steward no bungling burglar but a "Napoleon of finance." There are not a few to-day that secretly admire and envy, if they do not openly praise, any man who is adept at "legal thieving" on a large scale. If one robs a freight car we put him in jail, but if he steals a whole railroad we bow low before him. Let us teach children the lesson of James Russell Lowell's "Bigelow Papers":

> In vain we call old notions "Fudge,"
> And bend our conscience to our dealing,
> The Ten Commandments will not budge,
> And stealing will continue stealing.

Sanctified Tact

The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light. Here is a modern illustration, of the same sort as that which Christ used, showing how much more tact and persistency men will use who seek a wrong or low end than many who seek the highest things. At the beginning of the eighteenth century, a soldier belonging to one of the French garrisons in India became enamored of the eyes of Brahma, in the Temple of Seringham. These eyes were diamonds, and were the most brilliant in all the East. Their lustre captivated the soldier's soul. He haunted the temple, and pretended to yield to the might of the god, and become a convert to his worship. The priests so far believed in him that he was admitted to some care of the temple. They doubtless thought Brahma would be able to protect his own eyes. But on a stormy night the soldier disappeared, and with him one of the idol's eyes, the other having resisted all his efforts to dislodge it. So Brahma was left squinting, and the treacherous Frenchman sold his prize to a captain in the English navy for ten thousand dollars. A shrewd Armenian merchant paid fifty thousand dollars for it, and sold it to Count Gregory for Catherine of Russia for four hundred thousand dollars. That was the origin of the famous Orloff diamond. A saved soul, "the pearl of great price," a crown jewel of Christ, for which he paid "all that he had," the red coin of his own heart, is a far more precious gem than any diamond; but how few will work as long and plan as patiently to save an immortal soul, even in the family circle, as the soldier did to capture the idol's eye? There is much to ponder in the old colored preacher's remark, in a sermon on sanctification: "Brethren, what you need is sanctifigumption; get sanctified gumption if you don't get anything else."

Use and Abuse of Money

Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness. "Filthy lucre" is the exact equivalent of "the mammon of unrighteousness." "Mammon," like "lucre," means money, which is so often secured by unrighteous means, and is so often used for filthy purposes that the sins of many users seem to attach themselves to the money itself. But if the woman on any nickel could tell us the story of the "scenes and unseens" she has been through in this "trialsome and troublesome world," her travels would be like a railroad ride in Italy—of alternate dark tunnels and orange-clad valleys. That nickel paid for a glass of beer, that sent a husband home to curse his wife, and was next used to buy a foul book, but presently took a baby to ride in the street cars out of the city heart, and soon after helped to swell the India relief fund of a Sunday School. Money is a bad master but a good servant. As a gift, if wisely bestowed, it is twice blest. It blesses him that gives and him that takes.

> Who shuts his hand hath lost his gold;
> Who opens it hath it twice told.

Men talk of ownership, but God's word is stewardship. That is getting to be the people's doctrine also. As the public have begun to realize how little a man can really earn himself, and how much he owes to the work of his predecessors and contemporaries, and especially to God, who furnishes the raw material, more and more it is expected—almost demanded—that the men who have amassed fortunes by aid of favoring circumstances, partly by public laws and franchises and patents—without which their wealth would vanish in an hour—shall use them in part for the public good as stewards of the nation's prosperity as well as stewards of God. In the half dozen wealthiest families in New York, no one has secured so much of the honor and public esteem, for which men acquire wealth, as Helen Gould, who devotes her talents not to a useless increase of her wealth, but to a wise distribution of it. Like Miss Grace Dodge, another steward of wealth and social gifts, she would say that she was one of "those who had received their wages in advance." Miss Dodge gives not alone money, but herself to the working girls, for whose uplifting she plans daily and as diligently as the man who sits down to his desk only to increase his own gains. Both these women illustrate a truth rarer than generous giving, that those who have no need to work for their own support are nevertheless bound to obey the law, "Six days shalt thou labor." No adult, however rich, who is not sick, is excused from the great Edenic law of daily, strenuous effort, with the Biblical rests of a seventh of his time. He who is free from the need of self-support should devote his hours as regularly to wise distribution of wealth as others to its production, for money can not be given to the best advantage without much conscientious and courageous study of philanthropic investments. The Independent, years ago, prompted by the suggestive saying we have quoted from Miss Dodge, had this to say of such thoughtful stewardship:

"It is a blessed privilege to be able to give one's time to the labor of doing good. We can all do good; we all ought to. We can all, the poorest of us, make our daily toil a daily service of God and of man; but there is a special privilege granted to those who have received their wages in advance—the privilege of doing their work for others more directly and with less regard to their own immediate wants. Wealth is the most accursed of all things when it is used selfishly, to strengthen one's self and to grind the faces of the poor. Wealth is a most blessed privilege when it is used not for one's self, but to benefit those about us. Miss Dodge's task of increasing the opportunities and happiness of working girls, and providing them with innocent pleasures and Christian influences, is one of the best ways of working out one's advance wages; but if we might only see all those to whom God has given wealth, but to whom he never meant to give useless leisure, taking up some similar work, then the world would be a great deal happier and many evils would be relieved."

In contrast with these and other women, whose jewels are the tears of gratitude of women and children they have helped to brighter, better lives, how unwise the choice of women whose daily study is to adorn themselves and win the bauble prizes of social insincerity! It reminds us of the story of the men who were in a Kimberley mine when it collapsed, and died smothered with diamonds. In our next lesson we shall study Dives, who was smothered for eternity by his selfish gold.

Instead, let us build "everlasting habitations" by sending our treasure to heaven in advance, through investments of it in what will build up the kingdom of heaven on earth, refusing to sell out heaven for any earthly gain. Some years ago there was a widespread discussion of a proposal to buy Jefferson's old home at Monticello, but Mr. Levy, a descendant occupying the estate, proud of his ancestor's noble record, refused to sell the place at any price. At an earlier date, when Secretary of State Evarts had asked to be allowed to bring the matter of its purchase before Congress, he had met a similar refusal, on which Mr. Evarts said: "Well, Mr. Levy, I admire you and do not blame you." In our own lives, shall selfish, perhaps sinful, wealth, be accepted as the price of giving up the "everlasting habitations" which are our birthright from God, or shall our property be a power for good?

> We can all do better than yet we have done
> And not be a whit the worse:
> It never was loving that emptied the heart
> Nor giving that emptied the purse.

THE NOBLE ARMY OF MARTYRS IN CHINA

MEN AND WOMEN WHO HAVE LAID DOWN THEIR LIVES FOR THE LOVE OF CHRIST AND SOULS

EFFORTS have been made by all the Missionary Societies to obtain accurate lists of all the missionaries who have perished during the recent outbreaks in China, but so great is the confusion in that distracted Empire that even now there is doubt about the exact numbers. Some whom we fear are dead may prove to have been hidden away, or have escaped, but not yet within the bounds of civilization. But the hope becomes daily more faint. Truly, the list is appalling. The Church of Christ mourns for them; the world is the poorer for their departure. May the God of all comfort solace the mourning relatives!

REV. WM. COOPER

Following are the figures according to present data: Since the beginning of the Boxer uprising last May, 182 Protestant missionaries have been reported killed or missing. Ninety-three of these are reported massacred, and it is so long since any word has been heard of the remaining eighty-nine that it is now the general belief that these, too, have died the death of martyrs.

Of the ninety-three missionaries whose martyrdom has been confirmed, twenty-one were Americans, thirteen of these having been sent out by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and eight by the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church. The Boards of Foreign Missions of the Baptist, the Methodist, and the Protestant Episcopal Churches, as well as the Church of Christ and the Lutherans, have been fortunate in not having lost a single representative. The Episcopalians have not even had a dollar's worth of property destroyed. The Baptists, however, report a considerable loss of property, while the Methodists have lost all the property they owned in the area of trouble outside of Tien-Tsin.

Among other missions, the numbers known to have been killed are: Church of England, three: Shaoyang (Independent Baptist), twelve: English Baptist, nine; British and Foreign Bible Society, five, and, most of all, China Inland Mission, forty-three. By adding to these the thirteen missionaries of the American Board, and the eight Presbyterians already mentioned, the total of ninety-three is reached.

Here is a list of the names of martyrs just received from John R. Hykes, agent of the American Bible Society in Shanghai: American Board Mission, in Paoting-fu, July 1: Rev. H. T. Pitkin, Miss A. A. Gould and Miss M. S. Morrill. In the Shansi, in August: Ernest R. Atwater, Elizabeth Graham Atwater, Rowena Bird, Dwight H. Clapp, Mary J. Clapp, Francis W. Davis, Mary L. Partridge, Charles W. Price, Eva J. Price, and George L. Williams.

American Presbyterian Mission at Paoting-fu, June 30: Rev. F. E. Simcox, Mrs. Simcox, three children, Dr. G. Y. Taylor, Rev. C. Van Renssalaer Hodge and Mrs. Elsie S. Hodge.

Church of England Mission in Shantung and Chihli, June: Rev. S. M. Brooks, Rev. H. V. Norman, and Rev. C. Robinson.

English Baptist Mission at Taiyuen-fu, July 9: Rev. G. E. Farthing, Mrs. Farthing, two children, Miss Stewart. Rev. T. J. Underwood, Mrs. Underwood, Rev. Whitehouse and Mrs. Whitehouse.

The "Shaoyang" (Independent Baptist) Mission, at Taiyuen-fu, July 9: Rev. T. W. Pigott, Mrs. Pigott, Dr. Lovatt, Mrs. Lovatt, one child, Rev. G. W. Stokes, Mrs. Stokes, Rev. J. Simpson, Mrs. Simpson, Rev. A. Hoddle, Miss Duval and Miss Coombs.

The British and Foreign Bible Society, at Taiyuen-fu, July 9: Mr. Buynon, Mrs. Buynon and three children.

China Inland Mission, at Paotung-fu, July: Rev. B. Bagnall, Mrs. Bagnall and one child, and Rev. William Cooper. In Shansi: Miss Whitechurch and Miss Searell. In Chekiang: Rev. D. B. Thompson, Mrs. Thompson and two children, Miss Desmond, Miss Manchester, Rev. G. F. Ward, Mrs. Ward and one child, Miss Sherwood and Miss Thirgood. En route to Hankow from Shansi: Miss Rice, Mr. Saunders' three children, Mrs. E. J. Cooper and Miss Houston, and Mr. E. J. Cooper's child. Near the Yellow River (while fleeing from Shansi), Rev. G. McConnell, Mrs. McConnell and one child, Miss King and Miss Burton. At Taiyuen-fu: Dr. Miller Wilson, Mrs. Wilson, one child, Mr. and Mrs. Peat and two children, Miss Dobson, Miss Hurn, Miss F. C. Nathan, Miss M. R. Nathan, Mr. Woodruff, Mr. M. D. Barrett and Miss A. Eldred.

THE SIMCOX CHILDREN MURDERED IN CHINA

Such is the list of the martyrs. Besides there are eighty-nine missionaries missing.

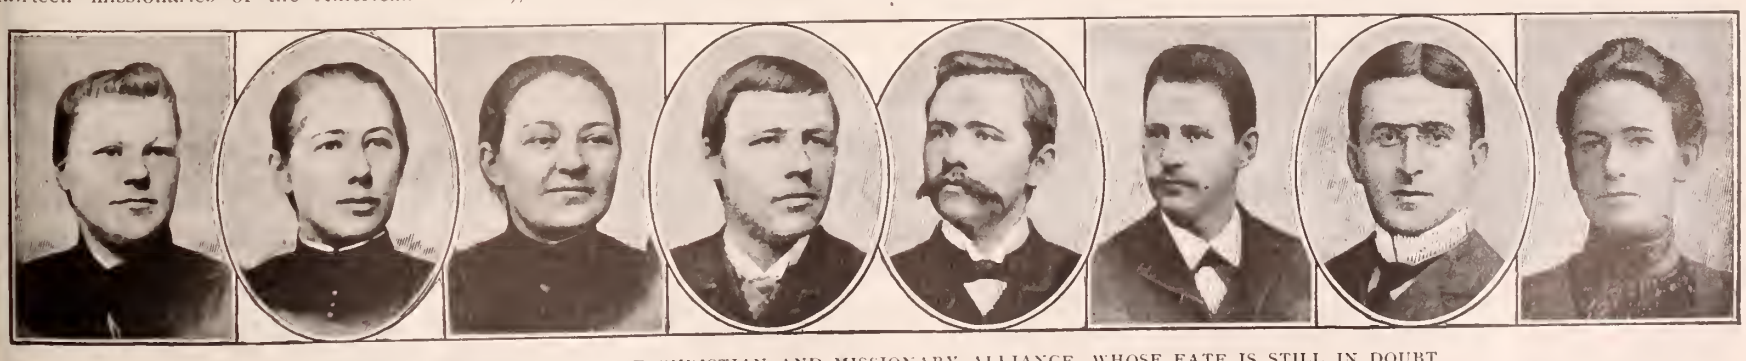
Of the grand total of 182 killed and missing, sixty-seven are men, seventy-six women and thirty-nine children. Among these, counting in the Swedish missionaries of the Christian Alliance, there are sixty-nine Americans.

Consul-General Goodnow, after making inquiries of the refugee missionaries at Shanghai, estimates the number of native Christians massacred at 15,000. This figure is only approximate, as it will be impossible to obtain a complete record until the missionaries return to the districts from which they were driven and make detailed reports to their boards.

Of the Americans, the following details will be of interest: Dr. Clapp was fifty-nine years of age and had been laboring twenty-one years in China. Mrs. Clapp went to China in 1884, and after a period spent in learning the language, she took charge of a school where her tact and devotion were greatly blessed in the conversion of young Chinese boys. Rev. Francis W. Davis was forty-three years of age and was a graduate of Oberlin. He had been eleven years in China. He was ably assisted in his work by his devoted wife, who is now on furlough in this country. Rev. George L. Williams had been only nine years at his field of labor, but in that time had proved his ability and consecration. His wife also was providentially on furlough when the outbreak occurred. Rev. Ernest R. Atwater was only thirty-five years old and was in the beginning of his missionary career. He and his beloved wife, who was another victim of the massacre, reached their scene of labor in 1892. They made many friends among the natives and were doing a most valuable work. Rev. Chas. W. Price was a native of Indiana and was fifty-three years of age. His wife and little daughter only seven years of age perished with him. Miss S. Rowena Bird was thirty-five years old. She went to China in 1890 and proved a valuable assistant to Mrs. Clapp in her work. Miss Mary L. Partridge was a graduate of Mount Holyoke, a brave and successful pioneer, who had often been in danger through carrying the Gospel to places which no missionary had ever visited. She was absolutely fearless and was faithful to the last.

DR. G. Y. TAYLOR

In the midst of sorrow, there are reasons for thankfulness. Five of the American Board's missionaries who had been given up for lost have arrived in New York after a thrilling flight from their persecutors. They are Rev. Mark Williams, Rev. J. H. Roberts, Rev. and Mrs. W. P. Sprague and Dr. Virginia C. Murdock. They were stationed at Kalgan, one hundred and twenty-five miles north of Pekin, where the Boxers were in force. They had been to Pekin, but believing themselves safe, as the chief official at Kalgan was very friendly, they returned to their station. On June 11, however, the attitude of the Boxers grew so menacing that it was decided to leave the town. A halt was made at a town fifty miles away to try to get some necessaries, which in the hurried departure from Kalgan had been left behind. While the party waited, they heard that some camels were for sale. They purchased the animals and started to cross the desert. On their way they were joined by a party of Swedish missionaries belonging to the Christian and Missionary Alliance, comprising six men, six women, and six small children. Guided by the Russian telegraph line the little company pressed forward, followed by hostile Chinese and Mongolians. They were six weeks crossing the desert, and their hardships were extreme. They were at times afraid to travel by day and continued their journey by night. They were sometimes unable to get water for two days at a time. Arriving in Siberia, they found friends among the Russian officials, who sent them over the Trans-Siberian Railroad to St. Petersburg. Thence the Swedes went to their homes near Stockholm and the Americans sailed for New York. Their journey from Kalgan to America occupied one hundred and seven days.



SWEDISH MISSIONARIES OF THE CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE, WHOSE FATE IS STILL IN DOUBT

Under the Evening Lamp

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

GRANDMOTHER'S ROOM

"WHEN I was a little girl," said grandmother, "I had to learn a whole chapter of Proverbs by heart every week. I recited it to my mother on Saturday night, and if I knew it perfectly she gave me a silver sixpence."

"Suppose you did not know it? What then?" This was the question of Alice, who is the little girl with the earnest look, on grandmother's right.

"Then I had to get up very early on Sabbath morning, study it over, and recite my chapter before breakfast. But then I lost my sixpence."

Ethel and Katharine both said that they would like to be paid for learning their Bible lessons, and they asked grandmother what she did with her money.

"Well," she answered, "it was my own money to do with just as I pleased. I was brought up to think that one-tenth of all I had belonged to God, and I have kept on thinking so all my life, so I put aside that portion for my missionary box. Then I used the remainder, as you do your allowance, for my own purposes. I always had a little money in my purse, and that was a very convenient state of things. It was not once in six months that I failed to recite my chapter by heart."

"What other parts of the Bible did you learn, dear grandmother?"

"The Sermon on the Mount, the fourteenth chapter of John, a great many psalms, the whole book of Philippians, the Ten Commandments, the last chapter of Revelation, and a great many chapters of Isaiah. Besides, I learned by degrees nearly all our church hymns."

"Do you remember them still?" asked Ethel.

"Every one of them, my child. When I lie awake in the night, I say them over and over, and they are a great comfort. Once," said grandmother, smiling at the recollection, "I had a terrible disappointment. There was a contest in our Sunday School, and prizes were offered for the best recitations of the Catechism and of the Scriptures. I gained a prize, and was called up to the Superintendent's desk to receive it. There, before him lay two piles of books, some in gay bindings, red, blue, gilt, very attractive, and some in plain black, not nearly so pretty.

"'Take your choice, Ruth,' said Mr. Van Sinderen.

"So I put out my hand and selected a book in brilliant binding, a book which even to-day I would fancy, for my heart warms at the sight of red. It is a triumphant color, children, and makes you see flags fly and hear drums beat and bugles call.

"'Oh, Ruth,' said my teacher just behind me, 'I wouldn't take that book if I were you. I'd choose that little thick book in the plain black dress.'

"But I was firm in my first choice. Alas, I had reason to be sorry. The book I had taken was far beneath my capacity, a real baby book, and I dearly loved to read. It always reminded me of my folly, the more so, as the other book, I learned later, contained a most beautiful story."

"I think somebody might have made you put down the red one," said little Kate, decidedly.

"No, dear, the lesson was a good one, better learned, that I had brought my regret upon myself. I have never since then been so ready to choose by just the outside. A plain and homely face may cover a kind and true heart. Rough clothing may be worn by one of nature's noblemen. I look a little deeper than dress when I am making an acquaintance. And it is borne in upon me that God wants us to do this, for we are told that 'man looketh on the outside appearance but God looketh on the heart.'"

Many wise bits of counsel come to the happy children who have grandmother's room to go to as a charmed retreat.

Truth-Telling

One must speak the truth when one is questioned. One need not speak an uncomplimentary truth which will hurt the feelings of another, unless there is very great occasion. It can never be my duty to say to my neighbor that I think her new carpet hideous. Her carpet is hers, and the expression of her taste. If she ask me my opinion I can say that my taste inclines me to a different style, but beyond that I am not obliged to go. Nor is it kind or excusable for me to say that my friend's baby is cross and homely, even though that be true. Candor in such ways violates the law of the golden rule. I can refrain from speech, if I have nothing nice to say.

Sunshine at Meals

"My husband is a perfect wet blanket at the table," said a wife despairingly as she rose from a silent and depressing meal. "I make every excuse for him, but I am disturbed about the effect of his moodiness on the children. They cannot understand that their father is tired, that his business vexes him, and that he dreads the morrow, not knowing what it may bring forth. He either has no appetite, or he waits on us as if the food were to be snatched on the eve of an execution, and my young people hurry away out of the doleful home, in spite of all that I can do to detain them there."

A great deal is said and written about the wife's duty to meet her husband with a smile, no matter what her trials during the day and in his absence may have been. Surely it is equally his duty to meet her in a tranquil and contented manner, and to leave his business cares behind him. Food partaken of in morbid temper does not easily digest. The family board should be more than cheerful; it should be gay, and everybody should save a bright anecdote, a merry saying, a happy thought for repetition there.

"Be not anxious for the morrow," is the present message of the Master to every disciple. This does not mean that we are to be idle, that we are to be improvident, or to lack thrift. It means only this, that we are every day to do our very best and leave the rest to God.

Ye winds of night, your free combine;
Without his high behest
Ye shall not in the mountain pine
Disturb the sparrow's nest.

Dear friends, if any of us need the caution, let us take heed to it. Let the family table three times a day be so pleasant a rallying place that children shall come to it fearlessly and with joyful steps. And let not the heads of the house have to walk softly lest they shall stir up faultfinding or provoke wrath in each other.

"WHEN I WAS A LITTLE GIRL" SAID GRANDMOTHER

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-all

—AILSIE AND DORA. Lemon juice is said to be good to remove freckles. Buttermilk is an excellent lotion for the skin. A few freckles are very becoming to most girls.

—BETH. Your Uncle Timothy is right. An hour before midnight will do more for you as a beauty sleep than two hours in the morning when you ought to be up, in the freshness of the day.

—PERPLEXITY. There is no reason on earth why a young man who is your intimate friend and your escort to and from social gatherings should refuse to accompany you home from the prayer-meeting. I don't know what to make of the modern young man. When Aunt Prudence was a girl, she used to have several to choose from on every possible pretext, but gallantry, not to say good manners, appears to be going out of fashion.

SONG

WHEN God drops down a blossom
From sunny fields above,
We call it Baby precious
And shelter it with love.
The little helpless darling,
She nestles in our heart,
And not the wealth of kingdoms
Could tear the bond apart.

Who wouldn't love the Baby,
With dimpled face so fair,
With roguish eyes and dimpled chin,
And golden silken hair?

She's papa's little treasure,
She's mama's precious love,
And brother's dearest sweetheart,
And sister's tiny dove.
Agoo, a coo, she murmurs
In a language all her own,
And no one minds if Baby
Has a little temper shown.

Oho! a squall is coming,
Her heart is like to break,
But mother flies, her darling
In tender arms to take.
The baby head is lying
Upon the mother's breast,
With songs and pats and kisses
Is Baby lulled to rest.

Who wouldn't love the Baby,
With rosebud face so fair,
With roguish eyes and dimpled chin,
And golden silken hair?

—ROSE LILY LITTLEJOHN.

About Nerves

"I AM so nervous. I scream at the slightest sudden noise, and jump if I see a mouse run across the floor. I simply cannot control myself."

Dear friend, did you ever try? It is rather a humiliating confession to make that one's nerves are absolutely beyond one's control, as a horse which has run away is too much for the weak hand on the reins. Let me whisper to you that there is an immense gain in holding fast to yourself, and quelling the expression of your fright or irritation; refusing to shriek, or to jump or to scream, and preserving the semblance of tranquility, even if it be difficult, and underneath there is agitation. Children are obliged by the stronger will of teachers and parents to suppress signs of passion or of fright; a little girl is reproved if she makes a fuss at a harmless beetle or a caterpillar. When we are grown up we are compelled to do for ourselves what our parents do for us in childhood, and it perhaps requires effort, but it is better for us in the end if we hold a strict guard over our lips, our gestures, and all manifestations of excited vehemence. Prayer is a wonderful help. If we know our temptations to be great in this direction, we must be the more alert in guarding against them.

The mother who is nervous and fretted is often so simply because she is too tired. Why attempt so much? I advise the wornout woman to stop in the very middle of the housecleaning, with carpets up and everything in confusion, and draw a long breath. It would be better to rest even with the furniture out of place and everything in a heap, than to persevere until the end, and then have a fit of illness. Pneumonia and fever follow in the wake of intense fatigue. Believe me, if you will only make haste slowly, you will get the conquest over your nerves. So, with Daisy's pretty new frock, that you are hurrying over so that she may wear it on Sunday. Let her wear her old one. It is still very nice, and the child is herself so sweet and dear and dainty that nobody looks at her clothes, and your anxiety is wholly needless.

I think it must have been for nervous people that the word was written in the good book, "As thy day thy strength shall be." And St. Paul bids us, "In nothing be anxious, but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God." Mark the clause, with thanksgiving. We are hardly in a thankful frame when we are ready to fly to pieces with nerves in rebellion. Ah! what true heart rest and mind rest and rest for the body too is there in carrying all our burdens to the Lord and leaving them with him.

To India Orphan Fund Contributors

It is well to direct the attention of our readers, and of all who are interested in the India Famine Orphan Work, to the fact that, at its meeting in Bombay, on September 4th last, the Interdenominational Missionary Committee adopted the following resolution:

"This Committee agrees, as a Committee, to act in this matter exclusively for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and in case contributions should be sent by other parties to this Committee, such parties will be requested to send any further contributions to this Committee through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

The Interdenominational Committee, in accordance with the resolution, recognizes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as the sole agent in the Orphan Work as far as the collection and forwarding of contributions is concerned. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no agents in any part of the country working under its direction for the orphans, and any one claiming to represent the India Orphan Work officially, and collecting or accepting contributions in such capacity, does so without authorization. All contributions given under such circumstances are at the risk of the contributors, who should send their gifts to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD direct, as the Committee advises. This, however, is not to be considered as affecting active, zealous church members and others who are working for India's orphans among their friends and acquaintances, and who send their gifts direct to headquarters. In order to assure themselves that the money has been regularly received, and that it will be forwarded to India, contributors should invariably insist upon seeing their contributions acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

DAILY STRENGTH

"AS thy day thy strength shall be!"
This should be enough for thee;
He who knows thy frame will spare
Burdens more than thou canst bear.

When thy days are veiled in night
Christ shall give thee heavenly light;
Seem they wearisome and long
Yet in him thou shalt be strong.

Cold and wintry though they prove
Thine the sunshine of his love,
Or, with fervid heat oppressed
In his shadow thou shalt rest.

—FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL.

Southern Orphans Help India

One of the most beautiful phases of our India orphan work is the interest it has awakened in the hearts of American children, who have expressed their sympathy for the famine waifs by gifts that are creditable to their kind little hearts and generous natures. A notable instance of generosity of this sort is found in the case of the Steele Orphanage for Colored Children, at Chattanooga, Tenn. These little folks, though themselves wholly dependent upon the benevolence of others, have been so touched by the sufferings of India's children that they have saved every coin that came into their possession for the purpose of making a gift in behalf of the India orphans. Mrs. Almira S. Steele, the founder and manager of the orphanage, knew of their plan and cordially approved of it. Their self-denial was attended with such success that they have been able to forward $200 to our India Orphan Fund. Their gift will be the means of providing for a number of famine waifs, who will learn through the kind missionaries how they were befriended and aided by the noble-hearted colored children of the Chattanooga orphanage.

Mrs. Steele's work among the colored children of the South has now been going on for over sixteen years, and has been greatly blessed. It is supported almost wholly by contributions, is economically conducted, and free from debt.

A Statesman's Rules for Daily Conduct

In the pocketbook of the Hon. Stephen Allen, who, some years ago, was drowned from on board the steamer Henry Clay, was found a clipping, apparently cut from a newspaper, containing the following maxims. They should be memorized and put into every-day use.

"Keep good company or none. Never be idle. If your hands cannot be usefully employed, attend to the cultivation of your mind. Always speak the truth. Make few promises. Live up to your engagements. Keep your own secrets, if you have any. When you speak to a person look him in the face. Good company and good conversation are the very sinews of virtue. Good character is above all things else. Your character cannot be essentially injured except by your own acts. If anyone speaks ill of you, let your life be so that none will believe him. Ever live, misfortune excepted, within your income. When you retire at night, think over what you have been doing during the day. Say your prayers daily. Make no haste to be rich if you would prosper. Small and steady gains give competency with tranquility of mind. Avoid temptation, through fear that you may not withstand it. Earn money before you spend it."

A Countess Reproved

Howard, the philanthropist, neither wanted courage nor talent to administer reproof where he thought it was needed. The Governor of Upper Austria, with his Countess, called one day on the man who had excited so large a share of the public attention. The Count asked him the state of the prisons within his department. Mr. Howard replied, "The worst in all the empire"; and advised that the Countess should visit the female prisoners. "I!" said she, haughtily, "I go into prisons!" and rapidly hastened downstairs in great anger. Howard, indignant at her proud and unfeeling disposition, loudly called after her, "Madame, remember that you are a woman yourself, and you must soon, like the most miserable female prisoner in a dungeon, inhabit but a small space of that earth from which you equally originated."

Catarrh

Is a constitutional disease.

It originates in a scrofulous condition of the blood and depends on that condition.

It often causes headache and dizziness, impairs the taste, smell and hearing, affects the vocal organs and disturbs the stomach.

It afflicted Mrs. Hiram Shires, Batchellerville, N. Y., twenty consecutive years, deprived her of the sense of smell, made her breathing difficult, and greatly affected her general health.

She testifies that after she had taken many other medicines for it without lasting effect, she was permanently benefited, her sense of smell restored, and her general health greatly improved by

Around the World with Josiah Allen's Wife

CHAPTER XLVII.

SAMANTHA MEETS WILHELMINA

WHEN I wuz told that the Queen of Holland wuz approachin' I sez, "You don't say so! you don't say that that is Williemiiny?"

"Yes," sez the bystander standin' by.

And I tell you I looked at her with all the eyes I had, and if I had had a dozen more I should have used them all, for I liked her looks first-rate, fair complected, blue eyes, light wavy hair, and a air of demure innocence and wisdom that wuz good to see. She wuz pretty and she wuz good, I could see that as plain as I could tell a buff cochin hen from a banty. And I wuz glad enough, when havin' discovered sunthin' she had left behind, her shaperone left her and went back to the tarven and she come and sot down right by my side to wait for her.

And as my rule is, I immegiately lived up to my priviliges and told her how highly tickled I wuz to have the chance to see her and tell her how much store I sot by her. Sez I: "My dear, I have always wanted to see you and tell you how much I have liked almost every move you've made since you got to be a sovereign and before. Your crown hain't seemed to be top heavy, drawin' your fore top and your common sense down with it as some crowns do. You've wore it sensible and you've carried your septer stiddy, and for a young girl like you to do them things has seemed a great thing to me. A good many young girls would be carried away if they wuz in a place like yours; I am most afraid Tirzah Ann would at your age."

Wilhelmina and Tirzah Ann

"Tirzah Ann?" sez she inquirin'ly.

"Yes, Josiah Allen's girl by his first wife," sez I. "I did my best bringin' her up, but if a kag is filled with rain water you can't tap it and have it run cream or maple molasses. She wuz nateraly kinder sentimental and vain and over dressy, and keeps up them traits to this day. And I d'no what she would have done if she'd tried to rule a kingdom at eighteen; I guess her subjects would have seen strange doin's and strange costooms, though I think Tirzah means to be a Christian. But you've done first-rate, you've seemed to study the best good of your subjects and have made a big effort to have peace in the world. I wuz dretful interested when you had that Peace Conference meet in your 'House in the Woods.' I'd been more'n willin' to had it meet in our sugar house, but it wuzn't big enough, and it wuzn't so central; it wuz better to have it where it wuz."

"I guess I sot more store by your doin's in that respect than by any other, for peace is what a sovereign and a subject must have to git along any ways comfortable. And at the present time what a comfort it would be if the nations of the world could git holt on it. But it almost seems as if peace had spread her wings and flowed away from this planet, such cuttin's up and actin's are on every side, wars and rumors of wars, armies and navies crashin' up aginst each other, nations risin' up aginst nation, brothers' hands lifted up aginst brother's and the hull world seemin' to be left to the mercy of the bloody fiend, War.

"Well, you and I can't help it, Williemiiny. I've done all I could in Jonesville. I've talked a sight and sot Josiah up all I could to vote for peace, and you've done all you could in Holland, and so now we've got to set down and trust in the Providence that watches over Jonesville and Holland."

She acted as if she felt real pleased with my praise, as well she might, and I sez, "Another thing I've liked in you, Williemiiny, you've been so bound and determined to pick out your pardner for yourself and not have him selected for you. Why, good land! a dress or a pair of shues or gloves hain't half so apt to fit and set well if you leave 'em for somebody else to pick out for you, and much more a pardner. I honored you for your idees in that direction, for you'll find, my dear," sez I, "that even if you take sights of pains and pick him out yourself, a pardner is sunthin' that requires lots of patience and long sufferin' to git along with, though real convenient to have round lots of times when tramps are about, or reachin' up overhead in the buttery, or at funerals, etc. It always looks nobler to have a man along with you than to mog along alone. And men are about on a average as fur as their goodness goes with their female pardners most of the time.

Wilhelmina is Advised

But he will be no he-angel, as you will find out if you cross him just before meal time, or don't see that his clothes are mended up good. I hearn once of a young bride who thought her husband wuz perfect, and I spoze looked at his backbone sarahuptishushly from day to day a-worryin' for fear his wings would sprout out and he would soar away from her to go and be an angel. But one day she mended a hole in his pocket, and bein' onused to mendin' she took a wrong turn, and sewed the pocket right up.

"Well! well! I don't spoze she ever worried about his angel qualities after that time. I spoze he cut up dretful and said words she never dremp of his knowin' by sight, and she wuz jest as surprised and horrified as she would have been to had a lamb or a cooin' dove bust out in profanity. But he wuz a likely man, and got over it quick, and wuz most too good to her for a spell afterwards, as pardners have been wont to do on such occasions ever since the creation of the world.

"But, as I say, matrimony has difficulties enough when Love heads the procession and Wedded Bliss plays the trombone in the orkestry. Of course, we've hearn time and agin that you wuz engaged to different ones. But that hain't nothin' strange; such stories got out about our Tirzah Ann and Shakespeare Bobbett and two or three others—I shouldn't mind it if I wuz you; I should take my time and pick and choose and compare all I wanted to.

"Now when I buy a chocolate or indigo blue calico dress I can't be hurried, no matter how broad the hints are that are throwed out to me, nor how oneasy the storekeeper gits, nor how impatient Josiah Allen is for me to decide.

Samantha Comforts the Queen

"I lay out to git a good color, one that will be agreeable to look at from day to day, and, above all, one that is firm and will wear well and wash. Of course, if you can git all of these last named qualities and a handsome pattern added, why all the better. But fast colors and durability are what you want to look out for first, in calico and pardners. And you can't always lay your hands on the right piece or the right man the first minute.

"So don't you be hurried by any of the hull caboodle of officials or relations or anybody."

She looked real consoled as if my words wuz awful congenial to her. And whilst watchin' her sweet face growin' brighter and sweeter, I thought of another thing that I thought mebby she had been worryin' about and that I could comfort her up in, just as I would want our Tirzah Ann comforted under like circumstances, and I got real eloquent talkin' about this before I got through.

Samantha Describes the True Lover

Sez I: "Of course, my dear, you've got a good deal of proppity and fortune-hunters are about, but I wouldn't let that worry me, for I've always said that if I wuz a rich, handsome young woman, I would just as soon be married for my money as my beauty. They're both outside of the real self, equally transitory, or in fact, the money if invested in government bonds is more lasting. For the national system is fur more firm and steadfast than the physical.

"Fifty years hence I spoze the money will all be safe and gainin' interest, so if that is what a woman is married for she will keep her attraction and even increase it. But fifty years hence where will her beauty be, if she wuz married alone for that? Where are its powerful attractions? All gone. If she had nothing but the beauty of snowy brow and brilliant eye and clustering locks and perfect features.

"But beauty that looks from the soul through the face. Ah! that is another thing! That still remains when the dusky hair is changed to white, when the glow is turned to shadows in the eyes, when the lithe form is bent. That is a bit of the eternal, and forever young like its Creator. You have got that beauty, my dear, as well as proppity, so don't worry."

I felt real eloquent, and I could see by her looks that I wuz impressin' her powerfully and givin' her sights of comfort in her tryin' place.

But I knew that eppisodin', though interestin' and agreeable, devoured time, and I knew that I must hold my eloquent emotions back and let Common Sense take the reins and conclude my remarks, so I sez:

"I hope from the bottom of my heart that you will git a good man, one that won't be too uppish, and will be willin' to chore round the house a little if necessary, and set store by you in youth and age, and that you and he will live happy and reign long over a peaceful and happy land."

The Queen Invited to Jonesville

I see her shaperone in the distance comin' slowly back as if not hardly dastin' to interrupt our conversation, and I sez, "Good-by, my dear, and God bless you. Give my respects to Queen Emma, and if you and she ever come to Jonesville I would love to have you make me a all day's visit, and I'll invite the children and kill a hen and make a fuss.

"I don't spoze Jonesville is so neat as Amsterdam; I spoze you can set down and eat offen the sidewalk in Holland most anywhere, but I am called a good housekeeper, and will do the best I can. And now I don't want you to put yourself out in the matter, but if you should come and could manage it handy, if your ma would bring me some of your tulip seeds I'd swop with her and give her some of the handsomest sunflowers she ever laid eyes on, and they make splendid food for hens to make 'em lay."

She didn't give me any answer about this either way, and I thought mebby her ma might be short on it for bulbs, and I wouldn't say anything more about it.

it she bid me good-by real pleasant and e shook hands and wuz jest partin' away m each other when I thought of an-her very important thing that I wanted warn the dear young queen about, and turned round and sez:

"Oh, I must warn you solemnly of one ng more before we part; I have word a sight about it; thinkin' so much on u as I do. I have been dretful afraid at you would be overflowed. If there ould be big rains and the ocean should e half an inch I've felt I didn't know hat would become of you. You had tter keep wash-tubs and pails handy d don't be ketched out without rubber ots, and keep your eye on leakages in ground as well as governmental and ancial affairs. And now again I will y, my dear, God bless you and fare-ll."

She shook hands agin quite warm and th a sweet smile on a pretty young face e assured me that she would be careful, d she jined her shaperone and went on wards the spring. And I know she wuz tful pleased with what I'd said to her r I hearn her fairly laugh out as she d her shaperone about it.

Whilst we wuz in Carlsbad Miss eechim took the mud baths. She said y wuz considered very genteel and I ess mebby they wuz, so many things are nteel that are kinder disagreeable.
ey wuz also said to be first-rate for the matiz and the nerves. But it seemed me I had almost ruther have nerves an to be covered all over with that sty black mud.

Mud Baths at Carlsbad

They take about sixty pounds of clay
d mix it with the hot spring water till it just about as thick as I make the batter r buckwheat cakes in Jonesville, and I ake that jest about as thick as I do my jin bread. And you git into this bath d stay about half an hour. Then of urse before you're let loose in society u're gin a clean water bath to git the d off. Miss Meechim thought they lped her a sight, and mebby they did d she boasted a lot how genteel they z.

But I told her I had never been in habit of settin' store by mud and kin' up to it, and didn't believe I ould begin at this late day, but Josiah's matiz wuz so bad I didn't know but he d better take one. But he said he had k one in Jonesville some years ago that uld last him durin' his nateral life.

He did fall into a deep mud-puddle one ght goin' to sister Celestine Gowdey's r a bask pattern for Tirzah Ann. And bein' dark and the puddle a deep one he undered round in it till he looked more e a drownded rat than a human bein'.
e never could bear basks from that hour this, and he has always dated his rutiz from that time, but it hain't so; he d it before. But 'tennyrate he wouldn't ke the mud baths at Carlsbad nor none us did but Miss Meechim. Howsum-er there are lots of folks that set store
'em.

Well, we went back to Vienna, and m there sot sail for Berlin, homeward und. Josiah was in dretful good spe-s, and said that no monument or obelisk had seen on our tower could ever ust up his admiration like the Jones-le M. E. steeple when he should first tch sight on't loomin' up beautiful and rious from the enrapturin' Jonesville nery.

Beautiful, Clean Berlin

And I felt a good deal as he did, but owed that his feelin's made him go too r, for Jonesville seenery hain't enrap-rin', and the M. E. steeple hain't glori-s in aspect. But truly Love is the eatest sculptor and gilder in the world, d handles his brush in the most marlous way. Under his magic touch the mblest cottage walls glows brighter than y palace. We had turned our footsteps ward home sweet home, and a light
m above gilt them sacred precincts, d my own heart sung as glad a tune as siah's, though I tried to sing it as much
I could in the key of common sense.

Well, we found that Berlin wuz a big, autiful clean city. It is the capital of ussia and the German empire, which all know is divided up into little king-ms, some as the Sylvester Bobbett
m is divided up, but kinder lookin' up Sylvester as the head on't. The old part of the city hain't so remarkable attractive, but the new part is beautiful in its buildings and streets. And somehow the passersby look cleaner and better off than in most cities. We didn't see a blind beggar man led by a dog, or a ragged female beggin' for alms whilst we wuz there, which is more than our cities at home can boast of.

But in spite of all this, I spoze there is a good deal of cuttin' up and behavin' there.

And I don't spoze that the name of the river that runs through it has anything to do with that, though Josiah thought it did. He said: "You couldn't expect many morals or much stiddy behavior round a river Spree."

The River Spree

But I don't spoze the name made a mite of difference. The water seemed to run along as smooth and placid as Dove Creek, that bathes the streets of Loontown at home. Indeed, the waters of the Spree runs along real slow and quiet. And I spoze the inhabitants there are about on a equality with the dwellers in other cities in the old and new world. Human nater is a good deal the same wherever you find it. And I've always said that if I wanted to write a heart-searchin', heart-meltin' tragedy, I had just as soon turn away from the big cities and go into some lonesome hamlet of New England, into some big faded farmhouse standin' by a dark weed-bordered sluggish creek, shaded by tall pollard willers. And there, behind the scraggly lilocks and cinnamon roses, and closed blinds of solid wood, with a little heart-shaped hole in the centre that casts strange shadders on the clean painted floor within, there I would find my tragedy material.

Mebby in some tall, scrawny woman's form, clad in brown calico, with scanty gray hair drawed tightly back from a pale face and imprisoned in a little hard knob at the back.

When that hair wuz brown, and the mornin' sun wuz ketched in its glistenin', wavin' tendrils, and the sunken cheeks wuz round and pink as one of the cinnamon roses, and the faded ambrotype of the young soldier in her red wooden chest upstairs wuz materialized in a handsome young man, who walked with her under the old willows when the slow-moving brook run swift with fancy's flight and her heart beat happily, and life wuz new and radiant with love and joy——

Before the changes come that swept them apart and left only a hollow, empty chamber in each heart, echoin' with footsteps that are walkin' heavily fur apart.

An Unwritten Tragedy

Then, if I could write the full history of that life, its joys and its sorrows, its aspirations, its baffled hopes, its compensations that didn't compensate, the bareness of the life, the dagger-sharp trials with what is called small things, the wild heart struggles veiled by the New England coldness of expression, some as her sharp crags and stuns are covered with the long reign of ice and snow. The heartsick loneliness of oncongenial surroundin's, the gradual fading away of hope and fears into the dead monotonous calm of hopelessness and despair.

There is a tragedy ready for the pen that would stand out as much more striking and sharp-edged as the stun on a untraveled highway is rougher than one worn down to smoothness by the feet of the multitude, a tragedy that would move the world could I tell it as it really is.

But good land! What a hand to eppisode I be when I git to goin'. I must stop this very minute, or I'll have the tragedy Alfred Tennyson speaks on, "Dyin' a Listener," on my hands.

Wilmington's Praying Circle

Mr. Alexander Palmer, secretary of the National Union Noonday Praying Circle, of Wilmington, Del., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD concerning the progress of the organization in most encouraging terms. He says: "Since THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published an account of our Circle we have received many letters from all parts of the country, and there has been a substantial accession of new members." Any one who desires to be fully informed as to the Circle and the extent and character of its work should address the Secretary at No. 1318 W. 6th St., Wilmington, Del.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. E. P., Mead, Neb., writes:

I prayed the Lord for help and he gave it and I told him that I would write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and tell that the Lord has been my Shepherd for a great many years.

H. B. A., South Dakota, writes:

For some time I had asked a special blessing in prayer, and promised if it was answered to acknowledge it in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It has now been granted to me.

Virginia Reader writes:

I wish to publicly acknowledge two instances of direct answers to prayer, and to praise the Lord for the fulfilment of his precious promises.

Reader, Ashmore, Ill., writes:

The Lord has just answered a prayer for me. I promised I would acknowledge it publicly. I want to encourage others to do right and receive a blessing as I have.

Reader, Rolling Prairie, Ind., writes:

I promised the Lord if he would answer my prayer in my brother's behalf that I would publicly acknowledge the same. My prayer was answered, and I now write to redeem my promise.

Girl Reader, Hawkrum, Pa., writes:

God heard my cry from the depths of sorrow and lifted me unto the light of happiness and love. I desire to acknowledge him in all my ways and give him all glory and honor.

E. H., Canada, writes:

I was in great trouble and sorrow recently. I prayed for immediate help and it came almost while I was praying. I thank God for his goodness to me.

Reader, Iowa, writes:

I was in deep trouble on account of my son. I prayed earnestly that he might be led to see his sin in taking the first step down to intemperance. I prayed with him. He has turned from evil and is trying to be a Christian boy. I promised my Heavenly Father that I would acknowledge it in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Reader writes:

I know that Jesus hears and answers prayers. I prayed for a blessing when my heart was broken. I prayed for days, for months, and now, bless the Lord, my prayer has been granted and happiness more wonderful than I ever imagined could come to any one has lately come to me, and I give God the glory. I believe the sorrow I thought so heavy only drew me nearer God.

Mrs. M. M. C., Indiana, writes:

I prayed our Heavenly Father to grant one special thing, and he graciously answered my prayer. I cannot doubt it. I praise his holy name. Many times before he has aided and helped me through prayer. I fully trust him, and wish to acknowledge his mercies through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

F. C. writes from a prominent hotel in New York City:

A few weeks ago I was arrested here in New York, and while awaiting my trial in the Tombs I read your good paper. I saw letters from those who had prayed to God for help and whose prayers were answered. I knelt down then and there, and prayed to God to save me and that I might go free on a light sentence. Thanks to my Heavenly Father, my prayer was answered and my imprisonment brief. It was my first experience, but a bitter one, and I am trusting God more and more. I have a good, praying mother back in dear old New England, and as soon as I can get work and get on my feet I am going back to her. I was nearly crazy for fear that I should die in prison, or that my dear old mother might die while I was there. I wish you would print all of my letter, so some other young man who may be straying away from Christian influence may take heed before it is too late. Bad company got me into trouble. Pray for me that I may live nearer to God.

E. D. V., Laurenceville, Pa., writes:

I wish to acknowledge through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD how gloriously God has answered my prayer, not only in one case but many times. If we pray in faith, believing, he will surely answer.

Mrs. W. E. K. writes:

I prayed to God for a week, and to-day he has answered my prayer, and I thank him.

Reader, Terre Haute, Ind., writes:

I asked God to answer a certain prayer, promising if he did so I would acknowledge it in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In two days my prayer was answered and I now fulfil my promise.

Earnest Reader, New Jersey, writes:

Having received so many answers to prayer in times past, I asked my dear Father if consistent with his righteous will to help my son, who was in great trouble. Answer came the evening after, and with grateful heart I thank God for his deliverance. I pray this experience may draw my boy nearer to his Saviour than ever. Pray with faith.

Mrs. C. R., Philadelphia, Pa., writes:

My dear Heavenly Father has answered my prayers in the past, and my faith looks up to my Blessed Lord. Recently I was in trouble. I went to my dear Heavenly Father in prayer and asked if he would not touch the hearts of two dear friends to help me, and, to my great joy, my prayer was answered.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have been received from Reader, Mongaup, N. Y.; a Friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Gray, Me.; Subscriber, Illinois; Mrs. M. E. R., Marion, Ia.; C. E. D., Belleville, Wis.; Reader, Hickman, Neb.; A Reader; Mrs. C. H. J., Cape Girardeau, Mo.; Mrs. J. C., Euclaire, Wis.; a Young Disciple, Ill.; a Reader, Moravia, N. Y.; W. P. DON'T KNOW HOW

To Select Food to Rebuild On.

"To find that a lack of knowledge of how to properly feed one's self caused me to serve ten long years as a miserable dyspeptic, is rather humiliating. I was a sufferer for that length of time and had become a shadow of my natural self. I was taking medicine all the time and dieting the best I knew how.

"One day I heard of Grape-Nuts food, in which the starch was predigested by natural processes and that the food rebuilt the brain and nerve centers. I knew that if my nervous system could be made strong and perfect, I could digest food all right, so I started in on Grape-Nuts, with very little confidence, for I had been disheartened for a long time.

"To my surprise and delight, I found I was improving after living on Grape-Nuts a little while, and in three months I had gained twelve pounds and was feeling like a new person. For the past two years I have not had the slightest symptom of indigestion, and am now perfectly well.

"I made a discovery that will be of importance to many mothers. When my infant was two months old, I began to give it softened Grape-Nuts. Baby was being fed on the bottle and not doing well, but after starting on Grape-Nuts food and the water poured over it, the child began to improve rapidly, is now a year old and very fat and healthy and has never been sick. Is unusually bright,—has been saying words ever since it was six months old. I know from experience that there is something in Grape-Nuts that brightens up any one, infant or adult, both physically and mentally."

Tom Hartwell's Way

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHEN they came home from the funeral of Tom's father, Mrs. Hartwell and the children sat down to supper, alone for the first time in a week. During the days of Mr. Hartwell's illness, neighbors had been coming and going, and the excitement had been intense; the whole thing, his breaking-down without warning, the fierce fever and the heart-failure at last, had been so sudden and so sweeping, like thunder out of a clear sky, like a cyclone coming in fury, that there had been no time for thought or fear. Then the funeral had brought relatives. Aunt Jane and her boys from West Chester, Uncle Charley and his wife from Boston, Lewis Bond and his sister, second cousins from New York. All these had taken their leave at once after the burial, and the widow and her son and daughters came back to look their poverty and desolation in the face. Mr. Hartwell had never had a large income, but his salary had sufficed for the needs of his family. They had not known how to save, and the utmost they had been able to do was to keep out of debt. Mrs. Hartwell was not only broken-hearted with grief, but in despair at the thought of the future.

She undressed her little Jessie and Frances, put them to bed, and then came back to Tom, sitting forlornly by the lamp with his books.

Mrs. Hartwell came over to him, put her arms around his neck, and broke down in a tempest of weeping.

"Mother, mother, mother!" cried Tom, at his wit's end, "dear mother, don't cry so, don't!"

He tried his best to comfort her. After awhile she dried her eyes and said:

"Do you know, Tom, dear, that we are just as poor as we can be, that we cannot live any longer in this house, that I don't know where our bread is to come from? All I do know is that the Lord will not forsake your father's children."

She said this very solemnly and Tom felt awed. It was almost as if there were an invisible Presence in the room.

"I can make fancy cakes and confectionery, I can keep house, I can sew, I cannot do anything else; and you, Tom, are too young to earn much. The little girls are mere babies yet and must be taken care of."

Tom looked up. He seemed somehow taller and older than he had been an hour ago. He took the books, laid them on the shelf, and said to his mother:

"I will be the man of the house, mother dear. We will pray and work. The Lord will provide. That is what father always said."

They knelt down together, and said their nightly prayer, and then they went to bed. The tired out, sorrowing wife slept. They had not three dollars in the house, and winter was coming.

Early in the morning Tom rose, made a fire in the stove, swept the kitchen, set the table and ground the coffee. Its pleasant aroma was diffused through the house when his mother and the little girls came down. As they sat down to breakfast the postman's whistle sounded and a letter was handed to Mrs. Hartwell.

As she opened it a crisp new bill for fifty dollars dropped to the floor. Tom picked it up and his mother read aloud:

"DEAR MADAM: Your late husband was honored and beloved by all his associates in the bank; we have ventured thus to lay our flowers on his grave, in the hope that you will appreciate our motive, and believe in the depth of our mourning and our sympathy with you in this hour. Mr. Hartwell, we think, would like this better than a sheaf of perishing lillies or a mound of fading roses.

"Very faithfully yours."

And then followed a long list of names.

"Did I not tell you, mother, the Lord would provide?" said Tom.

The day passed slowly and strangely, but there was much to do. Now and then a neighbor called for a few moments. At noon a carriage stopped at the door, and a man alighted and left a large covered basket for Mrs. Hartwell, with Mrs. Murray's kind regards. It contained a turkey beautifully roasted, a mould of cranberry jelly, mashed potatoes, turnips, bread, butter, and a mince pie, a delicious dinner ready for the table. As they rose from the meal, the postman came again, bringing another letter. This time it was from a lawyer in New York, an old friend of Mr. Hartwell. The writer said: "I know something of the state of affairs when death comes suddenly, and of the many expenses which throng at such a time. Will you accept for your husband's sake the trifle I enclose?"

It was a check for one hundred dollars. Mrs. Hartwell knelt down and thanked God. With the money thus put in her hands, she proceeded to carry out a little scheme. She bought flour, sugar, butter and eggs, and began to make delicate cakes for women in the town who did not understand the art, or were too busy to make cake, for traveler's luncheons, for picnics, weddings and church-fairs. Her small beginning was very modest and involved no special risk. Tom took a basket on his arm, delivered the goods, and went about to solicit orders. In the evening, and when he had a moment to spare, he pegged away at his studies.

One day he returned from a round of delivery with a flushed face and an air of resolution.

"Mother," he said, "Judge Arnold's wife is ill, and the nurse has gone away. The children are neglected, and the judge says he will give anybody twenty dollars a month who will take care of them from eight o'clock in the morning till eight o'clock at night. Could not I take the job?"

"You, Tom!"

"I have thought it all out. You have Carrie [a little maid who had been taken from a Home] to help you with the baking, and she could carry the cakes home as well and as safely as I do. The twenty dollars would be clear gain."

"But my dear boy, nursing is work for girls. People may make fun of you if they see you wheeling a baby carriage."

Tom drew himself up and held his head high. "I don't care who makes fun of me, mother, if I know I am doing right."

"It will be hard work," said the mother, "but I cannot withhold my consent. This is a very difficult place for Mrs. Arnold to find the right kind of help in, and I know you will be kind to the little ones, even if you have not much experience."

For several weeks the high-school boys were disposed to smile, but there is a great deal in taking a firm stand, and when they found that their laughter did not annoy Tom, it soon ceased. One lad, a leader among them, declared that he liked Hartwell's pluck. It took real sand, he added, to do that sort of work.

"That is a very dear boy," said the judge's wife months after, when she was able to go about again, and Tom was no longer needed. "He did everything for my babies as deftly as a woman could and with twice the conscience."

"He is a Christian soldier, mama," said little Robert gravely.

"I have studied Tom Hartwell," said the judge. "There is rare good stuff in him and I shall take him into my office and give him a lift. If Tom Hartwell wants to study law, I will see that he has an opportunity."

Thomas Hartwell is to-day a practising attorney. He made his way through college after a while and studied law with Judge Arnold. He is more than a lawyer; he is a thorough-going, earnest, sincere Christian, one who is in the forefront of every noble Christian endeavor. His mother no longer has to bake her little cakes. Tom can take care of her. The Lord never goes back on his own.

SOWING · GOSPEL · SEED

.....How the Quebec Society is Spreading the Knowledge of Christ in the Homes of the People

WHEN we read of the ostracism and persecution that the convert to Christianity in India or China has to endure, our sympathies go out to him and we long for the time when Gospel light and civilization will change the social conditions, so that every man shall have liberty to worship God according to his conscience. It is not generally known that nearer home there is a region where there is Gospel enlightenment and all the blessings of civilization and education, in which similar conditions prevail. In the Canadian province of Quebec and in certain adjacent sections on our side of the border, religious liberty is an empty phrase. True, a man or woman may undergo a change of faith and may leave the church of the family to enter another. There is no law to prevent the change or an avowal of it, and the laws may be invoked to prevent actual despoliation and personal violence, as either were used to punish for such a change; but the social punishment for a change of faith is appalling. To sensitive natures it is worse than death itself. It involves expulsion from the home, separation from family and friends, the loss of business connection and employment, and such public and private scorn that the convert is glad to escape from it, though in order to do so he must begin life again among strangers.

In the Province of Quebec, the population is overwhelmingly Roman Catholic. The Protestants number only 196,825 in a total of 1,488,535. In the city of Quebec and adjacent counties the proportion is still more startling. There, less than one-twentieth of the families are Protestant and nineteen of every twenty are Roman Catholic. The political result is very important. Of the Provincial Assembly of seventy-seven members, only seven are Protestants; and of the Legislative Council of twenty-six members, only four are Protestants. As a consequence of such a preponderance, the taxes and other legislation press unduly on the minority, and money is appropriated for the support of the church of the majority. That, however, would not be so dire an evil as to be intolerable, if it were not for the social prejudice that is manifested. In our own large cities, Catholics and Protestants live amicably together, and socially are on good terms. But in Quebec, Romanism seems to be of a type narrower and more bigoted than elsewhere. It belongs to the Romanism of a past generation. If any Roman Catholic is known to have attended a Protestant church, or to contemplate joining such a church, he incurs the odium of society. It is reported by people who have visited the province recently, that instances have been known of the priests having insisted on a family burning the Bible when it was found that they had purchased one. Children have actually been disowned and disinherited as a penalty for becoming Protestant.

Under such conditions the leaders of the Quebec branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society are doing valuable work. It is discouraging and difficult work as is proved by the recently issued report of the Society. Eight colporteurs and one Bible woman are engaged continually in the effort to get the Word of God into the homes of the people. To many of the people the Bible is an utterly unknown book. They have never read a word of it and have no idea of its claims or its value. Some regard it with prejudice as a heretical and a dangerous book which is liable to lead them into error. It has therefore been a work demanding strong faith and patience and perseverance to induce the people even to examine it for themselves. Much of the work has been done with individuals and is of the most unostentatious character. That it has been successful to any degree is a strong testimony to the power of the Book itself. God does bless the reading of his Word and it is still as it has been in other lands and other times the power of God unto salvation. Instances have occurred in which without any instruction, souls have been brought into the light simply by the secret study of the Scriptures. In other cases the first seeds have been sown by the Bible and then the reader has sought out the colporteur from whom he obtained the Book, to get further help. Nearly three thousand copies of the Word were placed last year and the results are already being felt. All honor is due to a band of faithful Christians engaged in such labor. They need the sympathy and the prayers of Christians in other lands, that their faith fail not, and that their labor of love may be blessed of God to the salvation of many souls.

PATIENT WITH THE LIVING

SWEET friend, when thou and I are gone,
Beyond earth's weary labor,
When small shall be our need of grace
From comrade or from neighbor,
Past all the strife, the toil, the care,
And done with all this sighing,
What tender truth shall we have gained,
Alas, by simply dying?

Then lips too chary of their praise
Will tell our merit over,
And eyes too swift our faults to see
Shall no defect discover.
Then hands that would not lift a stone
Where stones were thick to cumber
Our steep hill-path, will scatter flowers
Above our pillowed slumber.

Sweet friend, perchance both thou and I,
Ere love is past forgiving,
Should take the earnest lesson home—
Be patient with the living.
To-day's repressed rebuke may save
Our blinding tears to-morrow;
Then patience—e'en when keenest edge
May whet a nameless sorrow.

'Tis easy to be gentle when Death's silence shames our clamor,
And easy to discern the best
Through memory's mystic glamor;
But wise it were for thee and me,
Ere love is past forgiving,
To take the tender lesson home—
Be patient with the living.

SHOWED THE MINISTER

And Got Him in Line.

"In a minister's family in Los Angeles where I was visiting sometime ago, the wife complained of serious indigestion and dyspepsia. She admitted that she used coffee and said she more than half believed that was the trouble. I told her that I knew it was the trouble, for I had gone through with the experience myself and had only been cured when I left off coffee and took up Postum Food Coffee.

"She said she had tried the Postum, both for herself and her husband, but they did not like it. With her permission, I made Postum next morning myself, and boiled it full fifteen minutes after the real boiling of the pot began. Then when it was served, it was a rich, deep brown color and had the true flavor and food value that every Postum maker knows, It is all folly to talk about trying to make Postum with one or two minutes' steeping.

"You can't get something good for nothing. It must be boiled, boiled, boiled, and to keep it from boiling over, use small lump of butter, perhaps twice the size of a pea. That morning the minister and his wife liked Postum so well that their whole lives were changed on the question of diet, and they abandoned coffee at once and for all time.

"Now after a hard day's work, they are comforted, refreshed, and rested by a cup of well-made Postum for supper. They are both enthusiastic in its praise. The wife has entirely recovered from her dyspepsia. I will not go into the details of my own case, except to say that I was a desperate sufferer with dyspepsia, and discovered by leaving off coffee that coffee was the cause of it. I quickly got well when I took up Postum Food Coffee. I earnestly hope many more coffee drinkers may get their eyes open." Name and address given by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

LIFE-SIZE DOLL

Babies' Clothes Will Now Fit Dollie

2 ½ Feet High

"Life-Size Doll"—"That's advertised" that the baby's clothes will fit. No clothes to make. If mamma can donate one of baby's outgrown changes, that her little daughter can put on and off, button and unbutton to her heart's desire, the life-size doll will live in that child's memory long after childhood's days have passed away.

Every little girl loves a doll, more so a big doll; imagine how proud and delighted she would be if you gave her a real "life-size doll," 2 1-2 feet high, that can wear real clothes, whose head won't break, eyes fall in, or suffer any of the mishaps that dollie is apt to encounter.

This doll is an exact reproduction of a hand-painted French creation, done on extra heavy Sateen, that will not tear. In oil-colors that will not crock. The workmanship is perfect, the color effects the very finest.

The doll is intended to be stuffed with cotton or other suitable material. It is this Century's model of the old-fashioned "Rag Doll" that Grandma used to make, and would make Grandma open her eyes in wonder.

Dolly has Golden Hair, Rosy Cheeks, Brown Eyes, Kid Color Body, Red Stockings and Black Shoes, and in following the directions in making up if a piece of heavy cardboard is inserted in the soles, a perfect shoe is formed, enabling the doll to stand erect.

To the many mothers who have written, "Why don't you make a smaller doll for baby?" We have this same doll 20 inches high for the smaller children, which retails at 25 cents, while the "Life-Size Doll" sells at 50 cents.

If you are unable to procure these Dolls at your Retailers, the manufacturers will, upon receipt of price, send post-paid, to any address in United States, Canada or Mexico. ART FABRIC MILLS, 40 White St., New York.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Ants of Africa*

THE forest is inhabited by many species of ants, of many sizes, and of many different colors. Their number is so great that they not only cannot be counted, they cannot even be estimated. Their mode of life, their habits, and their homes vary greatly. Marvelous is the intelligence of these small creatures. Their thrift, perseverance and industry are beyond those of any other insect or animal.

They have great tenacity of purpose, and are most systematic. For their size they have immense strength. They possess many gifts to suit their different modes of living. They understand each other perfectly, otherwise they could not work with such deliberate concert of action, and so intelligently. They have chiefs, leaders, and workers.

Almost all the species of ants live together in large numbers. There are few that live solitary lives.

Those which prey alone are very voracious and fierce. Many aunts are endowed with a wonderful power of smell, and often, though not one of them can be seen, they suddenly make their appearance by thousands, or tens of thousands, when they scent food, many of the species coming even from under the ground. They are such nuisances that human being have to put the feet of their tables and cupboards into vases of water for protection.

Many ants have the ferocity of the leopard or other night animals. They attack their prey with great courage. One species, the bashikouays, go in countless numbers on their raids, and attack all life in the forest. All animals flee in order to escape them.

Among the most wonderful aunts are the termites, or white ants, who build structures of clay, or of grains of earth, to shut themselves from the light, to be protected from the rays of the sun, from the rain, and from their enemies.

Some species of termites are very fond of cotton goods, paper, etc., but avoid woolen or silk articles.

They manage to scent paper and cotton goods from under the ground, and ascend the poles upon which the trunks or chests which contain the goods rest. They build a long tunnel from the ground on the outside of the poles, and climb through to the chest, into which they eat their way. The tunnel is made of minute particles of wood glued together, by a substance coming from their bodies. Often the owner of the chest, when he opens it, finds nothing inside—everything having been eaten up by the termites.

One of the white ants, or nchellelays, said one day to another nchellelay: "Strange indeed is our life. We are unlike the other ants, for they enjoy the light of day, and breathe the air that passes over the prairies and forests. They can ramble where they please in search of prey or food. We nchellelays live in darkness. Light is odious to us. The sun is our greatest enemy, and we have to protect ourselves from its rays, which kill us when they strike our bodies. If, perchance, by some catastrophe, our houses are damaged, and we are thrown out of them, we have not only the sun, but the rain as our foe. Creatures surround us on every side to pounce upon us and devour us, and many kinds of ants are also our enemies. Our life is safe only when we are shut up in our houses."

An old and wise nchellelay, who had been listening, said: "Why do you complain of your existence? We are born with great gifts which other creatures do not possess, to suit our mode of life. To us, darkness is light, for we can see so much better in it. We erect buildings through which neither the sun nor the air, the light nor rain, nor our enemies can penetrate. We build during the night, so the sun cannot harm us. Just think how comfortable and cozy are our chambers!"

All the nchellelays were listening to what the wise and knowing one said, and when she had done speaking, they said: "You are right, wise one. We are born with certain great gifts, which no other creatures possess, to suit our mode of life, and protect ourselves from our enemies."

These nchellelays that were talking belonged to the species that build only on the prairies that are surrounded by the great forest. Their structures, or houses, are of the shape of gigantic mushrooms. They vary in height from ten to eighteen inches, the tops or crown being from ten to eighteen inches, and the stem or round pillar supporting the crown about five inches in diameter. As the colony grows larger, sometimes two or three crowns are built on the top of one another. Each house forms a colony.

From immemorial time, these nchellelays have built on the prairies, and as they increase and multiply in a wonderful manner, their structures cover the whole prairie, and can be counted by tens and tens of thousands, at short distances from one another. Strange indeed is the sight.

A Young Medical Missionary

EARLY in the present month there sailed from New York for Liverpool, en route to India, a young medical missionary of great promise. Miss Rose Fairbank, M. D., the traveler in question, was born in India and comes of a very distinguished missionary family. She is the daughter of the late Rev. Samuel B. Fairbank, D. D., long associated with the Mahratta Mission of the A. B. C. F. M., and granddaughter of the late Rev. Henry Ballantine of the same mission. Rev. Henry Fairbank and Rev. Edward Fairbank, both of the same mission, are her brothers, and Mrs. Hume, wife of Rev. Edward A. Hume, of Ahmednagar, is her sister. Mr. Hume is one of the leading members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Interdenominational Missionary Committee, which has done such splendid service in the great field of India relief work. Dr. Fairbank was a mere child when her mother died, and the little missionary of the future was sent to this country and reared in the home of an elder sister, the wife of Rev. Robert Woods, of Hatfield, Mass. She studied at Smith College, Massachusetts, where she graduated with the diploma of A. B. She took the full medical course at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. She now goes out to the India field under special appointment by the Woman's Board of Missions in New York to be connected with the Mary Ackerman Hoyt Memorial Hospital at Jhansi, in the Northwest provinces. Dr. Fairbank will write occasional letters for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose readers will thus be afforded an opportunity of noting the progress of this bright young servant of Christ in her mission to the afflicted ones of that distant land.

At 91 Lincoln Avenue, Cortland, N. Y., was once a house or sorrow and sadness. The daughter of George Loucks, the pride of the household, seemed going into a decline as she reached her early womanhood and her condition caused the greatest anxiety in the family. The happy ending of the matter caused considerable excitement in the neighborhood and, when questioned by a reporter, Mr. Loucks made the following statement:

"About two years ago my daughter, who was then in her sixteenth year, was in bad health. She was pale and thin, without strength or vitality, in fact her condition was that which is generally called all run down. We were, of course, worried about her and employed the best physicians to attend her. They studied her case and, although they did everything possible, gave her no relief which was permanent. The late Dr. Angel had first called my attention to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and my wife had heard they were a fine tonic, so we decided to try them for my daughter. We did so and inside of eight weeks the primary cause of her trouble was removed and she showed a decided gain in health, strength and flesh.

"A great many people will buy a medicine and take a few doses. Then if they are not benefited they throw it aside as no good, or take it spasmodically. We believed in a fair trial in strict accordance with directions and our faithfulness was rewarded for she was greatly benefited by them. Her color came to her cheeks and she continued to gain in weight and strength. So you see both my wife and myself believe in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and have found them a wonderful medicine. We have told a great many people about them and have been glad to do so."

Signed, GEORGE LOUCKS.

DOING THE BEST*

Inconspicuous Workers Recognized and Rewarded in the Day of Reckoning

URING the early days of trial after our Lord's departure, the disciples must have often thought of his Parable of the Talents with encouragement and with comfort. When he uttered it, how little did they understand the personal significance of his description of the "man aveling into a far country," or of that terval of centuries which he referred to , "after a long time." There were me among the little band whose work one has recorded. Paul and Peter so ershadowed them that we do not know here they went, or what they did. We ay be sure that they were not idle. ough their labors are not deemed worthy a place in the sacred record. There ve been many since their day, whose ry names are unknown, who have yet ne noble service in the Master's cause. hey toiled and suffered in obscurity, d passed away and were forgotten, hile others who occupied a larger sphere, lived in some great crisis of the hurch, or initiated some mighty move- ent, have had their names immortalized ecclesiastical history. But after a long ne when "the Lord of those servants meth and reckoneth with them," they, o, the inconspicuous worker with the ustrious leader, if they have been true d loyal, will hear the welcome words, Well done, good and faithful servant."

The principle which Christ so often unciated, of results commensurate with portunities, appears again in the Par- le of the Talents. Christ takes no count of the fact that one man brought ur talents and another ten. What he es notice and rewards is the faithfulness the servants. He who brought four lents had proved his energy and fidelity s clearly as he who brought ten. His portunity had not been so great, but he ad doubled his capital, as had his more chly endowed brother. A large circle lls a wider space than a small one, but ie smaller circle is as complete as a rger one. The inconspicuous worker ed not be depressed on account of the nallness of his sphere. If he fills that here, if he avails himself of his oppor- nities and does the best there is in him, is standing before his Lord will be among ie faithful servants. The reckoning is ot done by one who is greedy of gain, ut by one who is testing his servants nd is concerned with their qualities and eir devotion to his service, rather than ith what they bring in. This fact is ery cheering to the humble worker. He ay have only a few children gathered round him in a Sunday School; he may nd his sphere in a factory or an office; ut if he does his utmost, that is all that s expected of him. The one or two souls at he leads into the kingdom demon- trate his faithfulness as surely as do the rowds that some famous preacher pre- nts as the seals of his ministry. But oe to him who has great opportunity nd fails to use it.

It is the man with one talent who is eally keeping back the kingdom. There re so many of them and they are doing othing. In all our churches and in ociety, there are so many who have made p their minds that they have not the apacity for doing any spiritual work at ll. They cannot preach, they cannot ucceed even in Sunday School teaching, nd the evils and miseries of the world re so great that the little that they can o seems hardly worth the doing. So hey do nothing. It is these men to whom he reckoning will be a terrible thing. The kingdom will never come in its power ntil the weakest and most inefficient of ts members is doing all that he can. We ee how fatal such a disposition as that hown by this one-talented servant really s, when we think of our great political truggle now approaching settlement. When the great speakers and the skilful rganizers have done their best, on each ide, the voters, the great masses, must do heir part, and that is decisive. What vould happen if the thousands who have o capacity for political speaking, or working, were to stay at home and not do the thing that they can do—go to the polls and vote? If a thousand men in some doubtful State were each to say, "I have only one vote; what is that among so many?" and that thousand did not vote, how would their candidate fare if they all belonged to one party? The people who go regularly to church and keep alive their own spiritual life, but never seek to bring one soul into the light, have a warning in this parable. They are taking care of their own life but are missing the joy that comes from active service. They are failing to use the power that God gives to every earnest worker that seeks it.

Mrs. Talmage Lays a Corner-stone

ON the last Sunday in September, Rev. Dr. Talmage preached in John Wesley's famous old church in City Road, London. The house was crowded to suffocation and even the streets were thronged. A pouring rain prevented an after-meeting outdoors, as was intended, and many were greatly disappointed. During the following week, Dr. and Mrs. Talmage crossed to Ireland, where the preacher twice addressed audiences in Belfast and twice in Dublin.

On October 2, Mrs. Talmage laid the corner-stone of the Sunday School extension of the Wood Green Wesleyan Church, North London. In performing the ceremony she said: "For the glory of God and the advancement of religion, and in the spirit of international sisterhood, you of England and I of America, and for the welfare of generations to come, and praying that the work now begun may be completed without accident or harm, I now declare this corner-stone well and truly laid in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." Mrs. Talmage was presented with a silver trowel as a memento of the occasion. Dr. Talmage also made an appropriate address.

FRIEND OR STRANGER

I CAME and knocked upon the door,
I did not care to wander more;
And Christ forgave me o'er and o'er—
And I a perfect stranger.

He opened wide, and took me in;
He saved me from my mortal sin,
And with him now I long have been,
And now I'm not a stranger.

That door will open wide for thee,
And Jesus' love thou soon may'st see;
He'll save thee as he saved me,
To him thou'lt be no stranger.

Each day is gliding swiftly past,
Each setting sun may be our last.
Unless our faith becomes steadfast,
To Christ we'll be as strangers.

A COMMON TROUBLE

Thousands Suffer from It Without Knowing its Real Character

No trouble is more common or more misunderstood than nervous dyspepsia. People having it think that their nerves are to blame, are surprised that they are not relieved by nerve medicines and spring remedies; the real seat of mischief is lost sight of; the stomach is the organ to be looked after.

Nervous dyspeptics often do not have any pain whatever in the stomach, nor perhaps any of the usual symptoms of stomach weakness. Nervous dyspepsia shows itself not in the stomach so much as in nearly every other organ; in some cases the heart palpitates and is irregular; in others, the kidneys are affected. In others, the bowels are troubled, with loss of flesh and appetite, with the accumulation of gas, sour risings and heartburn.

Mr. A. W. Sharper, of No. 61 Prospect street, Indianapolis, Ind., writes as follows: "A motive of pure gratitude prompts me to write these few lines regarding the new and valuable medicine, Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I have been a sufferer from nervous dyspepsia for the last four years, have used various patent medicine and other remedies without any favorable result. They sometimes give temporary relief until the effects of the medicine wore off. I attributed this to my sedentary habits, being a bookkeeper, with little physical exercise, but I am glad to state that the tablets have overcome all these obstacles, for I have gained in flesh, sleep better and am better in every way. The above is written not for notoriety, but is based on actual facts."

Respectfully yours, A. W. SHARPER,
61 Prospect Street, Indianapolis, Ind.

It is safe to say that Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will help any stomach weakness or disease except cancer of the stomach. They relieve sour stomach, gas, loss of flesh and appetite, sleeplessness, palpitation, heartburn, constipation and headaches.

OLD AND YOUNG INVITED

One of the afflictions which renders life miserable from youth to old age and fills many a premature grave, is Catarrh. It ought not to be neglected. It should be attended to as quickly as possible.

Rev. J. W. Blosser, M.D., the celebrated Catarrh Specialist, and discoverer of the great Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Remedy, has, along with his ministerial work, given much time to his medical specialty permanently relieved thousands of cases of Catarrh that had resisted all other treatment. His treatment is simple, pleasant, safe and successful. A warm medicated vapor is introduced into all the intricate air passages, cells and cavities, where it destroys the catarrhal germs and eradicates the disease. It is the only treatment that reaches all the affected parts. It is so easily used, so pleasant and harmless that a child or a delicate woman could not object to it.

SAMPLES MAILED FREE.

If you do not care to invest money without a fuller knowledge of the remedy, write us and we will send a three day's trial sample free by mail, or if you will give us a better chance to demonstrate what we can do, enclose us $1.00, with a brief account of the symptoms, and we will send you by mail, postage paid, one box of Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Remedy with advice and instructions suited to your case.

The great relief you will obtain will be worth to you many times the cost, and if you continue the treatment a reasonable time, the chances are that it will be successful in ninety-five out of every hundred cases. Address.

Questions of the Week

1. Would a successful speculator in the Stock Exchange be justified in making a resolution to appropriate one-tenth (or any other percentage) of his net gains annually towards charity, church work or any other means for the promotion of Christianity, and would such offerings be acceptable?

A successful stock speculator would be justified in making the above resolution as any other business man, provided he followed up his resolution in making it operative under conditions named. Dealing in stocks, when carried on legitimately, is just as honorable a calling as dealing in any other commodity, when there is no fraud practised to mislead the public. As to any part of the gain being received for the promotion of Christianity, or any good cause, the proof of the honesty of the manner by which it was obtained and the motive of the giver, rest with God. In the narrative of casting money into the treasury, Jesus did not offer any objections to the rich man's offering, nor comment on how he obtained it. The lesson is: What was the sacrifice entailed by the gift? God is the judge of both how it was gained and the motive in giving it, and will reward accordingly.

2. For the ordinary Christian is it profitable, in the daily reading of the Bible, to read consecutively from Genesis to Revelation, or is some other order to be preferred?

There should be consecutive reading at intervals. To read only favorite passages would result in a one-sided view of the Bible. The Christian is not always the best judge of his own needs. It may be well for him to have admonition when he feels more in need of consolation. Therefore he should, say once a year, make it a rule to read the Bible consecutively, so that he may miss none of the passages it contains. Afterwards, he might pursue a different method, taking a course of poetry, some of which he will find in the prophets; a course of history or a course of philosophy, in which last he might well include some of Paul's epistles. Another variation would be to take the prophets of a particular period in connection with the history of that period in Kings and Chronicles. Or he may make a new arrangement of the Bible, taking up each book in its chronological order, as far as it has been ascertained. But in any case he should be careful to read the whole book consecutively at times. A good plan, which ensures greater familiarity with the New Testament than the Old, is to let the morning reading of the Bible (say three chapters) be in the Old Testament, and the evening reading in the New. Thus he would read the New Testament more than three times while he was reading the Old once.

3. Which is the most musical family in the Bible?

In I. Chron. 6:31, we read of those "whom David set over the service of song in the house of the Lord," and special mention is there made of "Heman, a singer." In the twenty-fifth chapter we have an account of his family. God gave to Heman fourteen sons and three daughters. And we read in the sixth verse, "All these were under the hands of their father for song in the house of the Lord, with cymbals, psalteries and harps, for the service of the house of God." If we add to these their father's brother, Asaph, I. Chron. 6:39, and his four sons, I. Chron. 25:2, I think we have undoubtedly the most musical family in the Bible.

4. In what sense were the keys given to the Apostle Peter (Matthew 16:19)?

Peter actually carried the keys to the Kingdom of Heaven as an apostle, for by preaching and even acting and living the doctrines of the kingdom he brought persons into the kingdom. He was the first to be given the power of bringing someone in, or of keeping them out, but the same power is given to all of us.. He was the first to declare in what way God would save the wicked, and who would be excluded from the kingdom. First fruits among the Jews at the day of Pentecost, Acts 2:41; among the Gentiles, the Centurion Cornelius and his company, Acts 10:44-47.

5. What is the object of throwing rice at a newly-married pair and where was the fashion first introduced?

Rice is thrown at weddings as an auspicious "send-off," because it is the most prolific of grains, and regarded as emblematic of God's command to Adam and Eve, and later to Noah, to "increase and multiply, and replenish the earth." Jews, as early as the time of Christ, threw wheat and the Russians throw oats and barley, upon the heads of the bridal couple, saying, "Increase and multiply." The custom, however, is earlier than this, and comes from the Brahmins of India, these Hindus regarding rice as an emblem of fecundity, and rice-throwing forming a part of the marriage ceremony there. It is erroneously believed that the custom originated among the Romans, because, in their most sacred form of marriage, the confarreatio, the bride held three wheat ears, symbolical of plenty, and although the confarreatio was allowed to fall into disuse under the Emperor Tiberias, the symbolic wheat ears never failed to play their part as a happy augury of future plenty in marriage. Some time later, it became customary for the marriageable girls to assemble outside the church porch with measures of wheat, which was thrown over the head of the bride as she reappeared after all was over; but the idea was derived from the Jewish custom mentioned above.

6. Quote passages from the Bible in which one word is used as a metaphor for sorrow, secresy, sin, death and the abode of the lost.

In the following passages the word darkness is used as a metaphor for:—1st. Sorrow: "A day of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness, as the morning spread upon the mountains" (Joel 2:2). 2nd. Death: "Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death" (Job 10:21; 22 also). 3rd. Secresy: "What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light" (Matt. 10:27). 4th. Sin: "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. If we say we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie" (John 1:5-6). 5th. Hell: "But the children of the kingdom shall be cast into outer darkness" (Matt. 8:12; also, II Pet. 2:4).

7. Is a mistress really justified in exacting more than eight hours' work a day from a domestic servant?

She is, unless there is an agreement to the contrary. A domestic servant is employed to accomplish a certain reasonable amount of work. If she can do it well in eight hours, well and good. If not, she should work until it is done. Those who insist on working only eight hours seldom earn their wages. It is certain, however, that a domestic servant should have some time to herself during the day, and not be required to "drudge" all day and far into the night, lest she take no pride in her work, but become a mere slave. There is as much dignity in "housework" as in any other occupation, and not one of the great human family should become degraded by it.

HATTIE V. CRAWFORD.

8. What are the chief reasons why the Christian should not attend the theatre?

They are the carnal and sensuous suggestiveness, the deterioration of the moral affections, the cost and dissipation of time and strength, and the demoralized mental appetite. 1. The immodest and sensual suggestiveness of the costumes does much evil. If one does not enjoy such, it detracts from the performance. If one does enjoy it, then he is corrupted by an impropriety in word or dress which he enjoys. 2. The moral affections which are played upon by insincere acting are stimulated and repressed in reflex action from the knowledge that it is fictitious. Constantly repeated, that becomes a great deterioration. 3. The hours and cost of plays are such as to waste strength as well as money. The home has to be neglected while away, and perhaps afterward as well. The habit so grows upon people as a fascination that it sadly dissipates the normal forces. 4. The atmosphere of fiction and sham demoralizes and enervates one's taste for what is genuine, virile and unsensational. The service of the church is rendered distasteful and ordinary healthy life becomes too tame in contrast.

C. P. ATKINSON.

9. What is the origin of the custom of "christening" a ship by breaking a bottle of wine over the bow?

"Christening" ships is a relic of the ancient libation practiced when they were launched. The action of "blessing" ships is alluded to by the monks of St. Denys. In July, 1418, the Bishop of Bangor was sent to Southampton to "bless" the king's ship, the Grace Dieu, and received £5 for his expenses. There are many other instances showing that it was customary at an early date.

10. When a wrongdoer seeks reinstatement in a church after suspension or expulsion, ought a public confession to be required of him, or is a general admission of guilt and repentance to the pastor sufficient?

It would depend upon circumstances whether an offender should make public confession. If his sin has been directly against the church or he has wronged the members, perhaps in the work of the church, he should make public confession. But if his wrongdoing does not concern the church in general, and he has been expelled on account of evil in his own life, his confession to the pastor may be sufficient. If the facts of his sin and expulsion are well-known to all the church, they should be informed of his repentance. The pastor and officers of the church should judge from the nature of the case whether public confession is necessary. The offender also should be guided by his own conscience.

G. R. B., North Chatham, N. Y. Does the narrative of the punishment which fell on Israel on account of Achan's sin (Joshua 7:10-12), indicate that a church in the aggregate will be punished for the open sin of one of its members?

You cannot suppose that one person will be punished for the sins of another. He may suffer through the sins of another, but not in the way of directly inflicted punishment. Neither is a church punished in the aggregate, but it, too, may, and doubtless does often, suffer through the sins of one of its members. Its influence is crippled and its power curtailed. That was the case with the Israelites. They lost power and were humbled by their enemies. The account in Joshua represents God as dealing directly with them and pointing out the cause of their humilation, but that is practically what occurred. The Church ought to discipline a member living in sin. For the sake of its own purity and for the sake of the offender it ought to show its abhorence of his sin. Paul ordered this done at Corinth (See I. Cor. 5:1-13).

John D. Vautier, historian Eighty-eighth Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers, Ninth and Washington avenue, Philadelphia, writes us as follows:

In your issue of September 19th you give a list of modern battles, with attendant losses, which, so far as the losses in the war for the Union is concerned, may be misleading. The figures for Gettysburg are from the official records, but even in their official reports the losses of the Confederates are always imperfect, and mostly always very much less than the actual loss. Of the Wilderness and Spotsylvania the Union losses are accurately given, but for the Confederate side no official report of the casualties was made by General Lee, but a careful comparison of the reports of subordinate commanders enables us to give close figures for the results. Appended are my figures. In my table I have included the Confederate losses:

Gettysburg—Union killed and wounded	17,684
Confederate killed and wounded	15,301
Total	32,985
Wilderness—Union killed and wounded	14,083
Confederate killed and wounded	8,500
Total	22,583
Spotsylvania—Union killed and wounded	16,141
Confederate killed and w'nded	6,000

T. T. F., Neelyville, Ohio. 1. If I am dealing with a person, and he defrauds me purposely, and afterward I am dealing with him, and he makes a mistake in my favor, am I wrong in not saying anything about it, if it evens the fraud? 2. Was Judas ever a sincere follower of Christ?

1. No matter what others may do, an upright man will not permit even the suspicion of dishonor to rest upon his own actions. Consequently, if an error should be made by another, even under the circumstances you mention, the proper course would be to call attention to it. At the same time, you would be quite right to retain what was required to justly square the old indebtedness, explaining why you did so. 2. Concerning the early life of Judas, nothing is known. It is evident from the fact of his having been called as one of the twelve that he must have previously declared himself a follower of Christ. He may, as some commentators hold, have been insincere from the first, attracted only by the possibilities of wealth, power and influence. Or, assuming a certain sincerity, he may have been unable to resist the temptation which came with the control of the money and gifts contributed to the cause, and so have given way to covetousness, faithlessness to the Master and then to embezzlement, and so on until the great crime was conceived and committed. Some have claimed that Judas' sin was the result of his ambition to hasten forward Christ's temporal sovereignty, and that he was really a patriot who betrayed his Master, believing that at the last moment Jesus would exercise his miraculous power and set up his kingdom. Such a theory, however, is regarded as fantastical.

D. J. B., Norwich, Conn. The Bible tells us that there shall be wars and rumors of wars and famine and pestilences. Now, if God sends these things, is a Christian doing right to try to stop God's work?

The argument that God is the author of evil and that therefore it should be permitted, is an old one; but it is wholly wrong. Evil springs from man's own sinful heart and his wicked deeds. Obedience to health laws would doubtless mitigate if it did not entirely prevent pestilence, and the universal cultivation of brotherly love and kindness would make war and even famine impossible. "God loves to be helped," and every one who labors to bring about His kingdom on earth is serving Him and fulfiling the purpose for which man was created.

TO SOW THE GOOD SEED

NEW AND OLD WORKERS GOING TO MISSIONARY FIELDS ACROSS THE SEA

'T was in a spirit of faith and courage and enthusiasm that there gathered on the deck of the good ship Winifredian, on Wednesday morning, October 10th, thirty missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union to watch through the rain and the fog the receding shores of their native land. It might be that they were seeing for the last time in this world the faces of their loved ones standing on the wharf watching the ship as it sailed out of Boston harbor, sending their prayers and silent benedictions after it as, with tear-dimmed eyes, they saw it sail away. It was not a new experience to some of the missionaries on board the Winifredian, for they were going out for the second and even for the third time, with their zeal not in the least lessened by the hardships and the possible dangers before them. There were others, younger and without experience, going out for the first time.

The young bride of but nineteen years and the gray-haired man grown old in missionary service side by side on the vessel's deck moved by the same impulse, the spreading abroad of the Gospel of Christ in heathen lands.

Boston's Tremont Temple and the rooms of the American Baptist Missionary Union were the scenes of great activity when the first of the farewell services arranged for the outgoing missionaries was to be held. Chapman Hall was filled to overflowing at ten o'clock, when the missionaries were the guests of the Boston Baptist Ministers' Meeting. All of the missionaries were introduced to the audience by name, and many of them made brief addresses. Special interest was given to the meeting by the presence of that veteran missionary, Rev. William Ashmore, whose half a century of work in China has not caused him to feel that it is time for him to rest from his labors, but who is as full of missionary zeal and as eager to be up and doing as he has ever been, at any time in his long and noble life.

At twelve o'clock, Monday, a "missionary breakfast" was served in Gilbert Hall, Tremont Temple. The breakfast was presided over by the Hon. Robert O. Fuller, President of the Missionary Union, a wealthy resident of Cambridge whose son has been for some years a missionary.

After the breakfast there were addresses by a number of the missionaries. Among them was Dr. Ida F. Levering, a medical missionary who has been in charge of the hospital for women and children in Nellore, India, but who now goes with her husband to Secunderabad, the most important station in the Deccan, where she will work among the women and children, and where it is hoped that a hospital may be established. None of the reports of their work given by the missionaries were more interesting than Dr. Levering's accounts of her work as a medical missionary, and of the opportunities the hospital work gave her and her assistants of "sowing the good seed" in the hearts of women and children brought to the hospital for treatment.

The meetings after two o'clock on Monday were held in the Clarendon Street Church, a church hallowed by the years of service of that great friend of missions, Dr. A. J. Gordon. This meeting was presided over by the Home Secretary, Rev. Henry A. Mabie. There were addresses by the Rev. C. E. Bousfield and the Rev. W. F. Beamen, both of whom have been missionaries to China and who expect to return to that country when it is possible for them to do so. There were also addresses by the Rev. H. C. Applegarth, whose text, "We therefore ought to sustain such persons," was a sermon in itself. The Rev. W. R. Manley, Rev. S. W. Hamblen, and the Rev. E. G. Phillips, missionaries returning to India, gave brief addresses.

MISSIONARIES OF THE AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION ON THE S.S. "WINIFREDIAN"

A pouring rain did not prevent a good attendance at the meetings on Tuesday, beginning with the meeting for prayer and conference in the morning.

The afternoon meetings were in charge of the Woman's Society and were presided over by Miss Sarah Durfee, of Providence.

Some of the missionaries sent out by the Missionary Union this fall had gone before these memorable services were held. Among them was the Rev. John L. Dearing, D.D., who returns to his duties as President of the Baptist Theological Seminary at Yokohama in Japan. In this school many of the missionaries and ministers in Japan receive their training. Mrs. J. H. Vinton and Mr. and Mrs. Sumner R. Vinton, and Mrs. Mary Williams Burhoe are now en route to Burma. Rev. C. W. Briggs has gone to Iloilo, and Rev. C. B. Tenny to Japan. Miss E. E. Scott, Miss A. E. Long, and Miss A. D. Mason are new missionaries who have gone to Burma. Miss Whitehead returns to her work in the school at Maulmein, Burma, and Miss E. R. Simons goes also to Burma and will be stationed at Toungoo. Mr. and Mrs. Hanson return with their two little boys to Bhamo, Burma, and Mr. Young goes also to Burma for work among the Shans. Mr. and Mrs. Haggard return to their work in Impur, Upper Assam, and Mr. and Mrs. Manley go to their former field at Kurnool.

The Baptist denomination and the whole Christian world must rejoice in the outgoing of so large a number of men and women to work in foreign lands. While the number is large, it is very small when one knows of the crying need of workers in the fields to which they have gone.

Money an Idol

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Exod. 32: 20:

And he took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and strawed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink of it.

PEOPLE will have a god of some kind, and they prefer one of their own making. Here come the Israelites, breaking off their golden earrings, the men as well as the women, for in those times there was masculine as well as feminine decoration. Where did they get these beautiful gold earrings, coming up as they did from the desert? Oh, they borrowed them of the Egyptians, when they left Egypt. These earrings are piled up into a pyramid of glittering beauty. "Any more earrings to bring," says Aaron. None. Fire is kindled; the earrings are melted and poured into a mold, not of an eagle or a war charger, but of a silly calf; the gold cools down; the mold is taken away and the idol is set up on its four legs. An altar is built in front of the shining calf. Then the people throw up their arms and worship.

Moses has been six weeks on Mount Sinai, and he comes back, and hears the howling and sees the dancing of these golden calf fanatics, and he loses his patience, and he takes the two plates of stone, on which were written the Ten Commandments, and flings them so hard against a rock that they split all to pieces. When a man gets angry he is apt to break all the Ten Commandments! Moses rushes in, and he takes this calf-god and throws it into a hot fire until it is melted all out of shape, and then pulverizes it—not by the modern appliance of nitro-muriatic acid, but by the ancient appliance of nitre or by the old-fashioned file. He stirs for the people a most nauseating draught. He takes this pulverized golden calf and throws it in the only brook which is accessible, and the people are compelled to drink of that brook or not drink at all.

But they did not drink all the glittering stuff thrown on the surface. Some of it flows on down the surface of the brook to the sea, and the sea takes it up and bears it to the mouth of all the rivers, and when the tides set back are in our day carried up into the Potomac and the Hudson and the Thames and the Clyde and the Tiber: and men go out and they skim the glittering surface, and they bring it ashore and they make another golden calf, and California and Australia break off their golden earrings to augment the pile, and in the fires of financial excitement and struggle all these things are melted together, and while we stand looking and wondering what will come of it, lo! we find that the golden calf of Israelitish worship has become the golden calf of European and American worship.

Pull aside this curtain and you see the golden calf of modern idolatry. It is not, like other idols, made out of stocks or stone, but it has an ear so sensitive that it can hear the whispers on Wall street and Third street and State street, and the footfalls in the Bank of England, and the flutter of a Frenchman's heart on the Bourse. It has an eye so keen that it can see the rust on the farm of Michigan wheat and the insect in the Maryland peach-orchard and the trampled grain under the hoof of the Russian war-charger. It is so mighty that it swings any way it will the world's shipping. It has its foot on all the merchantmen and the steamers. It started the American Civil War, and under God stopped it; and it decided the Turco-Russian contest. One broker in September, 1869, in New York, shouted, "One hundred and sixty for a million!" and the whole continent shivered. The golden calf of the text has, as far as America is concerned, its right front foot in New York, its left front foot in Chicago, its right back foot in Charleston, its left back foot in New Orleans, and when it shakes itself it shakes the world. Oh, this is a mighty god—the golden calf of the world's worship.

But every god must have its temple, and this golden calf of the text is no exception. Its temple is vaster than St. Paul's Cathedral in England, and St. Peter's in Italy, and the Alhambra of the Spaniards, and the Parthenon of the Greeks, and the Taj Mahal of the Hindus and all the cathedrals put together. Its pillars are grooved and fluted with gold, and its ribbed arches are hovering gold, and its chandeliers are descending gold, and its floors are tessellated gold, and its vaults are crowded heaps of gold, and its organ-pipes are resounding gold, and its pedals are tramping gold, while standing at the head of the temple, as the presiding deity, are the hoofs and shoulders and eyes and ears and nostrils of the calf of gold.

Further, every god must have not only its temple, but

and this golden calf of the text is no exception. Its altar is not made out of stone as other altars, but out of counting-room desks and fireproof safes, and it is a broad, a long, a high altar. The victims sacrificed on it are the Swartouts and the Ketchams and the Fisks and ten thousand other people who are slain before this golden calf. What does this god care about the groans and struggles of the victims before it? With cold, metallic eye, it looks on and yet lets them suffer. What an altar! What a sacrifice of mind, body and soul! The physical health of a great multitude is flung on to this sacrificial altar. They cannot sleep, and they take chloral and morphine and intoxicants. Some of them struggle in a nightmare of stocks, and at one o'clock in the morning suddenly rise up shouting: "A thousand shares of New York Central—one hundred and eight and a-half! take it!"—until the whole family is affrighted, and the speculators fall back on their pillow and sleep until they are awakened again by a "corner" in Pacific Mail or a sudden "rise" of Rock Island. Their nerves gone, their digestion gone, their brain gone, they die. The gowned ecclesiastic comes in and reads the funeral service: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord!" Mistake. They did not "die in the Lord;" the golden calf kicked them!

The trouble is, when men sacrifice themselves on this altar suggested in the text, they not only sacrifice themselves, but they sacrifice their families. If a man by a wrong course is determined to go to perdition, I suppose you will have to let him go. But he puts his wife and children in an equipage that is the amazement of the avenues, and the golden headgear of the harness gleams, until black calamity takes the bits of the horses and stops them, and shouts to the luxuriant occupants of the equipage, "Get out!" They get out. They get down. That husband and father so hard they never got up. There was the mark on them for life—the mark of a split hoof—the death-dealing hoof of the golden calf.

Solomon offered in one sacrifice, on one occasion, twenty-two thousand oxen and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep; but that was a tame sacrifice compared with the multitude of men who are sacrificing themselves on this altar of the golden calf, and sacrificing their families with them. The soldiers of General Havelock in India walked literally ankle deep in the blood of "the house of massacre," where two hundred white women and children had been slain by the Sepoys; but the blood about this altar of the golden calf flows up to the knee, flows up to the girdle, flows to the shoulder, flows to the lip. Great God of heaven and earth, have mercy on those who immolate themselves on this altar! The golden calf has none.

Still the degrading worship goes on, and the devotees kneel and kiss the dust and count their golden beads and cross themselves with the blood of their own sacrifice. The music rolls on under the arches: it is made of clinking silver and clinking gold. The soprano of the worship is carried by the timid voices of men who have just begun to speculate, while the deep bass rolls out from those who for ten years have been steeped in the seething cauldron. Chorus of voices rejoicing over what they have made; chorus of voices wailing over what they have lost. This temple of which I speak stands open day and night, and there is the glittering god with his four and there is the smoking altar of sacrifice, new victims every moment on it, and there are the kneeling devotees; and the doxology of the worship rolls on, while death stands with moldy and skeleton arm beating time for the chorus—"More! more! more!"

Some people are very much surprised at the actions of people in the Stock Exchange, New York. Indeed, it is a scene sometimes that paralyzes description, and is beyond the imagination of any one who has never looked in. What snapping of finger and thumb and wild gesticulation and raving like hyenas, and stamping like buffaloes and swaying to and fro and jostling and running one upon another and deafening uproar, until the president of the Exchange strikes with his mallet four or five times, crying, "Order! order!" and the astonished spectator goes out into the fresh air feeling that he has escaped from pandemonium. What does it all mean! I will tell you what it means. The devotees of every heathen temple cut themselves to pieces and yell and gyrate. This vociferation and gyration of the Stock Exchange is all appropriate. This is the worship of the golden calf.

But my text suggests that this worship has to be broken up, as the behavior of Moses on this occasion indicated. So you may depend upon it that God will burn and he will grind to pieces the golden calf of modern idolatry, and he will compel the people in their agony to drink it. If not before, it will be so on the last day. I know not where the fire will begin, whether at the "Battery" or Lombard street, but it will be a very hot blaze. The earth will wrap itself round and round in shroud of flame and lie down to perish. What then will become of your golden calf? Who then so poor as to worship it? Melted, or between the upper and the nether millstone of falling mountains ground to powder. Dagon down; Moloch down; Juggernaut down; golden calf down! But, every day is and God is all the time grinding to pieces the golden calf. Some years ago, in a time of panic, we learned, as never before, that forgeries will not pay; that the watering of stock will not pay; that the spending of fifty thousand dollars on country seats and a palatial city residence, when there are only thirty thousand dollars income, will not pay; that the appropriation of trust funds to our own private speculation will not pay. We had a great national tumor, in the shape of fictitious prosperity. We called it national enlargement; instead of calling it enlargement, we might better have called it a swelling. It was a tumor, and God cut it out; and the nation was sent back to the principles of our fathers and grandfathers, when twice three made six instead of sixty, and when the apples at the bottom of the barrel were just as good as the apples on the top of the barrel, and a silk handkerchief was not half cotton, and a man who wore a five-dollar coat paid for was more honored than a man who wore a fifty-dollar coat not paid for.

The modern golden calf, like the one of the text, is very apt to be made out of borrowed gold. These Israelites of the text borrowed the earrings of the Egyptians, and then melted them into a god. That is the way the golden calf is made nowadays. A great many housekeepers, not paying for the articles they get, borrow of the grocer and the baker and the butcher and the dry-goods seller. Then the retailer borrows of the wholesale dealer. Then the wholesale dealer borrows of the capitalist; and we borrow, and borrow, and borrow, until the co munity is divided into two classes—tho who borrow and those who are borrow of; and after a while the capitalist wan his money and he rushes upon the whol sale dealer, and the wholesale deal wants his money and he rushes upon t retailer, and the retailer wants his mon and he rushes on the customer, and all go down together. It is this temptati to borrow and borrow and borrow th keeps the people everlastingly praying the golden calf for help, and just at t minute they expect the help the gold calf treads on them. DEACONESS WORK AT THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Practical Helpfulness and Christlike Benevolence : : :

AMONG the many excellent institutions for which the city of Washington is justly famed, few have done better service than the Lucy Webb Hayes National Training School, which was named in memory of the estimable wife of ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes. This distinguished Christian lady, by her interest in the cause of missions, so endeared herself to the women of the land that the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the M. E. Church founded in her honor a national institution for the training of missionaries and deaconesses. It is both a training school and a deaconess home.

REV. A. H. AMES

The building was donated to the society by Mr. Ephraim Nash in 1890, and after having been enlarged was formally dedicated in October, 1891.

Contiguous to the training school, and as an adjunct to it, is the Sibley Memorial Hospital. Both are under the jurisdiction of the Woman's Home Missionary Society. The hospital building was donated by the late William Sibley, of Washington, D. C. Nurse-deaconesses there receive the training of a regular nurse. Rev. A. H. Ames, D. D., is superintendent of the training school and Miss Martha M. Tomkinson is preceptress. Dr. Charlotte A. Aikins is the director in the hospital. A corps of trained deaconess nurses, with the students of the training school, as assistants, render efficient service.

The object of the training school is to prepare women to be missionaries, visiting or nurse deaconesses, pastoral helpers, industrial teachers and superintendents of Homes. While the privileges of this school are intended primarily for those who expect to enter the service of the society, its doors are open, so far as accommodations allow, to all who wish to prepare themselves for any department of humanitarian activity. Churches are now opposed to sending out missionaries to foreign or even to home fields, without special training for their duties. The demand for skilled workers, and especially for the deaconess, is growing. She is an ambassador of Christ. She ministers to the sick and the poor, prays with the dying, cares for the orphan, and seeks out the wandering.

The government of the school and Home is modeled, as far as possible, upon that of the family life. The school studies include a Biblical department, instructions in evidence, doctrine, ethics, social science, church history and literature. Special lectures are given by experts. The department of Applied Science include instruction in kindergarten, kitchen-garden, domestic science, business methods, mission and charitable work and parliamentary law.

Experienced deaconesses, who reside in the Home and the young deaconess, who is in training, labor together like elder and younger sisters. Under the direction of city pastors they visit from home to home. The black-gowned deaconess is now a familiar object in the national capital. She goes among rich and poor, and is welcomed by both. She is a connecting link between the highest and lowest strata of society. Her labors among the children is a most promising part of the work; through the children she reaches the parents. Little lads are taken off the streets, formed into clubs, and taught the unwritten law of good behavior, the gospel of cleanliness, and the love of such manual occupations as wood-carving and basket-making. Little girls are formed into classes, and taught sewing and housewifely methods, together with Bible lessons.

Our photographs illustrate some of the practical work of the deaconesses in relief work, in carrying food to the aged, in visiting the sick and wretched, in hospital and playing and singing to them to cheer them and sooth their sufferings. One night a deaconess took her guitar to a midnight mission, in the very heart of the slums. She had a pitiful audience of men, wretched and sunk in vice. A thrilling message was given and then the deaconess, striking a few chords, sang:

If you are tired of your load of sin,
Let Jesus come into your heart.

Hardened men wept and prayed. Another day, with her guitar, she visited a poor friendless neglected outcast, who was crazed by opium. When the deaconess entered, the woman was moaning and raving, alternately praying and cursing. Attempts to sooth her were vain, till the visitor took up her guitar, and softly touching its strings, sang:

"You've carried your burden, you've carried it long,
Oh bring it to Jesus, he's loving and trong."

The poor sad woman was quieted. That was the beginning of a change that ultimately led her to repent and accept Christ.

But the deaconess's "Gospel of Song" has not always been heard among the submerged classes. At one time the singing evangelist was entertained in the luxurious home of a wealthy citizen. She was asked to sing, and touching the strings, she chose: "Christ is All." This she followed with the consecration hymn: "I'll go Where you Want me to Go." The cold man of the world was touched, and became a warm friend of the work, and a most generous contributor.

The Homes are supported by voluntary contributions. An additional building is to be erected on ground lately purchased, adjoining the school, as the present building is inadequate. There is an excellent opportunity for the liberal-minded to found and endow a free scholarship for deaconesses, and otherwise to aid a very worthy work. Superintendent Ames will gladly furnish all necessary information to inquirers who may be interested.

LUCY WEBB HAYES (FROM AN OLD PORTRAIT)

MINISTRY TO THE AGED

A Remarkable Conversion

Our readers are already somewhat acquainted with the excellent work of the El Faro Cristiano Mission at Aguacate, Cuba. In a letter just received from Rev. Arthur W. Dowe, Superintendent of the Mission, the writer says:

Our work is gaining new friends, and we are extending it as rapidly as we can. We are about to open another permanent mission, some ten miles west of this place, at Jaruco. The manner in which the opportunity was made for us was remarkable.

During our first few months in Aguacate we became acquainted with Mark M., a young Tennesseean, who often came to our Mission. But he never came to the point of final surrender to Christ. Last summer, while on a trip to the United States, I wrote to him, exhorting him to give himself wholly to the Master, to cast in his lot with us in our Cuban work. I received no answer, and only after my return learned the result of my letter. It appears that at the time he heard from me he had as companion in his cabin Arthur P., a young Englishman, who had been very carefully trained in youth by a pious, praying mother.

But as Arthur grew to manhood a great desire to travel took possession of him, and he shipped for America, where for some fourteen years he was a wanderer in a strange land, journeying back and forth between Canada and the Argentine Republic, and leading a wild life. His early training was forgotten; he was on the swift road to moral and spiritual ruin. Soon after coming to Cuba he entered our Mission one evening with Mark. The preaching, singing and Bible reading combined to awaken early and tender memories. A few days afterward Mark came into the cabin with my letter in his hand and said: "Look Arthur, what my good friend has written me from the States," and handed it to him. Then a voice seemed to say to him: "This is your opportunity—now is the time." Springing to his feet he cried out, "Mark, this letter is not for you, it is for me! it is for me!"

People were astounded at the sudden change that followed. A few days later he was preaching the gospel at Jaruco, first to the prisoners in jail, then to the sick at the hospital.

It is through his activities in Jaruco that we are opening a permanent mission there.

CUBA'S · GREAT · INDUSTRIAL · SCHOOL

IT IS AT REMEDIOS, AND IS MAKING THOUSANDS OF ORPHANS HAPPY AND USEFUL

WHEN, at the close of the Spanish-American war, the Americans began the process of reconstruction, the condition of the children and homeless orphans of the island was almost alarming. In the country they roamed about like small bandits; in the cities they swarmed in the cafes and restaurants, holding out clawlike hands and uttering a beseeching whine, the most pathetic and persistent of all Cuba's beggars. The situation was becoming a serious one. It was known that there were at least 20,000 orphans left by the war, destitute of home, relatives, support or protection of any kind. I have met them in the depths of the woods, running wild, hungry and half naked. From some of the remoter districts reports began to be heard that they were not only a burden but a menace, as certain petty thieveries indicated.

It was in this field, ripe to the harvest, that the great and lasting work of the Cuban Orphan Society was done—a work which has happily been done for the future as well as for the pressing needs of the present. Cuba's future must be industrial even more than it must be political, and nothing has been so much neglected in the island as scientific training for her agricultural interests. A great industrial school was established at Remedios, with General Francis V. Greene as the president of the society; and, with many prominent and wealthy New Yorkers interested in it, success was assured from the start. Miss Laura Gill, whose name, in consequence of her magnificent work in connection with the school, has become a household word in Cuba, was placed in sole supervision of its operations on the island, and by her activity, tact and devotion showed that no better choice could have been made. General Brooke, then military Governor of the island; General Ludlow, military Governor of Havana; General James H. Wilson, General Fitzhugh Lee and other prominent military authorities took an active interest in the redemption of the orphans and lent a helping hand. General and Mrs. Ludlow were especially helpful in the city of Havana, and a branch of the Remedios school was established in the old Compostela Barracks that accomplished much good.

A TYPICAL CUBAN SCHOOL

CHILDREN FROM THE HOSPITAL

From the first, all funds necessary to provide for the expenses of the school were provided by the society, and disbursements were made through the treasurer in New York city. The only assistance given by the government was the donation of a tract of land and buildings formerly occupied by the Spanish army, with an old stone fort and part of the trocha as reminders of its previous use. In charge of the school was placed Mr. Eben White, a trained expert in scientific farming. A corps of teachers, each a specialist in some branch, was employed, and an agricultural and industrial training school was inaugurated for the first time in Cuba's history.

The children swarmed in. Every teacher's hands were full for many busy weeks. The children were dirty, half clad, hungry, sometimes with a wolfish, starved look in their eyes. Frequently they seemed frightened, and it would be several days before they could be induced to talk.

From misery to joy was a swift gamut for these hungry and homeless little reconcentrados. The fame of the school spread far and wide, even to the remote mountain districts. There were more applications than could be entertained. One morning there was a timid lifting of the brass knocker, and when the attendant went to the door a shy, small, childish face looked up at her, and two plaintive dark eyes made a beseeching appeal.

"Please, may I come to school here?"

"Why, I think so. But who are you? Where are your parents?"

"I haven't any."

"Then, I'm sorry, but you'll have to bring a properly certified paper from the alcalde."

"Oh, yes; I will get it," cried the child, and without another word she turned and almost ran from the astonished teacher. That was in the morning. The alcalde was three miles away. In the middle of the hot, tropic afternoon she again made her appearance, dusty and fatigued, but triumphant.

"I've got it," she said, impressively.

And she had. They took the tired, dust-stained little figure in and gave her a bath and food, and before sundown she was photographed just as you see her in the picture, perhaps the happiest lit mambi in all the home.

Two orphan boys, ten and eleven spectively, were living the lives almost wild animals in a remote portion of t interior, twenty miles from Remedios. some means they heard of the scho They were tired of living on what fru and berries grew wild. The school quickly became a hive industry. Every practical art that coul go toward instructing these children f the building of a home and the develo ment of agricultural resources was taug them. The children learned the care horses, mules, chickens, cows, and oth animals, and were taught that no fou footed friend should be abused, som thing in which the Cuban is strangel lacking; and also they were taught coo ing, sewing, practical farming, and t care of a place, carpentering, trained nur ing, the care of bees, housekeeping, and dozen other arts of daily life. Seagoing Christian Endeavorers

THE FOUNDING AND REMARKABLE PROGRESS OF THE C. E. SEAMEN'S HOME AT NAGASAKI, JAPAN

NAGASAKI, Japan, has a Christian Endeavor Seaman's Home. It had a small beginning, and, opening on February 3, 1896, was a modest affair; but its history will interest Christian Endeavorers everywhere. The establishment of the Home came about in this way: The United States steamship Charleston, when on the China station in 1895, had a floating Christian Endeavor Society of fifteen members. The ship was getting repaired at Nagasaki, Japan. On shore, no decent place was to be found where the sailors could get a meal or a bed. The noble band of Endeavorers, after a prayerful conference, determined to start a movement to establish a sailor's Christian Home, and promptly raised on their ship $1,028, $600 of that amount representing the contributions of the fifteen members of the society.

This money, together with more subsequently raised, was put into the hands of the Christian missionaries at Nagasaki. A board of directors was chosen, with the request that the money be used to establish a Christian Endeavor Home, where sailors of the navy and merchant ships could go for rest and refreshment, as well as for reading, writing and recreation, and where a room could be set apart for those who desire to meet for religious instruction.

The Home, as soon as ready, was put in charge of a Christian sailor, Mr. John Makins, who fills his office with devotion and tact. The first year's expenses were met by the profit from beds and meals, and this was augmented by voluntary contributions.

The Home soon proved too small, and the directors, at their own expense, made an addition that cost them $3,500. This completed, there were twenty-five rooms in all, four of which are used by the manager as his home. The bedrooms, with one exception, are named after American men-of-war. The one exception is known as the Carlton H. Jencks' memorial room. Jencks was one of the leaders in the organization of the Home, and later met his death on board the United States steamship Maine in Havana harbor. The furniture for this memorial room came from Endeavorers in America, who contributed the cost at the solicitation of Miss A. P. Jones.

The Home has sleeping accommodations for fifty seamen, and has served as many as 400 meals a day. Last year 13,000 meals were served, 2,630 beds were occupied. Seventy-six meetings were held, and eleven souls professed conversion.

While so far the Home has been successful in paying running expenses, yet the directors deem it wise to secure an endowment fund to provide for possible and very probable contingencies in the future. A small sum is already in hand towards the $10,000 which the directors feel should be forthcoming. The opportunity to aid so important a cause will doubtless appeal to many Endeavorers in America.

The manager gives the following figures incidental to the last six months' work of 1899: Ships visited, 168; meetings held, 72; tracts and magazines distributed, 6,300; visits to hospital, 20; visits to jail, 12; free meals to the hungry, 37; free lodgings, 85; garments given to the destitute, 43; men assisted to leave port, 36; employment secured for 23; meals worked for, 96; total number of meals served, 19,845; beds supplied, 3,897.

To Miss Wortman, of Cadiz, O., the Home is indebted for the practical gift of a soda-water fountain, the only one in Japan. It has proved a great blessing to the thirsty soldiers and sailors, as the drinks served in Nagasaki are particularly bad.

Of the spiritual work Manager Makins writes as follows: "I had the pleasure of speaking two different Sundays at a native Methodist church here. The pastor said the two services resulted in five enquirers—two of that number have been received into the church on probation.

"Our meetings in the Home are sometimes quite well attended: at other times the attendance is small: it of course depends upon the number of warships in the harbor as to whether we have many men or not.

"Last Sunday night we had only six all told, but one of those gave his heart to God. He was from the German warship Irene.

"The wreck of the United States transport Morgan City brought us much work, as the 750 soldiers were brought to Nagasaki, and camped in two large warehouses near the Home. The soldiers had no money, but the bad ones sold their coats, blankets, everything they could scrape together, for money with which to buy whiskey.

"We held five meetings with the men. The Sunday evening meeting was largely attended, and at the close one soldier boy got up and said he would give his heart to God, not only because it was his duty to do it, but because of his dear ones left behind in Connecticut.

"Letters have come to us from soldiers who were with us a few days when returning to America from Manila, showing that some through our meetings here decided to follow Jesus, and that they have since joined the church on their arrival at home.

"It is indeed a blessing to know that here in a foreign land, men have not only been helped by providing them a decent home in which to pass away their little liberty ashore, but that some have here decided to prepare for the home on high."

Of the good work thus briefly outlined, the Rev. S. L. Baldwin, Recording Secretary of the Missionary Society, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, writes us:

LITTLE CUBAN MAIDS DRESSED FOR CHURCH

"This Seaman's Home is undenominational, and is doing a most excellent and much needed work at Nagasaki. I learned when I was there of a number of our American sailors who where saved from evil lives, and started on a Christian career, through the faithful labors of those connected with this Home. Certainly the American sailor, whether United States man-of-war's man or in the merchant service, with his privations at sea and his temptations on land, is worthy of consideration, and the comparatively small sum asked to endow the Nagasaki Home should be raised without difficulty or long delay."

BEWARE OF THE IMPURE

IF you would shun a corrupt life, avoid those who indulge in impure conversation. There are many people whose chief mirthfulness is in that line. They are full of inuendo and phrases of double meaning, and are always picking out of the conversation of decent men something vilely significant. It is astonishing, in company, how many, professing to be Christians, will tell vile stories; and that some Christian women, in their own circles, have no hesitation at the same style of talking. You take a step down hill when, without resistance, you allow any one to put into your ear a vile inuendo. If, forgetting who you are, any man attempts to say such things in your presence, let your better nature assert itself. Look the offender full in the face, and ask, "What do you mean by saying such a thing in my presence?" Better allow a man to smite you in the face than to utter such conversation before you.

THE LOST FOUND

I SUPPOSE that every day we are walking unconsciously among Enochs, and Augustines, and Wilberforces, and Clarksons, and Moffats, and Robert Halls. There they are! on the back seat in the mission school. There they are! playing marbles in the low alley, their knees out, their elbows out, their toes out, their hats rimless, and their souls Christless; and in double columns there is printed on their countenances a tragedy of unutterable pain. But they shall be gathered in. Sabbath Schools will do their work. Tract and Bible societies will do their work. A Christian printing-press will do its work. And they who are now scoffed at as ragamuffins will pass on to be the men of might and the men of God in future years.

ENCOURAGEMENT FOR CHILDREN

WHEN a child earns parental applause he ought to have it. If he get up head at school, give him a book or an apple. If he saw a bully on the playground trampling on a sickly boy, and your son took the bully by the throat so tightly that he became a little variegated in color, praise your boy, and let him know that you love to have him the champion of the weak. Perhaps you would not do right a day, if you had no more prospect of reward than that which you have given him. If on commencement day he make the best speech or read the best essay tell him of it. Truth is always harmless, and the more you use of it the better. If your daughter at the conservatory take the palm, give her a new piece of music, a ring, a kiss, or a blessing.

DON'T

DON'T worry because God made you different from others. Don't worry because you don't have the faith of that man, or the praying qualities of this, or the singing qualities of another. It were as unwise as for a carnelian to blush deeper because it is not a diamond, or a japonica to fret all the color out of its cheek because it it is not a rose. God intended you to be different.

TREAT THE BIBLE FAIRLY

ALL Scripture is to be expounded as far as possible, but one part is not to absorb attention to the neglect of others. Let us not be so pleased with the lily that Christ points out in his sermon that we cannot see the raven that flies past; nor, while we examine the salt to find if it has lost its savor, forget to take the candle from under the bushel. The song of the morning stars at the Creation must have been in the doxology of the hundred and forty and four thousand. David's harp and the resurrection trumpet are accordant. The pennon swung from the cedar masts of ships of Tarshish must be answered by the sail of fishing boat on Gennesareth. Into this great battle for God we are to take Gideon's sword and David's sling, and the white horse of victory on which Immanuel triumphs. Hiddekel and Jordan must be confluent. Pisgah and Moriah, Sinai and Calvary must all stand in the great scriptural ranges. No solo or quartette in this Bible music, but the battle chorus of all the patriarchs, prophets, evangelists and apostles. In the wall of heaven are beautifully blended jasper and emerald, beryl and sardonyx, amethyst and chrysoprasus. No one doctrine, however excellent, must be ridden constantly.

MORALS OF DIGESTION

IF a man has to wrestle with a lamb chop three hours after swallowing it, his good humor is exhausted. The contest in his body leaves him no strength for the battle with the world. Foreign wars are not so destructive as internal. When things sour on a man's stomach they make him sour with all the world. Some of us need not more a "new heart" according to the Gospel than a "new liver" according to physiology.

ABSTRACT PREACHING

RELIGIOUS address in this day, for the most part, has gone into the abstract and essayic. The word "sinner" is almost dropped out of the Christian vocabulary. It is not thought polite to use that word now. It is methodistic or old-fashioned. If you want to tell men they are sinners, you must say they are spiritually erratic, or have moral deficits, or they have not had a proper spiritual development; and I have not heard in twenty years that old hymn

Come ye sinners, poor and needy.

In the first place, they are not sinners; and in the second place, they are neither poor nor needy. I have heard Christian men in prayer-meetings and elsewhere talk as though there were no very great radical change before a man becomes a Christian. All he has got to do is to stop swearing, clear his throat a few times, take a good wash, and he is ready for heaven. My friends, if every man has not gone astray, and if the whole race is not plunged in sin and ruin, then that Bible is the greatest fraud ever enacted, for from beginning to end it sets forth that they are.

THE GOOD COMPANY OF BOOKS

THERE is a very precious kind of companionship, quite as necessary to our happiness as human friendship—the friendship of good books; for, as Isaac Barrow says, "He that loveth books will never want a faithful friend, a wholesome councillor, a cheerful companion, an affectionate comforter;" while Charles Lamb, with his usual fine exaggeration, "would have a grace before books—those spiritual repasts—a grace before Shakespeare and Spenser; a chanted choral before Milton; a little song of praise before our sweet singers; and a few words of gratitude ere we listen to our noblest story-tellers."

Without going this length, we must remember, in order to fully appreciate our books, that they are mental abodes. The very presence of a book on our shelves shows that the effort that produced it has not spent itself. The writer may be dead, but we know not what forces he set in motion, what large continuing impulse he released; nor yet where its reverberations will cease. Who can measure the results of Mrs. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, or of Besant's All Kinds and Conditions of Men? And apart from this consideration, we may sometimes sit silent among our books and remember that a book is like an old armor—some man or woman has lived and done their stroke of fighting inside of it.

Approached in this spirit, books place us in communication with another human being, living, distant, or dead; and our mental sensibilities feel the personal influence of Plato, Paul, Milton, Dryden, Tennyson, etc. These teachers may be dead or distant, and yet be more effective than a living present one; for though as a general rule, we learn personally more from actual life than from written examples of life, yet after all, words are words, whether they reach us through the eye or the ear. Besides which, a multitude of books is like a multitude of councillors—there is wisdom in them. Nobody can afford to be influenced by one or two minds only.

But whether our library be large or small, we should always have an inner circle of book friends, to which none but really good writers are admitted; and in so far as we do not read for mere pastime, we should have an intimate knowledge of our favorite writers. No poet is worth reading that is not worth learning by heart. No one has read Shakespeare's Sonnets who has simply skimmed them over like a leading article. A book to be of our inner circle, should be worth thinking through, as well as reading through; we should know what is on every page, without actual reference to it.

By what test shall we judge books worthy to come into this inner circle? There is no better one than sympathy with humanity. Sympathy is the life-blood of a good book! No good book without it! Also books of the highest order not only teach and counsel—they have a nobler office—they refresh and inspire; they enable us to put by "the cloud of mortal destiny," stimulate and tone our feeble imagination, and in some way connect the present with the past, and the earthly with the heavenly. This is the great truth about books—that the ones to be loved and cherished most are not those which give us knowledge; they are those which awaken our own mental activity by giving us flashes of vision, insight, which no experience of our own could furnish; which in fact could only be got by access to great minds; and such access to the majority would only be possible through books.

It is a good thing before approaching a noble book, either for study or pleasure, to have a place in our minds prepared for it. Such books may be kept on the shelf a little while, until we render them the tribute of a wistful desire and admiration. It is thus the picturesque manliness of Scott, the calm depth of Wordsworth, the intense spiritual passion of Shelley, and the majestic personages of Milton, should be introduced to our knowledge—no haste, no lack of respect, but a slow approach to intimacy, with all the joy of deliberate expectation. There is no intellectual happiness equal to that of reading for the first time a book which has been cherished in the hopes and fancies of many years. And intellectual happiness is—after spiritual joy—the highest happiness we can know. The noblest part of our humanity is the mind, an the noblest form of human vitality the acti ity of the mind; so that an intellectual li would be the life we should enjoy most, if w were gods, and released from the wants an weakness of this mortal frame. Good book then, are not only resources; they are stor houses of happiness.

There is a kind of reading far below thi and yet—unless carried to excess—a kind n to be despised or spoken ill of: the readir of novels, newspapers, magazines, review etc. These are the current coin of literatur and many people fancy they have no time f any other kind of reading. Now, the perus of good stories which draw their interest fro the large chapter of human life, is a gre mental refreshment. The artificial situatio of the novelist call forth an infinite variet which in turn exercise the reflective powers readers, suggest views that otherwise woul never have occurred to them, and largel form those habits of introspection, witho which there is no really noble character. course, it is easy to abuse this habit of intr spection, until it becomes a barren subjecti ity; but in our vivid life this danger is a ver small one. There is a far greater risk of purely external life than of one of morbi self-contemplation.

Less praise must be given to those snatch general readers who are the literary locusts our day—who skim over many books an rush on to many more; whose hearts nev warm to a book; who never surround it wit pleasant associations, as of a person the have talked with, or a place they have see These are the readers for whom ten or twent magazines monthly are published; who wa their science and history reduced into plea ant and portable shape, and who like all th tittle-tattle of the universe at their breakfas table every morning.

Not that newspapers are to be objected t far from it! Without newspapers there ar a great many things we could know nothin about, except at a cost which hardly any on can pay. A newspaper is a great source happiness, and a man who would always pr fer Plato to his morning paper would be a disagreeable as a man who always talked "the true and the beautiful" and never abou his family, or his country, or the place of whic he was a citizen. If we are truly friends wit the mighty dead, that friendship will quicke our interest in the living men and wome around us, and in all that is said and writte of them. It is not the use, it is the abuse newspapers that is objectionable; becaus excessive ephemeral reading destroys menta health. It weakens the judgment and th sense of personal discrimination, because i substitutes ready-made opinions for persona thought and decisions. The man or woma who reads only fugitive literature destroy brain power. Slaves of a lazy, slovenly habi of reading, they crave the news just for th excitement of it; a craving as distinct in form as that for bitters or any other stimulant Now, if it be a sin against the stomach to b careless as to what we eat, is it not a fa greater sin to be careless as to what we read for by this sin we vex the brain, which is th finer organ of the two. Our minds are no infinite in capacity; why then fill them with what is useless and perhaps harmful? Fo we are never sure we can forget what w have once read: it will come back to us som day as surely as a nursery rhyme.

For pleasant, desultory reading, there i nothing better than good reviews. To know where to look for any particular kind o knowledge is second only to having it. Re views make us wise about unread authors They are the geography of literature, and t scholars and readers serve the same purpos as voyages and travels do to travelers. An as some people like to see the world fro their own firesides, so, in the same way, a clear, masterly review of a book is often mor intelligible and pleasant than the book itself

Reading that goes only to the head is no to be compared with that reading which goes to the heart, and which makes us the writer's familiar friend. Oh, so blessed, and so happy are they who can form a personal intimacy with good books! who can feel printed pape draw them magnetically, as Homer says iron draws the hand of a hero; for them the com panionship of good books will be the finest essence of delicious rest:

"To bid for some short space the busy mill
Of anxious, ever-grinding thought be still:
And let the weary brain and throbbing breast,
Be by another's cooling hand; caressed.
This volume in my hand, I hold the charm
Which lifts me out of reach of wrong, or harm;
I sail away from trouble, and most blessed
Of every blessing, can myself forget:
Can rise above the instance low and poor
Into the mighty law, that governs yet:
This hinged cover, like a well-hung door,
Shuts out the noises of the jangling day;
These fair leaves fan unwelcome thoughts away."

Boers in Exile

FROM a recent visitor to St. Helena comes cheering news of the condition of the Boer prisoners. They appear to be enjoying the quiet and safety to which they were strangers during the long ampaign. Men of some races would et over the captivity, but the Boer seems have accepted the situation with char- teristic stolidity. No attempt has been ade to make their imprisonment un- ecessarily irksome. They have freedom movement, and only the belt of coast- ne is forbidden to them. Those who ish to relieve the monotony of idleness undertaking farm-work, and to make little money, either for luxuries or for eir families in South Africa, are at lib- ty to engage themselves to farmers on e island, and a considerable number ave availed themselves of the privilege. ven General Cronje has not shown the stiveness under captivity that might ave been expected of the "Lion of outh Africa." The society of Mrs. ronje and other members of his family as relieved his depression. He has an xcellent house for his sidence, and a carriage kept at his disposal. appears now that he ill not have the com- anionship of President ruger, which at one me appeared probable. he wily leader found a afe refuge in Portu- uese territory, and has ow sailed for Europe n the Dutch cruiser elderland. He found necessary to go on oard secretly and with guard. This was not rough fear of the Brit- h, to whom his flight as a relief from embar- assment, but because here were signs of Boer ostility. There was idespread resentment mong the burghers at is going away and aving them to bear eir troubles. They garded it as a deser- on of them and the ause, and it was feared at they might assassin- te him. It is difficult see what good could ave been accomplished y his staying. He had een heard to boast that in the event of ilure he would meet his British foe on his wn piazza with his trusty rifle in his hand, ut neither his death nor his captivity ould have helped the Boer cause, and as e succeeded in getting the money in the easury safely conveyed to Europe it was atural that he should wish to follow and rotect it. President Steyn, of the Orange ree State, has, however, remained be- ind, and appears to be in close com- unication with the guerilla chiefs still in ctivity. To outsiders, it seems a pity hat the struggle, which is now clearly opeless, should be protracted. Both Mr. ruger and Mr. Steyn would act wisely in dvising submission and making peace, o that the captives in St. Helena might e released and return, and peace and rosperity might be restored to the af- licted land:

To the counsellors of peace is joy (Prov. 12: 20).

An Opera Singer's End

A pathetic story is told of Old Salando, who died in Bellevue Hospital, New York, on October 5th. Twenty-five years go Salando was singing the barytone part in an opera company which had con- racts to appear in the chief cities of the Union. He drew a large salary, and saved a considerable sum of money. The first inroad on his savings was made to send his niece Annette to Italy to complete her musical education. When she returned to America, Salando secured a position for her in the opera company. But in a short time the company got into difficulty, and Salando advanced money to the manager to take it on tour. Business was bad, and at last the company disbanded. The uncle and niece were unable to obtain another engagement, and gradually Salando's savings melted away. One day Annette proposed that they get a hand-organ and sing in the streets, and as nothing better offered, that was done. They managed to live for a time, and were moderately prosperous; but one day Salando was stricken with pneumonia, and was ill a long time. All their little savings were spent, and Annette was worn out waiting night and day on her uncle. After his recovery they again went out on the streets, but not for long. Annette fell ill and died. Salando then went out alone, but all his enthusiasm was gone. He would sing nothing but the "Marseillaise" and the "Star Spangled Banner." It was a hard life, and he was getting old. On some days he did not receive more than ten cents. He was soon unable to go out at all, and almost starved to death in his miserable little lodging. One of his fellow lodgers who heard him groaning in the night reported his case, and he was taken to Bellevue, where he died. So ended a life of sorrow and disappointment. It is an ungrateful world that neglects in their old age those who in their youth have given it pleasure. Happily God does not so treat those who give their lives to his service.

Even to your old age I am he; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you. I have made and I will bear; even I will carry and will deliver you (Isa. 46: 4).

QUARTERS OF BOER PRISONERS ON THE ISLAND OF ST. HELENA

Rats Seize an Island

A strange incident is reported by the Boston press. It appears that a yachtsman who recently visited Sheep Island, in Hull Bay, the southern portion of Boston harbor, found the whole island infested with huge rats. They were so bold and so numerous that he could not keep any provisions, and he saved his own person from attack only by shooting at them when they approached. They are the kind usually seen on old vessels, only they are larger. They live chiefly on the crabs which they draw out of their holes, and in spite of their claws turn over and devour. A vessel which recently anchored near the island was visited during the night by the rats and stripped of every particle of food that had been left exposed. No one lives on Sheep Island and the rats have so terrorized the swallows, which formerly were plentiful on the island, that the birds go there no more, and the rats now have the island to themselves. It is believed that the vast multitude of rats now there are all descended from a few which were on board a vessel that was wrecked on the island about two years ago. The island would not have become so infested if people had been living on it; but being left to themselves, the rats multiplied and held possession. It is so with the human soul. If it is unoccupied by good it soon becomes the prey of evil.

He findeth it empty, swept and garnished. Then goeth he and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself and they enter in and dwell there (Matt. 12: 45).

A Canine Martyr

A monument has been raised in the Alps to the memory of a dog. The animal belonged to the famous hospice of St. Bernard and had a noble record of life-saving. No less than forty persons lost amid the snow and ice had been found and rescued by the same dog. One of his most notable rescues was of a child whom he found almost unconscious on the mountain. The dog lay down by him and warmed him to life with the heat of his own body. Then, in some way, he had made the child understand that he was to get on his back. The child did so, and the dog trotted back to the hospice with his burden. The dog lost his life in his life-saving work. A man who was lying in the snow saw the dog approach him, and, fearing from the animal's actions that he was mad, struck him over the head and killed him. On the monument raised to his memory, is sculptured a representation of the dog carrying the child on his back and an inscription commemorating the forty rescues to his credit. It was a martyr's death. One could wish that he had the consolation which has come to men who, like him, perished at the hands of those they were trying to save. How long is the record to which the list of martyrs in China has now to be added, who have had occasion to utter that most magnanimous of all prayers:

Father forgive them: they know not what they do (Luke 23: 34).

The Late Senator Sherman

In the death of Hon. John Sherman, which took place in Washington, on October 22d, there passed away a statesman who has been a prominent figure in the nation's history for nearly half a century. He was born in Lancaster, O., in 1823, being descended from an old and distinguished New England family. In 1854, then a young lawyer, he was sent to Congress. For forty-three years he was continuously in public office, serving in the House of Representatives, the United States Senate, and the Treasury and State Departments. From 1880 until 1892 he was a leading candidate for Presidential nomination by his party, and on several occasions came very near to a nomination. Probably the most important period of his public life was when, as Secretary of the Treasury, he conducted our financial affairs so ably that our national credit at home and abroad was greatly improved. During his incumbency in the Treasury Department, the country prepared for the resumption of specie payments, which was successfully accomplished in 1879. His last election to the United States Senate was in 1892. Throughout his whole career his record was that of a clean, conscientious public official, and his substantial services to the country earned him its esteem and gratitude. It may be said of him as of the poet-king:

After he had served his own generation, by the will of God, he fell on sleep and was laid unto his fathers (Acts 13: 36).

BRIEF NOTES

At Manila, on the principal business street where only two saloons were found before American occupation, there are now eighteen.

Evangelist George C. Needham is giving a series of addresses in the Bible Institute, Dallas, Texas, and is also holding union evangelistic services. He has arranged while there a series of visits to Galveston in the hope of comforting the bereaved and pointing them to Christ.

The first Protestant church in the Philippine Islands was dedicated on the 12th of August, the services being conducted by Bishop Frank W. Warne, D.D., of the Methodist Church. The pastor of this church is the Rev. Nicholas Zamora a graduate of the Roman Catholic College of Manila.

On a certain Sunday recently an effort was made by previous agreement to bring the young people in the Sunday Schools of Australia to decision for Christ. Prayer was offered in the churches and privately by the teachers. It is now reported that on that day 2,500 young people pledged themselves to the Christian life.

Secretary E. H. Mills, of the Twentieth Century Thank Offering Fund of the Methodist Episcopal Church, reports that $3,000,000 has been subscribed for Christian education, $4,000,000 for church debts and $750,000 for philanthropy and charities. He said that by January one-half of the desired $20,000,000 will be subscribed.

Missionaries waiting to go to China or other fields have an opportunity of gaining knowledge that may be useful to them. In a letter from the International Medical Missionary Society to the Conference of Mission Boards, it was announced that a special course of instruction in dealing with accidents and emergencies and how to give first aid to the injured had been arranged by the society, running from November 1 to May 1. It is open to missionaries of both sexes. Applicants may obtain board and accommodation in the college. The entire cost of instruction and board would be $100 for the six months. Applications should be made to Dr. Geo. D. Dowkontt, 288 Lexington Ave., N. Y.

A SELFISH LIFE BAD FOR BOTH WORLDS

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS

International Sunday School Lesson for November 11th: Luke 16: 19-31.

TRADITIONAL HOUSE OF THE RICH MAN OF THE PARABLE

...By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT, Matt. 6: 20: "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven."

ONE seldom hears a prayer for those who are in the perils of prosperity, though they are really in greater moral danger than those who are in adversity's rugged school. The International Lesson Committee, however, cannot be accused of forgetting those who are in perils of riches, for they have selected four lessons on this subject in swift succession. Only a few weeks ago we studied the "rich fool," who fattened his body and starved his soul. Some farmers rear large and beautiful barns for stock and grain, while housing their families in a two-room cottage, but this "fool" planned great barns for his grain when he had secured no home at all for his soul. Then, last week, we were pointed to another rich fool, shrewd in cheating his master in this world, but foolish in cheating himself for eternity by securing no eternal habitation. And now the same folly comes up again with a new face in the story of Dives, and will presently reappear in the young ruler.

Perhaps the Lesson Committee have anticipated the suggestion that, as there are societies to fight appetite and lust, but none to fight the greater root of evil—greed—the Sunday School should become the society for the eradication of selfishness. In fact, the lessons are giving warnings against the perils of luxury no more frequently than did Christ, who spoke of no vice so often as the love of money. And yet there is nothing in his teachings we take less to heart, as witness the effect upon any group of Christians of the story of that young boy who was found crying, and was asked, "What is the matter?" He sobbed back through his tears, "I don't want to be rich. The fortune teller said I should be rich, and no rich man can go to heaven." Christ did not say that, but he did teach that one who is rich takes great risks. "I'll take the risk," is the answer almost any Christian will make, with a laugh.

Jesus Christ taught in this lesson and related passages:

1. That there is an awful hell.
2. That a selfish life—not alone one of vice or crime—leads to hell.
3. That it is not necessary to be rich in order to be selfish.

Respectable Selfishness

There was a certain rich man, who was clothed in purple and fine linen and fared sumptuously. His name was as well-known on earth as a Crœsus or a Rothschild, but Christ doesn't even give him a name in the story. He is of no account except as a warning. To the God's eye-view, the selfish man, however rich or famous, is a nobody. History, in the end, gives him the same contempt.

This man of our lesson is commonly called "Dives," which is the Latin for rich man—"Mr. Rich," we might call him. It would be truer to the deeper meaning of the story to call him, "Mr. Self." It is selfishness that Christ is condemning as the way to hell. He selects for various reasons a man who possesses riches and is possessed of them rather than a poor man who is enviously filled with covetous desire for wealth for its own sake, but fails to get it because the selfishness of the prodigal is stronger in him than the selfishness of the miser. These are brothers, the prodigal and the miser, both sons of Selfishness, and both on the road to hell. One reason why Christ holds up the miserly selfishness of the rich especially, is because the prodigal gets condemnation enough from men. While it has to this day been very hard to convince most people that a man who wears good clothes, especially if he also goes to church, can really sin, whether in business or politics. "The king can do no wrong" is a maxim that is extended to all who wear "purple and fine linen." In fact, the greatest sins every way are those done by the Scribes and Pharisees in every age. The thieves that were crucified with Christ were, perhaps, also murderers, but the high priests and Roman officers of Jerusalem were deicides. All the crimes done that year by the poor in all the world were outweighed by that one supreme crime of Jerusalem's upper classes, the crucifixion of Christ. So, to-day, one educated, well-dressed scamp, who can deceive widows and orphans in seven languages, will carry off more stealings in one embezzlement than all the ignorant burglars in the country can steal in a year. "Your ignorant thief robs a freight car, but your educated thief goes and steals the whole railroad." We call thieving by its own bad name only when it is done by retail. When it rises to thousands of dollars it is only "rehypothecation" or "misappropriation," and when it approaches or passes the million point the robber becomes a "Napoleon of finance." It is because of this propensity to overlook the sins of the avenues that Christ takes his representatives of the sin of selfishness from that class.

But, mark, it is not an embezzler he points out to us as on the road to hell. There is not an intimation that the rich man of this lesson had resorted to any fraud in securing his wealth, or was guilty of any drunkenness or debauchery in his use of it. There is absolutely only one charge against him, namely, that he lived a selfish life. To him wealth meant ownership, not stewardship. He used riches for selfish honor and ease and enjoyment, not as a power for good. That was the crime that sent him to hell, a selfish life.

Purple was the color of kings' robes, dyed from a rare shell-fish found about Tyre. This man's robes of silk and wool, thus dyed, bespoke his selfish pride of power.

The rich man of this lesson gorged himself with food, while the poor starved at his gate. He would really have been happier in body and mind to have eaten less that the poor might eat the more. Gratitude is better than gout. "I am not here for my health," is the proverb of the man who bluntly avows his selfish aims in business. It would be better, even for his "health," if he should put more brotherhood into business. The unselfish man is happiest, even in this world, which becomes a "heaven begun below" to the man who lays up treasure in heaven by giving his money and time in such ways as to bring heaven down to earth.

Several eminent men inside the Church not long since concurred with Col. Robert G. Ingersoll in the amazing doctrine that "luxury is a splendid form of charity." What a pity Dives could not have had the benefit of that plea, and the kindred one, that "luxury sets money into circulation," and so is "good for trade." It is surprising that after so much study of political economy as we have had of late, wasteful expenditure, whether by individuals or by government, finds so many and so eminent defenders. The fallacious assumption back of all this is that if money was not spent extravagantly it would be "hoarded" in the old sense, locked away in drawers, buried in cellars, hidden in stockings. But, in fact, "money in bank" to-day is money at work creating industries where labor will find productive employment. To take this money instead for gorging is not only bad for the gorged, but also corrupting in its influence upon the whole community. Prodigality, whether in rich or poor, wastes a country's noblest wealth, high ideals and manly character and honest industry. Dives, where is Lazarus, thy brother? Dean George Hodges puts the modern fallacy upon the man of this parable in the following lines in his Heresy of Cain:

> Now Dives daily feasted,
> And was gorgeously arrayed,
> Not at all because he liked it,
> But because 'twas good for trade.

Certainly, "high living" is not good for manhood. The writer once heard Henry Ward Beecher say: "You overeat your prayers," and at that very moment eight men near us were asleep under his great sermon.

Beggary Not Canonized in the Bible

And there was a certain beggar named Lazarus. Out of this parable grew the "Order of St. Lazarus," a religious and military order originating in the first Crusade, whose object was to help lepers, of whom Lazarus—himself a leper, perhaps—was considered the patron. When crusaders were driven out of Palestine the Order returned to France. It was finally merged in other orders, abolished and restored, and is now in abeyance. It is difficult to create any admiration for a beggar, even though Christ has vouched for his safe arrival in heaven.

A parishioner of ours who had named his first child Martha, and the second Mary, proposed to name the third, who was a boy, Lazarus, but the wife vetoed the proposal because, while Lazarus of Bethany was a satisfactory character, this other Lazarus was a beggar, and even a beggar that got to heaven was hardly a satisfactory namesake. A Sunday School boy being asked in the study of this Dives lesson, which he would prefer to be, Dives or Lazarus, replied, "I will be a good Dives."

Christ no doubt wished to teach that "honest poverty" of the extremest type, where sickness compels the reception of charity, and even the solicitation of it, is not really as pitiable as the selfishness of a rich man who has less sympathy for his suffering brother man than his dogs. Men commonly despise beggary, with its rags and crusts, even in the few cases when it is a man's misfortune rather than his fault, but Christ would have us know that even more contemptible in the God's eye-view is selfishness, though clothed and fed like a king.

In the words of Goldsmith:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.

Christ gave no name to the selfish rich man; this good beggar, however, has a name in earth and heaven. But we must not fall into the medieval error of canonizing poverty, and even beggary as itself a virtue. Taking all the Bible says of beggary, we shall see that God regards it as in most cases a sin. That is one of the chief teachings of that handbook of industry, the book of Proverbs. We often hear the phrase, "He was born of poor but honest parents," but let it be noted that it is not necessary to be honest in order to be poor. It is sometimes dishonesty that leads to poverty. But if this form of martyrdom comes to us as a result of sterling honesty, let us find comfort, as Lazarus did, by "coupling heaven with it." It is related that the Prince of Wales was on a ship driven by a storm far out of its course, so that passengers, the Prince and all, had to be put on short rations, but in his hunger the Prince was comforted in the fact that he was the son of the Queen and would no doubt reach a waiting feast at home in due time. When, like Lazarus, the Christian is sick and poor, his heart exults as the child of a king for whom eternal abundance waits in heaven.

Death the Great Leveler

The rich man also died. This recalls the words of President Lincoln's favorite poem, the first stanza of which is:

> O why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
> Like a swift, fleeting meteor, a fast flying cloud,
> A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
> He passeth from life to his rest in the grave.
> —WILLIAM KNOX.

With a slight change Kipling's Recessional fits this passing of Dives:

> The music and the feasting dies,
> The honor and the wealth depart,
> Still stands thine ancient sacrifice,
> An humble and a contrite heart.
> Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
> Lest we forget—lest we forget!

Christ's Unveiling of Hell

And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments. An examination of scholars above twelve in twelve Sunday Schools showed that few could give a Bible text declaring the future punishment of the wicked. Yet Jesus taught of hell as often and as plainly as of heaven. Because men who appeal to the Bible have debated whether future punishment of the selfish and sinful shall be "age-long" or "eternal," the multitudes have jumped to the conclusion that there is perhaps no future punishment at all. Some would be more tender than Christ, and hold back the warnings he gave with such loving plainness. As Jonathan, the king's son, warned David, by arrows, of Saul's plots against him, so the utterances of Jesus about hell are love's arrows of warning.

Memory in the Future Life

Son, remember. Here we are taught that memory survives this life and goes with Dives to hell. That it also goes with the translated saint to heaven is shown by the words of heaven's new song, "Unto him that hath washed us from our sins." As the memory of unforgiven sin quickens the fires of hell, the memory of forgiveness swells the gladness of heaven. The immortality of the soul almost of necessity implies the immortality of memory, for it is one of the fundamental elements of mind, so much so that the ancient Greeks gave to memory the very name of the mind itself. To cancel memory would be to cancel all sense of identity and continuity and make the sensation of the moment the sum total of our intellectual life. Without it we could not know ourselves as the same person as yesterday. To lose it would imply a weakening of the mind. An aged preacher's faithful wife of many years said anxiously, "Dearie, dost thee think we shall know each other in heaven?" The old preacher answered, "Wifie, dost thee think we shall be greater fools there than here?" Memory, while gladdening heaven, will be a lash of pain in hell. "Son, remember the good things you had on earth, out of which you have brought nothing to the eternal world but the memory of lost opportunities to do good." Contrast with the memories of Dives those of that good rich man, Job: "When the eye saw me then it blessed me; when the ear heard me it gave witness unto me; for I delivered the poor that cried, the fatherless and him that had none to help. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame, and the cause which I knew not I searched out." Such were the glad pictures that should have filled Dives's pall of memory for eternity in heaven. Instead, his memories fanned the fires of hell.

"Do we belief in literal hell fire?" We believe that Jesus, in using figures of speech, did not use any simile more terrible than what he wished to describe. What hell fire stands for is certainly as bad as fire. Those who have lived intensely have suffered more at times in mind than they ever can in body. There are profound cannots of character suggested by the great gulf fixed, across which those on the wrong side "can not pass." They have reached eternal permanence of character. Their time for change has passed.

The Bible Better Than Spirits

They have Moses and the prophets. This man in hell wanted a spirit sent from heaven to warn his five brothers to keep out of hell. Jesus said that the Bible was enough, and those who would not heed such a divine letter would not heed a ghostly messenger. Strange, in the presence of Christ's refusal, that men in every age have pretended to receive messages from spirits. That they were not genuine is best shown by the fact that they were not spiritual, but "earthly, sensual, devilish."

Lady Huntington, rich and powerful, thanked God for the letter in the passage, "Not many rich, not many noble are called." It does not say, "Not any rich, not any noble." She was one of the doubly rich, who counted wealth and social position as but opportunities for doing good. And her life was happier and her memory is more fragrant in history than that of any woman of her time who gave her life to selfish enjoyments and social honors. "A good Dives"—let that be your description, if in God's providence wealth has come to you. To realize that ideal will be no easy task, but it means heaven here and hereafter.

Under the Evening Lamp

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Mother-Watching

ABOUT the mother of the one perfect Child who ever walked this earth, the one sinless Son of man, it is said that she pondered many things in her heart. We who are mothers know what this pondering is, though we do not know the ss which must have filled Mary's soul she watched the development of her nderful Boy in his white innocence and liant purity. Our child may be a lovely d docile daughter or son, but he or she eds restraint, counsel and guiding, and metimes the mother is puzzled as to just ich of two ways will be the wiser for r to take in the upbringing of her little e.

Especially tender are the brooding oughts of a mother who has an only ughter. Women know what problems ls must face; they forecast from their n experience some of women's inevitable als and sorrows. If they could, they uld save their darlings from every mis-e, from every preventible calamity. e girl never imagines until she has own up and met in her own person the ficulties of life, how much her mother s loved her, and how much she has rne for her through the years of prepara-n of maturity.

As the child, weary in the healthful igue of play and active exercise, lies sy and fair in her afternoon nap, her ther, sewing in hand, has no greater easure than to sit beside her. The sew-g lies in the mother's lap unheeded, r heart is in the future. Even now, mothers do abroad, she is sewing the linen which is to be laid away lavendar for the days when her man-child shall be sought in marriage. at the girl shall leave her mother's care provided with an abundant store of usehold linen is not to be thought of a moment, and year after year the ck grows, and is laid by in a chest to ait the maiden's betrothal and wedding. ry provident is the thrifty German ther, and her love and self-denial take practical form, while her prayers rise her dear one, and she watches her ten, pondering many things in her heart.

hn and Jenny

Jenny has been trained to great respect r hours. In her family, when a meal is nounced, every one comes promptly to e table. People rise when they are lled in the morning. People conform to les. John has been used to lying in bed the very latest moment, then hurrying to his clothes, rushing to the breakfast le, swallowing a cup of coffee in frantic ste and eating an egg "on the fly," and nilarly it has not seemed to him material be on time at dinner or supper. Any cuse would satisfy his easy-going mother, o did not mind a half-set table standing r hours after most of the family had left

John and Jenny are devoted lovers, t their first year of married life will not altogether smooth, unless both have ken for their friends two wise old Bears, .: Bear and Forbear. Jenny's way is uch the better one, and in the end she ll bring John to acknowledge this.

oolish Hazing

Young men at college have long been rdoned for acts of brutality which would t be condoned if committed by other an students. Lately, in several quarters, e annual cane rushes between the fresh-an and sophomore classes have resulted serious accidents to some of the partic-ants, one boy being in great danger for any hours from concussion of the brain, d another being disfigured for life by a broken nose. Parents find it hard to over-look the consequences of such folly when their own sons are the victims, and college authorities are doing what they can to stop these reckless frolics. The awakening of a public spirit against them among the undergraduates will be a better protection for future freshmen than will fulminations and suspensions from college faculties. One of the silliest instances of hazing we have ever seen, occurred recently when a lad, in evening clothes, going to call upon a young lady, was seized by riotous students of the class above him, hustled into the habiliments of a tramp and forced into a packing-box, to be ignominiously carried to the door of the girl and left there. Fortunately, he was rescued from his provoking plight before the young lady or her family discovered him.

College students insist on being spoken of as men. In many cases they do not deserve this appellation. They are simply foolish boys.

A Mother's Brooding Love

LOOK UP

Look up! Beyond the stars
Thy God is watching thee:
The light breaks through the heavenly bars;
Thy sorrows soon shall flee.

Variety in the Bill of Fare

A little planning in a country which offers so much variety for the table will keep us from setting the same dishes on the family board day after day. We may introduce a novelty by cooking tomatoes, for instance in half a dozen different ways, and a little care will put them on the table in an appetizing manner. Rice lends itself to several styles of preparation. Eggs may be varied indefinitely. A chafing dish supper may tempt a delicate person who is weary of the ordinary roast and boiled preparations which some housekeepers serve day after day.

A Fretful Expression

A beautiful countenance may be marred by a fretful expression, and a very plain face may be attractive, simply from the inner light of tranquility which makes the homely features lovable. We do not make our own faces, but our own thoughts and moods mold them, and many a homely young woman is very beautiful in her middle life, because she has a beautiful soul. And the contrary is also true.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—MOTHER. Are the pegs in the hall within the children's easy reach? If so, insist on their hanging up their hats and coats when they come in from school. You are unwise to wait on them so much yourself.

—C. H. C. A morning wedding must be over before noon. Eleven o'clock is a good hour, unless it must be earlier on account of a train. The groom would best wear a black coat and vest and gray trousers, and the bride a handsome traveling dress at such a wedding as you are planning for.

—EVELYN. I wouldn't worry if I were you. A man whose fancy is caught by every new face is certainly an unsatisfactory lover and would not make a very steadfast husband unless he had a change of heart. I wish girls generally would set so high a value on themselves that men could not imagine their pining away on account of their desertion.

—JEBUSITE. Why country women often look older than their city cousins is perhaps due among other causes to the fact that the latter take better care of their teeth. In communities where there are no resident dentists women allow their teeth to decay, and early lose them, when a little care would save them. Teeth, if fine and even, are a great ornament, as well as indispensable in aiding digestion. A dentist who occasionally or periodically visits a country neighborhood should be welcomed and patronized.

The Touch of a Vanished Hand

Is there one of us, dear friends, who does not need the reminder and the lesson contained in these beautiful stanzas? Why are we not more patient with the living?

We sigh for the touch of a vanished hand—
The hand of a friend most dear,
Who has passed from our side to the shadowy land;
But, what of the hand that is near?

To the living's touch is the soul inert
That weeps o'er the silent urn?
For the love that lives is our hand alert
To make some sweet return?

Do we answer back in a fretful tone,
When life's duties press us sore?
Is our praise as full as if they were gone,
And could hear our praise no more?

As the days go by, are our hands more swift
For a trifle beyond their share,
Than to grasp—for a kindly, helpful lift—
The burden some one must bear?

We sigh for the touch of a vanished hand,
And we think ourselves sincere;
But what of the friends that about us stand,
And the touch of the hand that's here?

Denied Good

I AM certain that if you had met Edna Steenson, you would have said as I did that her life was so rounded out with joy and love there could not be one wish which remained ungratified. There was always the happy smile and the cheerful word for all with whom she came in contact. To the observing eye she had all she could seem to want, a happy home, hosts of friends, talents, riches and admiration. It is little wonder we thought her truly happy, and that we welcomed her coming with joy.

Well, if you have ever studied human nature in its varied forms of expression, you know that the inner self we reveal and the outer self we conceal are often of such a contrary nature, that it is never safe to judge entirely by what the surface may tell us. We learn self-command by contact with the world, and often a smiling countenance conceals an aching heart. There comes to us sometimes a bit of news, just a common, every-day piece of information, and the fair hope, that was but just beginning to bud into beauty, is blighted forever. Yet we smilingly go on; no one knows of the suffering we endure, not even the nearest and dearest friend who walks about beside us. And we live on and find still a measure of enjoyment, since God's tender mercy is over all his works.

Now, the mistake Edna Steenson made was that she expected unalloyed bliss while she was mortal. And when the one earthly wish for which she cared most was set aside in an undeniable manner, it seemed to her utterly unbearable, and to no human friend could she speak of this supreme grief. For years she had been planning all along in one direction, working out a direct course with a will which knew no shadow of turning; and just as the goal seemed in view, came the words of the Jehovah, "Be still and know that I am God."

Surely it must mean something, that frustrated plan, that good denied. To her it had seemed for the best and had been the subject of many prayers, since she was used to praying about everything she did or intended to do.

Oh, that summit of happiness for which she had longed, henceforth she must always see it, but just beyond her grasp, denied the supreme good. There is always danger, more or less, in becoming self-absorbed, so interested in our individual needs as to forget the duty we owe to others. The life of the hermit is one of the most selfish methods of living. Neither dare we be self-contained and satisfied with hungry and sin-sick souls about us. The true joy of living is found in service.

By the ruling of Providence, Edna was thrown into closer touch with those who needed just what she could give; and in this way she began to see her gains through losses. This is one of the lessons which sorrow teaches—the beautiful lesson of resignation. She had hoped to make joy her bosom companion, but perfect peace had entered in instead. If her life had become one of utter hopelessness, few people would have cared for her friendship. If she had tears, they were shed in solitude, since she welcomed us always with a smile. Then, as the years passed, she realized a number of things she had not before known. If one door shuts, another opens; and if we were allowed to pursue our own course in life, our souls would become dwarfed.

Joy teaches but one part of our nature, but sympathy opens up broad avenues of good, and we never know the true blessedness of living until we are able of the fulness of our hearts to carry consolation to another. There is satisfaction, perfect satisfaction, but we shall never know it until we awake in His likeness. So the good denied resulted in a perfect submission to his will and a firm belief that all things work for our eternal good.

. . . "HAVE YOU ADOPTED AN INDIA FAMINE WAIF?"

The Great Question which is Agitating Christian America — Urgent Need of Active Work to Save the Thousands of Destitute Little Orphans . . . . . .

NO work of practical Christian benevolence in recent years has secured a stronger hold upon the hearts of God's people in our own favored land than the movement for the rescue of the great army of orphans left homeless, bereaved and destitute by the India famine. Already over 2,000 pledges of support for individual orphans in the care of our missionaries in India have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but the need of a movement on a much larger scale is made apparent by letters just received from missionary workers, who, with united voice, appeal to us in behalf of the multitude of children still uncared for. We invite every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to have a share in this great work of child-redemption—the grandest work the century has afforded, and one upon which the religious future of India largely depends. Fifteen dollars will support an orphan for one year, supplying care, food, clothing, shelter and training in an orphanage or mission school. The donor can adopt the orphan, choosing either boy or girl, and may have the protege placed in an orphanage or school of the donor's own denomination. Further, the donor can come into still closer contact with the adopted one by mail correspondence. Regular reports will be furnished by the missionaries. All contributions for orphan support and adoption should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York, the sender stating sex and denomination preferred.

Instances of Self-Denial

Many beautiful and touching sacrifices are being made by young and old in behalf of India's famine orphans. Here are a few of many similar instances:

Little three-year-old Dorothy Albrecht, in Illinois, gave her entire year's savings, $6, to the little orphans of India.

A poor fisherman of North Carolina sends, through a lady of his town, that his name may not be known, $10 for the orphans. In the same mail a prominent gentleman of New York City contributes money to support six little orphans, three boys for his young son, and three girls for his little daughter.

An old lady, over seventy-one, and afflicted with rheumatism, is making bread and butter to sell for the homeless little children of India. A kind lady of New York, whose benevolence has been proved over and over again, has given support for three little orphan girls for three years.

A decrepit old woman of eighty-four, doing all the work for three orphaned grandchildren, in the poorest section of New York City, was found by one of our city missionaries lying almost exhausted on her bed, with floors scrubbed as white as boards could be. When asked if she could not hire this very hard work done, she replied, "Yes, I have some money saved, but I thought I could stand a little more work, and send it to the poor little orphans of India," and bringing from under her pillow an old home-made purse, she placed the coins, savings from a very scanty income, in the hands of the good visitor, asking her to take it to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for her.

One man in Youngstown, O., furnishes support for six little ones, and from New Haven, Conn., Bullville, N. Y., Toronto, Can., comes a similar generous gift from several individuals. From a citizen of Boise City, Idaho, comes support for five.

A little girl in Colorado, Isabel B., aged twelve, received a prize for an essay, and though she was poor and this was the first money she had ever earned, she devoted a generous part of it to joining with others in her Sunday School class in caring for a little orphan in India. A Presbyterian church in Erie, Pa., was the first to attempt to provide for one hundred orphans. A little church out West, with a membership of nineteen, pledged support for one orphan.

The Woman's Home and Foreign Missionary Society of Advent Christian Church, through Mrs. Taylor, is caring for one hundred, and the King's Daughters, through Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, has adopted forty. Christian Endeavor, Epworth League, Baptist Young People's Societies and Sunday School classes throughout the country are actively taking up the orphan work.

The Folke Vennen of Chicago has sent pledges for one hundred and six orphans, with more on the way. The Halifax Herald has adopted a family of forty-two orphans, the larger part of the funds for their support having been raised by the efforts of the children of that city. The Bud og Hilsen of Minnesota is joining in the orphan work, after making a fine record in raising funds for the famine sufferers, and has begun by sending seven pledges.

A little girl in Philadelphia, six and one-half years old, herself an orphan, is contributing towards the support of a little orphan girl in India. A young men's prayer meeting in West Virginia has assumed the support of three orphans.

These are typical of many hundreds of other instances of loyal, self-denying, consecrated work in behalf of the famine waifs of India.

Echoes of the Great Famine

Each passing week now shows an improvement in the famine condition of the provinces where the suffering and mortality were lately so frightful. Letters from the missionaries confirm the news that the worst of the famine is really over. Rev. G. H. Harpster, of Guntur, Madras Presidency, writes:

"I am glad to be able to report that in a large part of the Krishna district there have been very fair rains. In other parts there has been scarcely any. Still, the situation generally has improved immensely, and the districts which have received rain will soon be able to support those which have not. For two months more, or until the harvest is gathered, there is bound to be much want. But generally the sky of hope is brightening, and in a few months the ghastly famine of 1900 will be over. Thank God, it will be over.

"But what a work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers have done in this time of stress! Who ever heard of help given, inspired and carried through by a newspaper in this style since the world began? I want you to take me very seriously when I say that the very mention of the name of that paper will bring the moisture to my eyes until I die. Heaven bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers, as men are blessing them all over this famine-stricken land."

Rev. E. F. Frease, of Baroda, secretary of the Interdenominational Missionary Committee, also writes most encouragingly. He says:

"I have spoken of the end of the famine being in sight. The first harvest in Gujerat promises to ripen within ten days or two weeks. Yesterday, in going up to Nadiad, I noticed field after field of one of the staple food grains of Gujerat called bajari, in full head, requiring only a few days of hot, dry weather to ripen it. And as hoped for, the skies have cleared and we are likely to have the sunshine needed, although, of course, we expect and need more rain for other crops. . . . How I would enjoy accompanying you over the same ground I went with you in May, for now the fields are wonderful in their green and the whole land is rejoicing with the promise of the harvest near at hand."

Mr. Frease has been dangerously ill—the result of his exhaustive work in connection with the famine relief operations. A late cablegram announces that he is still prostrated, but there are hopes of his recovery. God's people will pray for the restoration to health of this valued worker.

Rev. Geo. P. Taylor, Ahmadabad, writes:

"You will doubtless have heard before now of the long-looked-for rain having come at last. Surely no late-comer can ever have been more welcome, and a heavy demand is now being made upon our financial resources. Till the rains fell, our effort had been to retain in life as many poor folk as possible at a minimum of expenditure, and every rupee was thus most carefully doled out. But now the conditions are very different, and money has to be somewhat generously disbursed, if any crop is to be raised this cold weather. During the earlier months of the famine, a very large number of bullocks died, and consequently the cultivators, while still tenaciously holding on to their few acres of land, would be unable to get it sown and tilled unless supplied both with seed-grain and plough-cattle. Through you and your readers' kindness, and that of other friends at home, considerable sums have reached me, and it is with the greatest pleasure that I have thus purchased freely both seed and cattle, and handed them over under carefully considered conditions to the actual farmers.

"But the rainfall has brought in its train another change, and that a sad one. The mortality, high as it was before, has rushed up still higher with unprecedented rapidity, and numbers of the weakest of the people have simply succumbed to the diseases prevalent in the rainy season. Cholera and dysentery have been reaping a plentiful harvest. Our normal death-rate in this large city of Ahmadabad was 16 a day; last month the average rose to 150, and is now about 130. Our own missionary circles have also suffered heavily. From our staff of 39 European missionaries, all counted, we have lost four by death. Our senior and most efficient worker, Mr. Gillespie, was called away in May; then followed the oldest member and the youngest of our mission to the Bhils, Mr. Mulligan and Mr. Mawhinney; and only yesterday news came of the lamented death of the wife of my dear colleague, Mr Steele.

"For all your kindness to us and for your magnificent exertions to help us in this sad time, we cannot sufficiently thank you. But God knows all you have done and are doing, and he does not forget. That his richest blessing may rest upon you is my prayer and the prayer of many a one in this afflicted land."

A GROUP OF FAMINE VICTIMS IN GUJERAT

Called Our Corn "Heavenly Food"

Rev. G. N. Thomssen, of Bapatla, sends this interesting letter about the use of our American corn in India:

"When, as a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Interdenominational Committee, I was asked: 'Shall corn or money be sent to the starving in India?' I unhesitatingly voted for money, for it seemed to me that it was a mistake to send corn so late in the season. But the good ship Quito came, and brought food for the hungry. Our mission received 4,000 bags of corn, and now let me tell you how this has been distributed. In our granary at Bapatla we stored 400 bags of this precious food. Thousands heard of America's great gift of love and begged us to give them food. We had to adopt the apostolic rule in the distribution of the grain: that if any would not work, neither should he eat! This excellent rule weeded out the host of beggars who always thrive in India. Before distributing corn for the first time, we had a thanksgiving service. I told the large crowd of over one thousand people: there are three kinds of gratitude—first, that of the cat, which forgets in three days the kindness of three years; then that of the dog, that will not forget the benefits of three days after three years, but lastly, that of the Christian who, through all eternity, calls upon his soul and all that is within him, to bless the Lord, and not to forget all his benefits. 'Yes' said Yelliah, the preacher who, with Mrs. Thomssen, was giving out the grain, 'we will be grateful as Christians, first to our Heavenly Father, who has pitied us in our famine, then to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and all friends in America who have sent us the grain, and also to the missionaries who distribute to us food for the body and also feed us with the Bread of Life.'

"Many prayed earnestly for all the donors of this 'heavenly food,' as they called it, while tears of joy and gratitude flowed down the dark cheeks of the starving men, women, and children. Then bag after bag was emptied and over forty bags were distributed that evening, each one, after a day's work, getting about three handfuls of corn.

"The missionaries have been, as it seems to me, almost too conscientious. I asked our noble, veteran missionary, the Rev. J. E. Clough, D.D.: 'Did you sell any corn?' He said: 'Yes, I sold one bag to myself and paid fifteen rupees for it into the treasury'!

"We all feel grateful to Dr. Klopsch for emphasizing one fact while in India, namely, that where missionaries carry on the work of relief, there the work is done efficiently and economically. A few days ago, a wealthy Parsee gentleman from Baroda said to me: 'In famine relief operations, in spite of all watch-care, only one-half of the money goes to the starving; the other half goes to the officials. This can not be remedied'!

"I replied: 'This can be remedied. There is one honest agency in India at least, and if relief works are entrusted to that every cent will go to the needy'!

"He smiled incredibly, and said with just a little sneer: 'And what agency is that'?

"I said: 'The missionary!' At once he said earnestly: 'Yes, the missionaries are our greatest benefactors, and they are honest in the distribution of famine relief funds'!

"God has given us great joy in the midst of this great sorrow. What will your joy be when you find after many days the bread you have cast upon the waters?"

CHAPTER XLVIII.

SAMANTHA INSPECTS BERLIN

UNTER der Linden is as beautiful and imposing an avenue as I see on my tower, with tall, handsome housen risin' up on each side on't. And there are beautiful parks and pleasure ground and places of recreation of all kinds.

The Academy of Music is famous for its fine concerts, the city seems the very home of melody, and beautiful statutes are seen on every side. The equestrian statute of Frederic the Great is a grand one, and Josiah got all rousted up lookin' at it, and talked considerable to me about what a imposin' figger he himself would make if he could be sculped settin' on the mair. He said it would be a lovely sight a loomin' up in front of the M. E. meetin' house in Jonesville. But I got his mind off from it quick as I could.

One day when we wuz out drivin' through the handsome streets we went to see the palace of Bismark. It wuz a large, stately mansion, opposite a pretty little park. But though this seemed the very abode of luxury, I wuz told that Bismark loved the country fur better, and as Josiah and I delighted in the fields of Jonesville, so he loved sweet Nature, and follered her all he could into her hants in the country. Josiah sot store by Bismark, and honors his memory, and he seemed real tickled when I sez to him:

"Bismark always reminded me of you, Josiah, from what I've read of him."

Josiah was very tickled, and he sez with a proud happy look, "Yes, I spoze I am a good deal like him, he wuz as brave as a lion, had good sound horse sense and ——"

But I sez calmly, "I dare presoom to say, Josiah, that that is so. But I wuz alludin' to his appetite, I have hearn that he had a splendid and immense appetite."

Josiah acted huffy, and I drawed his attention off onto the corners of base relief and the white statters ornamentin' the ruff.

A Day in a Royal Home

To our great sorrow, we found that Emperor William wuzn't to home. I spoze it will be a great disappointment to him when he hears on't that Josiah and I had really been there right to his home and he shouldn't be there. I well know how bad I should feel if Potentates come to Jonesville and I happened to be off on a tower. And then I honored Emperor William for his kind heart and kind actions and his good sense, and felt bad enough to think I wuzn't goin' to see him.

But owin' to Robert Strong's gittin' a letter from somebody to somebody, we went through the palace just as I would want William to go through our house in Jonesville and the carriage-house and barn, if we happened to be away a visitin' when he come our way.

And oh, what a sight that palace wuz on the inside when we come to go through it, and the outside too looked well, very strong and massive and handsum and big, enormous big.

Why, it contains six hundred rooms. And Miss Cornelius Bobbett thought she had reached the very hite of grandeur when she moved into their new house that had six big rooms beside the bedrooms. And it did go fur ahead of the average Jonesville housen. But when I stood in William's white saloon and our party wuz givin' utterance to different ejaculations of surprise and admiration I only sez instinctively:

"Oh, if Sister Cornelius Bobbett only could see this room! what would she say? How her pride would be lowered down."

For it did seem to me the most beautiful room I ever beheld. It was more than a hundred feet long, and about half that in width, and the crystal glitter overhead reflected in the shinin' floor below wuz ahead of anything I had ever seen, as brilliant as a hull forest of ice-sickles mingled in with statutes and columns and angels and everything else beautiful.

Here in this room Sessions of Parliament are opened. And I thought the laws ort to be grand and noble indeed to make 'em worthy of the place they was made in.

But, immense as this room wuz, the picture gallery is most as big agin and full of beauty and inspiration from wall to wall and from floor to ceilin'. The palace chapel is kinder round in shape, and has all sorts of soft and rich-colored marbles in the floor and wall. The altar wuz made of Egyptian marble, a kind of buff color, and the pulpit wuz made of Carrera marble. I s'pose powerful sermons have been preached from that pulpit.

SAMANTHA POINTS OUT THE BEAUTIES OF THE WHITE SALOON

Art and Finance

In Berlin the most beautiful pictures are to be seen on every side on palace walls and in picture galleries. Dorothy and Robert just doted on 'em and so did I. But Josiah always complained of his corns whilst walkin' through 'em. A picture gallery just started them corns to achin' the worst kind from his tell.

The Bourse is sunthin' like our stock exchange but big enough to accomodate thousands of money-seekers. I spoze they have lively times here anon or oftener—the river Spree runs right in front on't (though I don't think that makes a mite of difference).

More than fifty bridges cross this river and it divides out into canals and little streams, all of which comes together agin and flows away into the sea.

Impressed by the Monuments

The Alson bridge is one of the most beautiful bridges I ever sot my eyes on and not fur off is the Alson Platz, a very charming public garden. Shady paths, trees, flowers, sculpture, all make this garden very attractive.

Not fur off is the Konigs Platz, one of the most imposing parts of the city. In the centre of this square stands the grand monument to Victory, it is high and lofty as a monument to Victory ort to be, solid and massive at the base (for in order to be successful you have got to have a good underpinnin' of principle and gumption) and crowned with a noble-lookin' figger, standin' amidst a flock of eagles.

The Royal Theatre is a handsome building and looks some in front like our own Capitol in Washington, D. C. It stands between two meetin' housen, as if it laid out to set back and enjoy its neighborhood and be real respectable.

In front of it stands a fine monument to the German poet, Schiller. I sot store by him. Thomas J. used to read his books to his Pa and me a good deal when he wuz tendin' the Cademy to Jonesville, his dramas and his poems, so Josiah and I felt quite well acquainted with him, and when we see his name here amidst foreign seens it give us quite agreeable emotions, some as if we wuz a travelin' in Africa and should see a obelisk riz up with Deacon Henzy's name on it. Also I wuz interested in looking at the beautful equestrian statute of Frederic William the illustrious elector, who did so much to make his country great.

FREDERICK WILLIAM'S STATUE

It stands on a bridge, as if dominating sea and land, as he did a good deal whilst he wuz alive. He looks calm and powerful, and has a look on his face as if he could do most anything he sot out to do. And the four slaves grouped round the base of the statute seem to look up to him as if they trusted him implicitly.

His clothes wuzn't exactly what I would want Josiah sculped in if he wuz to be rared up in marble, and it seems as if so many skirts and such a long cloak floatin' out must be in a man's way if he wuz in a hurry. But where is there anything perfect here below? It wuz remarkably handsome, take it as a hull.

Dorothy and Robert said they wanted to see the statute of Gerty.

And Josiah whispered to me and sez, "Gerty who? I didn't know as they knew any Gertrude that wuz buried here."

Josiah's Tribute to Goethe

And I whispered back, "They mean Goethe. Josiah. You know Thomas J. has read us quite a lot of his writings." Sez I, "Don't you remember about little Mignon who wuz so home-sick for her own land, and would keep askin':

Knowest thou the land where citron apples bloom?
And oranges like gold amidst the leafy gloom?

"You remember it, Josiah. I've seeu you shed tears when he wuz readin' about her."

And Josiah whispered back in a loud shrill whisper that I know they hearn: "If they wanted to see Go-ethe, why didn't they say Go-ethe?" (He always would pronounce his name to rhyme with sheath.)

I felt mortified, nothin' seems worse when you're tryin' to quell a pardner down than to have him whisper back so loud. Why, I have had Josiah right to my own table when I've had company and he wuz makin' onlucky remarks, I've known him to ask me right out what I wuz steppin' on his toe for, and I wuz worse off than as if I hadn't tried to curb him in. But then he has a host of good qualities and pardners are dretful handy lots of times. But life is a kind of a warfare to the best and happiest on us.

Well we all went to see the statute to Goethe; it stands in a pleasant spot in the Thiergarten surrounded by shrubs and trees. The face of the great poet is full of the sadness and glory of them that see visions and dream dreams. Grouped about him are the sculptured forms of Tragedy, Lyrical Poetry, and Research. It wuz a impressive monument and rousted up more emotions in me than any that I see in Berlin.

Well, we didn't stay long in Prussia, for the cords that wuz drawin' us home tightened from day to day, the children and Philury a drawin' them cords closter ever and anon with long and loving letters, and we hastened on to Hamburg. It wuz a lovely day when we sot out on our journey and we wuz all feelin' well, specially Josiah and I, for every revolution of the wheels brought us nigher to our beloved Jonesville and every toot of the engine seemed to shout afresh the joyful tidin's to us that we had sot our faces towards the bright hearth stun of home.

We had no eventful experiences on the journey to relate, unless it wuz a interview we had with a young man, a Freshman I believe he wuz from some college, travelin' with his tutor, and he seemed real fresh, he seemed to have plenty of money but a scarcity of brains, or mebby he had enough brains but they seemed to be in a sort of a soft state, and I guess they'll harden up some when he gits older if he has good luck with them.

Snubbing an Infidel

I wuz most a good mind to advise him to set in the sun bareheaded all he could, thinkin' mebby it might harden 'em some, but didn't know how it would be took.

He thought he knew a sight, but the shadder he really cast on worldly affairs wuz exceedingly small, he could step over it the hull time, but he felt that it reached the horizon. Robert talked quite a good deal with him, to pass away the time I spoze, but there wuz a queer smile in his eyes and kinder patient and long sufferin' as if to say:

"You'll know more in the future than you do now and I'll bear with you."

The young man thought he wuz patronizin' Robert, I knew from his liniment. He wuz a infidel, and seemed to think it made him very smart. You know some folks do think it is real genteel to doubt and a mark of a deep thinker.

I hearn him go on for quite a spell, for Robert wouldn't argy with him, thinkin' I spoze it might strain his arm to hit at vacancy. But at last I seemed to have to speak up to Miss Meechim and say:

"How strange it is that some folks think the less they believe the bigger it makes 'em, but good land! it don't take much intellect to believe in nothin', it don't strain the mind any if it is ever so weak."

I guess he hearn me for he kinder changed his talk and went to patronizin' the scenery. Well, it wuz beautiful a good deal of the way, though at the last of our journey it broke out rainy all of a sudden right whilst Josiah wuz all engaged in admirin' a particular view, and it grew cold and disagreeable. And he bein' tired out, worried a sight about the rain and the suddenness on't and how it stopped his sight-seein' and brung on his rumatiz, and he complained of his corns and his tight boots, and said that I had ort to seen that he wuz dressed thicker, and fretted and acted. And I sez:

"You've got to take things as they come, Josiah. I couldn't send anybody out this mornin' to bring in a pail of weather to see if it wuz goin' to rain. You've got to take it as it comes, and when it comes, and make the best on't."

But he still acted restless and oneasy, and most cried, he felt so bad. And I went on and dilated on the merits of calmness and serenity and how beautiful traits they wuz and how much to be desired.

Irritating Equanimity

And he snapped me up enough to take my head off, and said that he "couldn't always be calm and wuzn't goin' to try to be."

"No," sez I reasonable, "you've got to be megum in that, or in eatin' bread and milk, of course, you could kill yourself on that, though it seems innocent and harmless; you can carry everything too fur."

And seein' that his liniment still bore the marks of restless oneasiness and onhappiness, I eppisoded a little on his side of the question, for what will not a woman do to ease a pardner's mind and comfort him?

"Yes, Josiah, Cousin Joel Smith's life used to be so serene and so deadly calm on all occasions that she used to mad Uncle Joel, who wuz of a lively and active tempermament, like the most of the Smiths.

"I asked Joel once on a visit there, when she had been so collected together and monotonous in aspect, and talked with such oneven and sweetness of tone that I got dead tired on't myself, and felt that I had been lookin' on a sun-baked prairie for months, and would have been glad enough to had her got up a change of liniment some way, and a change of axent higher or lower, I sez to Cousin Joel:

"Do you spoze Serintha Jane would git excited and look any different and talk any faster or louder if the house should get afire?"

Calm in a Fire

And he said no, the house did git afire once, when he wuz away. And she discovered it in the morning whilst she wuz makin' some scollops in her hair (she always had her hair scolloped just as even as ever a baby's petticoat wuz), keepin' that too calm and fixed through bangs and braids. She had scolloped it on one side and wuz just beginin' it on the other when she see the fire, and she went gently to the door, opened it in a quiet ladylike way, and asked a neighbor goin' by in her low even axent, if he would kindly stop a minute. And the neighbor stopped and she said sweetly:

"Could I trouble you to do a little errand for me if you are going down town, or would it incommode you?"

He said he would do it.

Well, she said she didn't want him incommoded, "But," sez she, "if it is not too much trouble will you please tell my husband that I would like to have him come home as soon as he can make it convenient to do so, for the house is afire." And then she smiled sweetly and made a low bow, and went back into the house lookin' real serene, and went to scollopin' the other side of her fore-top.

The neighbor started off wildly on the run hollerin' "fire!" and "help!" for he see the flames bustin' out of one of the chamber winders. He got the fire engine and the neighbors collected, and got most of the furniture out below, and they couldn't hardly git her to make a move, for she hadn't got the last scallop made, but finally somebody grabbed her, and kinder hauled her out, she a tryin' to smile, they say, and look calm, as she was borne out.

I told Joel, before I thought, that "she ort to been singed, and that it would have done her good, mebby it would rousted her up a little."

Disappointed at Table

And I guess he felt so too, though he didn't say so. Josiah looked real interested, and I sez, fur I didn't dast to have the encouragement go too fur that way:

"Calmness and serenity are beautiful, Josiah, and almost always desirable, though when a house gits afire you ort to let up on 'em a little."

Josiah's liniment looked quite a little clearer, but some shadders still remained, and I went on tenderly and pictured out to him the first meal I would cook for him when we got home. And then his liniment grew peaceful and happy, and he sez gratefully:

"You're so calmin' to the nerves, Samantha when you set out to be, you're a perfect iodine."

Id'no really what he did mean, I guess it wuz anodyne, I keep a bottle to home for nerves. But 'tennyrate in a few minutes he wuz talkin' quite glib about home and the children and I felt richly repaid for all my trouble. And with such little agreeable talk and eppisodin' did I try to diversify the weariness of travel.

Josiah is a great case for Hamburg steaks, and he confided to me the hope that we would git some here that would go even beyond any that I had ever cooked and that would ensure him a future of this delicious food. But we didn't see a sign on 'em in the city. He wuz bitterly disappinted.

Hamburg is a free state, small, but I spoze feelin' quite big and independent. It is ruled by a Senate of eighteen members, and a house of Burgesses of one hundred and ninety-two members, and they make their own laws and keep 'em, I spoze, the most on 'em, and get along quite well and prosperous.

Florists in Quaint Garb

There is a beautiful little lake in the heart of the city on which small gaily painted boats dart to and fro carrying passengers like omnibuses in city streets. Beautiful bridges cross the Alster, a tributary of the Danube, and tall handsome houses line the streets.

They are great cases for flowers there in Hamburg. You meet flower shops and flower sellers on every side. But they are not the beautiful flower girls we read of in stories. They are mostly old wimmen, two old for hard work. They wear short skirts, comin' just below their knees, black bodices, long black stockings with gay colored garters, wooden shoes, broad-brimmed hats, saucer shaped, trimmed with stiff black cambric bows.

We wuz only there for one day, but long enough to drive through the principal streets and see some of the principal sights and git rested some, and then we sailed away for Home Sweet Home, via London, England.

Our Children's Home Helpers

Though the summer days are past, and the Children's Home closed till summer comes again, the good that was done at beautiful Mont-Lawn lives on. Many little ones, trudging sturdily to school now, owe health and strength to their sojourn there. Numbers of boys and girls who never went to Sunday School before their stay with us are regular attendants at some church or mission. The following contributions have been received:

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. O. W. W., Marion, O., writes:

I desire to add my testimony to that of many others, that God hears and answers prayer, and that he is our only hope and safety. He leads his children through dark days into the sunshine of his presence more.

Mrs. W., Omaha, Neb., writes:

My friend was estranged from me. I prayed to God and the estrangement was removed.

Constant Reader, Blanchard, Iowa, writes:

Some time since I prayed God to spare me a great trouble that seemed pending. My prayer has been fully answered. Truly he is a merciful father.

Mrs. R. E. H., Collins, Mich., writes:

I promised my blessed Lord that if he would carry me through a certain trial I would acknowledge it before men. I praise his name for answering my prayer.

W. J. S., Moyer, Pa., writes:

I want to acknowledge through your paper that God has answered my prayers. I thank him for having cast a new joy into my life.

Mrs. M., Jacksonville, Fla., writes:

I want to acknowledge the receipt of a special answer to prayer, as I promised to do when the request was made. I have many times proved the truth of the promise, "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive."

Believer, Huntingdon, Pa., writes:

I have been praying for a blessing from the Lord, which would not only effect my life, but the lives of a number of others. I received the answer yesterday evening, so write at once to redeem my promise to make it known.

Subscriber, Groesbeck, Texas, writes:

Many times have I felt that God answered my petitions. I believe, when our prayers are not answered in just the way we wish, it is because our Father who is too wise to err and too good to do a wrong, knows it is not for our good and denies us, just as "prudent parents disallow too much of sweet to craving babyhood."

Miss H., Portsmouth, Va., writes:

I write to acknowledge that the Lord has answered several special prayers for me recently I feel that he has always given me what I asked in faith, unless he knew it best to withhold.

W. H., Poughkeepsie, N.Y., writes:

I wish to thank my Heavenly Father for the many times he has answered my prayers. Surely I can say he is a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God. Glory be to his holy name.

D. J. T., Onancock, Va., writes:

A few weeks ago my way seemed entirely hedged in, but step by step the way has been opened. I believe it to be in answer to prayer, and desire to acknowledge the same through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. F. H. S., Chadron, Neb., writes:

I wish to keep my promise, by acknowledging through the paper a recent answer to prayer. For months I called upon the Lord. He has answered my prayer. I give him the praise.

E. B. T., Columbia, S. C., writes:

My wife and I are both glad that you give space in your paper to answered prayers. We have lately to bless God for richly answering our petitions. My message to the prayer circle is "Judge not the Lord by one day's sight."

Mrs. G. N. McD., Havana, Cuba, writes:

I prayed to know God's will, which he most graciously showed to me. As testimony for Christ I tell to the world, through the columns of your paper, that he is faithful to his promises.

Young Reader, Iowa, writes:

I feel that God has been very good to me in answering prayer.

C. M. V., Staten Island, writes:

I desire to acknowledge through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a direct answer to prayer. When circumstances seemed very dark and gloomy I promised my Heavenly Father, if he would help me, I would acknowledge it. My Father has done his part and I intend doing mine. All praise be unto him.

J. J. H., Norwalk, Mass., writes:

I have this morning received such a direct answer to prayer that I wish to make it known in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

M. B. R., New Haven, Conn., writes:

Sorrow and desolation in my home, then business trouble and loss. I prayed the dear Father in heaven to help me, and have found help; but must yet beg for strength to live on sweetly and patiently.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from T. F. S., Scituate, R. I.; Mrs. L., Bancroft, Ia.; A Reader, Chaplin, Conn.; S. D., Youngstown, Ia.; Reader, Chesterfield, Va.; Mrs. H. M. P., St. Louis, Mo.; Mrs. E. S., Big Rapids, Mich.; Mrs. M. E. B., Peterboro, N. H.; H. S., Mt. Ayr, Ia.; M. L. B., Sodus Center, N. Y.; N. GOSPEL LIGHT IN HONGKONG

Mission Work Among Sailors of all Nations—The "Day-Spring"—A Service on Her Majesty's Transport : : : :

BY REV. THOMAS WRIGHT, Chaplain Seamen's Mission, Hongkong

JOHN CHINAMAN is nothing if not complimentary. At all events there is no one so profuse in the employment of high-sounding epithets as he. His country is "The Flowery Land," "The Celestial Empire." It is not generally known that the Chinese name for the Gibraltar of the East, Hongkong, is equivalent to "fragrant waters," or "fragrant streams."

REV. THOMAS WRIGHT

Why it should be so called it is not easy to determine. Possibly some imaginative Chinaman, twenty or thirty centuries ago, struck by the extreme natural beauty of the bay, illogically conferred upon it the title which it has since retained. The modern traveler, as he enters the harbor in one of our ocean greyhounds, rarely fails to manifest his admiration for its loveliness. Many consider it the finest in the world. The flags of all nations are well represented, for is it not the fourth port of the world in the tonnage of its shipping? It is the great emporium, the distributing centre for the products of the East and West. Here, too, you observe hundreds of those strange looking junks which have come down the magnificent waterways of China, to return laden with the commodities of Europe and America, to communities which have never yet seen the face of a white man. The "fragrant waters" bear on their bosom varied and valuable merchandise, an abundance of this world's goods. May God grant that along those same highways may soon be borne messengers of peace, distributing, not earth's perishable riches, but the gold of the Gospel, tried in the fires of redeeming love. When such treasure goes inland from Hongkong, then will it become worthy of its name, "an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice, acceptable, well-pleasing to God."

In this "haven for ships" much good evangelical work has been done for the sailors who visit it; and much more needs to be done. For many years the Seamen's Mission has operated through various agencies to help Jack live true to his higher self, and to choose for his captain and pilot, on ship or ashore, the Lord Jesus Christ. The present chaplains, the Rev. J. H. France and the writer, are doing their best to maintain the splendid traditions of the society, to consolidate and extend the work of God among those who go down to the sea in ships, and to make Hongkong worthy of its name, "fragrant waters." Dens of infamy are to be found here, as elsewhere; unscrupulous men do not hesitate to enrich themselves by robbing the simple-hearted sailor of his hard-earned wages. Even before his ship has had time to swing to her anchor she is boarded by the emissaries (known as "runners") of these men, who wax eloquent on the attractions which the dens of the city present. It is to counteract such base influences as these that the Seamen's Mission is carried on. Numerous letters have been received by the workers from fathers and mothers of many lands expressing grateful recognition of the interest taken in their sons in this far-off islet.

We have also a church for sailors, called St. Peter's Seamen's Church. It is situated in the grounds of the Sailors' Home. Religious services of a brief, bright and brotherly character are held here every morning, and on four evenings of the week. Sankey's hymns are used, a short practical address is given, closing with prayer, in which absent friends and sailors at sea are not forgotten. At these services are found men of all races and nationalities, and the scene presented is varied and picturesque in the extreme. White and yellow and black men, men with fans in their hands, men in khaki, in blue jumpers, in every sort of costume, marine and military, sit under the swaying punkahs and listen reverently while the simple Gospel is proclaimed, usually in our English tongue, which seems to be more generally understood among seafaring men than any other.

Much might be written on the usefulness of the Mission steam launch, Day-spring, in which 1,300 pastoral visits were paid to the ships in the harbor during the past year, not reckoning the evening journeys undertaken to bring men from their ship to various meetings ashore. At the Kowloon Institute innocent recreations are provided for the sailor, concerts are given and temperance and other meetings are held. Provision is made at the "Star Coffee House" for the material wants of the men who come ashore for a short time "on liberty," meals and rooms being provided at reasonable rates.

A service is occasionally held in Her Majesty's Prison, and cell doors are afterwards left open for the chaplain's admission. These prisoners are not all criminals: many have been incarcerated for some offence against discipline, usually committed under the influence of drink. Once a week a service takes place in the civil hospital, and seafaring men (who are usually there in considerable numbers) are regularly visited and made to feel that though far away from home they are not without friends. Every opportunity of holding a service aboard ship, especially on those about to sail, is gladly seized, and parcels of miscellaneous literature are left for benefit of the crew. Special attention is paid to "apprentices," or boys learning navigation, and everything is done to bring them under wholesome influences.

Many of Her Majesty's transports have been passing through here of late, carrying Indian troops to the seat of trouble in North China. One in particular attracts special interest just now, for she is conveying the Australian Naval Brigade to augment the forces of the Empire up North. I invite THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to attend with me, in fancy, a farewell service on board. Ship's bell "for'ard" is tolled, and "aft" the boatswain's shrill pipe is heard to indicate that "church" is about to be held. Under an electric lamp on the fore-deck, the chaplain takes his stand, and soon the sons of the sea gather around him. They are in unconventional attire and assume unconventional positions more conducive to comfort than to dignity. The familiar top-hat and frock-coat are nowhere in evidence. The sailors are in the typical costume of the British man-o'-war's man, and bare feet and chests are the rule. The marines are in uniform new to the sea—khaki, gaiters and slouched colonial hats. Some manage to secure first-class seats on the hatches; others command the scene from elevated seats on the ship's broad gunwale; some lean on the halliards, and the rest make themselves as comfortable as possible on the deck itself. The music is led by a cornet and piccolo. When that congregation bursts into lusty chorus, their worship can be heard half a mile away. Reverently they listen to the chaplain's simple discourse, based on I. Timothy 6:11, 12, wherein he seeks to show from notable instances in modern military history that manliness and godliness are not only not opposed, but are perfectly consistent; nay, more, that the truest manliness is made manifest in the truest godliness. Some of his hearers may be doomed to fall in battle, and as the pastor speaks, he prays that God's spirit may carry a message of peace to the listening men on deck.

Salvation Army Work in Galveston

During the days of greatest distress in Galveston, the Salvation Army Relief Brigade formed itself into watches, and worked night and day. In the tent which they used as headquarters, they fed fully ten thousand people, serving some days more than a thousand meals, distributed twelve thousand garments, and sheltered sixty homeless mothers and their children. Brigadier Caygill relates many touching incidents of the work. Among the stricken ones who came to the Army's tent, was a woman and her three weeks' old babe—all that were left of a family of six. During the storm her husband had besought her to leave the house and flee with him to a place of possible safety. She in turn begged her husband to take their three older children and seek safety elsewhere, but she herself persisted in remaining where she was, saying: "If die I must, I would rather die here in my own home with my baby."

Strange to say, while she and the little one were both spared, her husband and the three children who fled with him were lost.

One man was brought to the Salvation tent, who had been found under a pile of debris, under which he had been literally buried for many days. The doctors said he could not recover. The children who flocked to the text were nearly all covered with sores caused by the action of salt water on open wounds, and were badly bruised and threatened with blood poison besides.

When the Army Brigade left the city, the authorities were masters of the situation. Numerous hospitals and supply stores had been opened, and anyone in need of help of any kind could get it by making the proper application. Every man, too, who wanted work could get it at from two to four dollars a day. Under the circumstances, the authorities announced that further work on the part of independent relief parties was not needed, whereupon the Salvation Army Relief Brigade, having accomplished all it set out to do in the stricken city, returned north.

Torpid Liver

When it is What headache, dizziness, constipation,
What fits of despondency,
What fears of imaginary evils, conduce with the distress after eating, the sourness of the stomach, the bad taste in the mouth, and so forth, to make the life of the sufferer scarcely worth living!

Dyspepsia resulted from torpid liver in the case of Mrs. Jones, 2320 N. 12th St., Philadelphia, Pa., who was a great sufferer.

MISSIONARY FUGITIVES FROM CHINA CROSSING THE SIBERIAN DESERT

MISSIONARIES CRUELLY SLAIN

The Terrible Story of the Massacre at Chekiang, China—How a Group Escaped from Shansi : :

MANY weeks, perhaps months, must elapse before the complete story of the Christian martyrdoms in China can be told. Far back in the lonely interior, and in localities remote from all succor, the devoted missionaries of the Gospel of Jesus Christ have yielded up their lives for the faith.

A partial list of the missionary martyrs was given in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. To-day we are enabled, through the kindness of Dr. Hallock, of Hangchow, to give the following details of the massacre of the China Inland Mission workers at Chekiang—all of whom were included in the list already published. Under date of September 1, Dr. Hallock writes:

"There were none of the whites left to tell the tale. What we learn is from native Christians and from rumors. The story seems to be about as follows: Mr. D. B. Thompson, having a good work in Ku-chow, and having built up a fine plant for work, was waiting in hopes his presence would prevent the destruction of the property and save the lives of hundreds of native Christians. He remained even after there was great danger. He had a good friend in the magistrate, who would do his best to protect him, and who said he would himself die before the foreigners should be killed. He kept his word. The people knew he was a friend of the foreigners. They arose and killed the official, his family, and possibly his soldiers. Mr. Thompson saw in what danger he was. He therefore went quickly and pleaded with the higher official for protection. He constantly refused. After an hour of pleading, the higher official promised. As Mr. Thompson walked out from the official's presence the official sent no escort with him, but instead, behind his back, coward-like, made the motion of cutting his head off. One story says the soldiers immediately speared him to death. Another says the guard not going with him, he was killed on the street. When he was dead, they went to his home and killed his wife and two children. The three young ladies in the city were found ruthlessly handled—speared and beheaded, it is said, before the door of this wicked yamen.

"Mr. Ward, of Chang-san, had sent his wife and child and Miss Thirgood down the river ahead of him in a boat to escape. Before they got to Ku-chow, the people saw a foreign lady looking out of the boat window. They drew them out of the boat and speared them to death, some say having first hung them to a tree. Mr. Ward, coming down shortly after and seeing them dead, tried to escape, but was killed also. Thus the company from Cheng-san were all killed.

"Of those who suffered martyrdom, Mrs. Ward and Miss Thirgood, it seems are Americans. Mr. and Mrs. Thompson (two children), Mr. Ward (one child), Misses Sherwood, Manchester and Desmond are English. It was thought that possibly one young lady escaped, but a month has passed and no word has come from her. Hope is gone, and God alone knows how to reward and punish."

AMERICAN MISSIONARIES WHO ESCAPED FROM CHINA

A number of authenticated instances of atrocities are given by one of the missionaries who escaped from the Province of Hunan. In one case he states a missionary had his eyes burned out; then a portion of his body was cut off, and finally a red-hot staff was driven through his back. In another case, a missionary was wrapped in cotton, the cotton was soaked in oil and the mass set on fire. The missionary was burned to death.

A party of refugees from Shansi recently arrived at Shanghai, after encountering such sufferings and hairbreadth escapes as will be difficult to find a parallel anywhere. The party consisted of Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Saunders, with two children (two others of their children died on the way), and A. Jennings and Miss Guthrie, all from Pingyao; E. J. Cooper and two children, from Lucheng (Mrs. Cooper, Miss Rice and Miss Houston, also from that city, were killed on the way or died from injuries received); Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Glover, with two children and Miss Gates, from Luan. All were members of the China Inland Mission, and of the nineteen who started five perished. The survivors tell this story:

"We had to flee for our lives at midnight with nothing but one donkey-load of bedding and clothes and a supply of silver, which we divided up among the party. At every village we were attacked and driven from one to the other with blows and curses. Miss Rice was killed on the road fifty li north of Tsehchaufu in Shansi. That day both she and Miss Houston sat down on the roadside, saying they would willingly die, but walk another step they could not. We thought we might be able to hire a cart for these ladies. The villagers refused the cart. A mob fell upon the ladies and drove them on, and in this way they got left and were beaten to death.

"The crossing of the Yellow River was one of our most trying experiences. The yamen had placed us in carts, and promised to send us over. For two days we sat on the bank of the Yellow River, not knowing what to do. We were like the Israelites at the Red Sea. On the third day the boatmen unexpectedly changed their minds, and took us over.

"The first city we came to south of the river was Changhou. The magistrate was bitterly anti-foreign and said had we only arrived twenty-four hours sooner he would have had the pleasure of killing us all. His orders were to allow no foreign devil to escape, but the Empress Dowager had taken pity on them, and he had just been instructed to have them all sent as prisoners into Hupeh. Accordingly, from this point we were sent across Honan, from city to city, as prisoners, by the yamen, sometimes in carts and sometimes mounted on the hard wooden pack-saddles of donkeys. For food they gave us bread and water, and nowhere showed us any kindness till we reached Sinyangchou, the last city in Honan. Here we were no longer treated as prisoners, and here we met with the Glovers from Luan, who had arrived after a similar journey."

DECISION FOR CHRIST*

The Master's Own Statement of Conditions of Discipleship

HOW different is the doctrine of the Cross as Jesus taught it from the doctrine in our theological systems! In the latter it appears as a bargain. Christ suffers a penalty properly belonging to the sinner and in consideration of his suffering and death God remits the punishment of the sinner. Christ is thus in effect worth the whole world and his sufferings are accepted as a balance against the world's sin. How many times has this statement been made in our pulpits! It is a formula to be accepted, a doctrine to be believed, and people who accept it are assured that they are heirs to eternal life. Perhaps some of the lifelessness in our churches is due to the levity with which this statement is made and accepted. But in Christ's teaching the doctrine of the Cross holds a different place. "Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me cannot be my disciple." Here it is not a belief in a formula, a comprehension of "the plan of salvation," but a discipline that is lifelong. It is not a cross which Christ bore that others might go free, but a cross that is a condition of discipleship, a cross that the disciple himself must bear. Those who heard Christ speak afterwards realized the truth of his words. They thought then that following him meant going to the Jewish capital to share in the splendors of a kingdom. One wanted to sit on his right and another on his left and another wanted to know what they would have. What they did get was poverty and hardship and exile, and in many cases the death of martyrs.

Has the offence of the cross ceased? There are some lives in which it is still the most important part. It is self renunciation and that is always difficult. Let any man realize what there is in him of the lower nature, love of pleasure, love of money, love of honors and popularity, love of any worldly things, some one or more of which is sure to hold sway in the mind, and let him set himself to deny that thing and he will find out what is the burden of the cross. In our land and time we are free from persecution. We are not required to travel that way of the cross, but Christ still requires the martyr spirit. None are worthy to be his disciples who would purchase their lives by denying him. The alternative may never be presented, but the spirit that would choose death before apostacy must be in the disciple, still, as it was of old. But there are other ways of the cross which should be trodden. The business man who sees his way to a great fortune through a sacrifice of principle, the politician who can make his election sure by a fraudulent pledge, the employee whose place depends on his acquiescence in a wicked practice, the lawyer who can win his case by a false plea, the schoolboy who knows that he will be ridiculed if he kneels down to pray in the crowded dormitory, the fashionable belle whose chances of a successful marriage would be enhanced by accepting an invitation to some sinful entertainment—all these have the opportunity of treading the way of the cross. Even in the family, there are occasions when the interests of loved ones and the entreaties of the nearest and dearest are in conflict with Christian duty, and the meaning is realized of Christ's words: He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me.

The time when Christ propounded this doctrine of the cross is significant. The work of founding his kingdom was inconceivably formidable. He had need of every follower, and many were coming to him for enlistment. Great multitudes thronged around him. Surely he would welcome and encourage them all. It was then with the utmost frankness that he declared the conditions and the consequences of following him. Not even Gideon, weeding out his army, presents a heroism so intense as Christ does in uttering his warning. He would have no fair-weather disciples; none should ever be able to say that he did not know all that was involved in discipleship. Christ demanded the supreme place in the soul. Allegiance to him must be paramount over everything, otherwise the applicant was rejected. It was a bold and sweeping condition. But how much did it promise! He who would give himself up to Christ, prepared to sacrifice ambition, avarice, self-indulgence, family affection if need be, and even life itself, would attain the noblest of all results. The discipline of Christ cut deep, but it developed the divine life. He who would attain the highest plane accessible to humanity has here the opportunity. Let him take up his cross and follow Christ. To them gave he power to become the sons of God. None others were acceptable. Dare they pray to have everything displeasing to God rooted out of their hearts, to lose everything, if need be, in his service? Then they were welcome, but not otherwise. So he would have everyone count the cost before pledging themselves. It is a momentous decision that none can escape. He that loveth his life shall lose it.

Mission Work in East Africa

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will remember the little African maid, concerning whom missionary E. H. Richards, of Inhambane, East Africa, has repeatedly written us most interesting letters. It was proposed to "redeem" Papanyana, that is, to follow in her case the custom, long sanctioned by missionary usage in Africa, of paying to her parents or native guardians a sum in return for which they give her to be adopted by the mission and trained to a life of Christian usefulness. At the end of her years of training Papanyana would be sent out among her own people to work and testify for Christ. Rev. Mr. Richards now writes under date Aug. 15:

"Papanyana is with us at present, and her betrothed is now in a superb native school in Natal. Her 'owner' thinks someway that her betrothed has gone to earn cash to pay him for his own flesh and blood, and it is quite as well not to let him into further light, lest we be beseiged to buy up half a thousand girls, all of whom ought to be redeemed, but whom it is probably not expedient to redeem with mission funds. The wife of our chief, the mother of a daughter who knews the multiplication table, and has married our chief preacher, was pointing out my bicycle to a group of friends who had never seen one. She explained that it was the machine with which I ground corn. None questioned her sagacity. A young native explained to a few of his friends that the same machine was the instrument with which I made pictures. Sometimes I think these people do not think; they just follow ruts into which they have been dropped by their forefathers, and merely exist along through life without any intelligent living. The men sin most and die first. 'The wages of sin is death.' There is no census in the land, but everywhere there are more old women than old men. Social vices, drink and war devastate the land continually. Among such a race with such an ancestry we propose to introduce the leaven of Christianity. The method which we have been pursuing for several years is to get possession of such children as we may, and separate them from their home surroundings—the farther and the longer the better. Every one of our present force of native workers was only fifteen years ago naked savages, devoid of understanding and utterly prone to evil. They were taken into our Christian families and faithfully taught, and after once perceiving the truth of the teachings, they never cared to return to their native haunts, and never have done so. In several instances the parents and relatives have come to them, but they have seldom returned. They seek Christian helpmeets and form Christian homes of their own, and in this way we establish Christian centers among the people, which in a little time become real live mission stations. We have six such stations to-day, with a prospect of three more before the year closes. We need funds to aid but not to support this work. The native chief will give us a portion of land—for no cost. He will do so for anyone, for whoever comes within his domain is his own to rule over, and he delights to have people come. The mission pays nothing for the land, and still we have control of it, for we put in certain school funds which would be immediately withdrawn if the work were not satisfactory from a Christian point of view. Corn and peanuts are the bread and meat, the 'corn and wine' of our inhabitants. Our native teacher or mere layman rises at daybreak and has his church service and school, and by nine A. M. is in the field digging over his garden with a clumsy sort of adze, which he calls a hoe. His wife and school children are all with him. He works till about four P. M., and then returns home for school and evening church service.

"A native takes a native wife according to native law. He becomes converted and she will not. After three years of earnest and faithful trial, he wishes to put her away and seek a Christian wife. Her father calls her home and sends her sister in her stead. The husband does not like her, but it is native and white law that he shall take her, and he does so. After a season, it appears that she also is given to strong drink, but so far there is no Biblical ground for a divorce. The Christian is sorely tried, and asks leave to send her home and to be allowed to take a wife of his own choosing. It will cost him $100 in gold to make the change, but he will likely recover this amount from the parent of the other so-called wives, and financially he can afford it. What he wishes to know is this: Is he justifiable in putting away a wife who is a heathen, whom he took in heathenism, and in her stead to marry a Christian girl? Must we recognize heathen marriage as Christian marriage?

"Our schools are hopeful. We have more than eighty who can read the Testament, and what is more they do read it every day. We have a system of giving of which we are not ashamed. Out of our 160 members less than a dozen have any visible income, and only our teachers and preachers have anything. They receive about four dollars a month. But our collections amount to over three cents each member a month, and compared with home conditions this amounts to almost as much as 'The Widow's mite.'"

Dr. Talmage Visits Belfast

THE Belfast News Letter of October 8th has the following: "Belfast is favored with a visit from the Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage, the famous American preacher, and in connection with his visit a service was arranged for yesterday afternoon in St. Enoch's Church. This is the fourth time that Dr. Talmage has preached in this church, and as his previous sermons were attended by such large numbers, special arrangements were made on this occasion with a view to prevent undue crushing. Tickets carrying the privilege of early admission were distributed to members of the congregation, but unfortunately these did not prove of much advantage to the holders. About half-past two an immense crowd had assembled at Carlisle Circus, and the gates had to be guarded by police. Their efforts, however, were in vain, for the crowd that had gathered practically rushed the gate, and the spacious church was rapidly filled. Many hundreds of persons, including ticket-holders and even special collectors, were unable to gain admittance. Subsequently, Dr. Talmage addressed briefly a large open-air gathering in the Carlisle Circus, which was attended by many of those who had failed to gain admission to the church."

Similar crowds of vast proportions assembled to hear him preach in other cities of the United Kingdom.

NOVEMBER DAYS

What royal fate at autumn's board,
What vintage of divinest rest,
What water for the thirsty poured,
What depth of peace, what joy of rest!

In amber goblets frosted fair
Sweet drops of honeyed nectar lie;
All forest-spices fill the air
Beneath the radiant autumn sky.

Still fearlessly the flowers climb
Along the hill slopes rough and steep;
They have the earliest chill and rime,
Before they fade and fall asleep.

We walk the woodland path to-day,
We see the loosened foliage drop;
We would not bid the verdure stay
Nor ask the summer's flight to stop.

Each season brings its own delights;
In each a tithe of Heaven is stored;
And autumn days and wintry nights
Alike are sent us by the Lord.

Much interest attaches in these days to a really authentic case where a disease treated without success by local physicians, has been relieved by a proprietary remedy. Such a case is that of Miss Edna Grace Bullock, of Brockton, N. Y., who suffered for over two years from one of those ailments peculiar to her sex, and during that time tried both local physicians and one of the so-called women's remedies with absolutely no result for the better.

Miss Bullock's story is best told in her own words. She says:

"In January, 1897, I contracted a hard cold at an unfortunate time for me and this led to an illness that lasted for two years. I was not confined to my bed but suffered greatly. I had severe pains in my stomach and in my left side and acute pains around my heart. I could not walk fast and was tired out after the slightest exertion. I also suffered from dizziness and had headache almost all the time.

"In the spring of 1899, upon the advice of a friend, I decided to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I found relief after taking two boxes of the pills but continued using them until I had taken six boxes. Previous to this I had been under a doctor's care for four months, then changed and took another doctor's treatment for three months but found no relief until I began taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I believe that they are the best medicine in the world and am always glad to recommend them."

Signed, MISS EDNA G. BULLOCK.

CROMWELL AND PARLIAMENT*

BY March 16, 1653, the Dutch were evidently beaten and peace was in sight; but before peace came there was an end of the Rump arliament. The discontent in the army ad steadily increased. They wished a horough reform in governmental meth-ds, and with the characteristic Puritan abit of thought, wished especially to guar-ntee the safety of the "Godly interests" y a complete new election. On the ther hand, the Parliament was scheming w to yield in name only, and not in ct, and had hit on the device of passing bill which should continue all the mem-ers of the existing Parliament without election, and, moreover, should consti-te them a general committee, with full ower to pass upon the qualifications of y new members elected. This, of ourse, amounted to nothing, and the rmy would not accept it.

Many conferences of the leaders of the vo sides were held at Cromwell's house, he last on the evening of April 19, 1653, oung Sir Harry Vane, formerly one of romwell's close friends, being among he number of the Parliamentary leaders. romwell, on behalf of his party, warned hem that their bill could not be accepted submitted to, and the Parliament aders finally agreed that it should not be rought up again in the House, until after rther conference. But they either did ot or could not keep their agreement. he members of the House were obsti-ately resolved to keep their places—any of them from corrupt motives, for ey had undoubtedly made much money ut of their positions through the taxing f delinquents and otherwise. In short, ey wished to perpetuate their govern-ent, to have England ruled by a little lf-perpetuating oligarchy. Next morn-g, April 20th, Parliament met and the aders began to hurry the bill through he House.

They reckoned without their host. romwell sitting in his reception room, nd waiting the return of the con-rees of last evening, learned what was oing on, and just as he was, clad "in lain black clothes and gray worsted ockings," followed by a few of-cers and twenty or thirty stark mus-eteers, he walked down to the house. here he sat and listened for some time o the debate on the bill, once beckoning ver Harrison, the Republican general, is devoted follower. When the question as put as to whether the bill should ass, he rose and broke in with one of is characteristic speeches. First, he numerated the good that had been done y Parliament, and then began to tell hem of their injustice, their heed to their wn self-interests, their delay to do right. One among his eager listeners called him o order, but no appeal to Parliamentary orms could save the doomed House. Come, come!" answered Oliver, "we ave had enough of this; I will put an nd to your prating!" With that he lapped on his hat, stamped on the floor ith his feet, and began to rate the Com-ons as if they were disobedient school-oys. "It is not fit that you should sit ere any longer; you have sat too long or any good that you have been doing ttely; you shall now give place to better en!" And Harrison called in the mus-eteers. Oliver then continued, enu-erating the sins of the members, some f whom were drunkards, some lewd vers, some corrupt and unjust. The House was on its feet as he lifted the ace, saying: "What shall we do with is bauble? Take it away!" and gave to a musketeer; and then, turning to-ard the Speaker: "Fetch him down!" nd fetched down he was. Gloomily the embers went out, while Cromwell taunt-ed Sir Harry Vane with breaking his promise, ending with, "The Lord deliver me from thee, Sir Harry Vane!" So ended the Long Parliament. "And," asserted Oliver, "we did not hear a dog bark at their going."

Tomes have been written to prove whether Oliver was right or wrong in what he did at this time, but the Rump Parliament had no claim to be, either in law or fact, the representative of the English people, or of any part of them that really counted. There was no justification for its continuance, and no good whatever could come from permitting it to exist longer. Its actions, and especially its obstinate determination to perpetuate its own rule without warrant in law, without the even higher and more perilous warrant of justice and national need, rendered it necessary that it should be dissolved.

*From Oliver Cromwell, by Theodore Roosevelt. This notable historical work, by far the most important that has come from Gov. Roosevelt's pen, deals with a period in English history which should be familiar to every American. It is finely illustrated with half tones; pp. 260; price $2. Charles Scribner's Sons, N. Y., publishers.

Chinese Ancestor-Worship

The Chinese worship their ancestors at the annual season for decorating the graves. They are attended to by the faithful worshipers, and covered with fresh earth. A bamboo stick is stuck on top of the grave, and from this floats strips of brightly-colored paper. Firecrackers are then set off on the grave. They often make paper houses, horses, carriages, servants, etc., of colored paper, and burn these for the benefit of the dead. Their belief is that since the dead are now spirits they need only the essence of things, and are thus enabled to receive and to enjoy the use of what is transmitted in this manner. They also transmit money to them in the same way.

DEATH AND RUIN IN THE WAKE OF AN EXPLOSION LIKE AN EARTHQUAKE

NEVER in the history of New York has an explosion wrought such havoc as that which occurred in the down-town section of the city, Monday, Oct. 29. Fire broke out at noon, in the building occupied by Tarrant & Co., wholesale and retail druggists, corner of Greenwich and Warren streets. The fire-engines had arrived, and scores of firemen were fighting the flames, watched by hundreds of spectators in the streets, none suspecting imminent disaster, when suddenly, with a crash as of thunder, came an explosion; then two more in rapid succession. The concussion and the falling debris killed more than forty persons outright, and injured, so far as known, over 400 more. Every building for blocks around was turned into a temporary hospital. Between thirty and forty buildings surrounding the one in which the explosion occurred were either entirely demolished, or so wrecked that the portions left standing will have to be torn down and entire new structures built. The property loss was placed at $1,500,000. Among the wrecked buildings were the Irving Place Bank and the Elevated Railroad station at Warren street.

As the appalling details were made known the people paused a moment, aghast at the thought that so great a disaster of the kind could possibly take place in the heart of the city. It seemed incredible that a series of such terrific explosions could be caused by mere alcohol, benzine, or naptha. Every one supposed that only nitro-glycerine could produce such a concussion. Nitro-glycerine is used in medicine, but it is not yet known that nitro-glycerine was on the premises. The shock of the explosion was like that of an earthquake. It was felt even by the tallest buildings on Broadway, several blocks away. The crowds of spectators were smitten with panic and fled. Men fought each other to make headway toward a place of safety, trampling women and children under in the mad rush. Several of the spectators were buried alive under falling walls, though it is known that most of the dead were employees in the ill-fated buildings. Not a single fireman lost his life, though many were injured.

A minister, the Rev. Martin Luther, of the Wilson Memorial Chapel, Forty-second Street, witnessed the disaster and had a narrow escape. "While I stood watching the fire," he says, "I moved to the south side of the street. Just then the explosion occurred. Had I remained on the north side a few minutes longer, I would have been killed. Who can describe the scene? As I looked one man appeared at one of the upper windows. His face expressed terrible agony and fear. The smoke occasionally shut him from the view of those in the street. 'Go up to the roof! Go up!' the crowd shouted. The man left the window, but I fear he perished.

"It was a terrible sight. It seemed to me that the whole building was carried up into the air only to break into a thousand pieces that descended on the people and houses. There was a slight sound before the explosion, and then, with a flash and a noise that shook the ground, the building went up. I was standing near a building and as there was a break in the crowd I darted through and got within the doors, but the fragments of glass from doors and windows fell all around me. The crowd stampeded dow the street; men and women fell over eacl other. To add to the danger and excite ment, truck-horses ran away. A grea many horses were in the neighborhood most of them standing with the feed-bag over their heads. At Greenwich stree they blocked the street, many of then having fallen. Still others in their terro tried to run over these. One of th horses which had fallen I tried to hel gain his feet and in doing so I was kicke in the head. While all this was going o there was a perfect rain of timber, tin, an glass falling in the street. I might say literally, that people were falling all abou me. Of course, all these people were no killed, nor were they badly injured, bu many of them were seriously hurt."

Many acts of heroism were witnessed for great calamities develop heroes. En gineer Phillips, of the Tarrant building saved several lives by rushing to the up per floors of the building as soon as th fire was discovered, warning the em ployees of a possible explosion. Ther rushing into the street he seized a girl typewriter who was returning to the building after luncheon, and carried her away just in time to save her from in jury. Two policemen were assisting a injured fireman out of harm's way whe the second explosion occurred and both were blown into the basement of a store they were passing and badly bruised—though the fireman escaped without fur ther injury. In the face of the greates danger, two Central office detectives darted into the banking office of Mecklen Brothers, under the Irving bank, gathered up $30,000 loose cash, and carried it to a safe place. Acts of humanity were also witnessed. A driver of a fire-engine, by a daring dash into the chaos, managed to cut the horses of his engine loose and save them. An instant later the engine was buried under a mass of debris. A car-horse was saved in the same way, the driver cutting his horse loose just in time to save it from the falling wall that crushed the car. Hundreds of people rushed into Trinity Church-yard, believing that there in the open space they would be safe from earthquake.

HOW THE RUSSIAN PEASANT EXILES HAVE THRIVEN IN THEIR NEW HOME

ROBABLY most of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have heard more or less of the Doukhobors. This Russian ct of uneducated peasants has been suffer- g persecution at home for a century and ore because of the fact that its members ab- red the established church and condemned ir and military service. But it was not until out thirteen years ago, when universal con- ription became the rule, that their troubles came unbearable. These inoffensive people, ho have charmed all who have met them by eir simple piety and kindliness, were ban- ed from their homes and exposed to all ds of hardships. At last, some influential ssians stirred themselves on behalf of these pressed peasants and obtained as a great or from the Czar permission for them to ve the country at their own expense. They d but little of their savings left after these ars of sorrow, and it was necessary for the akers of England and America to come to ir aid, and largely through their assistance ne seven thousand of these peaceable peo- have been transported to north-western nada, six or seven hundred miles beyond innipeg. Here they were placed in an un- tled country upon the open prairie some o and a half years ago, with the necessity on them of providing shelter and food for emselves before the long cold winter set in. ey set to work with determination, and eady they are beginning to feel at home in ir new fields and houses.

The few settlers who had occupied these ions before the Doukhobors came did not low what kind of people they were, and ought they might prove to be lawless and ngerous. One ranchman, who was about to ke a journey and leave his wife alone in house, just at the time of their arrival, went the Doukhobors and by signs with his gun eatened them with death if they came near his ranch. The morning after his departure his wife heard a knock at the door, and went with trepidation to the door, expecting to be assaulted. There she found a Doukhobor woman who smiled at her, for they could not understand each other's language, pushed her way in, took the milk-pail, went to the barn and insisted upon milking the cow for her hostess and doing other housework for her. She had taken this practical method of showing their good-will. This lady and her husband are now among the strongest friends of the Doukhobors. They have no children of their own and would be glad to adopt a Doukhobor child, but these Russians love their children so that notwithstanding their poverty, not one child in all the settlements can be secured.

These people are anxious to become Canadians and to be able to communicate with the Anglo-Saxon settlers around them. Knowing this, two ladies of Kingston, Ontario, Mrs. Varney, a Quaker, and her young cousin, Miss Nellie Baker, determined to establish a little summer school at one of the new Doukhobor villages on Good Spirit Lake. They arrived at their destination after a long journey, early in July of this year. Mrs. Varney had already passed the summer of 1899 there, conducting a dispensary for the Doukhobors, who have no physicians among them. They pitched their tents near three of the Doukhobor villages, a small tent for their residence, another for the dispensary, which was under Mrs. Varney's charge, and a third, 20x20 feet, for the school, over which Miss Baker presided, and for which work her studies at Queen's University had fitted her. Mrs. Varney had won the affections of the villagers last year, and they were not slow to send their children to the new school, some of them arriving before the ladies had unpacked their luggage. Miss Baker's report of her experiment, which has just been made to the Canadian Commissioner of Immigration, shows what difficulties she encountered. She found herself confronted by a tentful of boys and girls with none of whom did she have a single known word in common. "By signs and motions," she says, "I got them seated in rows on the prairie grass of the tent floor, and holding up a pencil said, 'One.' I could not detect any apparent comprehension. Then taking up another pencil I said, 'Two,' and added a third, 'Three.' Still no response, and my heart sank somewhat. However, I decided to repeat the method, and as I said 'One,' I noticed a look on a boy's face that told me he knew I was counting, and I saw him turn and speak to the others. Almost instantly they understood, and soon, repeating after me, counted up to ten."

From this beginning the course of teaching proceeded. Some of the pupils walked five miles to school and five miles back every day. Miss Baker carried on this school for six and a half hours a day and for five and a half days a week, and as almost the entire time was occupied with oral teaching, some idea may be formed of the arduous character of her work. She was naturally tired when the hour to close came, but the children were never tired. The favorite method was object teaching. They learned the divisions of time from a watch, to count money from coins, and so on. The children had a natural taste for figures, and at the end of the two months during which the school was open the older children had succeeded in getting through one-half of the multiplication table, and some of the more advanced pupils were in the second reader (Canadian). In writing, she declares that some of them equalled or surpassed the teacher. The children were anxious to have tasks assigned to them to prepare at home and never were satisfied with the amount of such tasks; they always wanted more. Their clothing was scrupulously clean and picturesque as well. "Of their needlework and embroidery," Miss Baker adds, "I am speaking of that done at their homes by the girls of my school, their handiwork is simply wonderful. For this purpose my handkerchiefs were taken, and soon returned beautifully worked."

At first the Doukhobors did not know that Miss Baker's work, like Mrs. Varney's, was entirely voluntary and unremunerated. When they found it out they sent a committee to her to offer her some compensation, although they were in need themselves. When she declined it they told her that they thanked her "all the day and all the night."

Some of the older boys, who did not know a word of any language but Russian at the beginning of July, can now, after barely two months' teaching, correspond with Miss Baker in "fairly understandable English."

It is worth while to quote Miss Baker's remarks upon the general character of the Doukhobors. She writes:

"The dignified courtesy and hospitality extended to us in more than a score of their villages, the manly bearing of the men, the delightful sympathy and affection with which they regard everything connected with their homes—an estimation of the home that has little to learn from, and possibly something to teach to, even Anglo-Saxons—their dwellings that already surpass in comfort and cleanliness those of any other class of settlers excepting those from older Canada and Great Britain, all testify to the desirability of the Doukhobors as settlers, who will, I believe, soon make good Canadian citizens. It does not require very keen perception on the part of one having had a welcome into hundreds of their homes to be assured that this is a community living up to high moral standards and holding tenaciously to the simple tenets of Christian faith. Of their day-break services of a Sunday morning, their impressive intonation of the Scriptures, their beautiful singing and harmonious chanting of hymns one could write chapters. They sing much of evenings in the villages and going to and returning from work afield. A favorite chant, freely translated, runs as follows:

"'You tell me stranger where you are going.
With the hand safe in my Saviour's
I will go over the mountainside and valley,
Over fields and prairies I will go, my friends,
To see the heavenly spring wild flowers;
I will go after Jesus
Over the hard sand, and the Lord God be with me.
He leads us on to Heaven
In his paths of righteousness.
Straight, straight to the Kingdom of Heaven.'"

A little story will add a touch to this picture of a noble people: A lady living twenty miles from one of the Doukhobor villages wanted a girl for a servant. A young girl went to her on trial for a month, but at the end of the period she promptly returned to her home. Her employer came after her, wishing to keep her, but on no account would the girl go.

TYPICAL DOUKHOBOR WOMEN

Urged to give a reason, at first she only replied that she "could not," but finally she said, "I cannot go back; my mistress did not love me." This little story throws a flood of light on the servant-girl problem. It is love that the Doukhobors want in life and which they freely give. It was love that prevented them from learning to kill their fellows in the Russian army, and it was their too great love that made the Russian government force its best subjects to leave their native land. It will be Russia's loss and Canada's gain. If they can only teach us on this continent the folly and sin of war, the joy of loving even one's enemies, and the impossibility of doing it with bombshells, their long pilgrimage and their years of hardship will not have been in vain.

Religion in Politics

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Daniel 6: 16: . . . . . Then the king commanded, and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of lions.

DARIUS was king of Babylon, and the young man Daniel was so much a favorite with him that he made him Prime Minister, or Secretary of State. But no man could gain such a high position without exciting the envy and jealousy of the people. There were demagogues in Babylon who were so appreciative of their own abilities that they were affronted at the elevation of this young man. Old Babylon was afraid of young Babylon. The taller the cedar the more apt it is to be riven of the lightning. These demagogues asked the king to make a decree that anybody that made a petition to any one except the king during a period of thirty days should be put to death. King Darius, not suspecting any foul play, makes that decree.

The Demagogues

have accomplished all they want, because they know that no one can keep Daniel from sending petitions before God for thirty days.

So far from being afraid, Daniel goes on with his supplications three times a day, and is found on his housetop making prayer. He is caught in the act. He is condemned to be devoured by the lions. Rough executioners of the law seize him and hasten him to the cavern. I hear the growl of the wild beasts, and I see them pawing the dust, and as they put their mouths to the ground the solid earth quakes with their bellowing. I see their eyes roll, and I almost hear the fiery eyeballs snap in the darkness. These monsters approach Daniel. They have an appetite keen with hunger. With one stroke of their paw or one snatch of their teeth, they may leave him dead at the bottom of the cavern. But what a strange welcome Daniel receives from these hungry monsters. They fawn around him, they lick his hand, they bury his feet in their long manes. That night he has calm sleep with his head pillowed on the warm necks of the tamed lions.

But not so well does Darius, the king, sleep. He has an attack of terrific insomnia. He loves Daniel, and hates this stratagem by which he has been condemned. All night long the king walks the floor. He cannot sleep. At the least sound he starts, and his flesh creeps with horror. He is impatient for the dawning of the morning. At the first streak of the daylight Darius hastens forth to see the fate of Daniel. The heavy palace doors open and clang shut long before the people of the city waken. Darius goes to the den of the lions; he looks in. All is silent. His heart stops. He feels that the very worst has happened; but gathering all his strength, he shouts through the rifts of the rock, "O Daniel! is thy God whom thou servest continually able to deliver thee?" There comes rolling up from a voice which says: "O king! live forever. My God has sent his angel to shut the lions' mouths that they have not hurt me." Then Daniel is brought out from the den. The demagogues are hurled into it, and no sooner have they struck the bottom of the den than their flesh was rent, and their bones cracked, and their blood spurted through the rifts of the rock, and, as the lions make the rocks tremble with their roar, they announce to all ages that while God will defend his people, the way of the ungodly shall perish.

Learn first from this subject that the greatest crime that you commit in the eyes of many is the crime of success. What had Daniel done that he should be flung to the lions? He had become Prime Minister. They could not forgive him for that, and behold in that a touch of unsanctified human nature as seen in all ages of the world. So long as you are pinched in poverty, so long as you are running the gauntlet between landlord and tax-gatherer, so long as you find it hard work to educate your children, there are people who will say: "Poor man, I am sorry for him; he ought to succeed, poor man." But after a while the tide turns in your favor. That was a profitable investment you made. You bought just at the right time. Fortune becomes good humored and smiles upon you. Now you are in some department successful, and your

Success Chills Some One

Those men who used to sympathize with you stand along the street, and they scowl at you from under the rim of their hats. You have more money or more influence than they have, and you ought to be scowled at from under the rim of their hats. You catch a word or two as you pass by them. "Stuck up," says one; "Got it dishonestly," says another; "Will burst soon," says a third. Every stone in your new house is laid on their hearts. Your horses' hoofs went over their nerves. Every item of your success has been to them an item of discomfiture and despair. Just as soon as in any respect you rise above your fellows if you are more virtuous, if you are more wise, if you are more influential, you cast a shadow on the prospect of others. The road to honor and success is within reach of the enemy's guns. Jealousy says: "Stay down or I'll knock you down." "I do not like you," says the snowflake to the snowbird. "Why don't you like me?" said the snowbird. "Oh," said the snowflake, "you are going up and I am coming down." Young merchants, young lawyers, young doctors, young mechanics, young artists, young farmers, at certain times there are those to sympathize with you, but now that you are becoming a master of your particular occupation or profession, how is it now, young lawyers, young doctors, young artists, young farmers—how is it now? The greatest crime that you can commit is the crime of success.

Again, my subject impresses me with the value of

in any career. Daniel knew that if he continued his adherence to the religion of the Lord he would be hurled to the lions, but having set his compass well, he sailed right on. For the lack of that element of decision of character, so eminent in Daniel, many men are ruined for this world, and ruined for the world to come. A great many at forty years of age are not settled in any respect, because they have not been able to make up their minds. Perhaps they will go West; perhaps they will go East; perhaps they will not; perhaps they will go North; perhaps they may go South; perhaps they will not; perhaps they may make that investment in real estate or in railroads; perhaps they will not. They are like a steamer that should go out of New York harbor, starting for Glasgow, and the next day should change for Havre de Grace, and the next for Charleston, and the next for Boston, and the next for Liverpool. These men on the sea of life everlastingly tacking ship and making no headway. Or they are like a man who starts to build a house in the Corinthian style and changes it to Doric, and then completes it in the Ionic, the curse of all styles of architecture. Young man, start right and keep on. Have decision of character. Character is like the goldfinch of Tonquin; it is magnificent while standing firm, but loses all its beauty in flight. How much decision of character in order that these young men may be Christians! Their old associates make sarcastic flings at them. They go on excursions, and they do not invite them. They prophesy that he will give out. They wonder if he is not getting wings. As he passes, they grimace, and wink, and chuckle, and say, "There goes a saint." O, young man! have decision of character. You can afford in this matter of religion to be laughed at. What do you care for the scoffs of these men, who are affronted because you will not go to ruin with them? When the grave cracks open under their feet, and grim messengers push them into it, and eternity comes down hard upon their spirit, and conscience stings, and hopeless ruin lifts them up to hurl them down, will they laugh then?

I learn also from my subject that men may take religion into their worldly business. This is a most appropriate thought at this season of the year, when so many men are starting out in new enterprises. Daniel had enough work to do to occupy six men. All the affairs of state were in his hands; questions of finance, questions of war, of peace; all international questions were for his settlement or adjustment. He must have had a correspondence vast beyond all computation. There was not a man in all the earth who had more to do than Daniel, the Secretary of State, and yet we find him three times a day bowing before God in prayer. There are men in our day who have not a hundredth part of Daniel's engagements, who say they are

Too Busy to be Religious

They have an idea somehow that religion will spoil their worldly occupation, that it will trip the accountant's pen, or dull the carpenter's saw, or confuse the lawyer's brief, or disarrange the merchant's store shelf. They think religion is impertinent. They would like to have it very well seated beside them in church on the Sabbath, to find the place in the Psalm book, or to nudge them awake when they get sleepy under the didactic discourse; or they would like to leave it in the pew on Sabbath evening, as they go out, closing the door, saying, "Good-night, religion; I'll be back next Sunday!" But to have religion go right along by them all through life, to have religion looking over their shoulder when they are making a bargain, to have religion take up a bag of dishonest gold and shake it, and say, "Where did you get that?" They think that is an impertinent religion. They would like to have a religion to help them when they are sick, and when the shadow of death comes over them, they would like to have religion as a sort of night-key with which to open the door of heaven; but religion under other circumstances they take to be impertinence.

Now, my friends, religion never robbed a man of a dollar. Other things being equal, a mason will build a better wall, a cabinet-maker will make a better chair, a plumber will make a better pipe, a lawyer will make a better plea, a merchant will sell a better bill of goods. I say, other things being equal. Of course when religion gives a man a new heart, it does not propose to give him a new head, or to intellectualize him, or to change a man's condition when his ordinary state is an overthrow of the philosophical theory that a total vacuum is impossible; but the more letters you have to write, the more burdens you have to carry, the more miles you have to travel, the more burdens you have to lift, the more engagements you have to meet, the more disputes you have to settle, the more opportunity you have of being a Christian. If you have a thousand irons in the fire, you have a thousand more

Opportunities of Serving

God than if you only had one iron in the fire. Who so busy as Christ? And yet who a millionth part as holy? The busiest men the best men. All the persons converted in Scripture busy at the time of their being converted. Matthew attending to his custom-house duties; the Prodigal Son feeding swine; Lydia selling purple; Simon Peter hauling in the net from the sea; Saul spurring his horse toward Damascus, going down on his law business. Busy! busy! Daniel with all the affairs of state weighing down upon his soul, and yet three times a day worshiping the God of heaven.

Again, I learn from this subject that a man may take religion into his politics. Daniel had all the affairs of state on hand, yet a servant of God. He could not have kept his elevated position unless he had been a thorough politician; and yet all the thrusts of officials and all the danger of disgrace did not make him yield one iota of his high-toned religious principle. He stood before that age, he stands before all ages, a specimen of a godly politician. So there have been in our day and in the days of our fathers men as eminent in the service of God as they have been eminent in the service of the state. Such was Benjamin F. Butler, Attorney-General of New York in the time of your fathers. Such was John McLean, of the Supreme Court of the United States. Such was George Briggs, of Massachusetts. Such was Theodore Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey—men faithful to the state at the same time faithful to God. It is absurd to expect that men who have been immersed in political wickedness for thirty or forty years shall come to reformation; and men who are coming forward, that they have patriotic principle and Christian principle side by side when they come to the ballot-box and cast their first vote, and that they swear allegiance to the government of heaven as well as to the government of the United States. We would have Bunker Hill mean less to them than Calvary, and Lexington mean less to them than Bethlehem. But because there are bad men around the ballot box is no reason why Christian men should retreat from the arena. The last time you ought to give up your child or forsake your child is when it is surrounded by a company of Choctaws; and the last time to surrender the ballot-box is when it is surrounded by impurity and dishonesty and all sorts of wickedness.

Daniel stood on a most unpopular platform. He stood firmly, though the demagogues of the day hissed at him and tried to overthrow him. We must carry our religion into our politics. But there are a great many men who are in favor of taking religion into national politics who do not see the importance of taking it into city politics; as though a man were intelligent about the welfare of his neighborhood, and had no concern about his own home.

My subject also impresses me with the fact that lions cannot hurt a good man. No man ever got into worse company than Daniel got into when he was thrown into the den. What a rare morsel that fair young man would have been for the hungry monsters! If they had plunged at him he could not have climbed into a niche beyond the reach of their paw or the snatch of their tooth. They came pleased all around about him, as hunters' hounds at the well-known whistle come bounding to his feet. You need not go to Numidia to get many lions. You all have had them after you—the lion of financial distress, the lion of sickness. You saw that lion of financial panic putting his mouth down to the earth, and he roared until all the banks and all the insurance companies quaked. With his nostril he scattered the ashes on the domestic hearth. You have had trial after trial, misfortune after misfortune, lion after lion; and yet they have never hurt you if you put your trust in God, and they never will hurt you. They did not hurt Daniel, and they cannot hurt you. The Persians used to think that spring rain falling into seashells would turn into pearls; and I have to tell you that the tears of sorrow turn into precious gems when they drop into God's bottle. You need be afraid of nothing, putting your trust in God. Even death, that monster lion whose den is the world's sepulchre, and who puts his paw down amid thousands of millions of the dead, cannot affright you. When in olden times a man was to get the honors of knighthood, he was compelled to go fully armed the night before, among the tombs of the dead, carrying a sort of spear, and then when the day broke he would come forth, and, amid the sound of cornet and great parade, he would get the honors of knighthood. And so it will be with the Christian in the night before heaven, as fully armed with spear and helmet of salvation, he will wait and watch through the darkness until the morning dawns, and then he will take the honors of heaven amid that great throng with snowy robes, streaming over seas of sapphire.

REPRESENTATIVES OF AUXILIARY BIBLE SOCIETIES ASSEMBLED RECENTLY AT THE BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

TO PROMOTE BIBLE DISTRIBUTION

Representatives of Auxiliary Bible Societies from Many Sections in Conference in New York

AN important meeting of eminent men representing the Bible societies of the country was held recently in the Bible House in New York. Feeling certain that our readers would be glad to see so notable a group of rkers, we have secured a photograph them, which is here reproduced.

The object of the meeting was to dis- ss methods for increased efficiency and more thorough dissemination of the ible in city and country. It is perhaps t generally known that there are over xteen hundred Bible societies in our nd, each affiliated to the parent American Bible Society. These auxiliary societies have control over certain districts respectively, both in the collection of funds and the work of distribution. Valuable as is the work done by the parent society, and important as is the local knowledge of the various auxiliaries, it had been urged that extension was still possible and that modern methods of conducting business might be applied with advantage to this magnificent enterprise. Some of the suggestions made were in the direction of increased centralization, bringing the whole country under the direct control of the parent society; while other suggestions tended to greater responsibility being vested in the auxiliaries. The conference was therefore called to obtain the consensus of opinion on the subject.

It appeared in the discussion that ensued that the auxiliaries were doing excellent work in their respective spheres. During the past year the number of families visited by their agents in districts where there was a probability of there being a destitution of Bibles numbered 49,074. It was found that of these the number of homes in which there was no copy of the Scriptures was 2,974. Of these, 2,557 had been supplied. Besides which 3,131 adults and 1,600 Sunday School children received copies. A decided feeling was expressed against the discontinuance of work so energetic, and several of the representatives urged, rather, an increased number of auxiliaries as the best means of dissemination. No change was therefore made in that direction, but an earnest effort was made to impress on the members that the parent society is by no means a wealthy corporation, but needs every dollar that can be obtained for the maintenance and extension of its work. Various methods of appealing to the givers of the nation were discussed, and inspiring addresses were made on the urgent necessity of promoting the circulation of the Bible at home and abroad.

THE GOSPEL AT A COUNTY FAIR

THE old-fashioned county fair is a thing of the past. The county fair of the present day is in many places a menace to the welfare of society. In days ne by, John Ploughman drove his stock the fair-grounds, put his biggest pumpns, potatoes, and tallest corn into Agriitural Hall. Mrs. Ploughman exhibited r "star" pattern patchwork and took e prize for her butter moulded into a ust of Geo. Washington.

The morals of the fairs have degenera- d, but there is all the greater need for ospel work, and the opportunity for meetg people who may be tempted is all the ore valuable. The Apostle Paul deared that he was willing to become all ings to all men, if by any means he ight save some. In visiting some of ese fairs it occurred to Mr. H. B. ibbud, of Springfield, Mass., that the postle's spirit might with advantage be pplied to these assemblies. The methods y which the various entertainers atacted a crowd could be used by the hristian worker, and gain for him the pportunity of addressing the people on e truths of the Gospel. An experiment roved that an audience could be gathered, hat a hearing would be granted and in he hope that the Holy Spirit would apply he word spoken to some heart, an earnest ospel address was given. Since that me he has visited many fairs and has ained by experience the art of interestng such audiences.

With a gospel-wagon, and two or three orkers, he takes his stand where the rowd is largest. What a babel of sounds! s there any chance for the Gospel here? isten! here is a fakir with lungs of eather, crying his wares in lusty tones; ext him is the "whip man" cracking his whips and making jokes to his audience. Here is the educated pig, there the snake-charmer, with the added attraction of some Hindu dancers. Add to all this the clang of the race-course bell, the cackle of the fowls, the cries of the fakirs and the general noise of the crowd, and you have something of an idea of the condition of things when the gospel-wagon arrives. Suddenly there rises above the din of the fair, a sound that has power to draw the crowds toward the gospel-wagon. One of the workers in the wagon is playing a little organ, while the others are making the Gospel song sound out to all parts of the ground. A large oil painting of "The Two Ways" is swung out from the top of the wagon.

After a crowd has gathered one of the workers displays some glittering medals which he announces will be given away at the close of the meeting as souvenirs. Each has on one side a pertinent question, such as "What must I do to be saved?" or "What shall I do with Jesus?" and on the other side are references to appropriate Scripture texts. He announces that these souvenirs are of personal importance to every one and urges each to get one and keep it. Then he explains the picture of "The Two Ways," with a pointed application, and there is another song on "My Mother's Bible," which never fails to touch some tender memory.

MR. GIBBUD'S GOSPEL SERVICE AT A COUNTY FAIR

The crowd grows, and one worker after another declares the way of salvation. It is not wise to tire such audiences, so after about half an hour there is another song and the meeting is over. Then the souvenirs are distributed and it is observed how carefully they are put in the pocket to be produced at home, and one may hope pondered in quieter times. Very often a distinct impression is made and there is little doubt that many are led by the plain Gospel talk to avoid the temptations of the fair.

Thousands of good tracts and religious reading matter have been thus distributed and the Gospel checks will be carried home, and carried for months in the pockets and shown to many. After a rest the workers begin another song service, and in ten minutes the crowd is as great as ever.

This year, after the work in the hopfield, some of the workers visited several fairs. Hundreds of Colportage books, many Scripture text cards and Gospel songs were sold. Immense crowds thronged the wagon. The fair authorities and all were well pleased with the work.

Next year it is hoped to greatly enlarge the work and to visit the principal fairs through New England and in New York State. It is a great opportunity of reaching the crowds with the Gospel, and it is hoped that Christian people everywhere will be encouraged by this experience to make the experiment in their own neighborhood when the fair is held.

Christian Work in Brazil

EVANGELICAL AND EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS. THE INQUISITION NOW A CHRISTIAN SCHOOL

IT is only within the last few years that Protestant evangelical and educational work has made substantial progress in Brazil. All such work has been strenuously opposed by the Catholic priesthood. The Archbishop recently called a congress to discuss means by which the youth of Brazil could be kept out of the Protestant faith. The congress ordered that schools be organized in every parish in opposition to the Protestant schools. But despite this opposition, missionaries report a gradually increasing school attendance. Altogether, Christian education in Brazil has never before given such great promise of success. Still, of the fifteen million inhabitants, thirteen millions can neither read nor write. The country, therefore, now offers wonderful opportunities to teachers as well as preachers. In St. Paulo, the Presbyterians have a school of nearly six hundred pupils, the largest in the country, where many now well-known Brazilian legislators and teachers received their education.

One of the most successful of the Protestant schools is that organized by the wife of the Rev. Z. C. Taylor, in Bahia, called the School Collegio Americano Egydio. A significant circumstance is that this school, in which Christianity is taught, is quartered in the old Inquisition building, which was formerly the scene of barbarous cruelty and injustice.

Regarding this school, Rev. Taylor, in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, says: "I bought the building ten years ago from the Archbishop, for $5,000, for our Baptist Mission. Here we have, besides the school, our church composed of two hundred members, and a press in the basement. The kindergarten occupies a front room, where the windows are full of plants. The building still contains many relics of old prison days, such as trap doors through which victims were let down, and massive doors with small openings, through which food was passed to prisoners.

"Mrs. Laura Barton Taylor, the director, teaches the new methods to the native teachers, and has her own classes in English. Mrs. Taylor was five years a missionary in North China. The kindergarten is in charge of Miss Alyne Goolsby. This is one of only about half a dozen kindergartens in Brazil.

"In the courtyard a tree now stands on the spot where a whipping-post for slaves stood for many years. Though a prolific species, the tree refuses to bear fruit, probably because of having absorbed quantities of human blood.

"The school, Collegio Americano Egydio, came into being in this manner: A rich coffee planter was converted. He had a large family and while a Catholic he never cared for the education of his children. In conversion, however, his heart yearned to give them all the advantages of a good schooling.

"He told me his wishes while I was a guest at his house, in a town 150 miles from Bahia. I told him that Mrs. Taylor was an experienced teacher and perhaps he could arrange with her to open a school. He said he would give all his property for the purpose in order that his children might receive proper mental and moral training. So he returned to Bahia with me, and when the proposition was made to Mrs. Taylor, she agreed to organize the school and provide teachers, if he would see to the financial part.

"He at once began raising the capital necessary for furniture and teachers' salaries. Four thousand dollars were subscribed. The best Boston school furniture and furnishing were ordered. Four of the large rooms in old Inquisition building were floored, ventilated and prepared for occupancy, so that when the time came for the opening ceremony, May 10, 1898, all was in readiness.

"In the meantime, while on a trip to his home, the coffee planter died suddenly, and the school fell upon our shoulders. At the inauguration ceremony appeared the State Secretary, the Superintendent of Instruction, several legislators and teachers, our United States Consul and other local celebrities. The local governor sent a band of twenty-five musicians.

"The success of the school has been phenomenal. From ten pupils on first day it grew rapidly to one hundred and thirty-six. Old methods of education still prevail in Brazil, but the new method then, as now, attracted all classes. The course includes thus far only the primary and collegiate. Four modern languages and Latin are taught, with gymnastics. Chapel service is held every morning, with singing, when the ethics of morality and Christian principles are set forth in the simplest way. The school is independent, but tuition so far has just about paid the teachers. The furniture has all been paid for by private subscription."

An Incident in the Chinese War

Further details of the massacre of the Chinese at Blagovechtchensk, concerning which our special correspondent, Mr. Frederick A. North, wrote a most interesting account in last week's issue, have now been received by cable. It seems that between 3,000 and 4,000 Chinese in the city, or nearby, were driven from their homes by the Cossacks, and warned that unless they were out of Russian territory within a set time, their lives would be forfeited. Then began a rush for the few boats on the river. Men, women and children struggled for places in the frail craft, and as each one put out, overloaded, refugees clung to the gunwales only to be beaten back by those on board. The boats soon filled and sank, and the shrieks of the drowning mingled with the cries of those left behind. The banks were still lined with Chinese. Rafts were hastily constructed, men fighting to the death for the boards and logs. The rafts then put out as overloaded as the boats had been, and many sank before the eyes of those on shore. To add to the horrors, the Chinese forts opened fire on the refugees, thinking they were Cossacks in disguise. "Even when, days later, we arrived at the city," says a correspondent, "we could count from a single point a hundred bodies in the water." For days before the massacre the Cossacks had been burning all the Chinese villages for miles up and down the river.

A New Idea at Northfield

Another conference has been added to the many for which Northfield, Mass., is already famous. On the 16th of October, about forty clergymen and Christian workers from Massachusetts, Vermont and New Hampshire met at that place, which has been the fountain-head of so many grand spiritual enterprises. The purpose of their meeting was to lay plans for a definite advance movement in Christian effort throughout New England. Invitations were issued by Rev. C. I. Scofield, D.D., President of the Northfield Bible Training School, and the meetings were held in that building. The design was to formulate some plan for an extended and thorough investigation of problems dealing with the religious life of New England, and thus furnish a basis for broad induction and practical treatment by an advance movement in Christian effort. The results of the meeting may be briefly summed up as follows:

The organization of a group for the study of the religious, social and economic aspects of the problem. Members of this central group will not only pursue their own individual investigation, but will endeavor to form subordinate groups in their immediate neighborhood, and any minister or Christian worker desiring to join in this study may receive a schedule upon application to Dr. Scofield, permanent chairman, East Northfield, Mass. The subjects to be investigated and tabulated cover a wide range, from church attendance to public libraries, amusements, temperance, etc. The ultimate aim is to use these results in such a way as to greatly stimulate the work of the churches and aid in bringing about a general revival of spiritual life and enthusiasm.

A Strange Experience

The following letter from a Mrs. A. A., of Patton Beach, Tex., tells the story of a remarkable experience:

TO THE EDITOR: I am a converted Jewess, a native of Holland. I was converted in Old Allen St. Church, New York. My people have all cast me off and said I was a hypocrite, so I asked the Lord to help me and that I never need anything from anybody. The Lord has been good to me. This peninsula has been known as a watering place. There was a depot, hotel, and a post-office. We have worked hard for twenty-two years and had a four-room two-story house. Everybody prophesied that if ever there came a storm this house would come down; but behold the mercies of God! The people on the day of the great storm came from two o'clock until dark, from the hotel and all the places around, to our house for protection. The house blew off of the blocks in the back part, but did not fall. We had provisions in the house enough to last 40 people two days. Surely his mercy endureth forever! It looked like destruction all around, but we saved several head of cattle and about fifty chickens.

The saddest of it all was that my only daughter and her five little children were lost; she lived six miles from us. I want you to pray for me, that I may say, with God's servant of old, "The Lord has given and the Lord has taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." For I know that the blessed Saviour will be with me to the end. I have felt his sustaining power and grace through this great affliction.

WAR ON IMPURE LITERATURE

by raising a fund before March 2, 190 and all who have the welfare of the childre and the protection of their moral purit at heart have been invited to contribut Special and urgent invitations to assist i the movement are extended to Y. M. C A's Christian Endeavor Societies, Epwort Leagues, Baptist Young People's Unions, an Sunday School pupils generally. It is sug gested that each contributor to the fun should give one cent for each year of th Society's active existence—30 cents for eac person. Parents can give in this proportio for themselves and also for their children who are the present beneficiaries of the nobl efforts constantly being put forth by th Society to save the young from the con taminating influence of impure literature.

During those thirty years of active duty on the moral "firing line," Mr. Comstock and his associates have had many remarkable experiences. Intimidated, assaulted with knife and fist, shot at, arrested, maligned, and in a thousand other ways obstructed in the performance of duty, they have not wavered, but pressed the warfare against vice and immorality. Since March 2, 1872, 2,450 arrests have been made by the Society, and more than 156,000 pounds (or 78 tons) of vile literature and contraband matter have been seized or destroyed. The disseminators of such things as destroy both the body and soul of the young have been traced, tried, convicted and placed behind prison bars.

The work of the Society has led it into schools and academies, in the effort to trace the circulators and the source of bad books. A letter by mail sent to a minister's daughter, a student in one of the New York State Normal schools, led the Society's officers to an academy of over 140 boys, among whom they discovered and arrested the sender. Following up the case, they arrested a man at Hurleyville, N. Y., and seized over 12,000 books, pictures and circulars in his possession. The same afternoon, a mail contractor was arrested and about the same quantity of books and prints found in his home. Shortly afterward, two men were arrested at Lancaster, Pa., with 16,000 contraband books and over 3,000 pictures in their possession. These are only a few of hundreds of such cases, typical of the energy, fidelity, and work of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice.

Contributions to the proposed fund may be sent to Kiliaen Van Rennselaer, Treasurer of the Society, 41 Park Row, New York City.

COMMANDER BOOTH-TUCKER AND PARTY VISITING A COLONY

Salvation Army Farm Colonies

COMMANDER BOOTH-TUCKER TELLS ABOUT THEIR GREAT SUCCESS IN THREE WESTERN STATES . . . .

THE farm colonies of the Salvation Army have recently been attracting considerable notice from those who are interested in the welfare of our city poor. The object of these colonies is to ke the surplus population of our great entres, and place them in homes of their vn upon the land.

The principal colony is situated in Colado, where some two thousand acres rich alluvial land have been purased and one hundred and fifty men, omen and children have already been ttled. Nearly every colonist is a mared man with a family, some with very rge families. Indeed, this has been the ntral pivot of the enterprise. Domicide, the destruction of the family and the me, is one of the worst signs of modn civilization. "I have three brothers," id one of our Bowery boys, adding, ith the mother-wit which often characrizes this class, "but only one is living; ne other two are married."

The keenest anguish of a city life is at which centres around a starving mily. The single man or woman is not be so much pitied. It is much easier r such to gain a living. Even if they ll, they fall alone. It is far otherwise ith a family. Here the finger-prints of overty leave their blackest mark, and the ffering is the most appalling, because ne victims consist so largely of weak omen and innocent children, and of ist the class who are most eager to ork, if they only have the chance.

Our farm-colony plan is intended to ounteract this growing and ghastly evil. t says, in brief, "Place the waste labor pon the waste land by means of the aste capital, and thereby convert this inity of waste into a unity f production." It goes one better" than the mere living wage," or "work-or-everybody" idea, inasuch as it proposes to ecognize and maintain the mily unit, and to transorm each workless family nto a home-maker and a ome-owner, and this without imperiling the position f the "in-works." On the ontrary, the position of he latter will be vastly etter—first, by the reoval of the terrible inubus of taxation, and, econd, by the fact that the multitudes thus happily reoved will immediately require the produce of the in-works' labor, thereby increasing the home demand. That this is no mere day-dream is proved by the experience already gained on the three Salvation Army Colonies which have been established respectively in Colorado, California and Ohio.

Mr. Curtis, a correspondent, in giving the history of the enterprise, concludes with this paragraph:

"There is no neater group of houses in Colorado, and no more contented community in the world. Nearly every one has written to friends urging them to join the next colony that comes out; and those I talked with were enthusiastic over their success and the pleasures they enjoy. It was difficult for some of them to find words to express their emotion."

The accompanying photographs were taken during a recent visit to the colony. The stone cottage was erected by the colonist who owns it, the stone being taken from an adjacent quarry. The group of colonists represents the heads of families. The school-house is used as a place for public worship; and on Sundays the scene is an exceedingly animated one, as the rigs and wagons bring the families and neighboring farmers to the service; whilst scores of cow-boys may be seen careering across the prairie upon their bronchos. A brass and string band help to lend attractiveness to the meetings.

At a recent agricultural fair which was held in a neighboring town, the colonists carried off nearly fifty first and second prizes. Owing to their influence, it was agreed by the fair committee that liquor should not be sold on this occasion.

A home for orphan children, and a sanitarium for working people are now in course of erection upon this colony grounds. The railroad company has inserted a switch, and is about to erect a depot there.

It might be mentioned that a special exhibit of these Salvation Army colonies and other social institutions was sent to the Paris Exposition, and was awarded a gold medal. Indeed, there can be little doubt that in the near future the colonization of our city poor will become one of the most important and successful philanthropies in the country.

LESSONS FROM NATURE

AS we read the Book of Nature,
Scanning close its pages all,
There's a sermon in each volume—
Summer, Winter, Spring and Fall.

Budding Spring revealeth ever
Nature's resurrection power;
While her blooming branches whisper
Of fair childhood's happy dower.

Summer comes and scatters roses
All along the path of strife,
Where the youthful feet are treading
On the battle-field of life.

In the fragrance of her blossoms
Floating on the stilly air,
Thorn-pricked fingers are forgotten;
Hearts set free from brooding care.

Till the fading leaves of Autumn,
Touched by Winter's chilling breath,
Gently teach to weary toilers—
Nature seeks her rest—not death.

And while barren trees and gardens
Fill the heart with nameless pain,
There is still sweet consolation
In the stores of ripened grain.

Calmly then they wait the Frost-King,
Clad in pearly white array;
Sweet the message that he bringeth
To the aged, bowed and gray.

Ploughshares rough and sickles heavy
Their tired hands have now laid by:
And they wait the angel-reapers,
Harvest-gathering for the sky.

Thus we glean from Nature's pages,
Much of joy as well as grief;
For the light of Heaven's Springtime
Lies beyond the "fallen leaf".

SAVED IN A PRISON CELL

CHAPLAIN MUNRO, of the Gospel Mission to the Tombs Prison, relates the following remarkable experience:

"In the early summer of 1899, about a year and a half ago, I received a brief note from a Christian gentleman in New York City, asking me to go at once and visit a man who had just been committed to prison on a very serious charge. That afternoon I sought him out, and had a long and pleasing interview in his cell. At first he was indifferent to spiritual appeals. Then he frankly related to me, step by step, the details of his ruined life. More than once his face burned with shame, as he covered it with his hands, while he told of his ruined and disgraced home and his broken-hearted wife. It was the story of a life blasted by sin. He had been in business for several years, but by drink, gambling and speculation had lost his property, and even his wife's fortune went the same way. He was now an outcast in a felon's cell. I prayed with him and urged him to make a complete surrender of himself to God. At last he prayed for himself. His petitions were full of broken sobs and penitent utterances, as he called on God for deliverance from the bondage of sin. He had come to himself, like the prodigal in the far country. All that night he wept over his blighted life. For several weeks his wife had been on the verge of collapse, from grief caused by his shame. After a few days, he sent her a note saying that he had given his heart to Christ. This news gave her unbounded joy, as she had been praying for his conversion for many years. From that day her recovery from nervous prostration was assured. During the remainder of his time in jail he gave evidence that a great change had taken place in his life. He even thanked God that he had been brought to prison, because there he had found a Saviour. After a time he was discharged, and returned to his home. For more than a year I heard nothing from him. He was engrossed in the whirl of city life. A few weeks ago, as I entered a noon-day prayer-meeting in the lower part of the city, I met the gentleman who had first called my attention to the prisoner. He told me that he had been watching over him since he left prison more than a year ago, and that he knew him to be living a devout Christian life ever since. He is now a member of the church, a teacher in the Sunday School, and his pastor's right-hand man in every good work. Then I remembered the words of the Psalmist, 'He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall come again rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.'"

Preaching to the prisoners is carried on by the Gospel Mission to the Tombs. Contributions to the work will be thankfully received by the Treasurer, George E. Sterry, 79 Pine street, New York City.

A Famous Anniversary

The old John Street Church in New York city, the oldest Methodist church in America, celebrated its hundred and thirty-second anniversary on Sunday, October 28. A love-feast opened the day's proceeding. Prof. M. D. Buell, of Boston University, preached the forenoon sermon, and Rev. C. E. Harris, D. D., the regular pastor, presided at the afternoon meeting. In the evening several pastors delivered suitable addresses.

MISTAKEN NOTIONS

SOME of our young people have read till they are crazed of learned blacksmiths who, at the forge, conquered thirty languages, and of shoemakers who, pounding sole-leather, got to be philosophers; and milliners who, while their customers were at the glass trying on their spring hats, wrote a volume of first-rate poems. The fact is, no blacksmith ought to be troubled with more than five languages; and instead of shoemakers becoming philosophers, we would like to turn our surplus of philosophers into shoemakers; and the supply of poetry is so much greater than the demand that we wish milliners would stick to their business. Extraordinary examples of work and endurance may do as much harm as good. Because Napoleon slept only three hours a night, hundreds of students have tried the experiment; but instead of Austerlitz and Jena, there came of it only a sick headache and a botch of recitation. We are told of how many books a man can read in the five spare minutes before breakfast and the ten minutes at noon, but I wish some one could tell us how much rest a man can get in fifteen minutes after dinner, or how much health in an hour's horseback ride, or how much fun in a Saturday afternoon of cricket. He who has such an idea of the value of time that he takes none of it for rest wastes all his time.

THE HARVEST FIELD

THE field is white to the harvest. Men with the sickles, come on and lay to the work! In this age of the world, with so many Gospel advantages, and so many grand incentives to work, a dead Church ought to be indicted as a nuisance. Invention and discovery have quickened the world's pace. The age, no more a-foot, is on wheels and wings. Quiet villages have been roused up by the hum of machinery, the clang of foundries, and the shriek of steam-whistles. We rise, after a short night's sleep and find that the world has advanced mighty leagues. The pulse of the world beats stronger, the arm of industrious achievement strikes harder, the eye of human ingenuity sees farther, the heart of Christian philanthrophy throbs warmer. In such a time, a torpid, lethargic, timid Church is both a farce and a blasphemy. If it do not march when God commands it to march; if it do not strike when God commands it to strike; if, when the mountains round about are full of horses and chariots of fire, it shrinks back from the conflict, God will mark it for ruin, and Christians will become inconsistent, and the minister will sleep in the pulpit, and the choir will quarrel in the gallery, and the shingles will rot, and sinners will perish, and the cause of God will be dishonored. One enterprising Church! How many tracts it might scatter! How many hungry mouths it might feed! How many poor churches it might help! How many lights it might kindle!

THE BACKSLIDERS

HERE is a man who started for heaven a year ago. He had been given to dissipation; he has looked back. You are drinking too hard. I believe a moderate drinker may get into heaven, but a hard drinker, never! "No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God." The snake catches the eye of the bird on the limb; it begins to tremble, and soon slips from the tree-branch, and begins to fly down toward the serpent, and soon it is caught in the terrible folds and is gone. The wine-cup has been your fascination. You have by it been brought down from the circles in which you once moved, and come down nearer and nearer to the day of your destruction, and after awhile you will be caught in the coils of that which "biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." O, man, give up drinking, or give up heaven! There is your choice. A man stood on the scaffold about to be executed, and the sheriff, pulling out his watch, said: "You have five minutes to say what you have to say." The dying man said: "Rum ruined me. I had a little brother. I loved him very much. He was a bright-eyed lad. I came home one day intoxicated. My little brother was picking berries in the garden, and for some reason I got mad at him, and I took up an iron rake, and with one stroke I killed him. Now I am to die for it; and you ask me what I have to say. It is this: never, never, never touch anything that can intoxicate." Alas, if you start for heaven and look back to your early dissipations!

IN THE RIGHT PLACE

HOW may we know if we are in our right place—not an inch above, not an inch below? If you can perform your work easily, without being cramped or exhausted, that is the right place. That man is in a horrible condition who is ever making prodigious effort to do more than he can do. It is just as easy for a star to swim in its orbit as for a mote to float in a sunbeam. Nature never sweats. The great law of gravitation holds the universe on its back as easily as a miller swings over his shoulder a bag of Genesee wheat. The winds never run themselves out of breath. The rivers do not weary in their course. The Mississippi and the Amazon are no more tired than the meadow brook. Himalaya is not dizzy.

WOMAN'S SPHERE

IF there be a family of four, five, or six children, after the mother has trained them for God and heaven, provided for their wants, cultured them, corrected their evil habits, and looked after their manners and morals, she will not have much time for anything else, and, in most cases, no time at all left for outside fields of work. Mark, then, the fact that home is to many the chief sphere, to many the only sphere, of usefulness. I consider it the curse of this day that so many mothers have resigned the responsibilities of the household through the week-day, turning their children over to the day-school, and, on the Sabbath, to the Sabbath School, and in all the evenings of the week giving over their children to hired servants. The day-school has its work; the Sabbath School has its work; hired servants have their work; but they can never take the place of the mother. It is the finest sphere imaginable.

The Way of Moderation

"THE WAY OF MODERATION" said the Greek sages, "is the way of the gods." It is certainly to human beings the way of happiness. For excess of all kinds dwells next door to ruin, and to death. Yet our fast-living age is always finding out new ways for extravagance. In home decoration and in dress it has been called aestheticism—a word that implies everything of the richest and the most expensive character. Under its cover, multitudes have launched out into reckless expenditure, shutting their eyes to the ruin that was an inevitable result. Yet to keep out of debt is the first essential to health, happiness, and to good work; and no sacrifice that will help us to make both ends meet must be grudged; nay, this is not enough, we must live within the rim of our dollar—that is, spend a little less than we make.

Now, many men, and most women, have occasional fits of economy; but such intermitting acts of retrenchment do no good; in fact they are often followed by some atoning piece of outrageous extravagance. If a household is to be conducted on economical principles, it is best that women should have the control of it; for she has a passion for small economies that men hardly ever counterpart. For household economies require a kind of courage men do not possess. They cannot look a butcher or a grocer in the face and fight him for a ten cent overcharge; but that is a thing a woman will do at a moment's notice. She will not tolerate a small imposition. She may have little sense in great political affairs, but in her household expense she is not to be cheated. And this, not so much for the money involved, as because it is a battle planned on her own scale of combat, and she is determined not to lose it.

It is but fair to say that generally when a woman brings her husband into financial difficulties by her extravagance, it is the fault of both. If men do not tell their wives how much money they have, and what demands there are on it, they can hardly expect them to know by instinct what amount of money they may lawfully spend. A wife may know to a cent what her bills amount to, but if her husband has not plainly told her what they ought to amount to, she is excusable for transgressing an unknown boundary. He might have had a watchful partner, but he has made for himself a wasteful subordinate. Why? Because he has been too timid to say a few words that he thought might be disagreeable; or too proud to confess any sense of poverty; or too set up with his own ideas of marital authority to share its cares and responsibilities. The result is a constant deterioration in moral character and in domestic happiness, by intermittent attempts at economy, which always fail for want of his wife's sympathy and co-operation. The final result may be easily anticipated, and is rarely, if ever, avoided.

Americans are the most extravagant people on earth. Defoe said the same of their English ancestors, two hundred years ago; and it is a fact that an American family can hardly scramble through life on an income which would enable a Dutchman to make himself rich. Of course, much of this extravagant disposition may be laid to inherited tendency. Americans come from an extravagant race, and they spend lavishly because, as Dr. Watts puts it, "'tis their nature to."

But the superabundance of a new land has now given place, in a great measure, to the limitations of advanced civilization, and extravagance is becoming more and more a national and an individual sin. It is to be combatted, first, by getting rid of our helpless sluggishness in the care of very small sums. Secondly, by having the courage to live according to our own means, and not according to our neighbor's means. We may call bei extravagant because others are so, "t tyranny of society," but it is really a slavi moral nature that won't take the trouble do what it knows to be just and right. Nir tenths of the things we do because it is t custom to do them, would have nothing say for themselves in a court of justice reason. Then why should we make o homes model schools for throwing mon away for very inadequate results, just becau the people we happen to know are fooli enough to do so? It is a snobbish as well an indolent complaisance.

How much nobler to plan a rational, ho est mode of life, consistent with our ov means, and then break the chains of custo and carry out our resolves in spite of wh any one may say. It is true that soci chains are riveted with terrible strengt and that most of us would find it morally a socially easier to make money than to save Still, if thrift be an excellence, it is a prac cal virtue, or it is no virtue at all. There however, no doubt of the virtue of thrift. is one of the most arduous methods of se control, and a really lofty moral exercise. lies midway between parsimony and extrav gance, and is "the golden mean" of domest expenditure.

What is thrift in domestic expenditure Thrift is to spend money so that not a penn of it is wasted. God is treasurer to such wise spender. There are people who do n squander their money, who yet never hav any to spare; never know how it has gon never have anything to show for it. Suc people are unthrifty, and they might as we be extravagant. Every man or woman wh is not a prodigal wants to know how muc they spend; but thrifty people want also t know what they have spent their money fo Hence, they go into details and put dow every day's item of expenditure, an infallabl rule for the cultivation of this most valuabl virtue and help to domestic happiness.

There is also a moral value in writing dow all the items of our personal expenses. If w dare to write down every cent we spend will throw a searching light into our secre characters. No grander moral condition tha solvency! It is a virtue worthy of all ou efforts to keep intact; for they who know ho to spare and how to abound have a grea knowledge. Let us take into account "all th virtues with which money is mixed up—hon esty, justice, generosity, charity, frugality forethought, self-sacrifice; and we shall se that it is a knowledge which goes near t cover the length and breadth of humanity and that a right measure in getting, saving spending, giving, taking, lending, borrowin and bequeathing would almost argue a per fect man."

What One Soldier Did

From Isabella, Philippine Islands, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a lette written by a soldier in the American army which tells of the result of one man's earnes effort to win souls to Christ. The writer says

"I am a CHRISTIAN HERALD reader and a church member, a soldier for Christ as wel as for my country. With one company o marines, I am stationed at Isabella. I saw the door open for Christ's work in the fac that this post is almost isolated and no re ligious work was done until three other work ers and myself opened a prayer-meeting and reading-room. We are handicapped in not having sacred song books, Testaments, and good literature. I hope it will be in the power of your readers to render us assistance in this line. Isabella is on the Island of Basalan, one of the Sulu archipelago group, and was at one time a Spanish coaling station. It is now used for the same purpose by our own government. Besides the native Filipinos, there are a few Spaniards and Chinese merchants in the town. The interior is very mountainous and is inhabited by the Mooro tribe, who are Mohammedans. Their leader is known as the Datto, and their garments are scant and of many colors."

The Anglo-German Alliance

MORE far-reaching in its probable consequences than any event of the past few weeks is the formal agreement made between Germany and England on the Chinese question. It pledges the two powers to exert their united influence to maintain the integrity of the Chinese Empire and freedom of trade for all the powers without distinction in all ports and waterways in China. Both powers pledge themselves also to refrain from taking advantages of present complications to acquire territory, and announce that in the event of any other power doing so they "reserve to themselves the right to come to a preliminary understanding regarding the eventual step to be taken for the protection of their own interests in China." The publication of this agreement has taken Europe by surprise. Its contents are not startling, as it was generally understood that both Germany and England stood for the open door, and that neither was looking for acquisitions of territory; but the fact of the agreement being made and the formal notification of it to other Governments is very significant. It is practically a notice to all whom it may concern, that in the Chinese difficulty, at least, Great Britain and Germany are allied, and will act together. That information may be useful to Russia, who is suspected of having instigated the recent outbreak, and to France, who has in foreign affairs become a tool of Russia. If those powers are contemplating a policy of aggression, they are now aware that England and Germany are no longer two isolated governments with separate policies, who individually might hesitate to resist them, but allies whose united strength it would not be wise to defy. It may be, too, that in view of the European situation, Great Britain and Germany have not limited their agreement to the Chinese question. Or if such agreement has not yet been reached, a precedent has been established which, if it works well in China, may be extended so as to apply to European complications. Of late years the voice of Russia in the councils of Europe has exercised a potent influence because it was known that France would actively support any project in which Russia was interested. It may be that Germany's new Chancellor, Count Von Bulow, and England's Prime Minister, the Marquis of Salisbury have realized the fact and have concluded that they can promote the peaceable and righteous adjustment of pending difficulties by pledging to one another mutual support and cooperation.

If one prevail against him that is alone, two shall withstand him (Eccles. 4 : 12).

THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY COUNT VON BULOW

A Treasure-Ship Disabled

A steamer arrived a few days ago at Seattle, Wash., from Nome, having on board a large number of passengers from the gold fields and nearly half a million dollars in gold dust. The voyage had been one of difficulty and danger. It had occupied seventeen days. Two days after starting, the boilers sprang a leak which became so serious as to stop the engines. For three days the vessel lay like a log in the sea, drifting helplessly at the mercy of the waves. The food on board had been provided on the basis of a normal voyage, so that when the delay occurred there was not sufficient to last until port was reached. The crew and passengers were accordingly put on short rations, and for about five days were insufficiently fed. Happily there was among the passengers an expert boiler-maker, who succeeded in repairing the boilers. The passengers say that but for his aid they might have perished if no steamer had appeared to tow the vessel into port. Though they had so much gold on board, it could not help them in the emergency. Their need was food and the skill of the artisan, which the gold could not purchase. Their experience may serve to remind them of other emergencies in which the money which is said "to answer all things" proves useless.

Riches profit not in the day of wrath, but righteousness delivereth from death (Prov. 11 : 4.)

The Value of a Tag

An association connected with labor interests, recently made an inquiry into certain business methods, which disclosed a curious situation. It appears that there is a distinct value in the name of certain firms of manufacturers. A lady went into a millinery store in New York to purchase a hat. The one she selected was a higher price than she wished to pay. After some bargaining, she was told that she might have the hat at a large reduction, if she was willing to have a different lining in it. She inquired what kind of lining would be put in instead of the one used, and to her surprise learned that it would be quite as useful and as costly as the one then in the hat. She therefore consented, and the change was made. The reason for the reduction was a mystery, until it was explained to her. The lining in the hat bore the name of a famous Parisian firm, while the lining substituted bore the name of the New York firm with whom she was dealing. The inference was natural that the firm wanted to obtain the lining to put in a hat of their own manufacture. Such a trick would exasperate the Paris firm if they knew of it, because the value of their trade mark depends on its never being found on an inferior article. It is that principle which makes the misconduct of Christians so heinous. The world expects more of those who bear the name of Christ.

Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity (II. Timothy 2 : 9).

The Cost of Freedom

A singular action has been entered in the Supreme Court. It has been brought by the widow and relatives of a man once well-known in New York City who all wish to set aside his will. The motives of the litigants, however, are not all of the same character. The will gives to the widow real estate, carriages, horses and other effects and an annuity, the whole aggregating one hundred and eighty thousand dollars. The remainder of the estate is divided among certain charitable institutions in New York. There are about a dozen nephews and other relatives, to none of whom is anything left. They are suing for a share in the estate. The widow is suing to break the will and to have instead of the share left to her a dower right which would amount to one hundred thousand dollars. It is so seldom that a suitor seeks a smaller share than is left by will, that some curiosity was felt about the widow's motive in this instance. It has now been found that the annuity which constituted the chief part of her deceased husband's bequest was made conditional on her not marrying again. It is evident therefore that she considers her freedom to marry, which she would secure by acquiring her dower rights instead of the bequest, as worth the difference in amount which is eighty thousand dollars. Perhaps she has already met some one with whom a union seems so desirable that it is well purchased at so large a sacrifice. There are many who love Christ so well that rather than be separated from him they would lose the whole world.

I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; for whom I have suffered the loss of all things that I may win Christ (Phil. 3 : 8).

The Approach of a Planet

Astronomers, the world over, are being requested to prepare for an interesting event which will occur about the middle of November. This is the nearest approach of the little planet Eros to the earth. It is only once in thirty years that it comes so close to us. It will then be nearer to the earth than any celestial body except the moon. Its orbit is placed between Mars and Jupiter, but from some cause at which astronomers can only guess, its orbit has been so enormously elongated as at certain parts to intersect that of the earth. It takes the planet twenty-one months to make its journey around the sun, so that it crosses the path of our earth at least once in every two years, but it so happens that the earth is at a different part of her orbit at the time, and only once in thirty years are the two so near together. Eros is one of the smallest of the celestial bodies, being only twenty miles in diameter. It is believed to belong to the great family of the asteroids, which travel between Mars and Jupiter. They are nearly five hundred in number and are believed to be fragments of a great world, which at some period has been shattered to pieces. The number of fragments show how great a planet it must have been before its disruption and how mighty must have been the force which shattered it. It is evidently no poetic symbolism but actual fact that the Scriptures use in giving assurance of the safety of those who trust in God:

Once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven, and this word signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, while we receive a kingdom which cannot be moved (Heb. 12 : 26-28).

An Involuntary Aeronaut

There was considerable anxiety and alarm at a fair held recently at San Jose, Cal., by an accident which threatened serious consequences. One of the attractions provided by the managers was a balloon ascent. The balloon was filled, the aeronaut took his seat, and the word was given to cast off. As the air-ship slowly rose, the spectators were horrified to see that a man, who had been standing near, had been entangled in the ropes and was being carried upward. A great cry was raised, but the balloon had risen nearly a thousand feet before the attention of the aeronaut was drawn to his involuntary fellow-passenger. Looking over the edge of the basket, he saw the man clinging to the rope, and every minute increasing his danger. It was a vexatious thing to spoil his own ascent, but with a human life in peril there was no option. He opened the valve, which released the gas, and the balloon slowly descended. As it reached the earth and the suspended man was once more on firm ground, his nervous strain overcame him and he fainted. It is no wonder that he was overcome by the sense of the danger he had escaped. If he attends such affairs in future, he will doubtless take care to keep clear of the ropes. It will be well, also, if he is on his guard against moral danger, which is worse. There are associations which are capable of dragging him down to a fate compared with which the peril of his involuntary ascent was small.

A companion of fools shall be destroyed (Prov. 13 : 20).

A GOD'S-EYE VIEW OF SIN AND SALVATION

THE TEN LEPERS CLEANSED.....

International Sunday School Lesson for November 18th: Luke 17: 11-19.

...By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT, Col. 3: 15: "Be ye thankful."

TEN HELP LESS HOME HOPE

There met him ten men that were lepers. No human help could avail for this kind of leprosy. And those who had it could have no wife or child to minister to them. And they had no hope of recovery. Leprosy is at once the product and the picture of sin. All through the Bible we are taught that even pride and envy and other respectable sins seem as loathsome to God as leprosy does to us. Miriam, prophetess and sister of priest and prophet though she was, became envious of her yet more honored brother, Moses, and God smote her with leprosy to show just how envy looks to him (Exod. 12: 11-16). A king became proud, and God caused the loathsome sin to come out in all its leprous hideousness (II. Chron., 26. See also II. Kings 15: 4, 5). Leprosy is a fitting type of sin because it permeates one's whole body, even the joints and marrow, causing weakness and deformity, as well as loathsomeness; and because it is also contagious. How sin changes every faculty, weakens the body, dulls the intellect, hardens the heart, paralyzes the will. See this in the gambler, the drunkard, the victim of impurity, and not less in the covetous, whose noblest instincts are dried up in his relentless pursuit of wealth. George William Curtis in Prue and I gives a parable of "Titbottom's Spectacles," which see every man as he is in mind; for example, the miser as a withered bank-note, and a woman without ideals as a broom. God sees many a proud sinner as a leper, corrupt and corrupting, needing the Great Physician to make his life truly noble.

A story comes from the Philippines that a soldier, having done some wrong to a Filipino merchant's family, the merchant, in revenge, when the soldier was drunk, inoculated him with the blood of a leper—a horrible revenge even for a leprous sin. Alas, there are many who are constantly inoculating others, by example and persuasion, with sins, not for revenge, but for revenue, a meaner motive. The liquor dealer knows that drink will injure body and soul, but he inoculates many a young man with a fatal appetite that he may enrich himself. The gambler knows the passion in which he trades will become a fiery fever in the veins of its victim, but he shrinks not to impart the fell disease. The seller of corrupt literature and the purveyor of vile plays know that their wares are charged with worse diseases than leprosy, but they boldly say, "We will do anything for money." There is one thing in God's sight worse than the leprosy of sin, and that is the double sin of the trafficker in leprosy, who, instead of seeking to be healed, trades in his disease. All of us have the leprosy of sin in God's sight, and are helpless, homeless, hopeless in soul, unless we have been healed by Christ, who passes through earth's Samaria and Galilee, as well as Jerusalem, seeking to heal the high and low alike. Under the clean outside even of the Pharisees he saw the leprosy of sin and warned them, even more urgently than the publicans, to come and be healed.

As they went they were cleansed. In another case Jesus healed a leper by a touch (Mark 1: 40-45). He had even healed some by a word: "I will; be thou clean." The ten of this lesson had doubtless heard of those cases and expected to be healed as quickly, but Jesus said, "Go, shew yourselves to the priests." As they could not legally appear before the priests until they had been cleansed, this was as good as a promise they would be healed some way before they got there. Strange they did not stop to solve the mystery. Strange they did not say, "We cannot go till we are cleansed." "You healed another by a touch; why not save us the same way?" "You cured another by a word; why not make healing as easy this time?" With great and exemplary faith they started off to obey, asking no questions. They seemed to have grasped the truth we so often forget, that "all God's biddings are enablings." And "as they went they were cleansed." Everything we need comes to us in the path of obedience. Naaman, the Syrian general, under whose beautiful uniform was the deadly leprosy, thought it absurd to suppose that washing in the muddy Jordan would heal him, a river so much less clear than his own Arbana and Pharpar, that still flow like liquid emerald through Damascus. But as he obeyed, dipping seven times, exactly as commanded by the prophet of God, his flesh came again as the flesh of a little child, symbol of his child-like obedience to commands he could not understand (II. Kings 5: 1-14). Full of similar instruction also for the hesitating sinner is the story of the four lepers at the gate of starving, besieged Samaria, who said, "Why sit we here until we die?" Seeking salvation they found a feast where they had anticipated great difficulties (II. Kings 7: 11). When the Israelites just emerging from Egypt were pursued, God said, "Go forward." There were mountains on each side and a mighty foe in the rear and the sea in front. How could they obey? But they marched forward as commanded, and "as they went" God cleared their way, rolling back the waves with his right arm of the east wind that they might pass safely through in the ocean bed. The women who went early to the sepulchre on that first Easter morn, said anxiously, "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?" But when they arrived angels had removed the difficulty. So the Bible is full of the lesson we are so slow to learn, that we need only to be sure we are in the path of obedience and then we may be also sure that God will clear our way. "As they went they were cleansed." As we obey God opens the way. Let us unquestioningly put our sin-sick souls in the hands of the Great Physician and do exactly as he bids us in absolute confidence. He will ask nothing that love and wisdom do not prompt, and require nothing that he will not give us strength to do.

Saved in the Path of Obedience

Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? One, a good Samaritan, seeing he was healed, turned back to thank Christ, but the other nine, who were Jews of better training went selfishly and ungratefully on their way. The International Lesson Committee in joining this lesson and Golden Text were mindful that this lesson would come up just before Thanksgiving, and they thus suggest that in recalling the blessings of the year we should give the very highest praise for the healing of the soul (Psa. 103). Even Christians are prone to give more grateful thought to the harvest, and the healing of the body and temporal prosperity, and for temporal benefits, as in this story of the ten lepers, not more than one in ten come to give thanks to Christ at the Thanksgiving service. "Where are the nine?" Many of them are at the football game. Not even one hour of the twenty-four set apart by a Christian nation for recognition of God's goodness will this ungrateful nine-tenths spare from selfish enjoyments. This is but one of many offerings of the devil's tithe. Only one-tenth of Gideon's army were unselfish enough to be led into battle. Let us not too much exalt majorities in church or state. To follow the majority may be, as in the case of the healed lepers, to go from Christ rather than to him. This lesson story is one of many cases where "One with God is a majority." It is also one of many cases where those of lowliest station have been most loyal to Christ.

A Lesson for Thanksgiving

A black cat held up the trolley-roads running through Fulton street, Brooklyn, for nearly an hour one evening. In some way the cat had made its way to the flat wooden guard-box that runs along under the elevated railroad tracks, just above the trolley wires. The cat did not mean to interfere with the passage of the cars in any way. It first attracted attention by piteous cries of terror every time a trolley-car passed under it. The cries attracted the attention of people in the cars and on the sidewalk, and they protested against what seemed to be the torture of the cat. The repair wagon was finally summoned by telephone, and the cat rescued from her dangerous position amid the cheers of hundreds of people. It surely was a very insignificant thing that two hundred cars stood idle, and thousands of people waited at the busiest time of the day, to rescue a cat. There are parts of the earth where it would not have been done for a child, or a man, or a woman. Slowly but surely, the kindness of Jesus Christ is conquering the brute and the savage in the heart of mankind.

"Think and thank." How much more each one of us has to be thankful for than that healed Samaritan leper!

1. We are of better blood. Let us thank God for what we inherit from noble parents and ancestors.

2. We live in a better country. Our country has many sins to answer for but those who really desire to do right are surrounded with unprecedented institutions and opportunities.

3. We live in a better age. The Samaritan had no Bible but the Pentateuch. That is full of noble things but it was but the morning twilight beside which the Gospel is the noonday. Especially is ours a kindlier world, made so by the influence of such miracles as this of our lesson. The great inventions of our time are something to be thankful for if we think of them as instruments for doing good. How much more one man can do in this age of mails and trains and telegraphs! One man can send his words by the press to millions, stirring them to nobler impulses.

But all these extra privileges make our sin the greater if for these far greater blessings for body, mind and soul we offer no tribute of praise.

Some murmur when their sky is clear
And all things bright to view,
If one small speck of cloud appear
In this great heaven of blue.

And some with thankful love are filled
If but one spark of light,
One ray of God's great goodness gild
The darkness of their night.

It is to be feared that in the break up of homes, caused by modern methods of business, there are more tables where no thanks to the Lord of harvest is spoken or sung or even expressed in a silent bending of the head than in any country of the world, heathen or Christian. Nine out of ten of the Thanksgiving dinners in our land are eaten without a word or sign of thanksgiving. And the day passes in those same homes with no family gathering for prayer and praise. In the cities we have learned by several lines of enquiry that only one-tenth of even Christian homes have daily family worship. Shall we not by the wise use of this lesson on gratitude revive these fallen altars as a fitting celebration of a Thanksgiving which recalls not a year but a century, and so inaugurate the new century with a grateful return to Christ?

Let the November winds call up the words of Shakespeare:

Blow, blow, thou winter wind;
Thou art not so unkind,
As man's ingratitude.
Thy tooth is not so keen
Because thou art not seen,
Although thy breath be rude.

It was the ingratitude of daughters to an earthly father that called forth those words from King Lear, and it is pertinent to say that we should at this Thanksgiving time consider whether we have been duly grateful to our earthly parents and friends, forgetting whom we also dishonor God. Go and write that letter of gratitude you have owed so long to some earthly friend, a father, a mother, a sister or brother neglected, who have made you all you are by their sacrifices. And in coming to God in prayer do not plunge into new petitions before you have thanked him for answers already received. The Sunday School Times quotes a quaint poem of two angels sent out from heaven to gather the prayers and praises of men. The angel that came to gather petitions brought a small basket, the angel that came for thanksgivings a big one, but the latter was as much too large as the other was too small.

The angel of petitions bore a sack
Cram full and bound uncouthly on his back.
The angel of thanksgivings blushed to feel
The empty lightness of his mighty creel.

Let us be prayerful in everything, thankful for anything, anxious for nothing. Doubtless the nine cleansed lepers were thankful that they had been relieved of their loathsome disease, but they did not express their thanks. That is the way some Christians act. They never use the opportunities they have of saying to whom they are indebted for their happiness in this world and their hope of the next world, or show their gratitude by their lives.

"JESUS PUT FORTH HIS HAND AND TOUCHED HIM"

Under the Evening Lamp

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

AN MOTHER HEAR MY LESSON?

CAN mother hear my lesson?
It is so very long;
I've said it over twenty times,
And yet I get it wrong.

I wish the teacher wouldn't
Mark out so many words,
For children who would rather play
Outdoors as free as birds.

I hate this horrid spelling;
Dear mother, won't you ask
The teacher just to let me off
From learning any task?

Dear lass, the mother answered,
I think you want to be
Some bright day in the future time,
A woman just like me.

You cannot stay at seven,
And should you be a dunce
When you are one and twenty, dear,
You'd sadly think that once

You had the chance of learning,
But mother was not kind;
She was not careful of her child;
She did not make her mind.

Rough winds are good for trees, dear,
And lessons hard to learn
Make little women sweet and strong,
And thus, rewards they earn.

SOPHIE PARSONS LEE.

Incapable Young Wives

I WAS told the other day of a young wife who, having married a poor but ambitious man, seemed content to handicap him by her inefficiency. hope the case was exceptional. The ng people were boarding at a cost ite out of proportion to the young n's modest salary, and while he worked day and came home tired, she had thing to do but to kill time by idleness, yawn with ennui, and stroll out to look shop windows. Here was a manifest paration for reefs ahead. The hus- nd unduly burdened, the wife a mere of driftward on the current, careless ere she floated. Said a practical Irish man going about her scrubbing in the use, and seeing that things were awry: Why now don't ye take a bit place, two oms or so, and keep house for your n, and save his money?" "Mrs. Mc- nigle," said bride, "I don't know how make a cup of tea and I don't want to rn." The sensible hard-working woman ked at the silly butterfly with wonder d pity, and after a moment of silence claimed: "Bad 'cess to the mother that ought ye up!"

Few mothers, let us trust, are so indis- et as to bring their daughters up in nceited ignorance of domestic affairs. deed, most young women in these times de themselves on being notable cooks d good managers. They go to market d buy from the butcher the best cuts their purposes, and this does not im- the most expensive cuts by any means. e young women of our period take les- ns in laundering clothes, and become st mistresses in clear starching, blue- ; and fluting, in washing flannels and aning laces. A girl is never fit for rriage until she has studied to some ent the art of good housekeeping. If husband is wealthy she can then order extensive establishment with intelli- nce and direct her servants. If he is a or man at the beginning of his career can help him in a thousand ways by common sense and frugality. Again, French and the Germans give us good mples to follow. The former initiate ir daughters into every household se- t and arm them against wastefulness. e latter regard no girl as educated un- she has taken at least a year's course instruction in housewifery. The frau- n is often sent to a pensionnat for the press purpose of learning domestic sci- e, and high-born damsels are as care- ly taught, usually outside their own houses, as are the daughters of the poorer classes, how to do and to direct every branch of homely housekeeping lore.

We need not echo the Irish woman's comment. "bad 'cess to the neglectful mother," for bad cess is surely her portion in her inefficient and inadequate daughter of whom she may well be ashamed.

The Mother-in-Law

We incline to the view that in a majority of families the mother-in-law is a welcome guest and a dearly loved and honored personage. She is the children's grandmother, and therefore their most indulgent champion and most popular friend. Her son's wife, her daughter's husband, whichever side her maternal relationship is on, it matters very little, for she adopts into her own big heart the one who is so dear to her child. There are two mothers-in-law in most youthful families. John's mother and Mary's mother, and the household could ill spare either of these self-sacrificing and sincerely devoted women from its assets.

If We Had Known

The day was like any other: bright, swift, full of business and of care. But in the still midnight, at such an hour as we thought not, the Son of Man came. The "one clear call" which all must hear before they put out to sea for the last time, summoned suddenly a loved one, who was not, for God had taken him home. If we had known that it was the last day for us and our beloved to be together on earth, how gentle we would have been, how patient, and how loving. We would have given him much of our company. Every instant would have been precious as a priceless pearl. But alas! we did not know.

The Little Folk In School

Just now, the main interest in most homes is centered in the children. We can afford to let other things go and look after them.

In the beginning of another school year there will be an amazing advantage to all concerned if teachers may be permitted to cooperate with parents, or rather if parents will freely give teachers their support and sympathy. If, for instance, the pupils do not seem to be comfortably adjusted in their classes, if the work is too little or too much, if there is a perceptible degree of friction between children and teachers, or if, as sometimes happens, there is suffering on the part of a gentle child from the teasing and tormenting of a bully, let the parents freely talk the matter over with the teachers, being careful not also to discuss it with the children. In most cases some decision will be reached which will promote the interests of the child, and, in all our civilization, no interests to-day take precedence of this. The child is the foundation-stone of the republic.

Beginning school again, let us hope that the impulse which sends the first autumn days spinning forward so happily and gladly will be strong enough to continue as the weeks glide into months. Nothing is so fatal to the advancement of a child, as a whole, as irresponsibility on the part of the scholar, leading to frequent absences and consequent falling below the class standard. Parents should insist that the children attend school regularly, except when they are ill, and should see that illness be prevented, as it usually can, by due attention to the laws of health. Let us all pray daily and fervently for the schoolhouse and the teacher, the finest forces in our modern life.

THE VERY HARD LESSON

Candor Among Kinsfolk

CANDOR is a virtue of unsurpassed merit, a virtue which may be abused, as, when people go out of their way to utter a disagreeable truth in circumstances where silence is advisable, but on the whole a sturdy virtue worth cultivating. If obliged to choose between too much reserve and too much openness, most of us would unhesitatingly aver our preference for the latter. Many a dissension would resolve itself into harmony if people would only remember the scriptural injunction to speak the truth in love. Many a wound which a sensitive nature broods over in silence would cease to ache if the cause of distress were plainly talked over in the family, and if the aggrieved parties would state the cause of their hidden resentment.

In domestic life, especially where people have quick tempers and strong wills, differences of opinion must arise. To nurse in silence a hurt and pained feeling is very foolish. The injured person who sulks and broods with a martyr-like air, refusing to speak, waiving away every conciliatory advance, and acting like a wet blanket on the household, has much to answer for.

When we are surest of a matter we may be mistaken. To give a dear one the benefit of a doubt is the policy of the Christian spirit.

At a Funeral

She lay in her casket like a queen, with heaps of flowers around her, and on her face a look so benignant that one felt aware of the angels lingering near. She was a woman still youthful, and her life had been a benediction. Groups of little children, her infant scholars, came and looked at her. They went away, saying one by one, "I shall never be afraid to die. I have seen Mrs. R."

"I Mean to be a Helper"

In the autumn, wedding bells peal merrily, and we often carry our congratulations to the bride. One fair maiden soon to be married to a man who has his way still to make, said earnestly to the writer the other day, "I'll not be a clog upon John. I mean to be a helper." The spirit was commendable, and Isabel may be sure that if she carries it out through their married life, she and John will succeed in their several enterprises.

Two women make the character of a man, the first, his mother; the second, his wife. The mother impresses her moral characteristics upon him, she moulds his manners, she trains him while he is facile to her hand. The wife exercises on him an influence not less vital. He measures women by her. He accepts her standards. Insensibly she raises or lowers him, and if she be inconsistent as a professing Christian, or a worldly woman, is antagonistic to religion, he will be very apt to decry the Gospel, and care nothing for the church. Surely, in every aspect, the wife should be a helper, and not a hinderer; in the spiritual realm as in the domestic, an uplifting force.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—WIFE. Try complimenting John, and defer to his taste in the cooking.

—MARGARET. School girls have too much to do to be occupied with boys socially. Give your whole time to your studies.

—LITTLE GIRL. See that your canary's cage is clean, and give him fresh water and plenty of seed, with a bit of lettuce or apple now and then.

—TIRED MOTHER. Yes, it is hard to sew for so many bairns, but let them have fewer frocks. And there isn't one you would like to spare—is there?

—JESSICA. Send your card in an envelope by mail with one of your mother's to the man whom you met last summer and who is visiting in your town.

—BRIDE-ELECT. If you are to wear a traveling dress and go away immediately after the ceremony, let the wedding be very simple, and dispense with bridesmaids.

—LOTTA. I advise you to wear a single tulle veil, with your white silk gown; have your little sister a flower girl, preceding the bridal party with a basket of flowers, and let your older sisters be bridesmaids. The bride gives each attendant some little gift as a souvenir.

These Questions Will be Answered Dec. 5

1. Will you tell me what I must do to become a Christian? I never had Sunday School privileges, nor church. As I grow older, I see the sin of the world and feel the need of Christianity. I desire to be able to train my children as Christians. I love to talk to Christians, but cannot feel so certain as they appear to feel about spiritual things. I have tried to pray but cannot. I wish to become not an artificial believer in Christ, but a real one.
2. What is the true basis of marital happiness?
3. What words were certainly spoken by Christ and yet are not recorded by any of the evangelists nor in the Apocalypse?
4. What is the best method for a pastor to follow in order to attract young people to church and to keep them there regularly?
5. What is the exact difference between vanity and self-esteem?
6. What is the duty of the Church of Christ to the fallen woman?
7. Should any man be appointed on the officiary or governing board of a church who is not an out-and-out Christian?
8. Do the words of Christ on the cross (Matt. 27:46), "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" suggest that he had not accomplished the work God assigned to him; in other words, that his life was not a success, as mankind at this present time think of success?
9. Is a foreign missionary justified in holding a political office in the country where he is laboring for souls, or in exerting his influence in any way except for the social and spiritual welfare of his community?
10. Is a child born with or without a character?

Questions of the Week

1. An emblem used in one passage in the Bible to signify frailty is used in another for humiliation, and in a third for sin. What is the emblem, and where is it so employed?

The emblem is that of ashes. In Gen. 18:27, "I . . . which am but dust and ashes," it signifies frailty. In passages like Esther 4:1, and Jonah 3:6, it expresses the deepest humiliation. In Isaiah 44:20, "He feedeth on ashes," it refers, according to Dr. Cooke and other commentators, to the sinful and diseased condition of the human heart, "eagerly swallowing the lies of Satan and rejecting Jesus, the only physician." G. E. KRAUTH.

Correct answer was received also from Heppie W. Hamilton.

2. Should the Christian Church recognize as binding any other form of marriage than that which it has prescribed, i. e., such forms or ceremonies as may be used by non-Christian or unevangelized peoples?

It should recognize as binding any form or ceremony which shows an appreciation of the significance and solemnity of the marriage tie. The Church has already done itself immense harm by dictating too much in matters of conscience and freedom, and should take warning from the past. Marriage is universal, almost a matter of instinct with simple and uncivilized people, many of whom regard it with as much reverence and respect as do the most highly civilized. By condemning the time-honored forms and ceremonies of heathen people, the church needlessly wounds their self-respect, and places an obstacle in the way of winning an influence over them. However, the church should strive to inculcate a knowledge of her superior sanctity, and impress upon all minds the fact that marriage is one of the most sacred relations of life, like to that between Christ and his church. L. T. RIGHTSELL.

3. If a Christian becomes accidentally acquainted with the hiding-place of a criminal, is it incumbent upon him to give information to the police, or should he leave them to find it out themselves?

It depends whether or not the Christian feels that the criminal, if arrested, will receive justice by the law of the land. And, too, in visiting a foreign country, if to the Christian the laws of that country, when executed, appear unjustly cruel to such criminals, it is not incumbent upon the Christian to reveal the hiding-place accidentally or incidentally found, in order that the criminal be arrayed before such a court. But a native Christian, or one living in, or under the protection of the laws of the United States, should not hesitate to inform the police of his hiding-place, unless there is reason to believe that the criminal will receive maltreatment before reaching the bar of justice. All Christians should realize the necessity of the laws existing in our country, should have confidence therein, and should urge that the law take its course.
ERNEST O'BANNON.

4. Is it right to use fermented wine at the Lord's table, inasmuch as by partaking of it some reformed drunkard may be brought into danger of backsliding into sin?

No; and in churches where it is still used it should be discontinued. Inasmuch as all Reformed churches admit the symbolical nature of this sacrament, its spiritual significance is unaffected by the use of leavened or unleavened bread, fermented or unfermented wine. But if the use of fermented wine should lead any one into backsliding, then its disuse is of the utmost importance. St. Paul's injunction should be strictly followed: "If meat make my brother to offend I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." The importance of the above truth was brought vividly before the writer by an incident that happened not many years ago in her own church. A most exemplary young man, a reformed inebriate, who had not tasted liquor for nearly two years, went directly from the Lord's table to buy drink, and after a two days' debauch, in a fit of insane remorse, shot himself.
E. E. STOW.

I believe we go to extremes when we would substitute anything in the place of fermented wine in the Lord's Supper. The only authority we have for its use comes from Christ himself. He did not oppose the use of wine at any time, but its abuse. Yet, the Bible everywhere condemns drunkenness. We see him at one time at the marriage feast making one hundred and thirty gallons of wine; the word used is (olvos) oinos. "No man having drunk old wine" (here the word is oinos. The most common use of the word in the New Testament for wine appears in the original, oinos, a word occurring in the Septuagint no less than one hundred and seventy-nine times, and is a translation of the Hebrew word yayin, which means "to boil up, to be in a ferment," hence used of wine. The word tirash occurs thirty-eight times and is likewise translated by the Septuagint, oinos. The radical meaning of oinos conveys the idea of fermentation. Where the word wine occurs in the New Testament not meaning fermentation, it occurs with some modifying word like neas (yeos), which means new wine, or we may take the word, gleukos, meaning new wine or sweet wine, as in Acts 2:13, "These men are full of new wine." We have every reason to suppose that had our Blessed Lord foreseen any danger in the use of the sacrament of fermented wine, he would have warned his church against its use. But as he told his disciples that, "except you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood you have no life in you," and "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood" . . . We trifle with sacred tradition when we attempt to discontinue a custom so universally held by Christendom. JAMES LEWIS LASCHER.

5. Should a Christian employer be satisfied with paying the market rate of wages to his employees when he knows they cannot live upon them in decent comfort?

No; a Christian man's attitude toward an oppressive wage-market is opposition. To prevail in that opposition might require many things not in his power. But he is not consistent if he himself does not remedy it, so far as it is in his own hands. He ought to give a fair return to any one who gives his normal day's labor to him, and nothing is a fair return for normal labor which does not furnish a living. C. F. ATKINSON.

6. If an eagle leaving The Christian Herald office, New York, January 1, 1901, were to fly due eastward at the rate of one hundred miles a day, between sunrise and sunset, when would it encircle the globe and return to its starting point, assuming that the earth is a perfect sphere of 8,000 miles radius?

Supposing that the earth were a perfect sphere of 8,000 miles diameter, the circumference would be approximately 3.1416 times this, or 25,132.8 miles. This would be the distance the eagle would have to cover, and, at the rate of 100 miles a day, it would take it 251.328 days. But the eagle by flying to the eastward would shorten each of its days by 100-25132.8 part of 24 hours, or its 251.328 days (the time it would take it to make the circuit) would equal only 250.328 of the days at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office in New York. Thus the eagle would arrive at its starting place 250.328 days after January 1, 1901, or September 8, 1901. This has been computed on the supposition that the word "radius" is an error, and that the word "diameter" was meant in the question. If the word "radius" is correct, the distance would be 50265.6 miles the eagle's time 502.656 days, and the time at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office would be 501.656 days, making the eagle's time of arrival in New York, May 17, 1902. These figures can be substituted in the above answer if the word "radius" is correct.
CHAS. LANSDOUN.

The question should have read "diameter" instead of "radius."

7. Is a Christian justified in continuing in business after he has gained a competence, or ought he to retire to give other men an opportunity?

To say that a Christian should retire from business as soon as he has "gained a competence," is to admit that the chief end of his business life is to acquire money. But this view is strenuously denied by the New Testament. Everywhere it is insisted that a disciple of Christ is to consider his business, his vocation, his "calling," his means, serving God and his own generation. It has much to do with his own proper development and the exercise and culture of his own powers and faculties. The question of financial results is, in the truest sense, secondary and subsidiary. In this view of the matter, the Christian is not only justified in continuing business even after his financial needs are met, but he may be under obligation to do so unless waning powers of mind or body, or other providential circumstances, plainly indicate the contrary. Besides, it is often in continuing in business that he can best "give other men an opportunity." The Christian employer of a dozen or a hundred men is usually be doing them a greater kindness by carrying on his business than by surrendering it into other hands. J. K. WILSON.

8. At what temperature does water boil at each 1,000 feet of altitude, and what is the cause of the variation?

At the level of the ocean with ordinary pressure, which is equivalent to the weight of a column of mercury 29.905 inches in height, pure water boils at 212 deg. F. (100 deg. C.). As we rise above the sea level the temperature practically rises one degree Fahrenheit for every 510 feet of ascent. Strictly speaking, however, the differences in elevation corresponding to a decrease of one degree in temperature increases as we proceed to higher levels. For all practical purposes, however, water boils at 210 deg. F. at 1,000 feet.

208 deg. F. at 2,000 feet.
206 deg. F. at 3,000 feet.
204 deg. F. at 4,000 feet.
202 deg. F. at 5,000 feet.
200 deg. F. at 6,000 feet.
198 deg. F. at 7,000 feet.

At the City of Mexico, which is 7,471 feet above tide, water boils at 198.1 deg. F.; at Quito, 9,541 feet above, it boils at 194 deg., and at Donkia Mt., 18,000 feet above, at 180.

Water will boil at any temperature when the pressure is less than the expansive force of the particles of rising vapor, or, in other words, the vapor formed must force its way through the superincumbent pressure; hence the boiling point varies with differences of pressure. Under the receiver of an air-pump we can practically make it boil at any temperature, simply because we can vary the amount of pressure. JOHN A. BATES.

9. What is the distinction referred to in I. Thessalonians 5: 23, between the spirit and the soul?

In Thessalonians 5: 23, the apostle accepts for the purpose of his argument the ancient philosophy that man is a compound of three different parts: First, the rational spirit which survives the death of the body and is immortal; second, the animal soul, which man has in common with the beasts, and which dies with the body; third, the visible body. Many learned divines are of the opinion that as it was the design of the apostle to teach mankind religion, not philosophy, he might use the popular language to which the Thessalonians were accustomed, without adopting the philosophy on which that language was founded; consequently, that it is not to consider him as intending more by his prayer than that the Thessalonian believers might be thoroughly sanctified, of how many constituent parts soever their nature consisted. Ma knight says: "The distinction between the soul and spirit," which sacred writers seem to have intimated in these passages is, "the soul must be considered as connected both with the body and with the spirit. By its connection with the body, the soul receives impressions from the senses; and by its connection with the spirit, it conveys these impressions by means of imagination and memory to the spirit as materials for its operations.

10. Where is the centre of population in the United States?

The following table shows the movement of the center of the population of the United States since 1790:

Year.	Approximate Location.	Miles Westward
1790	23 miles east of Baltimore, Md.	..
1800	18 miles west of Baltimore, Md.	41

A Superb Gift for Our Subscribers

As announced in last week's paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has a delightful surprise in store for the numerous members of its great family. It has had prepared 200,000 superb American Beauty, Drop-Leaf, Two-Century Calendars, exquisitely lithographed in twelve colors and gold. This calendar measures 12 by 29 inches, and has one special feature which differentiates it from any other calendar now published, and is peculiarly appropriate at the turn of the century. We refer to its Two-Century Feature, which enables anyone at a glance to tell the day of the week for any date between the years 1801 and 2000, or, in other words, for any date in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. For instance: you wish to know the day of the week a certain person was born. Knowing the date, you refer to our two-century calendar, and you can instantly tell on what particular day it occurred. So looking ahead, if you wish to know the day of the week you will celebrate your silver wedding or your golden wedding, glance at our calendar and it will give you the desired information.

Of course, it is at the same time a calendar for 1901, and yet it will be as useful for the next hundred years as it will be for the coming year.

As a wall ornament, it is chaste, tasteful, and artistic. Graceful in its proportions, beautiful in its conception and perfect in execution, it is just the calendar an intelligent family would delight in possessing.

Every renewal and every new subscriber will receive one of these magnificent calendars, and in order that those of our subscribers whose subscriptions do not expire at the beginning of the year may not be delayed in the receipt of their calendar until the date of renewal, which might perhaps be late in the year, we are planning to send one of these calendars to every subscriber whose term may expire during the coming year, and who will send us a postal card notifying us that they intend to renew their subscriptions when the proper date comes around. Such of our subscribers whose subscription term expires between this and the beginning of January need not thus inform us, as their renewal date comes around in ample time for calendar requirements.

When you send us notice of your intention to renew, please use a postal card if practicable, and do not communicate any other business on it, as these cards will be handled in the Calendar Department. We are confident that none of our subscribers will miss the opportunity of securing one of these superb calendars, which, by the way, contain no advertising matter whatever.

Chinese Homes in New York

SOCIAL LIFE IN CHINATOWN—AMERICAN INFLUENCE ON CHINESE CHARACTER—MR. AND MRS. HUIE KIN'S WORK

FROM the port of New York, 800 Chinese return annually to their native land, carrying with them foreign or anti-foreign sentiment—hat factor which has played, and is playing, so large a part in international history—according to their experiences here. The educational and religious opportunities which we provide in this country for the Chinese react to our own advantage in China. Two wide "open doors" to China are found at the ports of New York and San Francisco. In both places earnest Christian workers are doing all that their means permit to evangelize the Oriental strangers within our gates. To what extent the efforts they have put forth reduced the horrors of the hinese tragedy of 1900 will never be lly known. "Our Chinese servants sked their lives to bring us food," wrote rs. Conger, the pious mistress of the merican legation. Many missionaries ill, doubtless, say as much when the full ory of their trials come to our ears. ertain it is that the Chinese man or oman, who, while living in this country, as been ministered to in sickness and ouble by a servant of Christ, or whose ttle child has leant lovingly upon the reast of a Christian kindergartener, may expected to do what his or her power ermits to save a white man, woman or ild in China from starvation and masacre. That many Chinese who had lived America did do this last summer is a uth, giving food for thought and fresh centive to new efforts for the evangelizaon of their countrymen here.

EX-CONSUL'S WIFE

In New York city there are about 11,000 hinese, the greater proportion of whom ve in Mott, Doyers and Pell streets, the ree narrow, dark and dingy thoroughares constituting Chinatown. Here there a Joss-house where worshipers burn cense to the Chinese god, a Chinese theter where tom-toms salute the air, opium ens and other places of evil where Chiese and Americans alike find moral and hysical ruin; Chinese stores, where queer ings are sold; Chinese restaurants, where ueerer things are eaten, and Chinese omes where Chinese wives and mothers oon Chinese lullabies to yellow babies ho wear funny little caps and have odd ttle queues with cherry-colored threads raided into the hair. Here Chinese men nd women are married according to Chiese custom, and here, as in the "Flowery Kingdom," the Chinese baby, at six weeks of age, is invested with its name amid fitting pomp and ceremony, a part of which is having the head shaved and queue started. To such functions friends are invited and refreshments served as they would be in China. Sixty Chinese women are leading in Chinatown much the same life they would lead in their native land. They are jealous of foreign intrusion, and rare indeed is it that an American finds herself admitted within the precincts of a Chinese woman's dwelling.

Perhaps the white woman freest to come and go in Chinese homes is Mrs. Huie Kin, wife of Rev. Huie Kin, missionary in charge of the Presbyterian Chinese Mission at 53 Fifth avenue, with whose excellent work for his countrymen here our readers are not unfamiliar. Recently, Mrs. Huie was guest of honor at a "head-shaving," where eight tables at $20 each were set by the proud parents in honor of the little Chinaman who then and there had a queue started. She has attended many weddings and assisted in welcoming to the bridegroom's house many a red-veiled bride. "For three days before her marriage," says Mrs. Huie, "the bride 'weeps,' or, as the Chinese say, 'hides in a corner.' Her mother prepares, as part of her dowry, clothes enough to last all her life—a possible thing among people whose fashions change not. At his door the bridegroom meets her; a little boy presents her with a key; she presents the bridegroom with two tiny cups of wine. Merrymaking begins; all try to lift the bride's veil and see her face, but only her husband succeeds, after which her face remains uncovered and she drinks tea with her guests." Women of exclusive Chinese circles call very frequently at Mrs. Huie's home. The wives of consuls at this port have been her frequent guests. We give the portrait of one of these, who went back to China with most friendly feelings towards Christians. The present consul shows much interest in the Mission work. Mrs. Huie's opportunities for influencing the lives of Chinese women are exceptional, and she makes the most of them. Through her instrumentality the Bible has taken the place of Joss in many a Chinese home here and in the East as well. In a limited sense, 53 Fifth avenue is not only a mission, but a home for Chinese children, a social center for Chinese women and youths, and a hospital for sick and friendless Chinamen.

CHINATOWN MERCHANT'S WIFE AND CHILD

Some years ago, Mr. Huie visited China, returning with thirty-five boys, orphans, or whose parents wished them to have an American education. Out of this company, enlarged by numerous accessions from the Chinese colony already here, young Chinamen are going out into various parts of our own country and Canada as avowed missionaries of Christ, or as business men of Christian principles and American ideas: others return to China as bearers of the Gospel to their brethren; a chapel at San Hang stands on a lot given by Mr. Dang, one of the latter. Mr. and Mrs. Huie Kin point with pride to a thriving Y. M. C. A. here, whose officers and members are "our boys." Every Sunday, there is a Sabbath School service and sermon in Chinese, and Y. M. C. A. meeting at their home, followed by a dinner, at which thirty or more Chinese friends sit down to Mrs. Huie's table.

Around the World with Josiah Allen's Wife

COPYRIGHT, 1899, BY MARIETTA HOLLEY

CHAPTER XLIX.

SAMANTHA IN LONDON

WE didn't stay very long in London, but long enough so we could look about us some. Robert Strong had considerable bizness to attend to there, which, of course, devoured his time, and Dorothy had a number of young girl friends who lived there, and she wanted to go and see them, and she entertained 'em at our tarven:-sweet, fresh-complexioned young girls; they wuz almost as pretty as Dorothy herself, but not quite.

Arvilly had a cousin on her own side that she wanted to visit, and, of course, she wanted to canvas more or less, so that left Josiah and I free a good deal of the time to go and come as we liked. Of course dear little Tommy wanted to see everything and go everywhere. Miss Meechim and Dorothy took Tommy with them several times, and so did Robert Strong, and, of course, some days when we wuz all at liberty we would all go out together sightseeing. Josiah said most the first thing that he wanted to see the Tower of London, and Tommy wanted to see the Crystal Palace, takin' a fancy to the name I spoze, and I told 'em we would go to these places the first chance we had.

But deep in my heart wuz one purpose. I had laid on a certain plan day and night, kep' it in my mind and lotted on it. But of this more anon. This wuz my major plan. Amongst my minor ones wuz my desire to see Westminster Abbey agin. I had been there once on a former tower, but I wanted to stand agin by the tombs of them I so deeply honored; and the rest of the party feelin' as I did, we all set out there most the first thing.

Sightseeing in London

I also sot store by Westminster Abbey on account of its being the place where Victoria, honored queen and woman, wuz crowned, as well as all of England's monarchs. It is a magnificent building, no other mausoleum in the world can compare with it; it is almost worthy of being the resting-place of the great souls that sleep there. Dorothy's sweet face and Robert's noble liniment took on reverent looks as we stood by the tomb of saint and sage, hero and poet.

We went from there to see the Houses of Parliament, immense buildings full of interest and associations.

We also went to see St. Paul's Cathedral, which towers up in majesty, dwarfin' the other buildin's near it. It is a marvelous structure in size and beauty, only two bigger buildings in the world, St. Peter's at Rome, and the Milan Cathedral.

What a head Sir Christopher Wren must have had, and what a monument to his genius this gigantic pile is. No wonder he wanted this epitaph put on his tomb:

"If you want to see his monument, look about you."

Many other noted men are buried here, Bishop Heber, John Howard, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Wellington, Nelson and Sir John Moore, who wuz "buried darkly at dead of night," as so many bashful schoolboys know to their sorrow, as they rehearse it in a husky voice to the assembled neighbors the last day of school. Oh, how much they wish as they try to moisten their dry tongue and arrange their too visible and various hands, that the night wuz still darker, so dark that nothin' wuz ever hearn on't.

Feelin' the admiration I did for his livin' and lovin' pardner, I wuz glad to see the Albert monument. It wuz evenin' when we see it, and the garden where it stands wuz illuminated. The great elms glowed under a multitude of red lights. The music-stands glowed with stars of the same color, and the fountains riz up in great sprays of color and radiance. It wuz a beautiful seen, but none too grand for the great good man whose name the tall shaft bears.

The Palaces and the Tower

Albert Hall, which stands in the same grounds, wuz also brilliantly illuminated; its long glass corridors shone as if wrought out of crystal and ruby.

One day we rode from Blackfriar's bridge past the Mansion House where the Lord Mayor holds his receptions. And what interested me fur more, we went past the place where the Foreign Bible Society prints more than three million Bibles a year in two hundred different languages and dialects, carrying the knowledge and love of our Lord unto the ends of the earth.

Buckingham Palace wuz a sight to see, beautiful and grand, and not fur off is St. James's Park, one of the most attractive in the city though it wuz once only a marshy field. As I looked on its charming and diversified beauty I thought how little there is in heredity compared to gumption and draining.

Josiah, as I said, wanted to see the Tower of London. It is the most celebrated fortress in England. It is awful old, and good land! if I wuz shet up there I shouldn't never expect to break out. Some of the walls are fifteen feet thick. The White Tower, they say, wuz begun by William the Conqueror, a man that I told the guide politely, "wuz quite widely known, and I had hearn a sight of him though I had never had the pleasure of his acquaintance." It wuz completed in one thousand ninety-eight.

Josiah and I wandered round there for hours, and should most probable got lost and mebby been gropin' round there today if it hadn't been for the guide.

I wuz dretful interested in London Bridge. The present structure cost seven million, so they say, and I wouldn't have built it for a cent less. I thought as I stood there of what had took place on that spot since Sir William Wallace's day and how his benign head (most every bump on it good ones) wuz put up there a mark for the insultin' jeers of the populace, and it made me feel bad and sorry for Helen, his last wife, she that wuz Helen Mar. But Sir Thomas Moore's head wuz nailed up in the same place, and the Bishop of Rochester's and lots of others.

It wuzn't right.

And then I thought of the gay seens that had took place there, the tournaments and triumphal marches and grand processions and sad ones, and the great multitude who have passed over it, prince and beggar, velvet and rags, a countless throng constantly passing, constantly changing, no more to be counted than the drops of water in the silent stream below, all the time, all the time sweepin' on to the sea. I had sights of emotions.

And all the while I wuz in London, in the gay streets and quiet ones, in palace or park, the shade of Dickens walked by my side or a little in advance, seemin' to pint out to me the places where he had walked when he see visions and dreamed dreams. And I almost expected to meet little Nell leading her grandpa, or David Copperfield, or Peggoty searching for Em'ly, or some of our Mutual Friends.

And so with Thackeray. As I looked up at the gloomy houses on some quiet street I almost expected to see the funeral hatchment of old Sir Pitt Crawley's wife and Becky Sharp's little pale face peering out, or sweet Ethel Newcomb and her cousin Clive, and the dear old General and Henry Esmond, and etc., etc. And so with Alfred Tennyson. In some beautiful place of drooping foliage and placid water I almost felt that I should see the mystic barge drawin' nigh and I too should float off into some Lotus land. And so with all the other beloved poets and authors who seem nigher to us than our next door neighbors in the flesh.

Dorothy havin' never been there, felt that she must see Shakespeare's home, which is a journey of only three hours by rail, so we made a visit there one day, passing through some of England's most beautiful scenery on our way, grand old parks with stately houses rising up in their midst, gray stun churches in charming little villages, thatched-roofed cottages, picturesque water-mills; it wuz all a lovely picture of rural England.

It being a little too long a journey for one day, we stayed all night at Shakespeare's Inn, where the great poet went daily for his glass of stimulant—so they say. But I am glad I don't believe everything that I hear.

Arvilly mourned to think that she couldn't have sold him America's twin crimes: Intemperance and Greed; but I kinder changed the subject. As much store as I set by Arvilly's cast-iron principles, somehow I couldn't bear the thought of having Shakespeare canvassed.

All the rooms are named after Shakespeare's plays, painted over the doors in black letters. We slept in "All's Well That Ends Well"—a good name—and we slept peaceful, thinkin' likely that it would turn out so. Miss Meechim had the "Merry Wives of Windsor." She wanted to change with Arvilly, who had "Love's Labor Lost," but Arvilly wouldn't budge.

At Shakespeare's Cottage

Miss Meechim told me in confidence that if Shakespeare could have had the benefit of her advice he would probable have called it "The Unfortunate Wives of Windsor." "And then," sez she, "I could have occupied it with more pleasure." But I didn't much think that he would have changed his plans or poetry if she had been on the spot.

The next morning early we set out for Shakespeare's cottage, described so often, saw the room in which the great poet was born, and wuz told that nothing had been changed there since he lay in his cradle, which we could believe as we looked about us on the low walls, the diamond panes of the windows and the quaint old furniture. The cottage is now used for Shakespeare's relics, some of which looked as if they might be real, and some as if they wuz made day before yesterday. We visited the church where he wuz baptized and saw on one of the pews the metal plate on which is engraved the name of the poet's father.

And, thinkin' that a visit to Shakespeare's home wouldn't be complete without seeing the place where his heart journeyed whilst his life wuz young and full of hope and joy, we drove out to Shottery, to the little farmhouse where his sweetheart, Ann Hathaway, lived.

It is a quaint little cottage, and after going through it we drank a glass of water drawn up by a well sweep from the very same old well from which Shakespeare drank so many times. As I stood there I saw in fancy the rosy, dimpled Ann handing the crystal water to the boy, Will, who mebby whispered to her as he took the glass sweet words, all rhyming with youth and joy and love.

And the same blue sky bent above us; birds wheeled and sung over our heads, descendants, mebby, of the birds that sung to them that day. I had sights of emotions—sights of 'em—and so I did in the cottage as I sot on the old, old settle in the

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health anu Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges: they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefitted by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

corner of the fireplace, whose age nobody could dispute, as its stiff old joints are strengthened with bands of iron, where young Will Shakespeare and his sweetheart often sat, and where he might have read to her the new poem in honor of her charms:

To melt the sad, make blithe the gay,
And nature charm Ann hath a way.
She hath a will,
She hath a way—
To breathe delight, Ann Hathaway.

He or she didn't dream of his future greatness, and I dare say that old Pa Hathaway, who, mebby, slept nigh by, might have complained to her ma, "Wonderin' what that fool meant by talkin' in poetry at that time of night." And, mebby, if he soared too high and loved in verse, old Pa Hathaway might have called out:

"Ann! cover up the fire and go to bed! Mr. Shakespeare wants to go home!"

I don't say this wuz so, but mebby. So holden are our eyes and so difficult it is for the human vision to discern between an eagle and a commoner bird, when the wings are a featherin' out, before they are full plumed for a flight amongst the stars.

Well, we went back to London, tired, but riz up in our minds, and renewed our sightseeing there.

The "Widder Albert"

But time wuz passing, and the hour for our departure for London wuz drawin' nigh, and I felt that my major plan, heretofore mentioned, must be tackled now or never. And I spoze I may as well tell what it wuz as to keep it any longer.. It wuz my strong desire and determination to go and see the widder Albert. I had kep' it in my heart and mind from the beginning of our tower, and I told my pardner that I had got to go; sez I, "I have sent word to her that I wuz a comin', and I must go." Sez I:

"I honor her as a ruler and a woman who has had a right and used it, and is still just as affectionate and tender hearted as any clinger and creepin' vine of a woman that you can bring up."

"Yes," sez Josiah, "her demeanor towards her pardner durin' life and her feelin's for him since his death has been a perfect pattern to widders, and every married woman can set on her feet and learn of her. I want to see her," sez he, "and we'll go together, Samantha."

I looked him over with a glance that took him in from hat to boots, and looked dubersome. And the closter I looked the more reason I see for not takin' him with me.

And yet, how could I disappint him, for his heart seemed sot on goin'?

He see my hesitation and my dubersome looks and sez, "Well, have you got any objection to my goin' to see the widder? If you have, name 'em!"

I still looked dubersome, but said nothin'.

And he sez in a heart-breakin' tone, "Are you ashamed on me, Samantha? Oh, that I ever lived to see this day!" And he almost cried.

"Ashamed! Josiah! Why, you look better to me than any other man on the globe."

"Well then," sez he cheerfully, "we will go together."

But I sez, kinder avesive, "Mebby we can't git there, Josiah; we're goin' to be dretful busy."

Now I despise underhanded doin's and deceit, especially between married folks. But still epocks may rise, perfectly innocent ones, of course, when it is for the pardner's happiness and your own piece of a mind to kinder move on and keep still.

I could not take him with me, the reasons wuz insurmountable. And I could not hurt his feelin's by lettin' him see me go without him. Then what must I do? Why, the only thing that seemed feasible wuz to slip away onbeknown to him. Time had run on, we a bein' busy every hour till the last day come of our stay in London. And I thought to myself as I rose that morning, now or never.

I have often wondered if there is some occult soul language that makes two who have long lived together understand without words what is passin' in each other souls. I could see as I wuz pinnin' on my collar as well as if I had eyes in my bump of self-esteem, that Josiah, who wuz behind me, felt that I wuz preparin' for a great event. Still, I wore only my usual dress, and I dassent embellish myself as much as I felt I owed to the occasion. No; I must be guarded and cautious.

But though he didn't say nothin' I felt that his eyes wuz on my every move. Three times durin' that mornin' I made the attempt to slip out of the room onnoticed, havin' put my bunnet and mantilly out in a chair in the hall, but frustrated each time by his watchfulness. What should I do?

About the middle of the forenoon Robert Strong proposed that we should all go and take a last drive in the park, and we set off, all but Arvilly. She thought of some one in another part of the city that she wanted to canvas, and she started off alone in a handsome. Miss Meechim and Dorothy wuz feelin' well. Tommy, who wuz in fine sperits, wuz perched as usual on Robert Strong's knee.

The sheltered drives and smooth windin' roads wuz gay with passers-by, and the seen wuz beautiful, but I wuz dominated with one thought: we had got out, and wuz walking through a lovely path, and I thought to myself, now is my time to kinder lose my pardner and turn back to one of the entrances, get another convenience and go from there. With a guilty look at Josiah, though I wuzn't guilty, I turned off down another path and hurried on towards the gate, leavin' the hull party as I s'pozed. I knew they wouldn't worry, as I had told Miss Meechim that I had bizness in another part of the city and might go any time, but should be back at the tarven at noon, M' without fail.

Josiah's Ruse

I hurried onwards; the gate hove in sight. But who do you spoze wuz there a leanin' on the gate? It wuz my pardner, Josiah Allen.

Sez he, "I see you comin' this way, so I santered down to meet you."

Santered! He wuz most dead with fatigue.

"Well," sez I kinder short, "we may as well go back to the tarven." Oh, widder Albert, sez I to myself, shall I have to go home without seeing thee. No, indeed! my soul answered, not if woman's wit can avail.

After we got to our room I thought I might as well make Josiah useful, so I had him finish the packin', I a settin' and overseein' it, a situation usually reversed. But he made no complaints, only sithed hard as he put the last garment in and shet the led, and I sez tenderly:

"Lay down, Josiah, and rest; try to git into a drowse if you can."

He complied, and I read to him in a monotonous axent one of Kipling's last stories, and soon he wuz snorin'. Thinkses I, now is my time, and still kinder sayin' over big strange words, so he wouldn't know the difference, I put on my bunnet, took my mantilly and umbrell and softly opened the door.

Sez Josiah, "I will shet it, Samantha, I feel real refreshed! I'll go with you."

"Where do you think I'm goin'?" sez I, kinder short.

"I don't know," sez he, "but I know my place is by your side in joy or sorrow."

And I sez, "I have got a number of errents to do; I guess I won't go out till after dinner." So we went down and had a good meal.

Well, after dinner, Josiah kep' watch of me every minute, only I stepped into Miss Meechim's bedroom, where he dassent foller, and from there ordered a handsome, thinkin' the time had come to strike a blow for liberty, and goin' back after my bunnet, I sez plain to him:

"I've got to go out agin, Josiah."

He looked clost at me, and I see him glance at his hat, but I sez:

"I've ordered a handsome, Josiah; I must go alone." Sez I, "Miss Sylvester Bobbett has concluded to make her woosted mantilly with tabs."

"What do you spoze I care for mantillys," sez he, "or tabs?"

Sez I, "You know she sent here by her cousin in the spring to git a dress of London brown, thinkin' the color might wear better got on the spot, and now she has writ to me to git two yards of the same."

He knows my word is as good as my note, and he sez:

"Where will you git it, Samantha?"

I showed him her letter containin' minute directions, and he didn't say nothin' aginst it, and, thinkses I, Fate is a goin' to be good to me. I shall, after all, see the widder Albert's benine face.

FOOD SAVES

Doctor Knew the Value of Grape-Nuts

A breakfast food that a baby can handle is a pretty safe proposition for grown people with weak stomachs. Dr. Wm. Hall, 156 State street, Boston, has tried Grape-Nuts food in his own case, as a result of which he says: "I have been relieved from the distressing form of indigestion caused by the non-assimilation of starchy foods, and since making Grape-Nuts a part of my dietary scale, I have had no trouble, and find my power of concentration markedly increased.

"I have frequently prescribed Grape-Nuts food in my practice, with most excellent results. The notes of one case I enclose herewith. July 10th, '99, called to see M—— B—— two years and three months old; found the child ill-nourished, with waxen skin, enlarged joints, beaded ribs, enlargement of the abdomen, furred tongue, constant vomiting, and diarrhoea; in short, a typical case of rachitis. The child weighed fourteen pounds, and was daily losing flesh.

"Inquiring into the dietary, I found oatmeal, macaroni, rice, white bread, and milk had formed the chief articles of food, and lately all had been rejected. I at once stopped all other foods, and placed her on a diet of Grape-Nuts, which was retained on the stomach from the first.

"On my next visit, July 17, I found the child bright and cheerful, vomiting all stopped, stools formed and natural in appearance, weight 14 3-4 pounds. From then, for the next three months, the child made a regular and even improvement, gaining from eight to ten ounces each week. She is now quite recovered. In my opinion, this girl has been saved from an early grave by the use of Grape-Nuts food."

The popular secretary of the Wellsburg, N. Y., Board of Trade is Mr. W. J. Dalton, and his statement to a reporter regarding one of the most important events of his life carries with it the greatest weight. It is unusual for a person to be afflicted from childhood with rheumatism but it is even wonderful that there is a remedy so exactly suited to the treatment of this stubborn disease that one hundred doses were sufficient to eradicate it in a case of twenty years' standing. The proof that such a remedy is within the reach of all rheumatic sufferers is found in Mr. Dalton's own words. He says:

"I had been troubled with rheumatism all my life, even when a boy. It attacked me in the legs, arms and shoulder. The pain in the latter was particularly severe. I, of course, took medicine for it, but did not obtain permanent relief. One day about three years ago while reading a newspaper, I saw an advertisement of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and determined to give them a trial. I had taken but three boxes of the pills when the trouble, which had been my affliction from childhood, entirely disappeared.

"About a year later, I had another attack of rheumatism which was brought on by working in a damp place. I remembered well what Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People had done for me, so I immediately purchased some. Strangely enough, just three boxes again drove the disease from my system, and I have been entirely free from rheumatism ever since. I have told a number of people about Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and they have taken them with the most beneficial results."

CLIMBING MOUNT SHASTA*

MONT SHASTA is the most striking feature of Northern California. Its height is about 14,500 feet above the sea—very nearly the height of Mont Blanc. Mont Blanc is broken into a succession of peaks, but Shasta is one stupendous peak, set upon a broad base that sweeps out far and wide. From the base the volcanic cone rises up in one vast stretch of snow and lava. It is very precipitous to the north and south, but east and west there are two slopes right up to the crater. It is a matter of doubt whether Shasta is dead or only sleeping. Vesuvius slept calmly for centuries, and then spread death and desolation for miles around. The base of the mountain is magnificently watered and wooded, and forms a splendid hunting-ground. The woods are full of deer and bears; and now and then a mountain-goat, an animal very like the chamois of the Alps, is seen in the higher part of the mountains.

Well-provided with blankets and provisions, we started with a guide, and a man to look after the horses, at a very early hour, and rode through a beautiful forest of pines, silver firs and cedars. Along the banks of the streams were aspens, willows and the trees known by the name of the "Balm of Gilead," whose vivid green leaves were already changing to a rich orange or an apple-red—forming a beautiful contrast of colors with the glazed green of the cedars and the green-tinted white of the silver firs.

After an easy ascent to a height of about 8,000 feet, we reached the limits of vegetation. Thence our upward path lay over snow, ice and lava—lonely, isolated barrenness on every side, relieved only by an occasional, solitary dwarf pine, struggling to retain life amidst fierce storms and heavy-weighing snow. Many of them were quite dead, but embalmed by frost and snow in a never-decaying death.

After some hours of weary climbing over crumbling scoria and splintered rock, we reached the crater. In the ascent to the summit overlooking the crater, we had to cross an ice-field. It had that blue tinge found in the ice of which glaciers are composed, and its slipperiness made it almost impossible to walk over it, the ice lying often in ridges resembling the waves of the sea.

The main crater covers several acres. It is hemmed in by rims of rock, and is filled with volcanic debris, covered with snow and ice. Numbers of little boiling springs were bubbling up through the bed of sulphur, and were suggestive of the subterranean fires which once threw their molten lava over the surrounding country. The view from the summit was most extensive, and fortunately there was none of the usual smoke from the forest-fires, so prevalent in autumn in Northern California and Oregon, to impede the range of vision.

The descent to our camping-ground was accomplished in a comparatively short time. On the way, we stopped to witness a most glorious sunset. Round the horizon ran a thin mist with a brilliant depth of coloring. To the east a blue gauze seemed to cover each alley as it sank into night, and the intervening ridges rose with increasing distinctness. The lower country was flooded with an exquisitely delicate light, and a few fleecy clouds tinted with gold, pale salmon, and sapphire, passed over the empurpled hills of the Coast range. The great shadow of Mt. Shasta spread itself, conelike, across the valley; the blue mists were quenched; the distant mountains glowed like fairy hills for a few moments; and the sun, poising itself like a great globe of fire in the darkening heavens, descended slowly below the golden ridge to illumine another hemisphere.

During our descent, we passed through some patches of red snow, which leaves a crimson track behind those who cross over it. This curious phenomenon is always avoided by the Shasta Indians, when acting as guides or porters, as they say it brings death if you tread on it willingly and after due warning. We found a warm fire to welcome us on our arrival at the camp, and the exertions of the day made us very willing to turn in among the blankets where we slept soundly till long after daybreak.

TRUE RICHES†

I DO not mean to say that the possession of much money is always a barrier to real wealth of mind and heart. Nor would I maintain that all the poor of this world are rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom. But some of them are. And if some of the rich of this world (through the grace of Him with whom all things are possible) are also modest in their tastes, and gentle in their hearts, and open in their minds, and ready to be pleased with unbought pleasures, they simply share in the best things which are provided for all.

I speak not now of the strife that men wage over the definition and the laws of property. Doutless there is much here that needs to be set right. There are men and women in the world who are shut out from the right to earn a living, so poor that they must perish for want of daily bread, so full of misery that there is no room for the tiniest seed of joy in their lives. This is the lingering shame of civilization. Some day, perhaps, we shall find the way to banish it. Some day, every man shall have his title to a share in the world's great work and the world's large joy.

But meantime it is certain that, where there are a hundred poor bodies who suffer from physical privation, there are a thousand poor souls who suffer from spiritual poverty. To relieve this greater suffering there needs no change of laws, only a change of heart.

What does it profit a man to be the landed proprietor of countless acres unless he can reap the harvest of delight that blooms from every rood of God's earth for the seeing eye and the loving spirit? And who can reap that harvest so closely that there shall not be abundant gleaning left for all mankind? The most that a wide principality can yield to its legal owner is a living.

We measure success by accumulation. The measure is false. The true measure is appreciation. He who loves most has most.

A ROAST

On Temperance People.

A little woman out in Tower Hill, Ill., takes a fall out of the temperance people in a letter containing the following: "It is amusing to see some staunch temperance people who would as soon be caught stealing a horse as to be seen going into a saloon, that are tied down, hard and fast, to their coffee cups as much as an old whiskey sot is to his morning dram. They give the same excuse that the old sot does, they act the same way, the habit is just as fixed. Their dram does not as quickly intoxicate, but its steady use just as surely breaks down the nervous system and ruins them physically and mentally, frequently setting up some fixed form of chronic disease.

"Consistency, thou art a jewel, just as much to-day as of old. Either break away from your slavery,—tea, coffee, or any other pernicious habit you may have, or quit preaching to others. I know what I am talking about, for I was a coffee slave for a time and can speak truthfully of its effects. It almost ruined my nervous system, caused constipation, headaches, and sleeplessness. I suppose if I had drank enough at one time to make me entirely drunk, I might have felt easier.

"Finally the stuff began to cause coughing after my meals; then I concluded to part company with the demon, and at once, upon the advice of some friends, took up Postum Food Coffee. The change was marvelous. I passed from an invalid to a healthy person, in a very short time. I had quit a drug and taken up a strong, powerful, nourishing food in liquid form, and owe my present health to Postum Food Coffee." Name will be furnished by Postum Cereal Company, Limited, Battle Creek, Mich.

SEWING WOMEN IN ARMENIA

NEEDLE-WOMEN IN ARMENIA

Miss Shattuck's Visit to Belfast—Linen Merchants Engage Work of the Armenian Widows and Orphans

MISS CORINNA SHATTUCK, "the heroine of Oorfa," writes us, on the S. S. Helios. Mediterranean Sea, off the Island of Rhodes, an interesting account of her voyage up to that time and place. She says:

"Fortunately the least expensive route from Liverpool was also the quickest. Shipping luggage to arrive much later.

PARLAK AND HIS BROTHER
Two of our little orphans at Oorfa

We ran through England; crossed the choppy sea between Harwich and Hook of Holland; hastened through Rotterdam, Hanover, Leipsic, Dresden and Prague to Vienna, spending the night at the latter place, where Americans, whose speech betrayed them, kindly hoped I had seen beautiful Vienna thoroughly,' which, of course, I had not time to do. From Vienna, I went through Budapest and Belgrade to Sofia. In the jargon of languages during the last two days of this trip, familiar Turkish had place. With barely time for Sabbath breakfast among missionary friends at Gedik Pasha, I was again on my way aboard this steamer. Up to this time, I feel that the most important part of my journey was a run from London to Belfast. Samples of several kinds of handkerchiefs, new in pattern, and some of them quite difficult of execution had been sent since my Ireland visit in February to our Oorfa workers. The duplicates which they made themselves and returned showed sufficient ability on the part of the orphan girls to prepare my way in making a definite contract for them to do much work for the linen firm which I saw in Belfast. By this arrangement, I think our five hundred embroiderers will be at no time without employment.

"Before leaving the United States, I had also made arrangements by which the beautiful handkerchiefs may be obtained through Miss Emily C. Wheeler, 40 King street, Worcester, Mass. She is sure to have many in hand for sale before Christmas. The home-spun and cotton, and the silk ones, embroidered in rich Oriental patterns, are done by our widows who are incapable of the finer linen work. Great Britain has been our chief market-place, and we have not entirely ceased to receive orders from there. We make portieres, curtains, cushions, bed-covers, table-covers, children's dresses, bags and various small articles in deep red, navy-blue, light blue, terra-cotta, dull green and in white, the colors warranted fast. For this department, our friends can correspond with Mrs. Geo. M. Adams, 93 Hancock street, Auburndale, Mass., who will forward any orders to Oorfa. All this work means bread to our needy ones. Our widows and orphans often say: 'Two things saved us from insanity in our great sorrow—the blessed Word of God and the work so quickly devised for our hands.' As our women and girls ply their busy needles, they often talk of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through whose goodness they have received so much help."

Vigor and vitality are quickly given to every part of the body by Hood's Sarsaparilla. It purifies the blood, tones the stomach, rouses the kidneys and liver to active duty and refreshes the tired brain.

Help for Colored Preachers

A New York Philanthropist Initiates a System of Teaching for the Benefit of the Leaders of the Colored Race : : : :

VISITING the South some years ago, Mr. John C. Martin, a New York merchant and a veteran of the Civil War, was impressed with the respect paid by the colored race to their own preachers and the enormous influence that they exercise. Inquiries in various localities convinced him that there could be no better means of benefiting the race and helping them to reach a higher standard of religion and morality than by rendering aid to the preachers. If one preacher could be taught to make better sermons, could be helped in his studies, and could be enabled to get a clearer view of Scripture truth, his congregation would profit. More effective than any effort to reach the people themselves would be to teach the teacher. If he became efficient his people would be benefited. Mr. Martin found also that the colored preacher, as a rule, eagerly welcomed such help. He is conscious of his deficiencies, and being earnestly desirous of training his people in the way of righteousness, wanted nothing so much as hints that would help him in his work. In a quiet, unostentatious way Mr. Martin has been trying to meet this want. He has been seeking opportunities to help the preacher who has not been to college and cannot go there, but who needs the kind of help that colleges are established to render. The result has been most gratifying and suggests the advisability of extending the effort so as to reach a larger number of preachers, by systematic work in all the Southern States.

The plan adopted is to place in the field an experienced theological teacher, who shall go into a county and hold a meeting in some easily accessible town. The meeting is called by circular addressed to colored preachers, Sunday School teachers, and officers of churches. At the meeting, a lecture is delivered on the preacher's work with a special adaptation to Sunday School teaching. After the lecture, anyone is at liberty to ask questions, and there is never any lack of these. If there is great interest manifested, arrangements are made for other lectures, or Bible readings, as may seem most appropriate. The usual course is: 1. The Importance of Gospel Ministry; 2. The Minister as a Messenger from God; 3. The Object of Preaching the Saving of Souls; 4. Preparation of Sermons and their Delivery; 5. Public Reading of the Scriptures and Public Prayer; 6. How to Study the Bible; 7. The Bible Writers and Their Times; 8. The Christian Home; 9. How to Promote Peace and Co-Operation Among Rival Churches; 10. Christian Life, Purity, Economy, Usefulness.

The lecturer gives outlines of sermons on texts suggested by his hearers, and this is one of the most popular features of the course. Another favorite exercise is a Bible reading on some special topic, such as Atonement, Sin, Salvation, etc., showing the Bible texts referring to the topic in the various books. The closest attention is paid by all present, and when the time comes for answering questions, it is evident that there has been a quickening of thought and an earnest desire to get information, together with intelligent criticism of the lecture.

The lecturer Mr. Martin has employed thus far is Rev. W. B. Rankin, D. D., who has had considerable experience in tuition of the colored race. Mr. Martin defrays the expenses and the only stipulation made is that the room in which the lectures are delivered shall be provided free of charge. In many cases, however, even that is not required, for many of the meetings have been held in the open air. Dr. Rankin provides himself with a blackboard and when a text has been suggested it is written at the top, and underneath the divisions and subdivisions that make up the skeleton of a sermon. Care has to be taken—Dr. Rankin learned this early in his work—to avoid controversial questions. Each preacher is encouraged to be faithful to his own creed, but to get more Bible knowledge and a better facility in handling theological truths.

During the past four months forty-six lectures have been delivered in various localities, with marked success. One Institute which Dr. Rankin visited in Texas was so deeply grateful for the help rendered that its members passed a series of quaintly-worded resolutions declaring their indebtedness to the lecturer and the philanthropist who had initiated the movement. The progress so far made has been marvelous considering the outlay. Mr. Martin is mightily encouraged and would be glad to extend the work, especially by sending gifts of Bibles, which are sorely needed. Any friends of the colored race desiring to help in the work, may send contributions to this office and they will be used to put a second lecturer in the field.

COST OF INTEMPERANCE*

A Long Record of Heavy Expenses Entailed on the Community by the Prevalence of the Vice

MANY attempts have been made to estimate the cost of intemperance, but the figures that make up the appalling total are necessarily untrustworthy. It is impossible to learn, in spite of the ingenuity of statisticians, how much loss is incurred through this horrible vice.

Who can tell us, for example, how much of the poverty that is in every city is the result of intemperance? What is the difference in the wealth of the community between the situation in which the man is doing honest productive work and the same man idling his time away in the saloon, while his wife's friends support her and her children? That difference is a distinct loss to the public, and is part of the cost of intemperance. Then there are the poor who are supported in the public almshouses of every State. Some there are who are there through misfortune, and God forbid that one word of suspicion should ever be uttered against any man simply on account of his becoming a public burden. But there are others whose poverty is the direct or indirect result of intemperance. Lawyers whose clients have deserted them because of their drunken habits, physicians whose patients became afraid to trust them, business-men whose stores have been neglected for the saloon until the sheriff took possession, mechanics of rare skill who have been discharged because they were addicted to drink and became unreliable—all these are familiar objects in every community, and if they live to old age they are a burden to their friends or the public. The gross loss from this cause cannot even be guessed at.

The loss through the crime that is the result of intemperance is equally beyond computation. Experience has proved that in a sober community, the jail is often empty and the police force has little to do. Our citizens are a law-abiding people and they go about their business in an orderly manner molesting no one, so long as they retain their senses. But let the demon of drink get possession of them and they become capable of all kinds of wickedness. It is no uncommon experience for a man to wake up from a debauch to find himself behind the bars and to be horror-stricken when he learns what he did when he was drunk. He cannot be convinced that he did things so contrary to his nature. A kind husband and father maddened by liquor, beating and even murdering his wife and children; a good neighbor setting fire to his friend's house or barn; an ordinarily careful man after indulging in liquor driving over some child or woman; a peaceable man, quarrelsome in his cups, attacking some inoffensive citizen—such are a few of the awful variety of crimes directly traceable to intemperance, besides the indirect results of the robberies that are committed by men whom intemperance has made desperate. The cost of police, of jail wardens, of judges and the whole apparatus of justice is increased by this vice more than by any other and is beyond the power of any man to calculate.

In addition to these shocking items of cost, there are the innumerable cases of insanity produced by intemperance which are to be found in our asylums for the insane and the suicides which coroners must investigate. Nor does the distressing list end with the life of the wrongdoer. Too often he leaves a horrible legacy to his children of a craving for intoxicants. The cost of intemperance goes on indefinitely and is multiplying day by day. After bearing the cost of the drunkard's support, of keeping policemen and courts to deal with the drunkard's crimes, and jails to lodge him in when he has outraged the law, of maintaining almshouses for the support of his wife and family, of a Coroner to hold an inquest on him when he commits suicide, and paying an undertaker to bury him, the public must begin all over again with the children who have inherited his horrible propensity. Truly an appalling reckoning this.

Then, too, there is the loss that can never be estimated—the loss of men. The wealth of a community is not really in its dollars, but in the character of the individuals. What is a man worth? Who can estimate the value of a good man? And intemperance is robbing us of men and, statisticians tell us, of women, too. It despoils manhood; it takes away the goodness, the honor, the intellect, the moral purpose that raise the man above the beast and leave us only the residuum of the beast. The loss is beyond all computation, and it is the vile product of intemperance. The fact has not yet been grasped in its fulness by the Church of Christ; otherwise it would long ago have set itself to extirpate the evil.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A Mother, New York, writes:

I desire to testify through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a direct answer to prayer. I do believe in prayer—so often my dear Saviour has answered when I have gone to him.

Old Subscriber, Vernon, N. Y., writes:

I have been greatly helped by the answers to prayer in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I was in great trouble and God has answered my fervent prayer for help. I wish to acknowledge it, hoping it will help others.

A Reader, Bloomington, Neb., writes:

I acknowledge an answer to prayer. My heart is filled with thankfulness, and I praise God for his goodness.

Mother, Greenville, S. C., writes:

Does God answer prayers? Most surely he does. Some time ago it seemed impossible but that a great trouble would come to us. Earnestly we prayed, though I know now with but weak faith, yet did God hear and answer. The trouble passed us by. Oh! how I pity those who have no prayer-answering God.

Reader, Little Rock, Ark., writes:

I wish to acknowledge the goodness and kindness of our God in answering prayers. For two years or more I have been in great distress, troubles both great and small and many different kinds, but must say that I have never called on him in vain; some deliverances have been almost miraculous. Believe his promises and trust him and all will be well.

An Ohio Reader writes:

In fulfilment of a promise made some time ago, I wish to gratefully acknowledge a recent answer to prayer. The petition went up from a broken heart, with little hope that what I longed for could ever come to pass; and I know that only God himself could have brought about results which have filled my life with joy again.

A. G., Talmage, Neb., writes:

I want to acknowledge through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an answered prayer. I used to think such testimonies of little use or importance, but I have learned to know that one in trouble can gather strength, can find faith, or have their little faith increased by such acknowledgments.

An Old Subscriber, Tuscaloosa, Ala., writes:

I wish to acknowledge through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD two direct answers to prayer, hoping it may encourage others to carry everything to God in prayer.

Mrs. C. A., Golden City, Mo., writes:

I made a vow unto the Lord that if he would grant unto me a special request I would acknowledge it. He heard my prayer, and with gratitude in my heart to a prayer-answering God, I keep my vow.

A Constant Reader, Tiffin, O., writes:

I promised my heavenly Father if he would answer my prayer in behalf of my loved one, I would acknowledge it through the columns of your paper. I now write to redeem my promise and to give him the glory, for he is good and his mercy endureth forever.

J. M. W., Troy, N. Y., writes:

God has been so good to me in answering one of my most earnest prayers that I want to publicly acknowledge my thankfulness to him as I promised him I would do.

Reader, Ridgeway, Mich., writes:

Long and earnestly I prayed for a special blessing and my prayer has been answered, and I have received what I asked for. To him be all praise and glory.

M. S., Kentucky, writes:

Surely God does answer prayer. I know he has answered mine many times, and I give him all the praise.

E. C. M., Center, Pa., writes:

I wish to acknowledge God's goodness through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I have gone to him many times with a sad heart, and he made me glad. He has given me many things I prayed for—everything for the best, I believe. I believe he hears and answers all prayers for our good.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have been received from H. W. J., Pensacola, Fla.; Reader, Elk Garden, W. Va.; R. R. L., Delphos, S. C.; Mrs. M. J. Artistic Monuments in White Bronze

COST NO MORE THAN PLAIN ONES

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments. We have designs from $4.00 to $4.000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere.

Questions of the Week

1. Is the physical experience of death probably painful or painless?

It is the opinion of the most able medical writers, that in death one does not suffer. The neural organism is so paralyzed by the general weakening of the system, that the pain itself or the lowering of all the vitality, acts as an anæsthetic acts upon the healthy organism. The approach to the actual crisis of dissolution is accompanied by more or less pain. In certain cases of death by violence this appears to be very severe. But as the vitality is lowered, the pain becomes less and less, while the neural organism becomes gradually benumbed. The expression of pain in face or body sometimes seen almost in death itself may be mechanically accounted for, and need not overturn our conclusions above. That is because the muscles were drawn while sensation was still somewhat normal, or because of a mechanical reflex of the nerves in the act of their last paralysis. Some writers claim that death is often very painful, and that it is only the pain which prostrates the vital forces until it forces the collapse which is really death. The other view, from analogy and from what is known of the nervous organization, seems to be the correct one. Observation and studied reasoning indicate that death is actually painless and that in the approach to death pain diminishes gradually. C. P. ATKINSON.

2. What symbols are used for both Christ and his people, and where are they so used?

There are six symbols used for both Christ and his people.

1. A BRANCH. For Christ, in Is. 11: 1-4, "A branch out of his roots shall bear fruit," and "with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked; in Zech. 6: 12, 13, Heb. 3: 1-4, Is. 4: 2, Zech. 3: 8, Jer. 23: 5, 33: 15, 16. For his People. John 15: 5, "Ye are the branches;" Is. 60: 21, "The people also shall be all righteous, the branch of my planting; also, Rom. 11: 16, Ps. 80: 11, 15.

2. LIGHT. For Christ. In John 8: 12, Jesus spake, "I am the light of the world;" also, in John 9: 5, Luke 2: 32, and I. John 1: 5, "God is light." For his People. Phil. 2: 15, "Among whom ye are seen as lights in the world," Matt. 5: 14, Eph. 5: 8, Acts 13: 47, Is. 42: 6, Prov. 4: 18.

3. A STONE. For Christ in I. Pet. 2: 4, 6, 7, 8, "A living stone," "A chief corner-stone," "the stone which the builders rejected," "a stone of stumbling;" also, Ps. 118: 22, Eph. 2: 20, Matt. 21: 42. For his People. I. Pet. 2: 5, "Ye also as living stones are built up a spiritual house;" also, Eph. 2: 21, 22.

4. A TEMPLE. Used for Christ in Rev. 21: 22, "And I saw no temple therein for the Lord God the Almighty and the Lamb are the temple thereof;" also, John 2: 19, 21. For his People. I. Cor. 3: 16, 17, "For the temple of God is holy which temple ye are," and I. Cor. 6; 19, II. Cor. 6: 16.

5. A SUN. For Christ. Ps. 84: 11, "For the Lord God is a sun and shield;" also, Mal. 4: 2, Rev. 21: 23, 22: 5. For his People. Judges 5: 31, "Let them that love thee be as the sun;" also, Matt. 13: 43.

6. A STAR. For Christ. Rev. 22: 16, "I am the bright and morning star," II. Pet. 1: 19, "Until the day dawn and the day-star arise in your hearts;" also, Num. 24: 17. For his People. Dan. 12: 1-3, "And they that be wise shall shine," "and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

3. What is the legend concerning the fabled Phenix, in which the cause of its immortality is explained?

The phenix was a mythical Egyptian bird, a kind of plover, like the kibitz, often depicted with human arms, and called, in hieroglyphs, rekh. Others consider it to be the bennu, or mysticorax, a bird sacred to Osiris. The first of these representations has sometimes a star upon the head, supposed to indicate the astronomical period of its appearance. It visited Egypt after the death of its father, entered the shrine dedicated to it at Heliopolis, and there buried its parent, putting the body into an egg or case of myrrh. Another account is, that the phenix, when about to die, made a nest for itself in Arabia, from which a new phenix sprung. This bird proceeded to Heliopolis, and there burned and buried its father's remains. The more popularly known version is, that the phenix burned itself, and a new and young phenix sprung from the ashes. Still another version is, that a worm crawled out of the body and developed into a new phenix. A great difference of opinion has prevailed about the phenix period; according to Ælian, it was a cycle of 500 years; Tacitus seems to make it one of 250 years; Lepsius a cycle of 1,500 years. The phenix was fabled to have four times appeared in Egypt: 1, under Sesostris; 2, under Amasis, 569-525 B. C.; 3, under Ptolemy Philadelphus, 284-246 B. C.; and lastly, 34 or 36 A. D., just prior to the death of Tiberius. The phenix also appears upon the coins of Constantine, 334 A. D., viz., 300 years after the death of Christ, who was considered the phenix by the monastic writers. It is supposed by the rabbins to be referred to Job. 39: 18; and Psalms 103.

4. Is the Christian justified in suing to recover a loan in view of Christ's injunction, Luke 6: 35?

It depends upon circumstances. If his debtor is able but refuses to pay, there is nothing in Christ's meaning to prevent the Christian from appealing to law to recover what is justly his, after all peaceable means have failed. The Revised Version of Luke 6: 35 reads, "Lend, never despairing," (margin, "despairing of no man.") We are to be kind to those of whom we can expect no return in sort. God will repay us, though man does not. "It is meant of the rich lending to the poor a little money for their necessity to buy daily bread or to keep them out of prison; in such a case we must lend with the resolution not to demand interest for what we lend, as we may most justly from those that borrow money to make purchases withal or to trade with; but that is not all, we must lend though we have reason to suspect that what we lend we lose; lend to those who are so poor that it is not probable they will be able to pay us again. This precept will be best illustrated by that law of Moses (Deut. 15: 7-10) which obliges them to lend to a poor brother as much as he needed, though the year of release was at hand." This is an old commentator's explanation, but it is good and true.

G. E. KRAUTH.

5. Does it ordinarily pay for girls to devote the time necessary to learning the piano, to say nothing of the cost of tuition?

Most emphatically "no." Music is an art, but all are not artists, and in the absence of real talent, it is a serious waste of time, energy and ability, not considering expense, for our girls to devote so much time to something for which they often have no—or very little—real talent. If the time were given to something for which they do show some ability, it would result in equal, often greater, pleasure and profit to themselves and friends. Our ears are at times deafened, our sensibilities offended, when, with quivering nerves we listen to the so-called "music" evoked by the fingers (her soul is not even sensible of the composer's thought) of one who has no talent whatever. Can we call her efforts "music?" Then by what name are we to designate those soul-entrancing sounds that "woo our hearts from out our breast, and are the gods' undoing?" ELLAE JAYE.

It does, if only to make her a useful member of the home circle. How much pleasure she may give to her parents in the evening-time of life, to invalid friends, to her brothers and sisters, and by and by, if she marries and becomes a mother, to her own little ones. When an opportunity offers to improve her talents it should be embraced. She cannot know how many duties may depend on any one such accomplishment.

MRS. H. V. CRAWFORD.

6. May the converted man hope to live without sin, as John says (I. John 3: 9) or must we believe that every man sins, as he says, I. John 1: 8?

We cannot make John contradict himself. Really all is at harmony in a consecutive line of forceful reasoning. In I. John 1: 8, and in the whole of that part of the chapter the proposition is laid down that all men are actually and by nature sinners. All have sin, and need a Saviour to be freed from that sin. It is twice in the chapter made very emphatic by his positive statement impugning the word of any man who declares the contrary for himself. He next shows Christ a Saviour for sin, and, since all men are sinners a Saviour for all men. Christ being their Saviour, he then shows them to be able to overcome the inability of the original condition. He shows that a man can keep from sin while he has the inspiration of a certain spiritual quality about him, and moreover, so long as that abides in him he cannot sin. So long as that "seed" of life "remaineth" in him (whatever the degree of love which it means), he is shielded by holy transport, and is unassailable by the temptations of the wicked one. But in these two passages we must distinguish two senses in which sin is used. In the first it is used, at least partly, as an attribute of a man's being and in relation to an absolute ideal right. In the second it means the practical and voluntary trespass against God and transgression of law in active volition. A man with grace is not bound so to transgress. CLERICUS.

7. What is the best method of dealing with a girl who is disposed to be wayward?

Study her nature and devise plans to get her interested in something in common with yourself. Make a companion of her as much as you possibly can, asking her opinion about household or other affairs, and getting her interest centered, as far as is possible, in the home. Keep her in good company as much as you can, remembering that young folks must have amusement of some sort. Study how to furnish that amusement to make her enjoy herself and at the same time to be in good company. Let your thoughts and conversation be pure and ennobling. Select books that will inspire high aspirations. Make home pleasant and cheerful; don't preach; don't scold; be kind, yet firm; don't become discouraged; and do not forget, above all, to ask guidance of the wise and loving Father who deals tenderly with His wayward children.

KATIE M. KILLAM.

8. Is a church justified in offering a minister a larger salary to quit his church when he is doing a good work in his present sphere?

Yes. Generally the call is to a larger sphere of usefulness, with greater responsibilities and labor. Moreover, no church desires a minister, who, in his present sphere, is a failure. The very fact that a minister is doing a good work in his church, shows that he is likely to be successful in a larger parish. As a laborer is worthy of his hire, no church should desire a pastor to unsettle himself without properly compensating him for the change.

JOSEPH BARTON.

9. If a visitor is really unwelcome, should a Christian host let him know it?

It is hardly necessary to consider the question, where the visitor is unwelcome because of some habit or quality that must necessarily give offense. It is difficult to apply the usages of refined society in the case of a persistent bore and "time-waster," a tattler of neighborhood gossip, a tippler, or a profane, boisterous and rowdy person. It would require a violent stretch of the imagination to say that such visitors would be welcome in a respectable home. But even in dealing with extreme cases of this class, a tactful host or hostess can avoid impoliteness, while making it clear that they are not wanted. In all ordinary cases, Christian charity and politeness will strive to overcome any repugnance we may have for an unwelcome guest. No lady or gentleman would ever be so inhospitable as to plainly intimate a desire to be rid of a caller who behaved properly, simply because they did not like him. At the same time, the manner would not be sufficiently cordial to invite a repetition of the visit.

ROBERT VYSE.

10. If one sins, and by such act brings affliction on himself, will God hear and answer his prayers for pardon and physical restoration if he persists in yielding to his sin?

The case supposed indicates that the man has long been a slave to some appetite, and has thus brought evil upon himself, but the very fact that he calls upon God shows that he realizes his weakness, in fact he may be sorely tempted, and in his weak condition yields not wilfully, but from force of circumstances, in which case surely the God of mercy stands ready not only to hear but to pardon and to aid. Yea, even though he seems to us to yield continuously still his very desire to resist must cause him to conquer at times, and each successive victory will help him to ultimate triumph over his sin, even though it cannot release him from the results and consequences of his sins. But, on the other hand, if he wilfully yields to his sin making no effort to resist, except as he may pray for pardon, we may be assured that even a willing God will not answer such prayers for his very actions prove that his real desire is for the sin rather than the restoration.

Miscelaneous Questions

Rev. J. S. Adair, Howth, Tex. I have seen the advertisements of the Red Letter Testament. Why not send me one as a sample, and if I like it, I'll pay, and if not, I'll return the same. I bought one of your Bibles and I like it very much. I subscribed for the paper during 1896. Let me hear from you as soon as possible.

We send you a Red Letter Testament by this mail and are glad of the opportunity to submit it to you. We have sent over 200,000 out on approval the last year and have received a great many letters, thanking us for adopting this method of submitting a book at our expense to people who otherwise would never have a chance of inspecting it.

Theodore S., Port de Paix. 1. In what light should we accept hypnotism as a science for the alleviation of suffering humanity, or is it of the same nature as spiritualism? 2. Is hypnotism in accord with the teachings of the Scriptures?

1. It is not accepted as a science, and unfortunately is so largely in the hands of charlatans and humbugs that honest investigators are disposed to let it alone. 2. It is in the same category with divination, sorcery, witchcraft, necromancy and others that are repeatedly denounced in Scripture.

Inquirer, Iowa. Are there any reasons why a marriage ceremony should not be performed on Sunday?

No; it is a religious as well as a civil ceremonial, and the religious part of it is certainly not out of place on Sunday. For social and other reasons, however, a week-day is usually selected.

Inquirer, Midway, Va. What is a course in Sloyd?

Sloyd, the Swedish system of manual or industrial training, is distinguished from other systems mainly by the fact that only wood is used. The aim is to educate the eye and brain, and train the hand to manual dexterity; but not to train the child for any particular trade. A symmetrical development of body and brain is the great end aimed at in this system of training. The child is taught to make all sorts of things out of wood, from simple cubes and blocks to articles of furniture and toys, mainly, of course, in miniature.

Southern Reader. Is a collegiate education always beneficial to a person, no matter what his occupation?

Not invariably so. Though a collegiate education is always desirable, there are instances in which a person may be educated out of his sphere in life and unfitted for its struggles. The late C. P. Huntington declared that over-education was a positive disadvantage to those who had to make their way in life. In a general sense, however, and probably to the majority, it would be a decided advantage.

Reader, Deposit, N. Y. 1. Is it always possible for a writer of short stories to head his story with an original title, one not already in use by another writer? 2. Does one run a risk in using some other person's title unknowingly?

1. Doubtless there are many titles used that are not original, and owing to the multitude of titles, absolute avoidance of repetition is well-nigh impossible. 2. Yes. If the original title be copyrighted, the unwitting imitator may become liable to suit for infringement.

Reader, Waynesboro, Pa. We know of none.

OUR NEW DIPLOMATS AT WASHINGTON

... The Japanese Minister and the New Faces from Various South American Republics ...

DON EMILIO C. JOUBERT, DOMINICA

EDUARDO WILDE, ARGENTINA

KOGORO TAKAHIRA, JAPAN

MANUEL A. CALDERON, PERU

JUAN CUESTAS, URUGUAY

IN no corresponding interval, since the birth of the nation, have so many diplomats come from abroad to claim our hospitality as during the past few months. All the world now recognizes the United States as a world power among the nations of the earth. Many nations previously unrepresented here have lately sent envoys, and others, who have heretofore entrusted the Washington posts to diplomats of inferior ability, have detailed some of the ablest statesmen as their representatives.

Among the new diplomats the first place should unquestionably be accorded to Mr. Kogoro Takahira, the new Japanese Minister. He began his diplomatic career about a quarter of a century ago at the legation in Washington, at the head of which he has just been placed, and later served as consul-general in New York. Since that time his experience in handling the affairs of state has been extensive, and he has represented the Mikado as Minister Plenipotentiary successively at The Hague, Rome, and Vienna. Next came an appointment to the position of Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs at Tokio, and a few months ago he was selected for the Washington place, which his own government regards as one of the most important in its consular service.

Persia, which for many years has had no delegation here, will shortly send a Minister. Probably the former Chief Secretary to the Prime Minister will be named for the honor. Hon. Phya Prasiddhi, the newcomer from Siam, is one of the most distinguished statesmen of his country. He is a lawyer by profession, and was educated in France. Returning to Siam, he built a railroad, inaugurated a system of canals, established a police force and took the first census. Some years ago he made an extended tour of the United States. Corea is also to send us an official guest.

Great changes have been made in the personnel of the South and Central American legations. Prominent among the new diplomats is Dr. Eduardo Wilde, recently appointed Minister Plenipotentiary from the Argentine Republic. Dr. Wilde and his young wife have taken a handsome house in Washington and will entertain liberally. He is famous, both as a man of letters and a scientist, and was at the head of the National Department of Hygiene in Argentina during the yellow fever epidemics. He introduced in his own land a number of women teachers from leading American colleges.

Dr. Juan Cuestas, son of the President of Uruguay, has recently come to Washington as the official representative of his home government—the first minister it has ever sent here. Dr. Cuestas is thirty-two years of age, distinguished looking, extensively traveled, and has a large fortune. He is a lawyer and was Governor of his native province.

Dr. Rafael Zaldivar, the new minister from Salvador, served as president of that country for two terms—from 1876 to 1884. Like many other diplomats from the lesser powers, he is accredited to several European countries as well as to the United States, and will therefore spend more or less time on the other side of the Atlantic. Aside from President Diaz, of Mexico, Dr. Zaldivar has received more honors and decorations than any other politician in Central America.

Nicaraugua has a new and able envoy in the person of Senor Corea. Another legation re-established after an interval of several years, is that of Bolivia. Senor Ferando Guachalla, the Minister Plenipotentiary, is accompanied by two of his children, a son and a daughter, who will this winter attend school in Washington.

Senor Manuel Alverez Calderon, the new Peruvian minister, is a business man, and has spent most of his time during recent years in England and on the Continent. Hitherto he had never occupied a diplomatic post. He has a profound knowledge of international law.

Turkey's minister, Ali Ferough Bey, has requested his government to relieve him of his duties here, finding the climate unsuited to his health. Count Cassini, the Russian ambassador, may also be transferred to a European post. Other changes in the diplomatic family at Washington are probable.

WELDON FAWCETT.

A GREAT WORK AMONG BOYS

THE Association of Organized Work for Boys came into existence in New York City October 29 as the crystallization of a movement which has been gathering force for the past five or six years.

The meeting at which this centralization was effected occurred at the Boys' Free Reading Rooms, 112–114 University Place, and was attended by representatives from many settlements, churches, and associations of this and other cities.

Mr. Dean, President of the Boys' Free Reading Room and Chairman of the Organization Committee, was elected chairman of the meeting, and gave a brief history of the movement of which he is the originator and recognized leader. It is the outcome of five or six public Conferences of Boys' Club Workers held since 1895. They were so successful, and accomplished so much in raising the standard of work done in many of the clubs, that last spring two meetings were held at the home of Mr. Alexander M. Hadden, when the advisability of forming a central association of clubs and organizations working with boys was discussed, and a committee authorized to formulate a constitution. This committee during the summer drew up a broad and comprehensive plan and constitution, which was adopted at the meeting of October 29.

The Association is to have standing committees on every phase of club work, with the best informed worker on that subject as chairman. Requests for information or aid will be referred to these committees. The following phases of work will be thus treated: libraries and literature, gymnasiums, music and glee clubs, employment bureaus, manual training, play and games, entertainments and lectures, fresh air work, etc., etc. The temporary office of the Association will be at the Boys' Free Reading Rooms, 112–114 University Place. where inquiries may be addressed. Protestants, Catholics, and Hebrews are represented in this great movement for the elevation of boy life and boy character, through the medium of every regenerating influence that can be brought to bear upon it.

AN EVENING IN THE BOYS' FREE READING ROOM, UNIVERSITY PLACE

The Boys' Reading Room, on University Place, furnishes in itself a striking illustration of the value of club rooms for boys. The rooms where games are played, as well as the library, are crowded every evening with little lads who would otherwise be on the streets.

There are hundreds of separate organizations in the world working in the interest of boys and devising ways and means of making "the coming man" more worthy of his title of brotherhood to him who is "the brightness of God's glory and the express image of his person," and the value of their union and cooperation can not be overestimated; school, municipal, State and central governments will respond to the influence that can thus be brought to bear upon them and the church of God will find reinforcement in its earnest effort to make the world better.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

. . . Outside of Self . . .

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Job 42: 10: . . . . .

And the Lord turned the captivity of Job when he prayed for his friends.

COMPARATIVELY few people read this last chapter of the Book of Job. The earlier chapters are so full of thrilling incident, of events so dramatically portrayed, of awful ailments and terrific disaster, of domestic infelicity, of staccato passage, of resounding address, of omnipotency proclaimed, of utterances showing Job to have been the greatest scientist of his day, an expert in mining and precious stones, astronomer, and geographer, and zoologist, and electrician, and poet, that most readers stop before they get to my text, which, strangely and mysteriously, announces that "the Lord turned the captivity of Job when he prayed for his friends."

Now, will you please explain to me how Job's prayer for his friends halted his catastrophes. Give me some good reason why Job on his knees in behalf of the welfare of others arrested the long procession of calamities. Mind you, it was not prayer for himself, for then the cessation of his troubles would have been only another instance of prayer answered, but the portfolio of his disaster was rolled up while he supplicated God in behalf of Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite. I must confess to you that I had to read the text over and over again before I got its full meaning. "And the Lord turned the captivity of Job when he prayed for his friends."

Well, if you will not explain it to me I will explain it to you. The healthiest, the most recuperative thing on earth to do is to stop thinking so much about ourselves and go to thinking about the welfare of others. Job had been studying his misfortunes, but the more he thought about his bankruptcy the poorer he seemed, the more he thought of his carbuncles the worse they hurt, the more he thought of his unfortunate marriage the more intolerable became the conjugal relation, the more he thought of his house blown down the more terrific seemed the cyclone. His misfortunes grew blacker and blacker. But there was to come a reversal of these sad conditions. One day he said to himself: "I have been dwelling too much upon my bodily ailments, and my wife's temper, and my bereavements. It is time I began to think about others and do something for others, and I will start now by praying for my three friends." Then Job dropped upon his knees, and as he did so the last shackle of his captivity of trouble snapped and fell off. Hear it! all ye ages of time and all ye ages of eternity, "the Lord turned the captivity of Job when he prayed for his friends."

The fault with most of us is too much self-concentration—our health, our fortunes, our advancement, our social position, our achievements, our losses, our defeats, our sufferings, our persecution, our life, our death, our immortality. Of course, there is a lawful and righteous selfishness. In a world and in a time of such activities and rivalries and temptations, we must look after our own interests and our own destiny or we will go under. Do not wait for others to take care of you. Take care of yourself. But it will not hinder our preservation and prosperity if we enlarge the sphere of our wishes and prayers so as to take in others. The law in the natural world would do well for the moral and spiritual world. The centripetal force in nature would throw everything in toward the centre, and the centrifugal force in nature would throw everything out from the centre. But the centripetal and the centrifugal work beautifully together. The one force that would throw everything toward the centre is balanced by the force that would throw everything outward. Our world, with its own interests, feels the pull of other worlds. No world, no nation, no community, no man, no woman can afford to exist only for itself, or himself, or herself. The hour in which Job has that soliloquy about the enlargement of his prayers so as to take in his friends, and he put into execution his good resolution, was the hour when he felt a tonic, a sedative, a nervine, a cataplasm that helped to cure his body, and revived his fortunes till they were a hundred per cent. better than ever before, for the record is "the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before," and tended to make him a wonder of longevity, for he lived one hundred and forty years after his troubles were gone. Oh, what a mighty medicament is the contemplation of, and the effort for the welfare of others!

"But," says some one, "it was easy enough for Job to pray for his friends. Anybody can do that. There are those to whom we are obligated for years of kindness. They stand so close to us in sympathy and reminiscence and anticipation that it is easy for us to pray for their welfare." Well, I see you do not understand that these friends of Job were the most tantalizing and exasperating friends a man ever had. Look at their behavior. When they heard of his bereavements and the accidents by whirlwind and lightning stroke, they came in and sat down by him a whole week, seven days and seven nights, and the record is "none spake a word to him." What a disreputable and wicked silence! Mind you, they professed to be religious men, and they ought to have been able to offer some religious consolation. Instead of that they were dumb as the Sphinx which at that time stood in the African desert and stands there still. Why did they not say something about reunion in the heavenly realms with his children who had been slain? Why did they not talk to him about the satisfactory explanations in the future world of things we do not understand in this world? Why did they not go to the apothecary and buy a poultice that would have soothed the carbuncles, or some quieting potion that would calm his nerves, or a few drops of febrifuge that would cool his heated frame? No! For seven days and seven nights they did nothing, and said nothing for his relief. They must have almost bored him to death.

After these three friends had completed their infamous silence of a week they began to lecture Job. First, Eliphaz, the Temanite, opens with a long story about a dream which he had in the night, and irritates the sufferer with words that make things worse instead of better, and sets him in an attitude of defence against the lecturer. Then comes Bildad the Shuhite, who gives the invalid a round scolding and calls him garrulous, and practically tells him that he deserved all that he has got, and that if he had behaved himself aright he would not have lost his house, or his children, or his estate. He practically says: "Job, I will tell you what is the matter with you. You are bad; you are a hypocrite; you are now getting paid for your wickedness." No wonder that there came from Job an outburst of indignation which calls out the other quondam friend, Zophar, the Naamathite, who begins denouncing Job by calling him a liar, and keeps on the discourse until Job responds to all three of them in the sarcastic words, "No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you."

Oh, what friends Job had! Heaven deliver us from having one such friend, to say nothing of having three of them. It was for such friends that Job prayed, and was it not a religious triumph for him so to do? Would you, the very best of you, be in very devout mood and capable of making intercession for people who had come to you in a day of trouble and said: "Good for you; you ought to be chastised; you are being taken in hand by eternal justice. If you had behaved yourself aright you would not have been sick, or persecuted, or impoverished, or made childless." O no, my friend, you would not have felt like Job when he prayed for his friends, but more like Job when he cursed the day of his nativity.

Notice that this flagellation by the three friends was premeditated. They did not merely happen in, and come suddenly upon trouble for which they could not offer a compound. The Bible says: "They had made an appointment together." The interview was prearranged. They had agreed as to what they would say to the sick man. You can see that their remarks were not extemporaneous. What they said was sublimely poetic. They rose in style into what in later times we would call the Homeric or Dantesque. But Job was not in need of poetry so much as a salve for his eruptive disorder. He was not dying for lack of a paragraph in blank-verse. He was not so much in need of a didactic lecture about the justice of God as an assurance of the divine mercy. Some pious rustic of the land of Uz, not able to put three grammatical sentences together, could have said something more consolatory.

The meanness of the attack of these religious critics was augmented by the fact that they had the sufferer in their power. When we are well, and we do not like what one is saying, we can get up and go away. But Job was too ill to get up and go away. First, he endured the seven days and seven nights of silence, and then he endured their arraignment of his motives and character, and after their cruel campaign was ended, by a sublime effort of soul, which I this day uphold for imitation, he triumphed in prayer for his tantalizers. In all history there is nothing equal to it except the memorable imploration by Christ for his enemies. No wonder that after that prayer of Job was once uttered, a thrill of recovery shot through every nerve and vein of his tortured body and every passion of his great soul; and God answered it by adding nearly a century and a half to his lifetime, and whitened the hills with flocks of sheep, and filled the air with the lowing of cattle, and wakened the silent nursery of his home with the swift feet and the laughing voices of childhood—seven sons, and three daughters celebrated for their beauty, the daughters to refine the sons, the sons to defend the daughters. There is nothing that pays so well as prayer, and the more difficult the prayer to make the greater the reward for making it.

Let us all make similar attempt to pray for those who vex and misrepresent and tantalize us. You may be very popular in the city or neighborhood where you live, but I warrant if you are in active life there are those who wish you the opposite of wishing you well. Are you benevolent? They say it is on your part a matter of personal display. Are you eloquent or learned? They declare you are overrated, and that what you say or write is of no importance. Do you try to make yourself effective in church or hospital or board of directors? They call you officious. Are you well dressed? They say you are proud. Does a false report start in the community against your character? They believe it all, and add another story to the fabrication. Some of them pretend to be friends, but they have the cudgels all ready for you, Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, Zophar the Naamathite. Now, pray for them. "Oh!" you say, "I cannot do that." I thought you could not. But you will grow in grace until you can do it as easily and as well as did Job pray for his exasperators. You ought to pity them, for defamers and detractors and the envious and jealous are not happy. They hurt themselves more than they hurt you. Better be the pursued than the pursuer. Better be the infant Christ than Herod the robber of the Bethlehem cradles. You want to be a better man. You want to be a better woman. Then scale this height of triumphant prayer, and you will be ten times more of a Christian than you ever have been. It will prolong your life as it prolonged Job's life. You will feel a glorious reaction that will last through all time and all eternity. It will steady your nerves; it will reduce your spleen; it will regulate the pulsation of your heart.

Nothing is so unhealthy as to get mad. It is a shock to the whole physical organization as well as to your mental and mo condition. It is no unusual thing f people to drop down dead in a fit of ang You people who weigh over two hundr pounds avoirdupois had better never lo your temper, for at such times apoplexy not far off. Get the equipoise of Job the text, and it will help you in busine directions. Praying for all offenders, y will have more nerve for large und takings; you will have a better balanc judgment; you will waste no valuab time in trying to get even with yo enemies. Try this height of prayer f your antagonist to-day, and if you fa try it to-morrow. Keep on until you accor plish it, and I should not wonder if, addition to the moral and religio strength it gives you, it should add a hu dred per cent. to your worldly prosperit Job 42: 10: "The Lord gave Job twice much as he had before."

What we all need is to get out of ou selves and go to helping others, whet friends or foes. As beautiful an instanc of how this can be done I found last sur mer in London, in the person of Floren Nightingale, the heroine of hospitals, and battlefields when there were no hospital The lounge on which she lies prostra is a throne of power, and though she h passed into the eighties, she trains nurs for sick-beds, and her influence is no felt among the wounded in South Afric while her memory is full of the story Balaklava, Sebastopol and Inkerman where England and France and Russi grappled. She told me that she had n been happy until she undertook to allevia suffering, and that since she began th work she had never seen an unhappy da To that work she consecrated her life, h classic attainments, her social positio her brilliant personality. Her whole lif for others, and her face shows it. I thin so much of heaven is to be found in n other human countenance. Tennyson "Charge of the Light Brigade" is n more thrilling to me than the woman bravery and sacrifice that took care o those who were shot from the saddles o the "immortal six hundred."

My text enthrones prayer and gives a sceptre to wave over our temporal an eternal life. Under God, it cured Jo and fixed up his finances, and restored hi home, and made him so robust of healt that he lived fourteen decades. "But, some one says, "I do not believe in praye for friends and foes, because I do no think that God is going to change the law of nature because we ask him so to do. Neither do I think that God will chang the law of nature at our request, but I an sure that he answers prayer through na ural law. Not a physician of any skill, a lopathic, or homœopathic, or hydropathic or eclectic, but has some time been sur prised that what was thought to be a fata disease suddenly relaxes its grasp of th patient, and he recovers. Not one law o nature has been fractured. Prayer ma have given the sudden turn to that illness A business man may be in difficulty inex tricable—mortgages against him foreclos ing, goods to be sold for some reaso become unsalable, new invention in ma chinery making the old machinery of hi factory worthless, all kinds of commercia troubles pouncing upon him at once. Mos business men have at least, once in thei lives, been put in such agonizing crisis But the harried merchant or manufacture gets out of it. Creditors become more lenient, the wheels that were made useless for making one kind of fabric turn out t be good for making another style of fabric the stock of goods that could not be sold comes into unexpected demand, and whereas all things were against him all things are now for him. No law of nature is broken and no law of trade. Prayer may have given that extrication. God, by making a law, does not tie his own hands with it. If you are free to do what you are asked to do, is not God just as free, or are you mightier than your Maker?

It is too late in the history of the church and the world to deny the power of prayer. In any audience in which there are one hundred Christians seventy-five of them at least could give you instances in their own life where prayer was answered. In Buckingham, England, a man after a long illness died. An evil neighbor then presented the widow a large bill for work done for her husband, a bill far beyond her capacity to pay, and she knew that it had been paid during her husband's lifetime, but she had no receipt. In her trials she went upstairs to pray. While she was praying a butterfly flew into the window downstairs, and her child chased it until it fell behind a chest of tools. The child asked the mother to have the chest removed, and while it was being removed a piece of paper was discovered, and it turned out to be a receipt showing that the bill had been paid. In reply to prayer God sent the butterfly, as in Elijah's time he sent a raven.

What a scene it was when that whaling ship, after a cruise of three years, approached a New England harbor. From the shore the mother knew that it was the ship in which her son was sailing. But a hurricane struck the ship and destroyed it on the rocks, and the wreckage was strewn on the beach. But the mother continued all night in prayer for her son's safety, and in the morning a knock was heard at her door, and the door opened and in came her long absent boy, exclaiming: "Mother, I knew you would pray me home." But you need not go so far for illustration. I have in my own life had answers to prayer so pointed, so direct, so startling, that I dare not recite them lest I be misunderstood. I could pick many startling instances right out of this audience. You dare not doubt the integrity of those who present such evidence. You would believe them as witnesses in any court of law standing before judge and jury, and certainly you ought to believe them when they give solemn testimony as to what they have seen and felt in answer to prayer. Silent prayer; audible prayer; ejaculatory prayer; intercessory prayer; extemporaneous prayer; liturgical prayer. Prayer in the morning to start the day right; prayer in the evening to correct the mistakes of the day. Prayer for ourselves; prayer for others; not formal and heartless prayer, which is of no more use than the prayer of the heathen of Timbuctoo, who writes his petition on a board and then washes it off and catches the water in a cup, giving it to the sick to drink for his recovery; or the prayer of the people of Tibet, who put their petition in a cylinder and turn the crank, and as many times as the cylinder turns is the prayer offered; or the prayer in India, which is made in behalf of the wealthy by the people hired to read the Koran day and night for the benefit of the employer.

Many of the prayers offered in Christian lands are as senseless as these artificial prayers of the pagans. What is needed is not only heartfelt prayer but direct prayer, such as David mentions, drawing his figure from archery, with its bow and arrows. As the notch of the arrow is put against the string of the bow, and then the archer takes aim and in a flash the arrow strikes the mark, so David resolves that his prayers shall not be aimless. He aims his prayer at the heavens: "To thee will I direct my prayer." "Have you said your prayers?" is a misleading question. You may say your prayers a thousand times without praying. The Bible speaks of Elias, "who prayed in his prayer," implying that one can seem to pray when no prayer is offered. Prayer is the soul on the wing. It is the private door into the King's palace. It is the barometer showing what the spiritual weather will be. It is stepping into the Holy of Holies. It is telegraphy with the heavens. It is the winding up of the clock of the immortal soul. It is intercommunication between the finite and the infinite. Prayer suggested by circumstances, as when the child went outdoors in the snow to play, and said afterward to her mother: "Mother, I could not help making the snow prayer," and when her mother asked her what the snow prayer was, she replied: "Wash Me and I Shall be Whiter than Snow."

Prayer is what some one has called "the slender nerve that moveth the muscles of omnipotence." Prayer is the healthful respiration of the soul. It is the whisper of helplessness into the ear of help. It is laying hold of almightiness, omniscience, and omnipresence at one and the same time. Prayer enlists all divine and angelic reinforcement. Prayer is laying hold of a pulley fastened to the heavenly throne. Prayer is the first breath of a new-born soul, and it is heard in the last gasp of earthly Christian experiences. Prayer! In an instant it mounts the highest heavens. Neither seraph nor archangel ever flew swifter or higher than the infant's petition at her mother's knee. What an opportunity is prayer! Why not oftener use it praying for ourselves and, like Job, praying for others? What better work would we do, what better lives would we live, what better hopes would we entertain, if we multiplied and intensified our prayers!

In all the tossing of this life lay hold of the rope of prayer mentioned by John Newton, who was converted on shipboard from being a blasphemous sailor to become a great preacher of righteousness, and who said: "When I first amused myself with going to sea, when the winds rose and the waves became rough, I tumbled and tossed about like a porpoise in the water; at last I caught hold of a rope that was floating about, and then I was enabled to stand upright. So, when in prayer a multitude of troublous thoughts invade your peace, or when the winds and waves of temptation arise, look out for the rope, lay hold of the rope and stay yourselves on the faithfulness of God keeping his promises."

My hearer, I will tell you the time when you can afford to cease praying. It will be when you have no sins to be pardoned, no sorrows to be comforted, no more friends or foes who need your intercessions. Queen Elizabeth said to Walter Raleigh: "Raleigh, when will you stop begging?" Raleigh replied: "When your Majesty leaves off giving." And your time, my hearer, to stop prayer will be when God has no more pardon and mercy and strength to bestow, and the resources of the Infinite are exhausted. Havelock knew the value of prayer when he arose at four o'clock in the morning for his devotions. The soldiers of the Fourteenth Massachusetts Regiment showed that they knew the joy of worship when they took a delegate of the Christian Commission to see what they called their "praying place."

Now, if God has during these remarks shown us the uses, the importance, the blessedness of prayer, suppose we try to do what Job did when he prayed for his exasperators. Many of us at the beginning of this subject felt that while we could pray for ourselves and pray for those who were kind to us, we never could reach the high point of religious experience in which we could pray for those who annoy us and make us feel worse instead of feeling better. That was a Matterhorn, that was an Alp, to the top of which we feared we could never climb, but we thank God that by his omnipotent grace we have reached that height at last. Let us pray! Oh Christ, who didst pray for thine assassins, we now pray for those who despitefully use us and say all manner of evil against us. For their eternal salvation we supplicate. When time is no more, may they reign on thrones, and wear coronets, and sway sceptres of heavenly dominion. Meanwhile, take the bitterness from their soul, and make them soon think as well of us as now they think evil. Spare their bodies from pain and their households from bereavement. After all the misunderstandings and controversies of this life are over, may we keep with them eternal jubilee in the mansions on the hill. And as thou didst turn the captivity of Job when he had prayed for those who badly used him, and health came to his body and prosperity to his estate, now that we have by thy grace been able to make supplication for our antagonists, cure our diseases, if we are ill; and restore our estate, if it has been scattered; and awaken gladness in our homesteads, if they have been bereft; and turn the captivity of our physical pain, or financial misfortune, or mental distress. And thine shall be the kingdom and the power and the glory forever and ever. Amen.

OPENING THE NEW SPURGEON TABERNACLE

SELDOM have such scenes of religious enthusiasm been witnessed in London as those which have attended the opening of the Metropolitan Tabernacle. The site, indelibly associated with the labors of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, is now again covered by a great edifice, in which his son Thomas will continue the Gospel work. It will be remembered that on April 20, 1898, the hallowed building was destroyed by fire. There were many gloomy prophecies at the time that it would never be rebuilt; but the work of a man so consecrated and so earnest as Pastor C. H. Spurgeon produces results that survive all that the devouring element can do. It was found that owing to the increased price of labor and material, a much larger sum than the original Tabernacle had cost would be required to rebuild the edifice. The front elevation was intact, and so little had the exterior walls been damaged by the fire that with an expenditure of two thousand dollars they could be made secure. But the roof was gone and the building completely gutted. Experienced architects and builders examined the ruin and pronounced it possible to rebuild it for $223,000. Toward this sum there was the insurance on the old building, amounting to $110,000. A committee was at once organized to raise the balance, and so energetic has it been, and so liberal and prompt the response, that, without any bazaar or other such means, the whole amount has been raised and the Tabernacle has been dedicated free of debt.

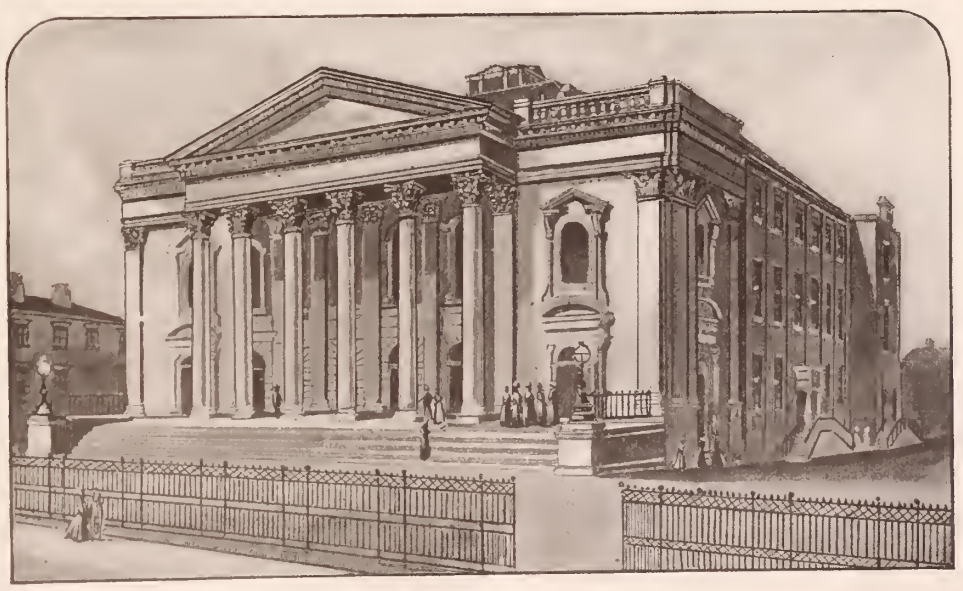
Though at first sight the new Tabernacle is an exact reproduction of the old one, there are many important changes. The present work requires increased accommodation for meetings of various societies, so the size of the auditorium has been reduced thirteen and a half feet, to admit of larger buildings in the rear. The aisles are wider, and better arrangements have been made for exit. These changes have diminished the seating accommodation, but there is still space for 2,705 persons, and a much larger number found room at the opening services. The new building is lighted by electricity, which, however, can be supplemented in case of need by gas, for which provision has been made. The decorations are pale green, cream color and gold. Many portions of the furniture are personal gifts of friends, one of the most interesting being the pastor's chair, which was given by former students of the Pastor's College, who are now missionaries in Africa. It is an interesting coincidence that the entire building has been done by the firm of William Higgs, whose father built the former Tabernacle.

The opening services began with a preliminary devotional service on September 19, conducted by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's old friend and protege, Pastor Archibald G. Brown. It was a thrilling moment when the vast audience rose to raise the first song in the new building. There is, as in the former Tabernacle, no organ in the building, and when those thousands of voices joined in singing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," the effect was electrical. Then Pastor Thomas Spurgeon read a few passages of Scripture, the first of which was, "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad." Congratulatory telegrams from many lands were handed in and read; one of the most pathetic came from Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon, the widow of the late pastor, who is very ill. It read: "Loving congratulations and an earnest desire for the presence and blessing of God at the meetings," and was signed simply "Mother." In his opening remarks Pastor Thomas Spurgeon laid special emphasis on the fact that, as the foundations of the new building were the same as of old, so the testimony was the same; and, he added, though it might be a shock to some, the place was no broader than before. Where they had stood, there they now stand.

The service being of a strictly devotional character, no applause was admissible, otherwise, when Mr. Sankey rose to sing, he would have received a most cordial welcome. He was very happy, he said, to be present in the new Tabernacle, as he had had great pleasure in having been in the old. He brought the greetings of ten thousand friends beyond the sea, among them Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, who sent them his love and his great rejoicing that the building had been reconstructed. The last time he, Mr. Sankey, had stood there was to sing a song over the dead body of the greatest preacher of the nineteenth century. He felt sad as he thought of the two mighty men who had passed away—C. H. Spurgeon and D. L. Moody. They were left to carry on their work. He then sang "The Better Land," accompanying himself on his own little organ.

Two more services were held that day, and on the next and two succeeding days there were again three meetings in which addresses of congratulation and special sermons were delivered, not only by Baptist ministers but by representatives of the Congregational, Presbyterian, and other denominations. At every meeting Mr. Ira D. Sankey's services were in special request, and on Saturday evening, September 22, he gave, by urgent demand, a complete service of song. That was the most attractive of the whole series. There was an extra guard of police in expectation of the great crowd, but the rush was so strong that the burly men in uniform were swept off their feet and carried bodily with the surging mass into the building.

Mr. Sankey sang "I'm a Pilgrim," mentioning that he was taught it by his mother. The next songs were: "Saved by Grace," "There'll be no Dark Valley when Jesus Comes," "My Ain Countrie," and the ever welcome "Ninety and Nine." The enthusiasm of the congregation can hardly be exaggerated. Mr. Sankey introduced a number of reminiscences connected with the authorship of both words and music of these Gospel songs, and spoke words of encouragement to Christian workers.



THE REBUILT METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE, LONDON

WAR TIME RIDE OVER THE WORLD'S LONGEST RAILWAY

WITH RUSSIA'S ARMIES IN SIBERIA

EXCITING EXPERIENCES OF AN AMERICAN TRAVELER....

EMBARKATION OF COSSACKS AND ARTILLERY AT BLAGOVECHTCHENSK, FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE SIBERIAN RAILROAD

IN the first chapters of the story of his remarkable journey "Across Siberia In War Time," which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD October 24, Mr. Frederick A. North narrated his experiences while a passenger on the Trans-Siberian Railway, traveling ten thousand versts over one unbroken stretch of Russian territory between St. Petersburg and Vladivostok. There Mr. North took steamer for Port Arthur, and continued thence by sea to Nagasaki in Japan, across the Pacific to Vancouver, then by rail to New York, completing his journey around the world in ninety-six days. With the story of his exciting experiences in Port Arthur and elsewhere, he concludes this most interesting narrative, which he wrote out at sea for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from his carefully-kept diary.

A Strange Mingling of Races

JAPAN SEA, Aug. 25.—The racial types and mixed nationalities seen along the Trans-Siberian Railroad embrace nearly all shades of characteristics in the Caucasian and Mongol. While the railroad is chiefly operated by Russians, its construction is the work of Chinese, Buriats, Calmuks, Tartars, Coreans, Cossacks, Japanese and Russian convicts. I have often seen villages of these toiling people, located along the line of the Siberian Railroad, now deserted where the bridges and great embankments are completed. The Buriats inhabit conical felt tents, which they set in long rows on the hillside.

The Russian officers, as I found them, are educated, have traveled, possess liberal views, are of wealthy families, have plenty of money and are generous. The common soldiers are, as a rule, uneducated and suspicious of strangers, exceedingly religious, kind-hearted, poorly paid, and blindly subservient to the commands of their superiors.

Kind-hearted Russian Officers

I never shall forget a little incident that occurred away back in Central Siberia, on the Hilok River, July 25, illustrating the compassion of the army officers for the poor unfortunate fettered convicts in two iron-barred cars attached to our train. At eight o'clock in the morning the train stopped twenty-five minutes to change engines, and allow the passengers to buy something to eat from the native women who came down out of the Cossack village. I went back to see the armed guards feed their one hundred convicts. Black bread, coarse meat, tea and sugar were their rations. One of the convicts, whose appearance showed that he was not yet inured to a prisoner's fare, bought some white bread from one of the Cossack women, but when he discovered that he did not have copecks enough to pay for it, with a look of disappointment he handed the loaf out of the prison car and the guard gave it back to the woman. Several army officers who were passengers with me, observing the situation, quickly bought up all the bread and cakes from the natives and told the guards to distribute it to the prisoners. The next day I saw the officers again donating delicacies to the prisoners.

The Trans-Siberian Railroad has good drinking water everywhere provided; it has a good road-bed, good rails, good stations, the best bridges in the world, cars superior to any other country except America, and this line will soon be one of the greatest arteries of commerce in the whole world.

It spans a longer stretch of country than any other railroad on earth. From St. Petersburg to Vladivostok, the present terminus of the line, it is exactly 6,547 miles. There is, however, no railroad between Stretensk on the Chilka River and Khabarousk on the lower Amoor River, and consequently, at present, all communication between these two points, a distance of 1,491 miles, is made by steamboat in summer and sledge in winter.

The railroad line through Manchuria, which before the Boxer trouble was nearly ready for the rails, will materially shorten the distance, and quicken the time in reaching Vladivostok and Port Arthur. The present war with the Chinese has so far postponed the completion of the Manchurian division, which would have been ready for traffic this fall, that a year's time will now be required in which to finish it. A Russian army of one hundred thousand soldiers has been sent into north eastern China, all along the line of the Manchurian, or Eastern China Railroad, as it is called, to protect the interests of the Russo-Chinese Bank, which has undertaken the financial support of the enterprise, and to prevent the Boxers from further destruction of the road-bed and intimidation of the graders and bridge-builders. A year hence passengers can make an all-rail journey across Manchuria by way of Nagadan, Tsitsilkhar, Kharbin, Ningouta, Nikosk to Vladivostok, or south from Kharbin to Port Arthur, thus avoiding the steamboat passage on the Amoor River, or the ocean passage from Vladivostok to Port Arthur.

From United States Consul Greener at Vladivostok, and other reliable sources, I learned that the average cost of construction per mile across the steppes is about $20,000; but through all other parts of the route it cost far more; through the Urals, for instance, it cost not less than $80,000 per mile. The gre iron bridge over the Volga River co $2,500,000, and the bridge over the Yen sei cost $1,000,000. The paid laborers i the construction of the line receive fro 30 cents to 35 cents a day.

A Delightful River Trip

My voyage of 1,500 miles down th Chilka and Amoor rivers was a continu delight. The changing scenes of mou tain, lowland, dark forest, Cossack vi lages, Buriat huts, signal stations, barge filled with soldiers singing their wa songs, flatboats filled with cavalry horse kerchiefed women with baskets of ed bles, blackened ruins of Chinese town passing steamers hurrying up the river t bring down more soldiers, pleasan weather, cheerful army officers, and every body happy except the Chinese, wer among the many experiences of m Amoor voyage.

It might be interesting to note ho war has advanced prices in Siberia. M Russian room-mate at Blagovechtchensk bought a half-pound package of tea o which was pasted a small tag marke "65k." With a knife blade he deftly re moved the bit of paper containing th figures and found "50k."; on removin the second layer, "35k." was revealed another scale removed and "25k." ap peared. The tea merchant had evidently marked his goods according to the ad vance in price. The "k" stands fo "kopeck" or "copeck," worth ½ cent At Vladivostok, in a dairy locality, eggs are 30 cents a dozen, milk 20 cents a quart, cheese 60 cents a pound. These articles are from three to five times thei normal prices.

Taking Siberia as a whole, I know of no other country developing faster, no possessing more sure qualities of permanent growth and greatness. It will develop somewhat as our American western States have done, along the great trans-continental railroads, on the rich prairies, fertile valleys, and wide cattle-ranges. Agriculturally, southern Siberia is very important: in mining she is attracting prospectors from all over the world; in timber she might supply all Europe: and in stock-raising she could furnish the world. The Russian Government is carrying out a successful policy of settling up Siberia.

Russia and the Chinese Trade

The great Siberian Railroad will bring to the very door of Russia the lion's share of the trade of China's 450,000,000, and the whole of the empire of Japan. No manufacturing nation in the world has anything like the advantage in supplying the millions of people in the Far East, and also Siberia, that the American nation has. All along the great railroad cities and towns are building up more rapidly than I have seen elsewhere in the circuit of the globe. In Irkutsk, Chita, Stretensk, Blagovechtchensk, Khabarousk, and Vladivostok, brick buildings are going up in magnificent proportions. At the present time there is need of more laborers and skilled mechanics.

YELLOW SEA, Aug. 27.—Yesterday afternoon Capt. Ptachinsky, commander of this vessel, the Petersburg, invited me to join him on the bridge. At his request I produced my passport and other papers of identification. He asked me where I had been and what I had seen. Referring to the war, he said: "Did you not see something very bad on the Amoor River?" I answered guardedly, saying: "Both sides committed atrocities: but the Chinese commenced the war." He then said: "We shall reach Port Arthur about noon to-morrow, and if you go on shore be particularly careful what you say and do. By all means sleep in the boat at night." I then asked: "Will they not allow me to walk about the town?" "I suppose they will," he answered, "but martial law prevails there, and the authorities may make you trouble if they become suspicious of you."

ON THE GREAT TRANS-SIBERIAN RAILROAD

PORT ARTHUR, Aug. 28.—Alas! I do not love the Russians and their government to-day as much as I did yesterday. They have just arrested me and dragged me by force before the police tribunal, to prove me a spy. I was charged with sitting down on the church steps after coming out of church, and writing something. One of my note-books was produced, and these are the words they found written: "Port Arthur, Aug. 28. Rain again. Walked out this forenoon and attended church—holiday service. Went through the village, seeing what I could and making note of same. Sailors and soldiers attended church. Fine church inside. Saw game crickets, tinsmith, blacksmith and market men." They had various other parts of the book read and translated. I had guarded myself against writing down facts about their fortifications, or recording the strength of their armies, or my opinion of the Czar or the Russian mode of warfare, but was afraid they might throw me into prison when they commenced reading the following description of the Cossack soldier: "Cap, blouse, high-top boots, large pants, belt, hair short, seldom beard except mustache, crucifix on neck, strong, broad-shouldered, rifle, bayonet, long dagger, ammunition, kettle, cup, spoon, soap, towel, haversack, bag, tea, sugar, black bread, rice, needle, thread, change of clothing, blanket and shoemaker's tools."

Released, and Off for Home

After the foregoing had been read to them they turned to me and gravely demanded why I wrote it. I told them that I was a teacher in America and desired simply to tell my pupils how a Russian soldier is equipped. They were not satisfied with the examination of my note-book, so looked at my passport and professional testimonials to see if I had told them the truth about being a teacher. They also read a letter I had from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a pass from the governor at Blagovechtchensk, a letter from the Russian Consul General at New York, a letter from Mr. Chustova, a Russian gentleman at Stretensk, legal permission from the chief of police at Vladivostok to leave the empire, and other documents.

They held a short consultation, then, without saying another word to me, walked out of the court-room and left me entirely alone. I gathered up my papers, which had been spread upon the table, and on the lightest foot that ever touched the streets of Port Arthur made my way to the ship, which was nearly ready to start for Nagasaki, in Japan, and thence home.

FREDERICK A. NORTH.

LONDON'S CHRISTIAN POLICE UNION

THE "Christian Police Association of London" is an unsectarian and non-political union, having for its object the welfare both spiritual and temporal, of policemen and their families. As a Prayer Union, it is designed for the promotion of true Christianity in the police force, and its full membership is open to all policemen who "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ" with the heart, are willing to confess him before men and are desirous of following him in their lives. Members agree to pray for one another, and to work for Christ as they have opportunity.

Connected with this association are: (1) A Police Bible Reading Union, to promote the daily study of the Word of God. (2) A Police Temperance Union, to promote Total Abstinence. (3) A Woman's Branch for the Christian wives and mothers of policemen. (4) A Police Missionary Union, supported almost entirely by the subscriptions of policemen. The "Willing Hearted Helpers' Band" was started as an auxiliary to the association, to enable all interested in God's work among the police to become "Helpers" and "Workers together with Him." Established through the agency of the association are various police institutes, convalescent homes and orphanages.

This association was organized in London, England, by Miss Catharine Gurney, with the full approval of the Commissioners of the Metropolitan and City Police, and now has branches in many parts of the world. Each city and borough branch in London has its own committee, consisting of members of the force, with the honorary secretary and the workers of the branch as honorary members.

Each member receives a card, on which is printed the foundation rule, "That all policemen be invited to join this association who can truthfully say that they believe on the Lord Jesus Christ with the heart, are willing to confess him with the mouth (Rom. 10:9, 10), and are determined by his grace to follow him in their life (John 12:26)."

Each branch holds monthly or quarterly meetings, to which all policemen and their wives are invited. These meetings have been found by those who attend them to be seasons of true spiritual refreshment, and as such are eagerly looked forward to by all. In the county forces, it is impossible for members to meet regularly, and there the need of fellowship and help is met by correspondence, a quarterly letter being sent by the honorary secretary to each member of the C. P. A., and, often, to each member of the force. Educational classes are also held in many centres, and also singing classes, meetings for policemen's wives, and classes for their children. A Prayer Union has also been started for wives and mothers, in connection with the C. P. A.

Many members of the force, who formerly never opened their Bibles, have begun to read the word of God regularly, and to attend the Bible class. Others have commenced to pray, often for the first time; or old home teachings have been brought to their remembrance, and a Christian mother's influence has been revived. Who can say how many prayers of dear ones, now in glory, are thus being answered? Many Christian men, who were formerly hiding their colors, have been led to confess Christ openly. Some who were unknown to each other before as brethren in the Lord have now been brought together, and are thereby strengthened and encouraged. A notable instance of this occurred at one of the earliest meetings held in connection with the association. A Christian constable had just sat down after testifying for Christ, when another man rose and said: "I have passed the last speaker on my beat now for some years, but did not know until this afternoon that he was a Christian." "Well," rejoined the other, "I did not know you were one either." Thus were these two brought together, to be mutual help to one another in the time to come. Many of the members are helping forward the Lord's work in holding Gospel temperance meetings, and in various other ways.

In New York the work progresses steadily under the care of Miss S. R. Kendall. The C. P. A. rooms in West 30th street are open all day long for the use of the police, and a meeting is held every afternoon to plead for God's blessing on the force, besides meetings for Bible study, testimony, and gospel addresses on several days in the week. Though the attendance is not large, it is steadily increasing.

WORLD'S GENERAL TEMPERANCE SUNDAY

SOBER LIVING

International Sunday School Lesson for November 25th: Titus 2: 1-15.

CHRIST AT THE TABLE

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT: Titus 2: 12: "We should live soberly, righteously, godly in this present world."

A WORLD lesson on a world problem. At the suggestion of the London Sunday School Union, the International Sunday School Convention has designated the fourth Sunday in November in each year as the "World's Temperance Sunday," by way of building for the twenty-five millions in the Sunday Schools of all nations a breakwater against the holiday flood of temptations. It is hardly less than sacrilege to use the sacred Thanksgiving and Christmas as times of increased dissipation. Some prefer an October date for Temperance Sunday in order to influence the November elections, but if Christian sentiment is to influence them effectually it will need to begin, not a week, but a whole year before the voting. It should also begin with the duty of personal abstinence as the only secure pedestal of prohibition. It is to abstinence alone that Paul devoted the present lesson, because he was under a despotism where Christians could not make laws, and because the world was no more ready for prohibition than for emancipation.

A world lesson on a world problem never so serious as now. Dr. James S. Dennis, author of that masterpiece of missionary literature, Christian Missions and Social Progress, declares that viewing the world at large intemperance is increasing, especially in missionary lands, through the liquor traffic, thrust upon them by Christian nations. It is too little known that half the world has been under total abstinence religions, furnishing seven hundred millions of arguments against the shallow theory that the desire for drink is universal and natural, and that the traffic must therefore be tolerated. The most awful crime of Christendom is that by permission of Christian citizens, Christian nations are breaking down this one great virtue of heathen religions. When we find in this lesson about the missionary island of Crete, that the "aged women" and "young women," as well as "aged men" and "young men," needed to be exhorted not to get drunk, we recognize without further evidence that Crete was being "civilized." The process was less atrocious then, for they had only wine—no "Holland gin" or "New England rum," the vilest drinks that ever burned their way down human throats with their hellish fire. Dr. Dennis' statement that on the whole the consumption and consequences of drink are increasing is confirmed by a recent official report to the British Parliament, which finds a decrease only in Canada, where the per capita consumption of alcoholics is only four gallons, as against seventeen in the United States. While Canada consumes less than one-fourth as much as we do, Australasia consumes only three-fourths as much as we do—the record of New Zealand and Tasmania being next best to Canada of all the world. The sad statistics of the United States are outdone by those of Great Britain. Germany, despite the lager beer that is supposed by some to be substituted for harder drinks, consumes increasing quantities of distilled liquors, and so France also, the hardest drinker among the nations, where the "wine cure" has not prevented an alarming increase in the use of absinthe and other "distilled damnation." Worse than the home consumption is the way in which the two foremost nations of the earth, Great Britain and the United States, have debauched with drink the weaker races they have essayed to uplift. As Congress is about to meet, let the following resolution be adopted by teachers' meetings, missionary societies, churches and other bodies, and let the petitions authorized be sent at once to the proper Congressman and Senator and to the President: "Resolved, that we hereby authorize the officers of this meeting to petition Congress and the President for the abolition of saloons in our army and islands; and for a law forbidding American traders to sell intoxicants in the New Hebrides and other islands not our own, corresponding to England's law; and we further petition the Senate to ratify the pending treaty entered into in 1899 by the great nations of the world to extend the protection against intoxicants previously granted to the Congo Free State to a larger zone of Central Africa; and we also petition the Senate to propose the world-wide extension of this mandate of true civilization to all child races at least."

A world lesson for "this present world," as the Golden Text reminds us. Paul's Epistle to Titus, no less than the Epistle of James, is devoted to making a "better world" here and now. They have not studied the Bible intelligently who have made religion only or chiefly an effort to save souls in heaven. Paul is often spoken of as the advocate of faith, while James is arrayed against him as the apostle of good works. But the faith Paul advocates, as we see in Titus and the 11th of Hebrews, is a faith that ripens in faithfulness. Sir Joshua Reynolds pictured faith as a heaven-gazing maiden, but the faith pictured in these passages may be described by a paraphrase of Bryant's ode to liberty:

O faith, thou art not as poets dream,
A fair young girl . . . .
A bearded man, armed to the teeth art thou;
One mailed hand grasps the broad shield,
And one the sword.

Does the Bible Teach Abstinence or Moderation? Speak thou the things which befit (literally) healthful teaching. Some teachers are hesitant in teaching Bible temperance lessons, because they are not fully persuaded that the Scriptures command total abstinence. To such, Dr. A. E. Dunning says: "We do not need a direct precept of the Bible to teach total abstinence. Such admonitions as this lesson gives to follow righteousness and avoid wickedness are sufficient. [He shows how drink promotes almost every form of sin, and that consequently to avoid these sins we must avoid drink]. The Bible tells us that no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven. We know that the use of liquor as a beverage tends to make drunkards."

The Bible, Revised Version, has this command: "Abstain from every form of evil" (I. Thess. 5: 22). By irresistible logic, this requires total abstinence from intoxicants, since that which prompts to every form of evil must itself be one of the forms of evil. The old plea of the tippler that the Bible says, "Let your moderation be known to all men" (Philip 4: 5) has been swept away by the more correct translation of the Revision, "Let your forbearance be known unto all men." The Bible, not alone in single proof texts, but in the great onflowing, resistless tide of its teaching, requires us to "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness." We are to use temperately whatever is good in itself, but abstain altogether from whatever is harmful and evil.

John Wesley's mother once wrote to him when he was in college, "Would you judge of the lawfulness or the unlawfulness of a pleasure, take this rule, Whatever weakens your reason, impairs the tenderness of your conscience, obscures your sense of God, or takes off the relish of spiritual things; whatever increases the authority of your body over your mind, that thing, to you, is sin."

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll;
Leave thy low vaulted past;
Let each new temple nobler than the last
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thy outworn shell by life's unresting sea.

Gray-headed Drunkards Admonished That aged men be temperate, grave . . . aged women likewise . . . not slanderers nor enslaved to much wine, What a condition Paul and Titus must have confronted inside the church of Crete when even the "mothers in Israel" had to be warned against enslavement by drink! Crete has always had a bad name for "fleshly lusts that war against the soul." Paul quotes one of their own prophets as saying, "Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, idle gluttons" (Titus 1: 12). To such a people, however, Paul did not hesitate to send the Gospel by the lips of Titus, one of his Gentile converts. In this epistle Paul encourages and instructs him how to develop his hard field. Thousands of such human animals the Gospel has transformed. Strange that we should be so sceptical of the power of the Gospel to transform the savages of foreign mission fields and the savages of our cities and frontiers, when we are daily reminded by the very names of the days of the week that our own ancestors were idol-worshiping savages. And when we read how they drank deep from the skulls of their foes, how can we doubt that the Gospel can to-day overmatch intemperance? That which has transformed savage Britons into Christian Englishmen can change those who are "earthly, sensual, devilish," into spiritual, generous, courageous Christians.

How Alcohol Wrongs the Children The young women to love their husbands, to love their children, to be sober-minded. Professor Drummond finds all through the world of life, from the lowest forms to the highest, not only the masculine selfish "struggle for life," but also the unselfish feminine "struggle for the life of others." The lion fights for food, but the bravest battles of the lioness are to defend her young. So to-day the men in the church are too exclusively occupied with the struggle for life, in the battle for bread for themselves and their families, and they leave too much to the mothers the battle for the life of others, the defence of the children against the saloons and other perils.

It is the mothers and children who suffer most from the drink traffic.

A little boy, when in a store, said:

"Well, the saloons are open again."

"Yes," answered the merchant, "and does it make any difference to you, my little man?"

"Well," said the boy, hesitatingly, "we don't have so much to eat at our house when the saloons are open."

This calls up the thought that although Paul could do nothing but exhort men not to buy or sell drink, Christians of to-day, as a result of Paul's teachings developing into popular governments, can do something besides exhort. God's full plan of law and Gospel can now be applied. Gladstone's great saying, that it is the purpose of law to make it as hard as possible to do wrong and as easy as possible to do right, finds its best illustration in laws that protect tempted youth by closing the pitfalls when gambling, intemperance and impurity are promoted as a matter of business.

We can make men moral by law to the same extent that we can make men healthy by law. Formerly the plague swept like a destroying flood over Europe about once in ten years, and men bowed their heads in their streets and said, "It is a visitation of God." They counted it a "necessary evil." But wiser men inaugurated street cleaning and public sanitation, and as a result the plague almost wholly disappeared from the world, and the average length of life was increased two years. Men had been made more healthy by law, not necessarily but inevitably, by creating a better environment; and so our tempted young people, though each one may do wrong if he will, are "made moral by law," the sin decreasing inevitably wherever the temptations to it are removed. The so-called "necessary evils" could be almost totally abolished if efforts as persistent and systematic as have been made to protect physical health were made to protect moral health. In some extreme cases law and order work is needed, but nine-tenths of the people who are corrupting youth, many of them respectable citizens doing it thoughtlessly, would stop if asked to do so by an impressive delegation representing the guardians of children, parents and teachers. The only arrest needed by most wrong-doers is "the arrest of thought."

Perils of Young Men The younger men likewise exhort to be sober-minded. The statistics often published showing how few young men are in the churches and Sunday Schools, how many in the saloons and jails, should arouse us like a fire-bell. In almost any saloon on any evening you will find the majority of the patrons are young men, more in one of a hundred saloons than you will find then at the Y. M. C. A., or the following Sunday at any Sunday School or church.

If the influence of drink showed itself only in physical injury, it would be bad enough, but our lesson reminds us that drink is but one of a fraternity of vices. With it goes vile talk, for one thing, calling for a special fight in itself. When John Coleridge Patteson, who became the devoted bishop, was a lad at school, he was one of the cricket eleven. At the suppers, after the matches, the boys became accustomed to indulge in rather coarse mirth and silly jokes, and the talk sometimes became bad. At last Patteson could stand it no longer. He rose up from his place one night, and said, clearly and decidedly, with boyish frankness and determination: "I must leave the eleven if this conversation is to go on; I will not share in it; and I can not listen to it. If you persist in it, nothing is left me but to go." Instead of his going, the bad talk had to go. Browning shows that the root of nearly all vices is the lack of a girded will:

The sin I impute to each frustrate ghost
Is the unlit lamp, and the ungirt loin,
'Tho the end in sight was a vice.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Presidential Election

IN every city, town and village of our broad land the one supreme subject of interest in the news of the past week was the re-election of President McKinley for another term in the White House. To one-half the nation the news flashed through the land on Wednesday morning brought joy and gladness, while to the other half it was a disappointment. This was inevitable and it was no more than has occurred in former years. It now becomes the duty of every patriot to accept the decision of the polls with all loyalty, and laying aside all bitterness and discontent to work cheerfully for the good of our common country. We have reason for thankfulness that we live in a land where these matters are settled by votes and not by revolution, and that our people are sufficiently patriotic and self-disciplined to bow to the decision of the majority even when they do not approve it. It is gratifying, too, to notice that the campaign just closed has been of a cleaner character than those of former times. There has been less of personal abuse, less of vituperation, and more of discussion of principles than in previous campaigns. This indicates national progress and a recognition of the fact that intelligent men may differ on questions of national policy without imputing to one another unworthy motives or evil designs. There is no reason for despair of the national future on the part of the party that has failed to elect its candidate. This country has passed safely through crises in the past, in spite of the pessimistic predictions of the politicians. God still rules among the nations of the earth, and we may be quite sure that the destinies of this great country are safe in his hands. It is also encouraging to remember that the President is a God-fearing man who relies for guidance in his responsible position on the same beneficent Power as we depend on in our humbler spheres, and to him as to us the same promise is made:

If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him (James 1:5).

Fighting a Treacherous Foe

Thrilling stories of the defence of the British Legation in Pekin, by the European and American residents are told by those who went through the awful experience. After the German Ambassador had been killed in the street, it became clear that no foreigner was safe. One legation after another was attacked and at last it was realized that the only hope of any of the ambassadors and their suites being saved was for all to get together and unite their forces. The British Legation offered the best facilities for defence as it occupied a large area and was surrounded by high walls. Thither, therefore, the Europeans fled, and shortly afterward they were joined by the Americans and the Japanese. On June 20 all were safe within the walls which were quickly surrounded by a yelling mob of Chinese, who threatened to burn the legation and murder the inmates. Every available carpet, curtain, tablecloth and sheet was made up into a sandbag by the ladies of the legation, was filled with earth by the servants and piled around the interior buildings, and a ten-foot trench was dug around the premises. Fortunately, a few guns had been brought by the marines, and they were dragged into position; but the supply of ammunition was so small that it had to be carefully economized. Day after day, and sometimes all night long, the Chinese kept up a hot fire. In spite of all the precautions men were killed and many wounded. Bomb-proof shelters for the women and children were dug, but the women nobly refused to provide for their own safety, while their fathers, husbands and brothers were fighting. They busied themselves serving out ammunition to the men at the loop-holes and in helping the wounded. As the days passed the subject of food became serious. By the beginning of August, horseflesh became the only diet, with a little porridge and bread. Such luxuries as canned milk and a few chickens were reserved for the sick in the hospital, which had been hastily constructed. At last, on August 13th, after the siege had continued fifty-four days, and the garrison were almost in despair, the welcome sound of foreign cannon was heard in the distance. Every one was cheered, but they were in greater danger than ever. The Chinese realized that unless the brave defenders were annihilated that night the chance of massacreing them would be lost. They made the fiercest attack of the whole siege soon after midnight, and the garrison, exhausted by insufficient food and by loss of sleep, their numbers thinned by death and wounds and fever, were nearly overwhelmed. But they fought bravely, and held their assailants back until the international army arrived and forced the Chinese to flee for their lives. So it happens in the Christian's struggle with the great enemy of souls.

AN INCIDENT DURING THE DEFENCE OF THE BRITISH LEGATION AT PEKIN

The Lord will preserve him and keep him alive, . . . thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies (Ps. 41:2).

Our Greatest Scales

The largest as well as the most accurate weighing machine in the country is now the great scales at the Navy Department at Washington, D. C. Formerly the scales of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Baltimore and Ohio, each with a capacity of a hundred tons, held the palm, but Uncle Sam's scales surpass both these instruments in capacity and accuracy. A recent visitor to Washington saw an impressive exhibition of the capacity of this instrument. A fragment of brick was placed on the weighing platform and though it weighed less than a pound, its weight was correctly indicated. Shortly afterwards two huge thirteen-inch guns, weighing over fifty-five tons each, were brought on heavy freight-cars to be weighed and the same scales accurately registered the vast weight. Considerable skill and care were exercised in producing a machine of such vast capacity. Some of the most sensitive parts were manufactured specially for it. Much of the machinery is underground, resting on solid beds of concrete, and great care was taken to have the foundation so firm that there should be no depression or vibration, no matter how colossal the weight by which the scales were tested. Great pride is felt in the accuracy and sensitiveness of the instrument, which seems to be as nearly perfect as man can make it; but like all human productions it fails to attain the perfection of God's work, which reaches a sphere beyond our capacity.

The Lord weigheth the spirits (Prov. 16:2).

Telephones in the Grave

An apparatus to save the life of a person who has been buried alive has been invented by a Frenchman. It consists of a tube, which is inserted in the soil of the grave above the coffin, and passes through the coffin lid, almost touching the breast of the body. Inside the tube is a wire to which a plate or ball is attached. If a person has been buried alive, he would naturally, on recovering consciousness, attempt to rise, or to raise his hands. In either case, if the apparatus invented by the Frenchman had been put in the grave, the ball or plate would be moved. This would set ringing a bell placed in a box above the grave and keep it ringing for half an hour. It would, also, by applying the principle of the burglar alarm, call up the Central Telephone Station, from which help could be speedily sent to the cemetery, if the ringing of the bell over the grave had not already given the alarm to the attendants. Probably some persons who have a nervous dread of premature burial may exact a promise from their relatives to have such an apparatus attached to their graves. The number to whom it would be of service would be extremely small, if indeed any are ever buried alive. A much more important matter is for preparations to be made for that day of universal awakening which will come to all the dead, when eternal happiness or unutterable woe will depend on the acceptance or neglect in this life of the offer of salvation.

Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt (Daniel 12:2).

A Precaution Omitted

A case of fatal negligence has occurred in the service of an electric lighting company in New York. The company employs men during the day-time to test their wires, especially in the vicinity of any lamps which are reported to have been burning dimly or intermittently during the preceding night. As it is an extremely dangerous occupation the men chosen for it are the most experienced employees, who know how to avoid danger. One of these, with his helper, was sent out to the west side of the city, where the wires were known to be faulty. He worked for an hour or more making his tests and repairing where it could be done with the tools he had with him. He was near the home of a friend at that time and he looked in for a few minutes to chat with him. He soon came out again and resumed his work; but he had removed his rubber gloves when he went to his friend's house and he did not put them on again when he ascended the next pole. In a few moments his helper heard a heavy thud and looking around saw the lineman prostrate on the ground. He went to his assistance, but the man was dead. A black streak on his hands showed where the fatal current had entered his body. In his pocket were the rubber gloves that would have protected him. It seems strange that so experienced a man should have neglected the simple precaution, yet nothing is so common in the affairs of the soul. There are multitudes who know the way of salvation and are familiar with Gospel truth, who do not apply it to their own hearts and lives.

To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not to him it is sin (James 4:17).

Unwelcome Guests

Two men appeared in a police court in New York a few days ago to answer the charge of intrusion at a wedding. A young couple had been married at St. Agnes's Church, and after the ceremony, a grand supper was spread at the Marlborough Hotel for the guests. It was arranged that the supper should be followed by a dance, and when all had partaken of it and had gone upstairs to the dancing-room, the windows of the supper-room were left open. About half an hour afterwards, one of the guests having occasion to return to the supper-room saw, to his astonishment, two men, apparently tramps, seated at the table eating the delicacies and drinking the wines. He hurried back and told the bride's father what he had seen. At once the police were sent for and the two men were arrested. Before the magistrate, they made the excuse that they were standing outside, looking into the brilliantly-lighted apartment, when one of the guests asked them why they did not come in and drink. They waited until all the guests had disappeared and then entered by the window. If the invitation was really given, it was probably the idle jest of some hilarious guest and the men must have known that they had no right to the viands and the wines. It would be well if this experience taught them the danger of being excluded from that great supper of the ages, the marriage supper of the Lamb, to which they, in common with all men, are invited, but to which none will be admitted but they who have accepted his salvation.

The wedding is ready but they which were bidden were not worthy (Matt. 22:8).

BRIEF NOTES

Next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will contain letters from correspondents on the question raised in THE MAIL-BAG, of the use of unfermented wine at the Lord's Table; also an important article by Dr. Talmage, emphatically endorsing the use of such wine and showing that it is justified by Scripture.

Rev. Thomas Harrison commenced a series of revival services in Indianapolis on November 11. They are being held in Roberts Park Methodist Episcopal Church, of which Dr. Bacon is pastor. In 1881, Mr. Harrison held services in the same church for twelve consecutive weeks. Many of his helpers are the men and women who were converted under his preaching nearly twenty years ago.

The Interdenominational Council of Women for Christian and Patriotic service recently organized in New York with Mrs. Darwin R. James as president and Miss Helen Gould and Mrs. R. S. MacArthur as vice presidents, has resolved to direct its first aggressive effort to securing the passage of a constitutional amendment making polygamy a crime in every State and Territory.

Among the Christian workers at Plymouth, Mass., are two foreigners of note. One is an Italian known among his countrymen as "The Marquis." He is of noble birth, and for some years held office in the Guard of St. Peter's. His sermons are thoroughly evangelical and are attended by large numbers of Italians. The other is an Armenian from Tarsus, St. Paul's native city. He was educated at Aintab College, in Central Turkey. He speaks excellent English, and has been very useful during his sojourn in this country.

Around the World with Josiah Allen's Wife

SAMANTHA HOME AGAIN

WHEN I sot out to git Miss Bobbett's woosted (and layin' out to sarahuptishushly go on and see the widder Albert without my pardner's knowledge) Josiah helped me into the handsome, pretty calm in liniment, though he eyed the driver dretful clost. He wuz a humbly creeter with a wart on his nose, but Josiah looked at him with a cross, jealous look, and I hearn him mutter, "Three times have you rid out with this man to my knowledge." But then I am used to such looks and acts; I've seen him cast just such looks onto Elder Minkley when I wuz praisin' his sermons, and onto tramps if I fed 'em up high.

Well, you wouldn't believe it, nobody would, but when I got to my destination, and riz up in that handsome ready to alight, and the driver wuz jest a goin' to assist me, my pardner pushed him aside kinder brusque and unmannerly, and sez to me:

"I concluded that I would stroll down this way, Samantha, and help you pick out the woosted."

Stroll down! It wuz three milds at least. He had took a quicker convenience and got there before me, and he sez to the driver in a overbearin', defiant tone:

"You can go your ways; I will see my wife back to the tarven."

But I gin the driver a look intercepted by Josiah, and sez with dignity, "You can wait for me a few minutes; I may be back and want you."

The look my pardner giv' him wuz enough to throw him off his perch, but bein' used to hurricanes and such he withstood it and sez, "I will wait, mum."

Josiah's Strategy

Well, I picked out the woosted, Josiah bein' as clost to my side as he ever wuz durin' courtship. What could I do! A woman's brain is fertile, but she can't raise potatoes on a dry oven or merrygolds on a lamp chimbly. Give up that visit I could not. Take Josiah with me with them insurmountable hampers holdin' me back, I would not. What should I do?

Sez I, "Josiah Allen, you need a new hat and neck-tie; none of the bretheren to home in the M. E. church have got London accessories to shine in."

Fur be it from me to encourage such feelin's in cold blood. But I wuz het up with excitement and hope it won't be writ down aginst me, or if it is, hope the same page will show a diagram of my feelin's.

Sez he, "Go with me, Samantha, and help pick it out."

"No," sez I, "I would ruther you would show your own taste, Josiah."

He sot off, and I also hurried to the door, thinkin' I should most probable be punished by seein' Josiah start for meetin' with a broad-brimmed felt hat, flappin' about his ears, or a lady's walkin' hat.

I got to the sidewalk and signaled the driver, who wuz just drawin' nigh, when Josiah hastened forwards and drawed my arm through his.

"Have you got your hat and necktie?" sez I faintly.

"No, the old ones are good enough for a wretch like me."

"What do you mean?" sez I.

"A broken-hearted, deceived man!" sez he. "And now!" sez he glarin' at the approachin' driver as Cain might have looked at Abel, "I want you to explain yourself! I will brook no more. Time after time have you rid out with this man, and now you wuz tryin' to evade me agin."

I see I must explain: I could brook no such insinuations, and sez I comin' out plain, "I wuz tryin' to git away to see the widder Albert."

"See her?" sez he. "Didn't I tell you I wanted to go, too?"

"Yes," sez I, "Josiah, but there wuz hampers in the way of my takin' you."

Sez he bitterly, "My first conjecture wuz true; you don't think me good enough to go and see the widder."

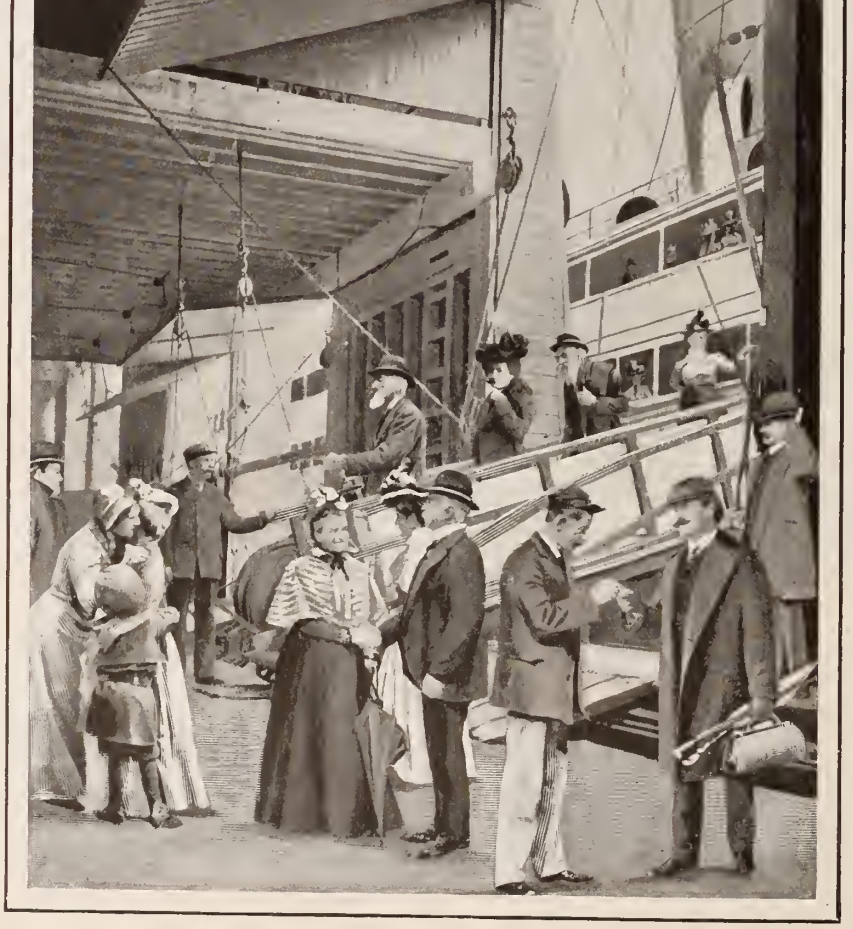
Sez I, "I think you are too good, Josiah, or that is, it is my pride in you that stands in the way. It is a lovin' pride that makes me want you to appear your very best before such a woman as that. I feel towards you as I do towards America, Josiah, I want you both always to put your best foot forrerd, but specially before them I think so high on."

"In what do I lack?" sez he with a real proud, self-satisfied look.

Sez I, "Your clothes hain't fit, Josiah; towers, as you know, are wearin' on broadcloth. And havin' such a reputation to maintain, and the cast-iron principles to show out that an author can be and generally is as good a housekeeper as wimmen that think Ruskin is a winter apple, could I take my own pardner with a sammon colored shirt on to see her who set such store by her pardner, and I dare say kep' his shirts white as snow, and his clothes all mended up as you well know I do when to hum. No, I can't, I can't!"

And my feelin's overcome me, and I covered my face in my snowy handkerchief. I didn't weep I know, for my eyes felt dry, but I sithed fearful, for I hearn myself, and he did too.

He looked at his buff-colored cuffs and his frayed-out vest, and he see that I had reason on my side, and in his relief from his worst suspicions he didn't git mad as he might have done at another time, and then comparin' him as I did to America soothed him some. He turned onto his heel, and with a dejected mean silently started for the handsome to help me in. Had he argyed the question or acted huffy I'd no what the result would have been. But that sad, broken-hearted demeanor, every pardner who truly loves knows how it ended. I waved off the handsome almost imperiously; we took a four-wheeler and returned in state, I a not mindin' the expense so I could soothe my pardner's sad heart.



SAMANTHA AND JOSIAH ARRIVE IN NEW YORK

I wuz bitterly disappointed about not goin' after I had sent word too. But mebby it wuz for the best: we might have got to arguin' about England's doin's with the Boors, and I might have said sunthin' hash. You know when two wimmen are gittin' along in years and are great talkers, git to visitin' one word brings on another, and before you know it they have said things better left onsaid. Or she might have twitted me of America's shortcomin's, and I couldn't have stood that, for though a ma will find fault with her own children for their good, woe be to the one that jines in with her, especially if it is another ma. So mebby it wuz for the best, though it wuz a blow to me, and doubtless wuz to her, if she heard on't, but to make sure that she shouldn't feel hurt and mortified and think I'd slighted her, I sent her a letter, which I composed that very day and sent the last minute.

Miss Meechim and Dorothy bought lots of things that they said they coul git cheaper in England, and Arvilly con home in great sperits; she had sold thr books, had sold herself out and we home with an empty box but a full purs Robert wuz busy up to the last minut but managed to spend time to take Tomm to see some famous waxworks he ha promised to.

The next morning bright and early w went aboard the ship that wuz to take u home. It wuz a fair day; the fog disperse and the sun shone out with promise an the waves talked to me of Home, Swe Home. I posted the letter I spoke o with my own hands. I directed it

WIDDER ALBERT,
London, England.

And she has probable got it before nov and I'm lookin' for an answer to it ever day. It runs as follers:

"Dear and revered Queen and Widder:

"I tried my best to git to see you whils in London, but Josiah's clothes wuzn fit; he had frayed 'em out on a tower, an his shirts wuz yeller as saffern, half washe by underlins. I wouldn't demean him i your sight by bringin' him with me and h wuz worrisome and I couldn't leave him You've been married and you know hov it is.

Samantha's Tribute to Victoria

"So I have to return home sad-hearte without settin' my eyes on the face of woman I honor and set store by, a good wife, a good mother, a good ruler. Th world hangs your example up and i workin' up to the pattern and will in fu ture generations. No doubt there is a few stitches that might be sot evener i the sampler, but the hull thing is a hono to our humanity and the world at large. bow to your memory as I would to you i deep honor and esteem. And if we do not meet here below may we meet in them heavenly fields you and your Albert Josiah and I, young and happy, al earthly distinctions washed off in the swellin's of Jordan.

"And so God bless you clear down to the river banks whose waves are a swashin' up so clost to our feet, and adoo." JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE.

It wuz a cold lowerin' day when the good ship bore us into New York harbor. The gray clouds hung low some as if they wuz a sombry canopy ready to cover up sunthin, a crime or a grief, or a tomb, or mebby all on 'em, and a few cold drops fell down from the sky ever and anon, some like tears, only chill and icy as death.

These thoughts come into my mind onbid as I looked on the heavy pall of dark clouds that hung low over our heads some like the dark drapery hangin' over a bier.

But anon and bime bye these dark meditations died away, for what wuz cloud or cold, or white icy shores? It wuz home that waited for us; Jonesville and my dear ones dwelt on that shore approachin' us so fast. Bitter, icy winds would make the warm glowin' hearth fire of home seem brighter. Love would make its own sunshine. Happiness would warm the chill of the cold November day.

Thomas J. and Maggie stood on the pier, both well and strong; Tommy sprung into their arms. They looked onto his round rosy face through tears of gratitude and thankfulness and embraced me with the same. And wuzn't Thomas J. happy? Yes, indeed he wuz, when he held his boy in his arms and had holt of his ma's hands, and his pa's too. And Maggie, too, how warmly she embraced us with tears and smiles chasing each other over her pretty face. Tirzah Ann and Whitfield wuz in the city, but didn't come to the minute, bein' belated, as we learnt afterwards, by Tirzah Ann a waverin' in a big depart-ent store between a pink and a blue iffon front for a new dress.

But they appeared in a few minutes, rzah Ann with her arms full of bundles hich dribbled onnoticed on the pier as e advanced and throwed her arms round r pa's and ma's neck. Love is home, d with our dear children's arms about and their warm smiles of delight and elcome and their loving words in our r, we had got home.

The children wuz stayin' at a fashion- le boardin' house, kept by Miss Eliphat Snow, a distant relation of Maggie's, ho had lost her pardner and her prop- ty, but kep' her pride and took boarders

"HE WUZ JUST DRAWIN' NIGH, WHEN JOSIAH CAME FORWARD"

r company, so she said. And we wuz ll goin' to start for Jonesville together he next day. But as the baggage of our arty wuz kinder mixed up, Josiah and I hought we would go with Miss Meechim's arty to the tarven and stay.

Robert Strong and our son, Thomas J., iet like two ships of one line with one ag wavin' over 'em, and bearing the ame sealed orders from their Captain bove. How congenial they wuz, they ad been friends always, made so onbe- nown to them, they only had to discover ach other, and then they wuz intimate to nce, and dear.

Dorothy and Miss Meechim and the hildren greeted each other with smiles nd glad, gay words. Yes, all wuz a appy confusion of light words, gay aughter, Saratoga trunks, smiles, joy, atchel bags—we had got home.

A Shadow of Sorrow

As I stood there surrounded by all hat I prized most on earth I had a glimpse of a haggard lookin' form ar- ayed in tattered finery, a bent figure, a oung old face, old with drink and dissi- ation, that looked some way familiar, hough I couldn't place her. She looked t our party with a strange interest and eemed to say some murmured words of rayer or blessing or appeal, and disap- eared—soon forgot in our boundless joy nd the cares tendin' to our baggage.

Arvilly wuz glad to set her feet on hore, for she too loved her native land vith the love that a good principled, but tern stepmother has for a interestin' out worrisome child that she's bringin' up y hand. She thought she would go with he children to their boarding-place, navin' knowed Miss Eliphalet Snow in heir young days, when Miss Snow wuz nigh-headed and looked down on her, and vantin' to dant her, I spoze, with accounts f her foreign travel. And we parted o meet agin in the mornin' to resoom our oyage to Jonesville—blessed harbor where we could moor our two barks, Jo- iah's and mine, and be at rest.

Miss Meechim and Dorothy and Rob- rt laid out to start for California the next day, as business wuz callin' Robert there loud and he had to respond.

And I may as well tell it now as any time, for it has got to be told. I knowed t wuz told to me in confidence, and it must be kep' for a spell anyway, Robert and Dorothy wuz engaged, and they wuz goin' to be married in a short time in her own beautiful home in San Francisco. Now you needn't try to git me to tell who told me, for I am not as sot as cast iron on that. I shall mention no names, I only simply remarkin' that Dorothy and Robert set store by me and I by them. Them that told me said that they felt like death to not tell Miss Meechim of the engagement, but knowin' her onconquerable repugnance to matrimony and to Dorothy's marriage in particular, and not knowin' but what the news would kill her stun dead, them that told me said they felt that they had better git her back to her own native shores before bein' told, which I felt wuz reasonable.

Dorothy and Robert

How I did hate to part with sweet Dorothy, I loved her and she me visey versey. And Robert Strong, he sot up in my heart next to Thomas J., and crowdin' up pretty clost to him too. Miss Meechim also had her properties, and we had gone through wearisome travel, dangers and fatigues, pleasant rest, delightful sight-seeing, poor vittles, joy and grief together, and it wuz hard to break up old ties. But it had to be. Our life here on this planet is made up of meetin's and partin's. It is hail and farewell with us from the cradle to the grave.

We all retired early, bein' tired out, and we slept well, little thinkin' of the ghastly shape that would meet us on the thresholt of the new day. But, oh, my erring but beloved country! why ortn't we to expect it as long as you keep the mills a-goin' that turns out such black, ghastly shadders by the thousands and thousands all the time, all the time, to enwrap your children.

Dorothy never knowed it—what wuz the use of cloudin' her bright young life with the awful shadder? But then, as I told Robert, that black, dretful pall hangs over every home and every heart in our country and is liable to fall anywhere and at any time, no palace ruff is too high and no hovel ruff is too low to be agonized and darkened by its sombry folds.

But he said it would make Dorothy too wretched, and he could not have her told, and I agreed to it, but of course I told my pardner and his heart wuz wrung and his bandanna wet as sop in consequence on't. And he told Miss Meechim, too, that mornin', and her complaisant belief in genteel drinkin' and her conservative belief in the Poor Man's Club, wuz shook hard—how hard I didn't know until afterwards. Oh, how she, too, loved Aronette! The children when they wuz told on't mourned because we did, and on their own account too, for they sot store by her what little they had seen of her—for nobody could see her without loving her.

As for Arvilly, her ideas on intemperance couldn't be added to or diminished by anything, but she wep' and cried for days.

Well, I spoze you all want to know the peticulars. Robert Strong wuz the first one that left the tarven in the mornin'. He had to see a man very early on business. He went out by the ladies' entrance. And there crouched on the cold stun steps, waitin' we spozed to ketch another glimpse of Dorothy, and mebby to ask for help, for she wuz almost naked, and her plump little limbs almost skin and bone, dead and cold, frozen and starved, so we spozed, lay Aronette. Pretty, happy little girl, dearly beloved, thrown by Christian America to the wild beasts just as sure as Nero ever did, only while he threw his human victims to be torn and killed for fun, America throws her human victims, her choicest brightest youth, down to ruin and death, for greed. Which looks the worst in God's sight? I d'no nor Josiah don't.

The Fate of Aronette

Well, Robert called a ambulance, had the poor boney, ragged victim took to a hospital, but all efforts wuz vain to resuscitate her. She had gone to give in her evidence aginst America's license laws, aginst Army Canteen, Church and State, aginst Licensed Saloon Keeper, aginst highest official and lowest voter, aginst sinner and saint, who by their encouragement or indifference make such crimes possible.

The evidence wuz carried in, the criminals must meet it, it is waitin' for 'em, waitin'. Of course the New York parties who helped Robert, policemen, doctors, and nurses, thought very little of it, it wuz so common, all over the land, they said, such things was happening all the time from the same cause. And we knew it well, we knew of the wide open pit, veiled with tempting covering, wove by Selfishness and Greed, scattered over with flimsy flowers of excuse, palliation, expediency that tempts and engulfs our brightest youth, the noblest manhood, old and young, rich and poor—it is very common.

But to us who loved the pretty, merry little maid, rememberin' her so happy and so good, and saw her ruined and killed before our eyes by the country that should have protected her, we kept it in our hearts, we could not forgit it.

Robert Strong had her buried in a quiet corner of a cemetery and left orders for a stun cross to be put up to mark her grave. He asked me to write the epitaph, which he had carved in the marble, and I did:

ARONETTE
Young, Happy, Beloved—Murdered!
Vengence is mine saith the Lord.

Robert had it put on just as I writ it. He didn't tell Dorothy anything about her death till they got home. She never see the epitaph; it wuz true as truth itself, but it wuz hash, and might have made her bed-sick, lovin' Aronette as she did. But after Dorothy Strong wuz livin' with him, blessed and happy in their pretty, simple home in his City of Justice, then he told her that Aronette wuz dead, died in a hospital and wuz buried in a pleasant graveyard. And Dorothy mourned for her as she would for a beloved sister.

Yes, Dorothy will mourn for her all her days. The young man who wuz to marry her will live under the shadow of this sorrow all his life, for he is one of the constant ones who cannot forgit. The old grandmother in Normandie waited for letters from her darling which never came, and will die waiting for her.

The young man who enticed the pretty little maid into the canteen, licensed by America, and gave her stupefying drink, licensed by our laws, took her, staggering and stupid, to another dretful house, made as respectable as they can make it by our Christian civilization. He lived long enough, I spoze, to add several more victims to the countless list of such murders that lays on our country's doorsteps, and then he too died, a bloated, loathsome wreck, makin' another victim for the recording angel to mark down, if there is room in her enormous books of debt and credit with this traffic for another name. And I spoze there is, for them books tower up mountain high, and new ones have to be opened anon or oftener, and will I spoze till God's time of reckonin' comes and the books are opened and the debts paid.

Under the Evening Lamp

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Good Housekeeping

WHEREVER there is good housekeeping there is a keen and active brain behind it. Very probably there is no fuss, for the best housekeepers have a way of moving silently about their work. Our most burdened matrons have, owing to modern conveniences and appliances, a far easier time than their colonial ancestors had. In a sumptuous volume issued by the Century Company, and written by Helen Evertson Smith, of Sharon, Conn., we find an account of good housekeeping in the seventeenth century, which is in sharp contrast to our domestic machinery to-day.

"Floor coverings," says the author of Colonial Days and Ways, "were then a rarity even in palaces, and the sand and rushes which polished the boards or silenced the tread were as plentiful here as elsewhere. Porcelain was a luxury in any land—even delft was uncommon—and pewter was considered too fine for the daily use of any save the rich. Wooden dishes served on ordinary occasions in Old England and in the New, save among the wealthiest.

"Great, very great must have been the suffering from the cold and from the lack of suitable food. The earliest mention of chocolate in Connecticut is said to have been in 1679. Five years later coffee is first named, and tea not until 1695.

"For many years bread was hardly known, and this for several very good reasons. It was a difficult matter to preserve the leaven from one baking until the next. Either it would sour from too great heat or it would lose its vitality from the severe cold weather. To bake bread in an iron pot over the fire or under the same utensil inverted before the blaze was an undertaking very doubtful in its results; yet there was no other way, for the brick or stone ovens of a later date did not exist during the first decade, and, except in a few instances, probably not for a score of years longer. Until a sufficiency of breadstuffs could be raised here, which was not for several years, both wheat flour and oatmeal were imported in considerable quantities; but the first was costly even in England, and, as both often arrived in an exceedingly damaged condition, the roughly pounded or ground meal of Indian corn was for months at a time the staff of life.

"The larger part of the early colonial houses were of heavy timbers roughly squared by the ax, chinked with moss and lined with hewn planks two inches in thickness. In later days coats of plaster were put on over the planks, but during the first years the walls were made warm as well as picturesque by hangings of bear, deer, otter, wild cat and fox skins, whenever these could be spared from more pressing uses. The exterior walls were about two feet in thickness, which tells of the size of the forest trees that had been cut down to make them. The high-placed and deep-seated windows were scant in number and narrow and heavily barred.

"It is doubtful if the first of the windows were glazed. Oiled paper was the usual substitute."

The narrative goes on to relate that in cold weather these windows were defended by heavy wooden shutters both without and within, and that for light the family depended on candles, pine knots and the friendly blaze in the great open fireplace. Truly good housekeeping was a problem in old colonial days.

The Daughter's Room

As soon as she is old enough to take care of her room and keep it neat and dainty, the little girl should have a room of her very own. It is also well for a lad to have his room, but his interests are usually more pressing outside the home than in it, so that if either must wait awhile, it would better be Jimmie than Janie. Let her room have a pretty paper on its walls, and let the garniture of the room be white. Then we should exact from her daily attention to her room. It should be clean, orderly, and tidy—a daily object lesson to her as to character.

"Killed by Inches"

"It's killing me by inches." So a correspondent writes. What is this incubus, slowly eating out a good woman's life? It is worry, constant, depressing, sordid worry. There is an invalid in the home, whose sufferings are prolonged. There is a mortgage on the farm, and the interest is an ever-present menacing spectre. The mother is afraid that one of her boys is under stress of temptation; she disapproves of the lover of one of her daughters. Under an accumulation of cares and anxieties, she is always worried. Hence her plaint.

What is the remedy? It is twofold. Reduce expenses to the minimum. Try to trust the sick one to the Great Physician. Pray believingly to the Lord, who can help you in pecuniary troubles, as in all others. Ask him to shield the son. Be not too sure that your daughter cannot choose her own husband, as you did at her age, and cast your burden on the Lord.

The Shadow

Nothing in life is so common as death. No other shadow is so familiar. Not long ago death came suddenly to a good man in a little rural community. He had been kind to everyone, especially so to the poor. After he was laid to rest the whole town seemed saddened. One young lady said: "It is just as if we had all lost a father." The shadow is familiar, yet we never grow used to it. Always it brings us surprise; always we are lonely and for awhile cannot adjust ourselves to the strange vacancy in the home, at the table, and on the street. But the comfort is that we shall meet beyond the river, in the sweet bye and bye, and then partings will be no more forever.

Cloud-Bursts and Cyclones

In these autumnal days, stories reach us here of a cloud-burst, there of a tornado. Man is very weak, with all his boasted prowess, when the elemental forces are unleashed in their fury. One moment safety, the next devastation. I met an old lady on a train one day last summer. She said, asking me some question about the road, "I am just coming home from the cyclone country; it will be good to live again where they don't have those awful wind storms." I agreed with her. But wherever we dwell, we may be at peace, if we trust the Almighty, who is able to save, and who can preserve us in every extremity.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—EUGENIE. Pure candy eaten in moderation after meals will not be likely to injure a child's digestion.

—ELMA. Unless your friend's stories are very clever, bright and original, I advise her not to try to make a living by writing. The market is overcrowded.

—IMPECUNIOUS. A betrothal ring need not be a diamond; a turquoise will do very well. But an opal is not liked by everyone, and it would not be considered a good choice for an engagement ring.

—MATRON. Five o'clock tea is a matter of course in England, and many women find it very refreshing here. If it be the custom of the house to give a cup of tea to the afternoon visitor, serve slices of thin bread and butter and small, crisp cakes.

—BEREAVED MOTHER. So you, too, are grieving over your empty cradle. There are so many to keep you company. God comfort you! Your darling is safe in the arms of Jesus. If you can believe that all is well with her, you will cease to weep so bitterly.

GRETCHEN'S PETS

—WILLIE WEAVER. A lady does not take a man's arm in the daytime unless she is old, or infirm, or an invalid. In the evening in a lighted city street, a girl does not take a man's arm, though she may accept it in a crowd, or for protection in crossing a thoroughfare. Nobody takes a woman's arm except a kind policeman.

—MARIA. I think if the Lord had not meant us to eat meat, he would not have given us the teeth of carnivorous creatures. For most persons, some animal food is necessary to health. Eggs, milk and cheese are animal food. But roast beef, roast mutton, beefsteak and poultry help us to vigor.

—PUZZLED FATHER. The boy's Latin is all right. There is a new method of pronunciation, but Aunt Prudence finds that the declensions and conjugations are unchanged, and her nephews and nieces are not above accepting her aid in Cicero and Virgil; though she clings to her old-fashioned pellucid pronunciation and they have no end of quirks and quirls. Every good student of English must know some Latin.

"DINNA FRET, MY LASSIE"

NAY, dinna fret my lassie,
The sky is black to-day,
But sune ye'll win to sunshine,
And flowers will strew the way.
Sae, dinna fret my dearie,
But wait the Lord's gude time;
The blue sky bides abune the clouds,
The sunbeam melts the rime.

Nay, dinna fret my lassie!
But laugh when cares abound;
An' think o' loving-kindness
That girds your life around.
There's ane that keeps you, dearie,
And nane shall snatch you thence;
The Lord himsel' is ever near Wi' his gude providence.

A Wife's Complaint

DO you think it fair, says a wif that a husband should devo all his time under the evenin lamp, first to his newspape and next to his nap. John gets hom about six o'clock from his day's work. H is tired, and I never expect him to talk the supper-table. One must have patienc with a hungry man. I have the table se an appetizing mea ready, the children faces and hands ar washed, and the whol house keyed up to we come papa. After su per the children, wh are little, soon go t bed. I wash the dish es, and arrange thing for to-morrow's breal fast. As I am busy a day, have few acquain ances and no relative in town, and am th mother of three babies doing also all my ow work, I am ready t rest in the evening, an I want to talk. Bu by the time I can si down, John is deep i the paper, and refuse to be disturbed; h says the evening is hi only time to read, an he must know what i going on. When he a last folds it up and lay it on the table, I bright en with expectation but no; my lord is nov sleepy, and, a thing abominate in a man he throws himself a full length on th divan, and in half a minute is sound asleep In five minutes he is snoring. When bed time finally arrives, have to shake him t say, "John, John, it's ten o'clock; wake u and close the house," and then, grumblin and dishevelled, h gets on his feet an locks the doors an windows. I am a dis couraged and disgust ed woman. Have I no just cause for com plaint?

It seems to me tha this lady is not receiv ing her due modicum of respect and consideration from her good man. Ten years ago, when he was courting her, he neither read the paper nor drowsed through the evenings he spent in her company. She is as worthy of attention now as she was then, and she has a larger claim upon John's chivalry for now she is altogether his. Should anyone tell John that he does not love his wife, that he is indifferent to the mother of his children, he would put in an amazed disclaimer, but his kind of love is very selfish, and is not warranted to wear.

Why should not John read aloud, and let Annie know what is happening in the world, as well as absorb it himself? Why should he sleep on her divan when she dislikes it, and wishes cheerful conversation? Why should he treat his wife with scant politeness, when to other women he is a model of good manners? Will not John take a hint and do better?

PERSIA'S NEW PROPHET

HASIATY BAHA, THE FOUNDER OF THE BAHAUS—HIS MIRACLES AND DOCTRINES

Special Correspondence of The Christian Herald)

THE Bahaus are an interesting people. The name is derived from Baha, the originator of their religious faith. Mahdy, or Muza Ally Mahomet, the forerunner of Baha, appeared thirty-six years go in the city of Shuaz. Before becomg prominent he was secretary to a Prusan nobleman. As a descendant of Maomet he was called Sayid, with which le were accorded many privileges. He ad unusual opportunities for travel, and et men of letters in various countries. t twenty-one years of age he made himlf known as the "forerunner of the ex-cted one," and became a martyr at enty-nine. His body, held in a sarphagus made of American marble, rests a mountain between Sion and Sinai. It claimed that the bringing of this sarphagus was the means of the conversion three thousand Americans to Bahauism. he readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ve probably not heard of this event. Hasiaty Baha, who was born in the city Teheran, appeared to the people a few nths after the death of his forerunner. was about this time that two fanatical ung Bahaus of Tabius went to Teheran d attempted to assassinate the Shah r permitting the death of Muza Ally ahomet. This attempt, though unsucssful, brought about the massacre of any Bahaus, including women and chilen of tender years, and the movement as seriously impeded in consequence. ntil then Zarin Taj, a woman of marked rsonality and enthusiastic in the new ith, used to proclaim its teachings m the mosques in Teheran. Her eloience attracted thousands of hearers. obably no other woman in Persia had er ventured on such a course before. er fanatical opponents, fearing that their eligion would go out of their hands," as result of this woman's teachings, secured r condemnation to death. She was angled, and thrown into a well.

PERSIANS OF THE NEW BAHAU SECT OF RELIGIONISTS

A Prophet in Exile

Baha, fearing for the safety of his own e, sought and received permission to elter himself in Bagdad. Here, so many ohammedans visited him in order to arn about the new religion that he was quested to leave the place. He then ok up his abode in an orchard for twelve ys, in accordance with an odd custom the country. Here he is said to have rformed a number of miracles. Thence went to Constantinople where he drew many persons that the Turks were armed. He was requested to leave this y also, and so found his way to "Acca" in Palestine. About eight years ago he died, leaving his eldest son, Hasiaty Suril Allah (God's mystery), to fill his place. The son is invoked by dozens of different names, all having a religious meaning. He has six children, all daughters. The second and third are twins, and the fourth, fifth and sixth are triplets. These circumstances have been regarded as wonderful, and have served to add to the awe with which Hasiaty is regarded.

The Bahaus divide the year into nineteen months of nineteen days each; they profess to fast for nineteen days before New Year's day. Some Bahaus tell me that they have no prayers; others say that they are bound to pray three times a day. They do not have such numerous oblations as the Moslems do. A good Bahau is expected, on New Year's day, to change everything that is in his house. If he is too poor, "let him sell the old things and buy new ones," they say.

At certain festivals it is the custom of the country to exchange visits. In accordance with this custom I have been visited by Muza Adbool Ahad, a prominent Bahau. He has suffered much for his creed and has been put out of his house, because, as his neighbors tell me "the filthy dog is a heathen; he does not fast nor pray, nor observe the oblations which our law commands. If he was not a heathen, God the Almighty would have blessed him with an issue."

The Bahau Faith

In conversation with him, I learned much that interested me concerning the Bahau faith. The Bahaus give permission to all men to dwell in love and purity towards one another, also to learn any tongue that they desire (the Moslems forbid any tongue but the language of the Koran). The Bahaus command that all rulers shall encourage every kind of science and learning. They are bidden to erect schools for the children that there may be taught such knowledge as shall best serve them when they come in contact with people of other nationalities. The people are bidden to obey their rulers in faithfulness and quietness. Rulers are urged to arrange for peace conferences so as to stop wars. Confession of sin is to be made to God, who alone is able to forgive.

Their chief has relieved his followers from the custom of paying visits to the graves and places of the martyrs, and from carrying the dead bodies of their kinsfolk there. Still, the custom is not given up, though many who start on such journeys dispose of the bodies by the way, being dismayed by the heavy customs duties collected all along the route.

A visit to Hajy, the head of the community of Bahaus, and a very prominent citizen, proved most interesting. Hajy has only one wife and two girls of ten and twelve years respectively. Their style of dress is much like that of the Moslem, though they are more genteel in both apparel and manners. Unlike Mohammedans, they shook hands with me. When in conversation, I expressed the hope to Hajy that as the Bahaus seemed to favor Christianity and to adopt many of its externals they would also see the light and truth revealed in Jesus Christ our Redeemer. Looking at me in an amused way, he replied: "We have found the light as it is revealed in Jesus. It is you Christians who are late. Jesus Christ has truly come the second time as predicted in the Gospel and is residing in the Acca."

Hajy claimed that first Ally, and then Baha was the promised Comforter. I endeavored to show him that was impossible, among the reasons because neither of them had taught the people about Jesus. My host told me that the woman spoken of in Revelations 12—and he had the New Testament in his hand as he spoke—was Fatima, and her son was Ally. The twelve hundred and thirty years spoken of in the chapter had been fulfilled, he claimed, as it was just that length of time between the hegira of Mohamet to the appearance of Baha.

Hajy further informed me that if we Christians wished to understand these things we must stand in the sun and let it shed its beams upon us. Then he proceeded to tell me of the seven miracles which are to happen at the Resurrection. These include seven years of religious famine, a great earthquake, the rising of the sun in the west, and the appearance of a picture in the sun, which will speak and announce the presence of Ally Mahomet. My conclusion is that the new religion is no great improvement on Mohammedanism. It improves the condition of women a little, in that it limits the number of wives to two, but the husbands can divorce their wives if they wish to. Then the love of science and education which they profess has not yet been put into practice. The only religion from which the world has much to hope for is, after all, the religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

OUR ART CALENDAR

WE congratulate our readers on the beauty and usefulness of the calendars which we are sending to every new subscriber and to every present subscriber who renews a subscription for the coming year. They are a triumph of the lithographer's art. Delicately printed in twelve colors and gold, they are an ornament fit for the walls of the most elegant room. They are of the drop-leaf variety, and contain no advertising matter. A novel feature of these calendars is an ingenious device by which anyone can find out on what day of the week any date fell during the past century, or will fall during the coming century; in other words, between January 1, 1800, and December 31, 2000. This feature is, of course, in addition to the ordinary calendar for 1901.

WORSHIPING IN A COURT-HOUSE

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a letter from Rev. W. H. Lee, of Farmville, Va., in which the writer states that "On June 18th, we lost our church by fire, and everything material belonging to it was burned up, leaving us out doors as a congregation. After a few days we were allowed to worship in the court-house. We carried a small insurance policy on our church, and with the money received and the help of white friends we commenced to rebuild." This little colored congregation in the South would be grateful for any help from other congregations or individuals, to enable them to restore their church home. They are poor and find the task before them a heavy one. Any letters of inquiry on the subject may be addressed to Pastor Lee, at Farmville, Va.

Rheumatism

No other disease makes one feel so old.
It stiffens the joints, produces lameness, and makes every motion painful.
It is sometimes so bad as wholly to disable, and it should never be neglected.
Elsie B. Kirk, Box 247, Montezuma, Iowa, had it in her hips and limbs so that she could not sleep; Mrs. Hattie Turner, Boliver, Mo., had it so severely she could not lift anything and could scarcely get up or down stairs; W. H. Shepard, Sandy Hook, Conn., was laid up with it, was cold even in July, and could not dress himself.
They have authorized the statement that they were permanently relieved, as others have been, by which removes the cause of rheumatism by correcting acidity of the blood and builds up the whole system.
Hood's Sarsaparilla

BOOKS OF THE PATRIARCHS

PROF. HILPRECHT'S FIND OF THE LIBRARY AT NIPPUR, WHICH WAS ACCESSIBLE TO ABRAHAM

DURING the past year's excavations in Babylonia, conducted by Prof. Hilprecht of the University of Pennsylvania, a discovery has been made of extraordinary interest. In the library of Assurbanapal, which Layard found at Nineveh sixty years ago, there were extracts from certain books in an older and more famous library and references to records and authorities in that library which showed that it must be a collection of great value and importance. Prof. Hilprecht's ambition was to find that library and he has succeeded.

With about four hundred men he began digging in a mound which rises from the desert of Asia Minor, about seventy-five miles south of Bagdad. The mound was about two hundred feet high and was irregular in shape. A stream of water divides it into two parts. The sand being partially cleared away from the mound on one side, the stream revealed a number of dwellings. Work was then begun on the mound on the other side of the stream, and disclosed a strong edifice that seemed to partake jointly of the characters of a fortress and a temple. Outside the walls, which were of solid masonry, immensely thick, were a number of weapons showing where the guard had fallen defending the stronghold. It would appear that the defence failed, for the interior shows that the temple-fortress was overthrown and destroyed. The roof had fallen in, and when the superincumbent mass, ninety feet thick, was removed, the nature of the edifice was revealed. It proved to be the temple of Baal or Bel, which was known to exist at Nippur. The altar was there, and there were small rooms which had been used as residences for the priests. In the centre of the west wing, however, was the most important discovery. This was the ancient library—the object of Prof. Hilprecht's search. It was possible to trace the arrangement of the rooms and to see how the students had used the library. The books were the usual tablets of clay inscribed by a stylus while the clay was soft. Some of them had been broken, and the fragments vary in size from about two inches square to pieces a foot wide and a foot and a half long. Nearly eighteen thousand tablets have been taken out. They were ranged in an orderly manner on shelves, convenient for reference. These do not exhaust the library, for there are other rooms, doubtless containing books still covered by piles of sand and rubbish.

Prof. Hilprecht is having the tablets sent to Constantinople, whence they will be brought to this country. Some of them he has already deciphered. Among them are several which have the top line beautifully inscribed in well-shaped cuneiform characters. The lines below are by another hand, and are clumsily done. The lower lines are the same sentence as the top line, and there was an evident attempt to imitate the exquisite writing of the top line. The obvious inference is that they are the copy-books of that time on which some boy was learning to write. Besides these, there were lists of words in two languages, which suggests the idea that the boy was learning some foreign language. Some of the tablets contain historical records of the events of a king's reign. Others contain records of astronomical and astrological observations. There are also lists of kings which Prof. Hilprecht thinks may prove a valuable aid in reconstructing the history of the period. One of the tablets appears to be the librarian's catalogue, and another the record of persons borrowing books. There are poems, too, resembling in construction the Hebrew Psalms. Inventories of the temple furniture and a list of the gods worshiped there are included.

All the contents of the library are more than four thousand years old. It is known that the destruction of Nippur by the Elamites occurred 2,200 years before the Christian era, so that there was no opportunity of adding to the library since that date. According to our chronology, this was about the period when Abraham, at the call of God, left Ur of the Chaldees to go into the land of Canaan (Gen. 12 : 1). We may conclude, therefore, that this library existed in Abraham's day, and he may have had an opportunity of consulting it. The discovery sheds a new light on that period. It shows that even then a literature existed, and there was a much more advanced civilization than was supposed to have existed at that early period. A more exhaustive study of the tablets may involve a complete reconstruction of our Old Testament chronology, as it appears that the antiquity of man is greater than was thought. But it must be remembered that the dates which appear at the head of the marginal columns in our Bibles are in no sense a part of the sacred text. They are based on the inferences and deductions of scholars, notably of Archbishop Usher, who constructed a chronology from the meagre data furnished by the lives of the patriarchs. It certainly appears impossible that the beginning, which is set at 4004 B. C., can be correct. The eighteen hundred years between that date and the destruction of the library at Nippur would not suffice for the development of a civilization so high as that which the tablets prove to have existed. The book of Genesis, however, does not give 4004 as the date of the Creation, and it will doubtless be found that the error is to be looked for in the calculations of chronologists rather than in the Biblical record.

The Martyrs in China

Heaven must be fairer since they crossed the shining bar,
And richer now the glad angelic anthems swell,
While their sweet voices join the consecrated choir
In praises to the Christ they loved and served so well.

More beautiful by far must be our Father's house,
Since he has gathered these, his loved ones, to his home,
To share its beauty, he has longed to bring them safe
Across the sea of crystal with its shimmering foam.

Jewelled the diadems he placed on their brows,
Celestial arches echo with the glad "well done;"
Golden the sheaves that glisten where the toilers reap,
Earth loses what the paradise of God has won.

The sweetness of their lives has left a silvery trail,
To guide our faltering footsteps in the paths they trod,
A heritage that makes their memories beautiful,
They are not dead but live forevermore with God.

Are We a Well-Mannered People?

JULIA WARD HOWE RAISES A QUESTION OF VITAL INTEREST TO ALL AMERICA

IT is an old copy-book motto that "familiarity breeds contempt." This saying may easily have had its origin in days in which social caste was even more of a superstition than it is to-day. Yet, in certain aspects of human intercourse, it contains something of that old-world wisdom which we always look for in a proverb.

I shall use the word "familiarity" here strictly with regard to manners. In the circle of our associates, we would gladly always see preserved the happy mean between roystering frolic and prim formality. The freedom of our American life has naturally placed at a discount the stiff-necked ceremony once held to belong to refined society. This I regard as a change for the better. Generous youth is generous in communicating its emotions of pleasure, and the whole atmosphere of society is warmed and illuminated by its emphasis of expression. On the other hand, reactions in this as in other matters are apt to run into extremes. Reserve is a fine power in literature. It has also its place in the great art of life. We deride Deportment as it is represented in Mr. Dickens' character of Turveydrop, and yet, Deportment belongs to the drama of our human life, and is essential to its true expression of what we intend and what we stand for.

We love the high spirits of youth, but we do not love to see rude and boisterous young people. A romping girl is sometimes delightful to behold, but we should be sorry to think of a young lady as going through life in the character of a tomboy. I regret to say that in this day this tomboy stage of manners prevails too widely, and outlasts the childish period to which it is appropriate. I think that excessive hilarity defeats its own end. Violence exhausts itself, and those who indulge in violent delights often experience painful reverses of feeling and seasons of unreasonable depression. A cheerful, equable tone of mind and manners is happiest for the individual and for the social circle.

Mr. Henry James, in his stories, has dwelt a good deal upon the difference between European and American manners, notably in his tale of "Daisy Miller," in which a young American girl, most innocent in character and intuition, is described as offending, through mere ignorance, against the gravest rules of woman etiquette. The story is a pathetic one, as the heroine exposes herself more and more to public censure and misunderstanding, always with the giddiness of a child of six years. The exhibit made of the mother's helplessness and the daughter's self-will is pitiable. It is hardly overdrawn, and it brings in view a radical defect in American education, viz: the independent dictation exercised by very young people in matters social and personal, without the smallest regard to the counsel of elders.

In saying this, I have no desire to hearken back to the despotic parental rule of the older time. The fear of parents which then obtained was really a hindrance to the happy and helpful intercourse which the filial relation implies. The present reaction against that ancient terrorism has its good side, but it is often carried so far as to give foreigners the impression that parental rule in the United States amounts to nothing at all.

Now, according to the common sense of mankind, experience is the great teacher. We must needs encounter it for ourselves, but we ought also to be glad to profit by it as it is handed down from one generation to another. Civilization itself is the result of ages of tradition, a disregard of which points toward a return to savage life.

In the great changes of fortune which form a feature of our national life, a man who begins business by selling matches in the street, or by some equivalent employment, often in the end becomes a millionaire. His children will be sure to occupy a station in life very different from that with which his early days were familiar. This fact may give them an exaggerated idea of their own superior importance, and may at the same time inspire in him a distrust of his ability to regulate the conduct of his young people. In view of these not uncommon circumstances, mannerliness and a right idea of human relations should receive much attention in the training of our youth.

In what I have just said I intend no disparaging comparison of one social rank with another. The manners of a farm-house may sometimes be more careful and considerate than those of a palace. But as sudden wealth involves a severe trial of character, its dangers as well as its opportunities should be made account of.

Changes in social aspect may also be considered in a more general way. The manners suitable to a village may not suit a metropolis. Much of our American society was once of the village type. Everyone was well known among his neighbors, and misinterpretations of character were rare and needless. Our society to-day is cosmopolitan. We are liable at all times to be observed by people who come from regions of great form and ceremony. The "Hail fellow, well met," of family intimacy will seem to such persons to need explanation. It is always underbred to attract attention needlessly, and in view of this, loud talking, excessive laughter, and careless gestures are to be avoided in public places. More deplorable even than these is the chronic disregard of the tastes and feelings of other people which we too often remark in youthful circles. Our national manners have been from time to time sharply criticized. Let our elders and our young people unite in the endeavor to remove all foundation for such criticism. We call ourselves the first nation on earth. Let us aim at being also the most polite. JULIA WARD HOWE.

A SLUMBER SONG

FOR THE FISHERMAN'S CHILD

FURL your sail, my little boatie,
Here's the haven, still and deep,
Where the dreaming tides, in-streaming,
Up the channel creep.
See, the sunset breeze is dying,
Hark, the plover, landward flying,
Softly down the twilight crying,
Come to anchor, little boatie,
In the port of sleep.

Far away, my little boatie,
Roaring waves are white with foam;
Ships are striving, onward driving,
Day and night they roam.
Father's at the deep sea trawling,
In the darkness, rowing, hauling,
While the hungry winds are calling,
God protect him, little boatie,
Bring him safely home.

Not for you, my little boatie,
Is the wide and weary sea;
You're too slender, and too tender,
You must rest with me.
All day long you have been straying
Up and down the shore and playing;
Come to port, make no delaying.
Day is over, little boatie,
Night falls suddenly.

Furl your sail, my little boatie;
Fold your wings, my tired dove.
Dews are sprinkling, stars are twinkling
Drowsily above.
Cease from sailing, cease from rowing;
Rock upon the dream-tide, knowing
Safely o'er your rest are glowing,
All the night, my little boatie,
Harbor-lights of love.

Torture greater than human ingenuity could invent, pain so exquisite that those who have not suffered it can form no idea of its intensity, is often the fate of those whom that dread disease, rheumatism, has marked for its victims. The disease generally begins with a slight pain in the joints and, if proper treatment is begun in time, the agonies that would otherwise follow can be averted. Even in cases that have become aggravated a remedy now exists that promises a certain and lasting relief, as will be seen by the following sworn statement. Mr. Frank Remmelt, of 709 McGee Street, Elmira, N. Y., was laid up with rheumatism which resulted from standing, during his work, upon a damp floor. He says:

"About a year ago I was attacked with rheumatism in my feet and legs, chiefly in my legs. They swelled greatly and became very stiff and sore. Whenever I attempted to walk the pain was awful. I had been suffering in this way for about three months when someone handed me a pamphlet advertising Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I read it through carefully and made up my mind to give them a fair trial, for I knew that unless I could get relief I would soon have to give up work, and this I could not afford to do.

"'I got two boxes at first and by the time the second one was used up I began to feel decidedly better. The swelling was going down, the stiffness and pain were much less and I found I could get about much better. I got three more boxes and by the time the last of them had been taken I was entirely free from the swelling, the pain and the stiffness. In fact I was healed and I am glad to say that I have had no return of the trouble since."

The International Committee Metes Out Swift Punishment to the Authors of the Chinese Massacres — The Story of Miss Morrill's Martyrdom

THE day of judgment, for many of the Chinese officials responsible for the murder of missionaries and converts, has come. Justice is dealing swift punishment to the guilty ones, repentance having come too late. The International Commission, presided over by Gen. Baillard of the French forces in China, appointed to ascertain which Chinese leaders were responsible for the murder of Christians in Pao-ting-fu, has found that the governor, the treasurer and the judge of the province are guilty. By the time this is before our readers the sentence of death will have been executed.

Thus, frightened into penitence by the fact that their leaders have paid for crimes against the Christians with their lives, and by the dread of an invasion by the foreign troops, the inhabitants of Boxer villages are offering the Christians land and money to rebuild their houses. The Rev. Dr. W. S. Ament of the American Board of Foreign Missions, during a private expedition to Chouchou, collected $2,000 in gold, with which he fully indemnified the Christians of that place and of thirty other villages.

At Lianghsiang Dr. Ament obtained a site for a new church, collected $500 in gold, and secured an allotment of forty acres of land for the benefit of the native Christians. The Chinese Governor also collected $200 in gold, with which Dr. Ament was to indemnify the converts of the Congregational mission in South Chouchou in a similar manner.

Chinese Making Restitution

Rev. Mr. Tewksbury, also of the American Board of Foreign Missions, succeeded in collecting 18,000 taels and getting an allotment of 100 acres of land in Tungchou and its vicinity, where one hundred and eighty converts were killed. The income from the land is 500 taels a year, which will be sufficient to support the converts. The Chinese also promised to rebuild twenty chapels, to grant land for nineteen cemeteries, and to erect the necessary monuments in thirty villages. The missionaries have not collected money anywhere to indemnify themselves, as they intend to lay their claims before our government.

The Martyrdom of Miss Morrill

Meantime comes the story, with horrible details, of how Miss Mary Morrill, of Portland, Me., and Miss Annie Gould, missionaries at Pao-ting-Fu, won the crowns of martyrs. When the other missionaries, all men, were burned to death in their homes, Miss Morrill and Miss Gould were reserved for a more exquisite torture. The Chinese understood that these pure Christian women could be hurt more by shame than by physical torture. After making them watch the burning of their mission houses with their faithful male defenders in them, after compelling them to stand by while the streets ran with the blood of their native converts, they stripped them of their clothing and tied them by the hair to long bamboo poles. Coolies bore the other ends of these poles, and then through miles of crowded streets the victims were forced to walk, stained and bleeding, encouraging each other from time to time with a prayer or a verse from the story of the passion of Him for love of whom they were suffering.

Miss Gould, enfeebled by long weeks of watching and anxiety, succumbed, and death from terror robbed her torturers of the fiendish pleasure they had designed for themselves in her agony. But Miss Morrill stumbled bravely on, alone, to her martyrdom. Her eyes were raised to heaven with a look in them as if she saw it already open ready to receive her. She was like Hypatia among the savage Christians of Alexandria, alone, naked, with death her only hope. When the fiends had sated their malignant ingenuity, her wrists were tied with a rope behind her back and she was forced to her knees. One blow of a sword severed her head from her shoulders, and she was at rest. Her body was burned. So died this brave and faithful American missionary, holding fast, even in the last moment, to the faith she had believed and taught. Her martyrdom is at once one of the saddest and the most glorious in the whole story of Chinese persecution.

A Characteristic Letter

That Miss Morrill was of the metal of which martyrs are made, is revealed in her farewell letter to her father, dated May 30. She wrote:

Miss Gould and I cannot leave if we would, and would not if we could. Our twenty-two girls may be able to leave after examination on June 15, but most probably will not. With the country in its present state, it would not be expedient for girls and women to be on the road. So we are bound to stay here and care for them.

After telling of the killing of a Chinese general who had tried to suppress the Boxers, she went on:

I am afraid it will not be so easy to send away the girls. Of course, if we could see them safe with their parents it would be easier for us to leave at a moment's notice. It may be that the bands that have destroyed the railroads will move in another direction. It may be that some check will be put upon their movements. The Lord can do as great things as he has done in the past, "for his arm is not shortened that he cannot save, nor his ear heavy that he cannot hear." Do not feel too troubled about us. The danger is all around and near, but God is nearer.

Letters received by Mrs. Archibald Little in Shanghai, from Shansi, give further details of the persecution of Christians in that province. One letter gives the Governor's proclamation thus: "The foreign religion is detestable because it despises the gods, and harasses the people. Boxers will burn the houses of all Christians and kill them."

The writer continues: "On July 15 Mr. and Mrs. McConnell, with their little girl, Miss King and Miss Burton, together with Mr. and Mrs. Young, came down from Kikichow. On their arrival at Si Yai Koo they were attacked and surrounded, and on July 16 they were decoyed to the banks of the Yellow River where they were all killed."

Another letter, dated at Si-an, says that when the mission there was burned, Mr. Peng was killed, and that then violence was used to make four Christians worship idols, forcing them to recant.

The Boxers then ordered them to draw lots before the idols. If the lot came upward it was to be proof that they were sincere in recanting; but if downward the Boxers would consider that they were insincere and would kill them. One Christian then worshiped the idols and drew lots, fortunately obtaining the upward lot. The others were killed with torture in the temple of Yoo. On the west side of the Yen River, near Pingiang-fu, the people took all the Christians, men and women, and with a knife cut a cross on their foreheads. Then they tortured them to death.

"All the Christians at Pingiang-fu," says another writer, "have received an official paper, which they are required to paste on their doors, announcing that they have renounced Christianity. All the homes of Christians in the country about the city have been destroyed. The wives and daughters of the Christians have been shamefully treated and tortured. No steps have been yet taken to punish the Taotai, who handed over to slaughter the Thompsons and their children, the Wards and their children, Miss Sherwood, Miss Manchester and Miss Desmond, and now he holds in prison the evangelist who saw Mr. Ward killed. Lest he should give evidence against Taotai, that official is forcing the unhappy man to write false letters, distorting the facts of the massacre."

It is estimated that 20,000 native Christians were killed in the Pekin division alone.

TAKE A RECORD.

See How Many Friends Are Hurt by Coffee.

It would be just as reasonable for a te perance advocate to drink a little dilut whiskey as to drink coffee, for one is truly intoxicant as the other, and persister in the use of coffee brings on a variety chronic diseases, notorious among which dyspepsia, heart palpitation (and ultimat heart failure), frequently constipation, kidn diseases, many cases of weak eyes and tren ling condition of the nerves.

This is only a small percentage of the gr variety of diseases which come from an balanced nervous system, caused by the p sistent daily use of the drug caffeine, whi is the active principle of coffee. Anoth bit of prima facie evidence about coffee that the victims to the habit find great di culty in giving it up.

They will solemnly pledge to themselv day after day that they will abandon the of it when they know that it is shorteni their days, but morning after morning th fail, until they grow to despise themselv for their lack of control.

Any one interested in this subject would greatly surprised to make a systematic quiry among prominent brain workers America. There are hundreds and thousan of our most prominent people that ha abandoned coffee altogether and are usi Postum Food Coffee in its place, and for t most excellent reasons in the world. Ma of them testify that ill health, nervous pr tration, and consequent inability to work, h in times past, pushed them back and out their proper standing in life, which they ha been able to regain by the use of good healt strong nerves, and great vitality, since coff has been thrown out and the Postum put its place.

A SILENCED SINGER

A NUMBER of poets, whose musical measures have cheered or comforted our readers, have graduated into hymn-writers, because composers, noting the grace and beauty of their verses, asked the privilege of setting the words to music. Every now and then a bit of information, usually of a bright and happy nature, in keeping with a singer's pleasing task, comes to us about our poets. But tidings cannot always be glad; and we must weave a cypress wreath for one who sings no more on earth—or, since our friend is singing among the angels, shall the tribute be the lilies and roses of happy thoughts? One who knew her well writes from Stayner, Canada, of Mrs. W. J. Kennedy:

MRS. W. J. KENNEDY

Since THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has published many of Mrs. Kennedy's hymns, I thought its readers might be interested to see her picture, and hear something concerning her. She was born in Monaghan county, Ireland, in 1848, and died at this place May 1, 1900. She was converted when very young and led a pious Christian life, using her gift of song solely in the Master's service. She wrote hundreds of Gospel songs, the most popular of which are, "My Heart is Glad," "In a Saviour's Love," "There is Gladness in the Gospel," "Beyond the River," "My Presence Shall Go With You," "Gathering Home," "The Gospel Banner," "At the Pearly Gates," and "Lead Me to the Rock." She was unfailingly kind and charitable and entirely lovable in the home that was hers. For over eighteen years she was a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and got many subscribers to it, feeling that it would be a blessing wherever it went.

A BEAUTIFUL GIFT TO INDIA

A few weeks ago, a missionary in India, who had labored faithfully and efficiently in the famine field, wrote to Dr. Klopsch a letter in which he enumerated some needs of his work. In that letter he made a special plea for an organ to be used in his orphanage Sunday School. Shortly afterward the faithful missionary died, "in the harness," having practically given his life for the welfare of the India famine sufferers. By a singular coincidence, Dr. Klopsch received soon afterward a letter from Mr. W. T. Godfrey, a business man in New York City, inquiring whether he "knew of a Sunday School in some isolated place" that was in need of an organ, as a friend of his had one he wished to donate. He was promptly informed of the missionary's Sunday School at Baroda, India. The owner of the organ, Mr. Robert S. Dod, of No. 103 Seventh street, Hoboken, N. J., on being informed of the fact, gladly gave the instrument, which was boxed and shipped to India, to the care of Rev. E. F. Frease, Secretary of the Missionary Committee at Bombay, to be forwarded to its destination, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD paying the freight. It is a large and beautiful instrument, in perfect condition, and will be a valuable aid in the missionary work in a field where there are comparatively few conveniences, and where every aid is gratefully welcomed.

"Keep the Upward Windows Open"

LET the soul be ever ready,
Waiting for the daily word,
Listen for the loving message
From the tender Father, Lord.

"Keep the upward windows open,"
Catch the morning's earliest ray,
Gather sunshine, shed it round you,
Through the hours of every day.

"Keep the upward windows open"
To the sunrise and the birds,
Let them sing their sweetest music,
Kindly thoughts and loving words.

"Keep the upward windows open"
That good angels may come in
With their joy, their power and uplift
Far above earth's strife and din.

So with your soul—windows open—
Open to the blessed Lord—
Life shall be a day of sunshine,
As you follow at his word.

THE CHURCH CHOIR ZOBO BAND OF PATERSON, N. J. Photo from Life.

This band was organized by the church choir and Organist, Mr. W. F. Miller, as a means of raising money for Church and Missionary purposes. It was a success from the start, and has even participated in Easter Sunday service. The band is very proficient, and is now taking outside engagements. They find it a pleasant, profitable variation from routine work. Many Church Choirs have these Zobo Bands, and find them of great value. As a means of earning money for church purposes, a "Zobo Concert" invariably draws full houses. Zobo Bands can play any piece of music in all parts by ear or by note as preferred.

READ WHAT PASTORS AND ORGANISTS SAY ABOUT OUR INSTRUMENTS

G. B. Richardson, Business Manager of the "Young Peoples' Weekly," Elgin, Ill., writes: "The Zobo Instruments I purchased of you were first used at an entertainment given at my home to the 200 employees of the Young People's Weekly. Although the Quartette had opportunity for but one rehearsal the effort met unbounded enthusiasm and was voted a great success. We are now considering the organization of a full orchestra for next winter's entertainment, and I write this to ask you to forward me a select list of 12 to 15 instruments." Wm. J. Siemers, leader of the Beacon Light Zobo Band, Baltimore, Md., writes: "I send you to-day copy of a Baltimore paper, giving a very complimentary notice of the "Zobo" Concert given last night by the Beacon Light Zobo Band, composed of members of the choir of the Scott Street United Brethren Church. The concert was a great success, both artistically and financially, and at the close we received an offer at good pay for another engagement. Every church should have a Zobo Band. It is the pleasantest and easiest way of raising money that I ever tried or heard of, because any one that can hum a tune can play on a Zobo." Miss Hattie E. Konnty, of Springfield, S. Dak., organist, choir leader, says: "Zobo Instruments received, and are all right, and we want more of them." Rev. James C. Mitchell, of North Easton, N. J., says: "I have just received the Zobo Cornet and I am delighted with it; will organize a band." Wm. F. Miller, organist and director of church choir of Park Ave. Baptist Church of Paterson, N. J., says: "I find the Zobo Brass Band Instruments to be first-class, and just what we needed, as we have a very small organ. We have a fourteen piece Zobo Band, and intend to enlarge it. We have had one Zobo Concert, and would say it was a complete success." Mae Blance Winfield, instructor of music at Gallaway Female College, of Searcy, Ark., says: "I am much pleased with the Zobo Band Instruments." Had we space we could quote you thousands of such letters from renowned persons who have had our goods, but we believe we have quoted enough to satisfy any reasonable person that we are perfectly reliable and that our goods are as represented.

CAN BE PLAYED BY ANY ONE WHO CAN HUM A TUNE—NO LEARNING

We do away with that long tedious labor of practice. It is the most extraordinary musical instrument ever produced. An instrument capable of almost every modulation, its music may be softened to the cooing of a dove or the thrilling song of the nightingale. The Cornet is an elegant accompaniment to Organ, Piano or any string instrument, and affords unlimited pleasure to the individual; suited for all in and outdoor entertainment. These instruments open up new possibilities to the Vocalists, and develop the vocal cords.

WITH A FULL BAND A GRAND PIPE ORGAN EFFECT CAN BE OBTAINED Those that have no pipe organ, the Zobo supplies the want at a minimum cost. Every church without a paid choir should organize a Zobo Church Choir Band. Sing into the mouthpiece—Zobo does the rest.

$1.00 SPECIAL OFFER To introduce the musical marvel of the age and to give you a chance to test our instruments and prove all our claims, we will send the Zobo Cornet, solid brass, highly polished and lacquered, 11 inches long, 5 1-2 inch bell, with full instructions how to play, and illustrated catalogue, prepaid, for $1.00. We make this offer, believing that all interested will eventually organize a Zobo Band. This is a grand offer, and you should not miss it. We warrant each instrument just as represented or money refunded. Send money by registered letter, postoffice money order, or a bank draft payable to our order.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. H., Bonsall, Cal., writes:

I "know that my Redeemer liveth," for answer came to my prayer like lightning's flash, even as I prayed.

Reader, Charlie, Tex., writes:

I was very much concerned over the spiritual welfare of a loved one. God has blessed her and I write to acknowledge his goodness, as well as to strengthen the faith of others.

An Old Subscriber, Lexington, Tenn., writes:

I want to acknowledge through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the loving kindness of my Heavenly Father. Yes, he answers prayers. Only recently I was told that one very dear to me had made a decision that I believed would be a drawback to his Christian life, and I prayed that he might be directed by the Holy Spirit. In less than two weeks he came out on the Lord's side. I felt that God had for Jesus' sake answered my prayer, as he had often done before.

A Reader, Broomfield, Colo., writes:

For many long months deep sorrow and trouble have been constantly with me, and for a time I was rebellious toward God. Then hope came, and a voice said: "Trust God. He will help you." For days I prayed that the burden might be lifted, promising faithfully to acknowledge his goodness and mercy. My prayer is answered. Oh, how I praise him that led me to trust him fully!

Mrs. W. J. K., Cleveland, O., writes:

I promised God if my prayer were answered to make known to others that I had received divine benediction by his grace. My prayer has been answered. Let all pray without ceasing.

A Kentucky Subscriber and Reader writes:

I prayed God to help my dear mother. He has answered. As reading the "Answered Prayers" in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave me so much hope and increased my faith, I am glad to fulfil my promise in this answer to my prayer, hoping that those who read may be benefited.

Subscriber, Montgomery, Ala., writes:

During a recent season of trial and perplexity, I sincerely promised the Heavenly Father that if he would open the way and show me the right course to pursue, I would give public acknowledgment. He answered my prayer and I now write to redeem my promise, thanks be to his name.

A "Widowed Mother, and a reader for ten years," writes:

I wish to acknowledge, through this good paper, the mercy of God in answering part of my prayer. I am praying now that the revival here may be successful, and that many be brought to the Lord, among them my two dear sons.

A Constant Reader, Waterloo, Ia., writes:

I wish to praise and glorify God through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for answering my prayers. My heart is filled with thankfulness toward our Heavenly Father, who is ever willing and ready to help us if we will only trust him. O God, fill our hearts with greater faith.

W. J. V., Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

I give glory to God for an answered prayer; the answer came within twenty-four hours after the asking. I can truly say, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I do not want."

E. C. H., Temperanceville, Va., writes:

I asked a special blessing in prayer and the same was answered. I desire to publicly acknowledge it through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Reader, High Point, Mich., writes:

I promised that if my prayer was answered I would acknowledge God's faithfulness that others might be strengthened. It has been answered. I believe God will answer all our prayers if it is for our good and we have sufficient faith.

Reader, Plainfield, N. J., writes:

I have received four answers to prayer recently, and wish to acknowledge this in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that it may be helpful to others.

H. P., Boonsville, Tex., writes:

I desire just to say a word for Jesus. I have been in great trouble, the way looked dark, but God is answering my prayers; daylight is dawning, bless his Holy Name.

H. J., Mound City, Mo., writes:

I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me in giving me strength to pass through the most trying ordeal, also his direct answers to my prayers on more than one occasion.

A Girl Reader, New Brunswick, writes:

I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer offered in behalf of a friend, with the promise that if God would answer I would acknowledge his loving kindness in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He has answered, and I write to fulfil my promise and give God the glory.

S. E. E., Du Quaim, Ill., writes:

I made a vow to the Lord, that if he would answer my prayer I would acknowledge my belief in prayer and in his power and goodness. The answer came beyond my expectations, and I bend in humble thanksgiving before him.

Reader, Delavan, Wiss., writes:

I want to give public testimony that God for Christ's sake answers prayer, not only for our spiritual wants but also for temporal blessings. He has just carried me tenderly over what seemed an insurmountable difficulty in answer to prayer. Oh! that all would try the efficacy of faithful prayer.

E. E., Lanark, Ill., writes:

For some months past I have been in trouble. I carried my trouble to God in prayer. To-day my prayer was answered, and I can not express all my gratitude to God, but I testify that he will answer prayers.

Mrs. G. T., Boston, Mass, writes:

A short time ago I found a great trouble was coming to me, and I prayed that it might be averted. God has answered my prayer, and I am glad to add my testimony to those of the many others who have acknowledged God's mercy through this paper.

EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES

An Example of Kindly Interest in Religious and Moral Development Set by a Great Corporation

A SIGNIFICANT testimony to the value of Young Men's Christian Association work is given in the conduct of one of our greatest corporations—the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. It was not generally known until the recent conference in Philadelphia of the Railroad Department of the Y. M. C. A. how cordial and helpful were the relations between the managers of this great road and the Y.M.C.A. At that conference, the chiefs of the road not only participated in the meetings and took a lively interest in the proceedings, but extended the courtesies of the road to visiting delegates, and, at the conclusion of the conference took the delegates on a delightful excursion to the sea. First Vice-President Green and second Vice-President Pugh were prominent among the speakers, and President Cassatt honored the conference by his presence on the platform.

It appears that for many years past, the company has manifested its interest in unostentatious ways in the Y.M.C.A. It has encouraged the organization of branches where they did not already exist, and has provided them with temporary accommodation until the Association was strong enough to secure a home of its own. The company was in every instance a liberal contributor to efforts of this latter kind, and many a Railroad Y.M.C.A. is indebted to it for not only help in building, but in equipping the rooms and the gymnasium with the best appliances. The headquarters in West Philadelphia, we have heard, was provided entirely at the cost of the company. This model institution shows that it is with no niggardly hand, but with princely generosity that the management of the Pennsylvania road gives.

These relations are very creditable to both sides. They show that the influence of the Y. M. C. A. is of a character that employers appreciate. It improves and develops the best elements in the character of the members, makes them better and more trustworthy men, keeps them out of temptation and improves their moral tone, all of which inures to the benefit of the employers as well as of the men. On the other side, it is extremely gratifying to see a great corporation treating its employees not as mere "hands," but as human beings, who have minds to be cultivated and souls to be saved. We should hear less of labor disturbances if such relations existed in other corporations. It appears, too, that this railroad does not limit its interest to Y. M. C. A. work, but has shown its interest in its employees by establishing savings banks for the encouragement of thrift and an insurance and pension system by which a provision for old age, or for the family in the event of death, may be secured. It is by such means probably, rather than by legislation, that we may reach a solution of the labor problem.

1,500,000 Paupers Through Drink

In reply to an inquiry on the subject of temperance addressed to the superintendents of almshouses in various sections of the United States answers have been given by 816. Averaging the results obtained, it appears that the number of persons now being supported in these institutions, who were brought to poverty by indulgence in intoxicating liquors is more than one-half of the whole number. If the same ratio applies in all the almshouses of the United States, it is estimated that about one million and a half persons have been thrown on public support by the liquor traffic.

Faithful to Trust

I CLOTHE my heart with freshness, though the year
Is drifting to its close, and flakes of snow
Proclaim the near approach of winter. Sere
And yellow are the leaves the north winds blow
In drifts within the wood. I murmur not,
For what to me the gilded sword of change!
Time holds for me an ever sunny spot,
Where love and fancy, arm in arm, may range.
Who fills his place in life, and fills it well—
Though it be toiling in the field, or mine
Or in the shop, where clanging wheel and bell
Proclaim the working hour—the years will twine
Their wreaths around his brow! Faithful to trust
Is one sweet flow'r that blossoms from the dust.

REGISTERED TRADE MARK
SKIRT BINDINGS

YOU can buy skirt bindings that cost quite a little less than the S. H. & M. Bindings. But if you think that is economy you are wrong.

Inferior bindings—and all bindings are inferior to the S. H. & M. brands—do not fit the curves of the skirt properly. They make it wrinkle and curl up.

They soon get discolored and fray.

They soon wear out and have to be replaced at a cost far exceeding that of the bindings themselves.

The price of bindings seems like a trifle, but the cost of replacing them is no trifle.

Ladies' tailors advertise constantly to rebind skirts with S. H. & M. Binding, and you will find that their prices include a charge of at least $1.00 for the work.

What is the use of using bindings that never fit well, nor look well and have to be replaced once or twice during the life of the skirt when S. H. & M. Bindings are at your disposal?

No bindings ever made fit the skirt so well, are so rich, distinctive and elegant, or wear so long as the celebrated S. H. & M. Bindings.

Look on the back or on the label of every yard of bias velveteen or brush edge bindings you buy for the S. H. & M. registered trade mark.

It is your right and privilege to insist on finding it there.

The Divine Nature a Combination of Power and Tenderness

STRENGTH combined with tenderness make a character which wins the affection and admiration of all. This is more than the iron hand in the velvet glove, because that may be used to crush as effectually as if it were not sheathed in velvet. It is the strong man protecting, supporting, cherishing, providing. Incidents revealing such characteristics always awaken our esteem. The old story of the rough cavalryman stooping from his horse to snatch a child from before his horse's hoofs is an instance in point. Who does not long to have known that man and to have grasped him by the hand? We have seen a burly policeman, capable of doing his share in suppressing a riot, lifting a fallen child, or guiding a schoolgirl through the maze of vehicles on a crowded street. A fireman foremost in his company risking his life by deeds that might daunt an athlete, yet carrying down his ladder some fainting girl so tenderly and gently that his grasp was as light as that of her mother. We like such men. They seem to have the best characteristics of the masculine and feminine natures—the power and vigor that belong to the man with the kindness and gentleness that attract us in woman.

The Psalmist presents the character of God in this twofold aspect. He covers the heaven with clouds, he sends snow and rain, he makes the winds blow and the waters flow, he knows all the stars and he compels the enemy to be at peace. Yet with all this, he gives the beast his food and provides food for the birds, he blesses the children and heals the broken-hearted and binds up their wounds. It is a beautiful picture, sweetly encouraging to mankind. We do not always learn it from nature. Here we are more impressed with God's infinite power. It is important that we appreciate that power and wisdom, but there are times in human experience when it becomes oppressive. We stand appalled by some exhibition of almighty force and energy, or, as we read the story of the stars, we are lost in wonder at the figures of the vast distances and the stupendous bulk of the heavenly bodies and the might that swung them on their journeys and keeps them in their orbits. But there are moods in which the consideration of power imparts no comfort. Suffering under some calamity, sore under some bereavement, trembling under the consciousness of sin, and longing for pardon, or longing for holiness and purity, yet deploring our weakness, we need some other element than power in the divine character to encourage us to approach him. We would not have him less mighty than he is, but we want to be assured of his tenderness and compassion. The feeling that makes the child in trouble turn instinctively for sympathy from the father whom he admires to the mother whom he loves.

The practical lesson the Psalmist draws from the combination of strength and tenderness is the duty of praise. There ought to be gladness that the Being whom we have so much cause to fear, is One whom we may love. Despite his majesty and infinite power, we may call him our "Father." If he casts the wicked to the ground, he also lifteth up the meek. He invites trust and confidence, for "he takes pleasure in those that fear him." It is a great point gained when we know that omnipotence is joined with love. Such a character we can praise and admire. It is precisely the character that human nature needs in the Divine. It implies that the true wisdom of man is to put himself in accord with it. To resist his will, to take the path of rebellion, is to be in opposition and to encounter the might and power of the Infinite. To yield to him, obey him, reverently seek his help, is to place ourselves in the line of blessing and to assure ourselves of development. All the scientific triumphs of our time have come not from resisting nature, but from understanding natural law and applying it to the end we seek. So it is in the spiritual world. We need to know God's will and to do it. Then we gain power, we are in harmony with his nature, which is the law of our being, and all things become possible to us. Conversion is no more than this. It is the turning around, the leaving of sin and the yielding to God's grace, which can transform our natures and bring us under the benign influences of God's nature.

MRS. APPLEGATE AND HER DESCENDANTS

FIVE GENERATIONS

Not infrequent reminders come to this office that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is an old friend, a welcome guest, in a home where four and five generations gather. Sometimes the letter is from a little tot whose mama, acting as secretary, expresses the small person's admiration of pictures in the paper, informing us at the same time of the small person's great good fortune in having three or four living grandparents. Sometimes it comes from one or another grandmother, who tells how the paper has long been a messenger of comfort, peace and cheer in the home where she sits crowned with years, in the midst of children and children's children, who rise up and call her blessed. In the present instance, a young mother, Mrs. L. M. Helmer, Mohawk, N. Y., who "has read your paper for years," sends the photograph of an interesting quintette and says: "The oldest lady is Mrs. Elizabeth Applegate, aged eighty-nine, and mother to Mrs. Harriet Fretts, sitting between her and Mrs. Marion Mayer, Mrs. Fretts' daughter and my mother. I am the mother of the baby, little Marion Elizabeth Helmer."

KEPT THE LOVE IN HIS HEART

Dr. Raynolds relates this interesting incident of the Armenian rescue work at Van:

Before the massacre, a young man, now one of our preachers, was teaching in a village, and a boy from another village was in his school for a year, imbibing a good deal of religious truth. At the time of the massacre this lad was in his own village and took to the mountains, where he became separated from his father, and was found by the Koords, who compelled him to go with them to a near Sheikh, where they extracted from him some sort of acceptance of Islam, and sent him to a distant village to be carefully watched for some years and brought back. The boy was bright, and was put in course of instruction for a Mollah, but all the time he kept his love for Jesus in his heart. Last fall he expressed a desire to visit the Sheikh, hoping for a chance to escape, but was so closely attended that no such chance presented, and the Sheikh was away from home. A few weeks ago he again applied for permission to visit the Sheikh, and this time was permitted to go alone, and so improved the opportunity to come to the city and appeal to the Armenian authorities for protection. They entreated that I would receive him as affording the best safety for him. He is too old to accept as an orphan, even if his father were not living, but I agreed to care for his expenses this year from relief funds and permit him to learn a trade with our boys. I had a long talk with him last Sunday evening, and found that he had kept much of what he had learned so long ago in the school. He has given himself to the blessed Saviour.

2. What metaphor is employed to characterize false doctrine and wicked persons?
3. Who were called the "Bible moths?"
4. How was it that Paul did not know the high priest as he said (Acts 23: 5), though he must have had frequent occasion to see him before his conversion?
5. What is the best method of dealing with people who are very easily offended at the slightest provocation—even unintentional—who are always on the lookout for trouble, and whose feelings are so sensitive and so easily hurt that it is almost impossible to get along with them?
6. Is a clergyman justified in omitting from the marriage ceremony the words pledging the wife to obey her husband?
7. Has a person a legal or a moral right to take the photo of another person by "snapshot" or otherwise, without the latter's consent?
8. Should the keeper of a drug store or hotel refuse to supply articles that are not necessaries on Sundays?
9. Is a daughter, who lives at home with her parents in moderate circumstances, and whose reasonable wants are supplied, justified in asking regular wages?
10. In choosing a new minister for a church, should the fact that certain members contribute the greater part of the minister's salary be considered when they prefer one candidate and the poorer members another?

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

Questions of the Week

1. Name a word that serves in the Bible as a metaphor for sorrow, a snare and the grave.

The answer is, pit, which is used metaphorically for sorrow in Psalm 40: 2, "He brought me up out of a horrible pit;" and again in Psalm 88: 6, "Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps." It stands for a snare in Ezekiel 19: 8, "Then the nations set against him on every side from the provinces and spread their net over him: he was taken in their pit;" also in Lam. 4: 20, "The anointed of the Lord was taken in their pits." It denotes the grave in Isaiah 38: 18, "Death cannot celebrate thee, they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth."

FRED L. SAWYER.

Correct answers have been received also from S. Beekman, Heppie W. Hamilton, Minnie M. Barker, Agnes E. Temple, Louis L. Sheffer, E. W. Roberts, E. C. Robinson, P. J. Stone, A. R. Blachly, D. S. Call, Carrie Bucher, C. P. Atkinson, J. W. Van Valzah, Chas. S. Perry, Ina Humphrey, and G. G. Gifford.

2. Is piano playing a really desirable accomplishment for any but persons of pronounced musical talent or for those who are professionals?

I think it is. There is no better foundation for true musical culture than a knowledge of piano playing; if accompanied by a knowledge of sight-singing the person of average intelligence should be able to thoroughly appreciate and enjoy all good music. It is not necessary to acquire the technique requisite for the professional pianist, or the knowledge of theory that is compulsory for the composer. At the same time I am not advocating a "smattering" of musical knowledge—let the study be serious and artistic just as far as it goes. No one would contend that a thorough foundation in arithmetic was not desirable because the student did not aim to become an expert accountant, or intend to pursue to its end the study of the higher mathematics. Arithmetic is useful in many other lines; and in like manner the accomplishment of piano playing has a much wider field of usefulness than the merely professional one. Its gracious influence in the home, church and social life needs only to be suggested. Parents who can play are much better fitted to guide their children's music study; and it is from families where music has been cultivated in the home during several generations that the great artists and composers naturally spring. So, for the sake of the individual appreciation of this great art, the home and social influence, and the coming generation, all of which will prove mighty factors in American music culture, let every one acquire as great a degree of proficiency in the accomplishment of piano playing as time, opportunity and ability will allow. L. V. MOORE.

3. How can Paul's statement at Antioch (Acts 13: 20) that the time of the Judges continued four hundred and fifty years, be reconciled with received chronology?

The wording of the Authorized Version agrees with the chronology of the Book of Judges and of Josephus, but contradicts I. Kings 6: 1. But the true reading, given in the oldest Greek MSS. and followed by our Revised Version, does away with the apparent discrepancy. The passage, correctly rendered, reads, "He gave them their land for an inheritance, for about four hundred and fifty years: and after these things he gave them judges and Samuel the prophet." This refers to the 450 years as the period from the birth of Isaac to the taking possession of the Promised Land. G. E. KRAUTH.

4. Would it be wrong for a Christian who is diffident and forgetful to make a prayer and learn it, so that it could be repeated when called upon to do so at a prayer-meeting?

It is perfectly proper for any Christian to compose a prayer, commit it to memory and use it in prayer-meeting, or anywhere else, provided he is led of the Spirit to do so. The mere uttering of a formal prayer, committed to memory without the Spirit's unction to sustain it will be no more efficacious in itself than the sounding brass or the tinkling cymbal. The Lord's Prayer is an example of a written prayer which may be made formal or spiritual according to the mind of the individual. On the other hand, it is entirely unnecessary for any spiritually-minded Christian to depend on any formal or memorized prayers on account of any human infirmity. In Romans 8: 26, 27, we are informed that "the Spirit helpeth our infirmities." "We know not what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered." Whenever we find ourselves barren and unfruitful in prayer, we can ask the Master to help us, as the disciples did when they said, "Lord teach us to pray." J. J. MUNRO.

5. When two persons quarrel and their friends are unable to reconcile them, should the friends be expected to espouse one side or the other, when the cause of the quarrel is purely personal to the two concerned?

It largely depends on the cause of the quarrel. If one has grievously wronged the other, or has done something particularly mean and contemptible, it is perfectly right for the friends of the wronged person to show their opinion of the wrongdoer. The wronged person has a right to expect that public opinion will manifest itself. There are men who break up families and are yet received into social circles as if they have done no harm. Sometimes the law affords no remedy for the wrong and the only penalty that can be inflicted is from the sympathy with the sufferer, which closes against the wrongdoer the doors of homes to which he was formerly welcome. Then he feels his disgrace as he ought to feel it. But where the quarrel is not of so serious a nature there is no obligation on friends to take sides. Both cannot be invited to the home at the same time and therefore it is often best to invite neither. When no moral principle is involved it is well to remember Soloman's sage warning that "he who passeth by and meddleth with strife belonging not to him is as one who taketh a dog by the ears" (Prov. 26: 17).

6. Why is it that women complain so much more frequently than men do of lack of leisure?

The average woman performs at least the duties of housekeeper, "second girl," seamstress, (un) trained nurse and kindergarten teacher. Many do all their own domestic duties unaided. Add to this woman's multiform duties as wife, mother and hostess, and then it will be seen that her complaint is by no means groundless. When the different departments of household work are elevated into the rank of professions, with training schools for each, a woman with something less than the patience of Job and the mental calibre of a Gladstone, may expect to manage these departments without worry or waste or lack of leisure. But the nervous wrecks of womanhood all about us, and the moral wrecks of young manhood from Christian homes where mother was always "too busy to be bothered," proclaim that that time is not yet.

L. M. BEALS.

Women complain of lack of leisure more than men do, because, in addition to home duties and other industrial pursuits, more of the demands of society, fashion, philanthropy and religion are acknowledged and met by women than by men; and they are not as systematic in their use of time as men are, because of circumstances or habits.

7. Is a Christian business man who is quite solvent, but is aware that failure may come through some of his speculations, justified in putting some of his property beyond the reach of his creditors—say in his wife's name?

Such a practice is wrong from two points of view. We will suppose, first, that the property is conveyed to the wife that the man himself may draw upon it in case of need. There is no doubt that this is the object in view in many such cases. Well, has the man any moral right so to protect himself? Surely not. He is simply putting in a safe place that to which he has no right until all his debts are paid. To be sure, he may do this while he is solvent; but that does not affect the principle in the case. He is simply appropriating that which he imagines he may need to satisfy the just claims of his creditors. But again. We may suppose that the man makes this disposition of his property for his wife's sole benefit. But the wife has taken him "for better, for worse; for richer, for poorer." Now for her to take, or for him to make, any provision for her alone, is to go in the teeth of such a solemn obligation. If she takes him "for richer, for poorer," she cannot expect to share his good fortune and evade all partnership in his ill-fortune. No; the practice is wholly wrong from every point of view, and ought to be opposed by all who profess to be governed by the law of righteousness. JOSEPH HAMILTON.

8. What remedy can be found for the isolation so frequently experienced in country farm-houses?

Whatever of remedy there is must consist in the communication which is made possible by the printing-press and the facilities that are already at hand for personal association. The personal association cannot be made much greater than it is for most families, because the natural tendency to seek company usually regulates that. However, young people's circles for song, reading, and debate might be inaugurated from house to house one evening each week. They could attend despite the distance of a half mile, a mile, or even more, which separates country homes in sparse sections. The elder people would in the same way come to feel more social and renew their youth by the occasional visits of the circle. But this depends upon a measure of cooperation and organization. Any single family can find the remedy for itself largely by the means which the printing-press and the mails supply. Let the family, according to ability, plan some periodical visitor which suits the tastes of different members of the household. Take a paper and magazine for each person in the family, if time to read and means will justify so much. Take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the church paper of the family, the newspaper most suitable to the locality and one with something in it, a good magazine and a few up-to-date, useful books. Let each read one according to inclination but stimulate each other to good taste in that inclination. Let the family gather up the week's literature and the week's actual work in it some night, and have an evening literary party in the family. Get up a correspondence or two on literary and historic or current subjects with relatives who are likeminded, in some other part of the country, and let that contribute its part. Nothing gives life to home reading parties and conversation like bringing in the outside world. Then make the church and the Lord's Day contribute also by studying and discussing its texts and subjects. C. P. ATKINSON.

9. What should a church do when the minister, who has served it through a long period, is too old for acceptable preaching, if it is too poor to pay him a pension in addition to paying the salary of a younger minister?

That depends upon the pastoral economy of the particular church. If it is the policy of the denomination and consequently of that church to pay a preacher only a bare living, and then provide for the aged and indigent, then the church is bound to do at least a proportionate part in paying the worn-out ministers. Churches should assist one another in the pensioning of the worn-out preachers, so that all churches may always be at liberty to have an effective preacher. But the dues from that church for the superannuate must not be evaded. Such a debt is a debt of honor on the church, because the terms of employing the effective preacher morally involve this and bind the church to it. The individual church of which the minister has been pastor is especially under the obligation to see that he is provided for unless there is a conference board or a synodical board to make such provision. If the church is under an independent and individual obligation, it is bound to provide for the age and weakness of its minister, even if it has to divide the time of a minister with some other church in order to do so. If the policy of the church, however, has been to pay the clergyman such a salary as contemplates that he shall lay by something for himself, then of course the responsibility is upon himself. It would still be an unfeeling church which would let him suffer. C. P. ATKINSON.

10. What is the origin of the expression, to "take the cake?"

As we use the expression, it is applied to one who does a thing preeminently well, or sarcastically, to one who fails conspicuously, and its immediate origin is in the cake-walk common to Southern States. Yet the negro cake-walk has respectable ancestry in the mediæval past. Gerard's Herball (1663) informs us that "in the springtime are made with the leaves hereof newly sprung-up, and with eggs cakes or tansies, which be pleasant in taste and good for the stomacke." These cakes or tansies were offered as prizes in competitive sports. According to Brand, in the Easter season foot courses were run in the meadows, the victors carrying each a cake, given to be run for by some better class person in the neighborhood. In some parts of England a custom prevailed of riding for a bridal cake. "This riding took place when the bride was brought to her new habitation. A pole three or four feet high was erected in front of the house, and the cake was put on top of it. On the instant that the bride set out from her old home a company of men started on horseback, and he who was fortunate enough to reach the pole first and knock the cake down with his stick, received it from the hands of a damsel. This was called 'taking the cake.' The fortunate winner then advanced to meet the bride and her attendants."

Miscellaneous Questions

These letters, on the subject of the use of fermented wine at the Lord's Supper, have come to hand:

Mrs. A. Manypenny, Milford, Mich., writes: "I wish to protest against one of the replies made to one who asked if it was wrong to use fermented wine at the Lord's table. For the benefit of those who have not studied this question, I wish to quote the opinions of a few who have done so. Dr. Fowler says 'God seems to exhaust the force of language in denouncing wine, which biteth like a serpent.' Surely this cannot be the wine that Jesus made at the wedding-feast! The Bible mentions two kinds of wine: one a blessing, the other a curse. The obliteration of this distinction impeaches the consistency of revelation. Prof. E. Nott, of Union College, says, 'unintoxicating wine existed from remotest antiquity.' Dr. Barnes on the same subject, says: 'The wine of Judea was a pure juice of the grape, and a common drink of the people. We are told by Pliny and Philo that many wines produce headache and madness, but the sweet wines of Syria are used for dyspepsia and other stomach troubles. Which kind does it look reasonable that Paul recommended?' Dr. Thompson says the Moslems make no fermented wines, but boil the juice down to preserve it. Dr. Jacobus says the purest wines of Jerusalem and Lebanon were boiled and sweet. 'This unfermented wine was held in very high repute among the ancients. It was lifted by our Saviour into a symbol of his atoning work, while fermented wine is left under the curse of God, giving sorrow in this life and despair in the life to come.'"

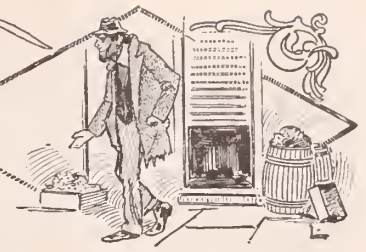
ROBERT WYNN, New York, writes: I notice that your correspondents are still exercised over the old question of the elements in the Eucharist. Do you not think the time has arrived for taking a newer and more rational view of the Sacrament than do the writers of the communications you have published? Why should we be so much concerned about the kind of wine Christ used at the ceremony? His intention in instituting it is obvious. He wanted some outward symbol of the union of his people with one another and with himself. His memory was to be kept alive in their hearts and they were to love one another. The natural means adopted combined these purposes. It was a simple meal which should not be a feast. It must be a meal to which none should sit down but those who loved him and in sitting down at a common table they would signify their common brotherhood in him. He chose the ordinary bread and wine which at that time were on every table in Palestine, because they were the ordinary food and drink. The one would remind them of his broken body and the other of his atoning blood. Anything that would symbolize these would serve his purpose. It is the spirit and motive of the Sacrament, not the details that should concern us. We may be very sure that if there is the slighest possibility of some poor, tempted creature having his struggle made harder by tasting the beverage which has injured him, Christ would be the first to bid us use some other beverage. Did he not say that if any one caused one of the little ones that believed in him to offend, it were better for him that a millstone were bound about his neck and he were cast into the sea (Mark 9: 42)? Therefore by all means let us use a harmless beverage in this ceremony.

We refer our correspondents to the article on this subject from Dr. Talmage's pen which appears on the editorial page of this issue. In that article he discusses the whole question frankly and comprehensively, and defines the attitude of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which has always been opposed to the use of fermented wine at the Sacrament.

The Ragged Church on the Bowery



T is Sunday evening, and above the din of the lower Bowery and the elevated trains church bells sound clarion invitations to service. To multitudes, the ound is the signal for glad preparation: it there are in the great city many men, nd not a few women, who hear it with orrow and regret. Poor, ragged and iendless, they feel that they cannot join the service in the Lord's house side by de with those who have nothing in comon with their miseries, and who would nly look askance at their rags.

To this class, there has lately ome the welcome news of the oranization of a church on the great ast side thoroughfare, the Bowy, which is in a measure exclusively their own. It is known as The Ragged Church," and is loated at No. 39 Bowery, where ospel services are held for God's ildren and sinners, "and free offee and lunch are served Sunay evenings." Here is a haven or the waif. It is the sort of urch he can enter without fear f comparison of clothes or social onditions — a church where he ay sit with others of his kind, ho have sunk to his own level. o with dragging step he joins the ne of men that has formed at the ntrance to No. 39 Bowery. Four olicemen keep in order this line, umbering over 1,000 men. They ake sure there is no crowding, nd the ragged ones enter the uilding two abreast. When 218 en have entered, the doors are osed, and no more will be admitd until some of those who have lready entered pass out. Thus om seven till nearly midnight, ere is a stream of ragged ones owing in and out, from five to six hunred having entered during the evening. he rest of the crowd are temporarily sent way for want of accommodations.

Inside, in a room back of the restaurant of the late Peniel Mission, there are seats for exactly 218 persons. There is a hospitable rule that no one may stand. These seats are filled with types of the lower Bowery, those who have fallen through misfortune, poverty, drink, and crime. Sit on the platform and look down into the rows of haggard, sallow faces, and you find the degenerate, the ex-convict, the inebriate, the man without will; countenances bereft of hope and written all over with the lines of indifference: eyes laden with despair; shoulders bent with misfortune and sin. The whitewashed walls are covered with mottoes, texts, extracts from Scripture, that tell of God and a better life. On the platform are the leaders and workers for Christ in a lowly field.

Some one is playing the organ, the congregation is singing hymns from cards that have been found in each seat. Meanwhile six waiters have handed to every one present a pint of coffee in a tin cup and four hot crullers. The body has been warmed. Grace has been sung, a prayer has been prayed, and now after the feast, there is a song service, reading from the Bible by the Superintendent. Mr. W. Austin, addresses by two preachers. A final invitation by the Superintendent to all to accept Christ may come to the altar and at every service a number profess conversion. When all is over, the congregation passes out and another audience of 218 men and women, many of them in rags, fills the hall. On a recent Sunday evening there were forty conversions.

This good work was recently started and founded by Mr. W. Austin. Mr. A. W. Dennett, of the Peniel Mission, kindly gave up his hall for the purpose, and personally helped the Ragged Church, and met the expense of the meals until he lately went to California. The entire work is now in the hands of Mr. Austin and his faithful helpers.

Mr. Austin was a leader in the Ragged Church of London, where thousands have been converted during the thirty years of its existence. Services are held every week-day evening at eight, and on Sundays at three o'clock, and from seven right through until nearly midnight.

In the Bowery Ragged Church, the leader has been fortunate in securing the volunteer services of an excellent preaching staff and workers. Among these are the Rev. J. J. Munro, Chaplain to the Tomb's Prison, New York; the Rev. John D. Longmore, of Brooklyn; Col. Charles R. Raye; Evangelist Robert Rein; Charles E. Crane; Charles H. Ridgway, and John McDonald, all of whom give their services free for the sake of the work itself and for the love of souls.

Mr. S. D. Sitterley has conducted the distribution of the free meals and he has also acted as organist to the Ragged Church, besides being proprietor of the restaurant and soup kitchen adjoining, where over 2,000 men are fed daily.

REV. J. S. LONGMORE W. AUSTIN, FOUNDER COL. CHAS. R. RAYE

THE FOUNDER OF THE RAGGED CHURCH AND HIS COADJUTORS

A BRIGHT CAREER CLOSED

DR. GEORGE D. HULST OF BROOKLYN SUDDENLY CALLED FROM EARTH IN THE MIDST OF HIS USEFULNESS

STANDING beside the casket in the South Bushwick Reformed Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., on Nov. 7, and looking down at the peaceful features of the man who had ministered for more than a quarter of a century within those walls, the question that ose lips, now silent, had so often uttered ame with momentous power: "If a an die, shall he live again?" Dr. Hulst told the writer that he never looked n a dead face without that question of he ancient patriarch recurring to his ind. He preached a sermon on the ext once, in which, with masterly skill, e presented the reasons for believing in he future life. It seemed to comfort im to go over them and dwell upon hem. He must have known that he ould live again in the hearts of his eople, who loved and reverenced him, ut he clung, as we all do, to the hope hat after death had done its work, the dentical ego conscious of its identity, would go on living in new conditions and mid new surroundings. A scientific bserver of nature, so careful and so culti ated as he, had seen much to discourage uch a hope; many students of nature, vho were glad to commune with him, ad abandoned the hope; and the appearnce of the dead, so utterly beyond sense nd feeling seemed to banish the hope; ut his faith triumphed over all, and with he apostle's confidence he cried: "We now that if our earthly house of this abernacle were dissolved, we have a uilding of God, a house not made with ands, eternal in the heavens."

Dr. Hulst's life had been a singularly ranquil and joyous one. Born in the old Duryea homestead at Penny Bridge, Brooklyn, N. Y., he had early manifested that love of nature and insect life which characterized his later years. Graduating with honors from Rutgers College in 1866, at the age of twenty, he passed to the Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1869. In the same year he began his ministry in the South Bushwick Reformed Church, which continued until his death.

Such services as he could render to the public without trenching on his pastoral duties, he cheerfully gave. For a time, he lectured on entomology at Rutger's College; he also served for a short period as State Entomologist of New Jersey; and he was President of the Department of Botany at the Brooklyn Institute. Twenty years ago the American Association for the Advancement of Science recognized his erudition by electing him a member, and a few years afterwards made him a Fellow. His own college showed her sense of her indebtedness to him, by conferring on him the degree of Ph. D. But honors and dignities could not spoil a nature so genial and sweet. He was ever the cheerful comrade of his brethren in the ministry, the guide and counsellor of the humblest members of his flock, and the compassionate friend and helper of all with whom he came in contact, who were in adversity. Few knew how earnestly he strove to help the struggling. A short time ago when in a time of hard pressure, inquiries were made into the condition of the poor, it was casually discovered that Dr. Hulst was helping more than a hundred families, the bread-winners of which were out of work.

THE LATE DR. GEORGE D. HULST

It was seldom, and only when deeply moved, that his sermons were eloquent. He attempted no flights of oratory, but his reasoning was convincing and he sought to influence the judgment and the will, rather than the emotions. But he was a man of deep feeling. It was easy to see that. It showed itself in his reading of the Bible. Whether it was a Psalm that he read, or some pathetic chapter from the Prophecies, or a Parable from Luke, or the tender words of Christ's parting address from John, or loving counsels from the Epistles, there was the same reverent, expressive rendering that seemed to bring a new meaning out of the inspired volume. One who humorously urged him to omit his sermon and read passages from the Bible instead, received a look of appreciation of the doubtful compliment, and he replied: "I wish they would be satisfied to have me do it; but they would not be content with the best."

People who saw his alert, wiry frame, his bright, cheerful demeanor and knew his love of out-door life, predicted for Dr. Hulst a hale old age; but it was not to be. "The Lord had need of him" elsewhere and with tender love for him, called him away, without an hour of suffering. On Monday Nov. 5, after preaching as usual the preceding day and teaching his Bible class in the Sunday School, he rose in his ordinary health. An hour later he suddenly fell prostrate. It was all over in a moment. Before medical assistance arrived, he was dead. He was only fifty-four years of age, but the sun of his life had set, to rise on eternal day.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

: : : Five Victories : : :

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Joshua 1: 5: . . . . . There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life.

MOSES was dead. A beautiful tradition says the Lord kissed him, and in that act drew forth the soul of the dying lawgiver. He had been buried, only one Person at the funeral, the same One who kissed him. But God never takes a man away from any place of usefulness until he has some one ready to replace him. The Lord does not go looking around amid a great variety of candidates to find some one especially fitted for the vacated position. He makes a man for that place. Moses has passed off the stage, and Joshua, the hero, puts his foot on the platform of history so solidly that all the ages echo with the tread. He was a magnificent fighter, but he always fought on the right side, and he never fought unless God told him to fight. He got his military equipment from God, who gave him the promise at the start: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life." God fulfilled this promise, although Joshua's first battle was with the spring freshet; the next with a stone wall; the next, leading on a regiment of whipped cowards, and the next battling against darkness, wheeling the sun and the moon into his battalion, and the last, against the King of Terrors, Death—five great victories.

As a rule, when the general of an army starts out in a war he would like to have a small battle in order that he may get his own courage up and rally his troops and get them drilled for greater conflicts; but the first undertaking of Joshua was greater than the leveling of Fort Pulaski, or the assault of Gibraltar, or the overthrow of the Bastile. It was the crossing of the Jordan at the time of the spring freshet. The snows of Mount Lebanon had just been melting and they poured down into the valley, and the whole valley was

A Raging Torrent.

But Joshua looks at his army and cries: "Forward, march!" and they start for the bank of the Jordan. One mile ahead go two priests carrying a glittering box four feet long and two feet wide. It is the Ark of the Covenant. And they come down, and no sooner do they just touch the rim of the water with their feet, than by an Almighty fiat, Jordan parts. The army of Joshua marches right on without getting their feet wet, over the bottom of the river, a path of chalk and broken shells and pebbles, until they get to the other bank. But no sooner have they reached the bank than the waters begin to dash and roar, and with a terrific rush they break loose from their strange anchorage. As the hand of the Lord God is taken away from the thus uplifted waters—waters perhaps uplifted half a mile—they rush down, and some of the unbelieving Israelites say, "Alas, alas, what a misfortune! Why could not those waters have stayed parted? Because, perhaps, we may want to go back. O Lord, we are engaged in a risky business. Those Canaanites may eat us up. How if we want to go back? Would it not have been a more complete miracle if the Lord had parted the waters to let us come through, and kept them parted to let us go back if we are defeated?" My friends, God makes no provision for a Christian's retreat. He clears the path all the way to Canaan. To go back is to die. But you say: "Why did not these Canaanites, when they had such a splendid chance, standing on the top of the bank thirty or forty feet high, completely demolish those poor Israelites down in the river?" I will tell you why. God had made a promise, and he was going to keep it. "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

But this is no place for the host to stop. Joshua gives the command: "Forward, march!" In the distance there is a long grove of trees and at the end of the grove is a city. It is Jericho. That city was afterward captured by Pompey, and once by Herod the Great, and once again by the Mohammedans; but this campaign the Lord plans. There shall be no swords, no shields, no battering-ram. There shall be only one weapon of war, and that nothing but a ram's horn. Seven priests were to take these rude, rustic musical instruments, and they were to go around the city every day for six days—once a day for six days—and then on the seventh day they were to go around blowing these rude musical instruments seven times, and then at the close of the seventh blowing of the ram's horns on the seventh day, the peroration of the whole scene was to be a shout, at which those great walls should tumble from capstone to base.

The seventh day comes,

The Climacteric Day.

Joshua is up early in the morning and examines the troops, walks all about, looks at the city wall. The priests start to make the circuit of the city. They go all around once, all around twice, three times, four times, five times, six times, seven times, and a failure. There is only one more thing to do, and that is to utter a great shout. I see the Israelitish army straightening themselves up, filling their lungs for a vociferation such as never was heard before and never heard after. Joshua feels that the hour has come, and he cries out to his host, "Shout, for the Lord hath given you the city." All together the troops shout: "Down, Jericho, down Jericho!" and the long line of solid masonry begins to quiver and to move and to rock. Stand from under! She falls! Crash! go the walls and temples, the towers, the palaces; the air blackened with the dust. The huzza of the victorious Israelites and the groan of the conquered Canaanites commingle, and Joshua, standing there in the debris of the walls, hears a voice saying: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

Only one house spared. Who lives there? Some great king? No. Some woman distinguished for great kindly deeds? No. She had been conspicuous for her crimes. It is the house of Rahab. Why was her house spared? Because she had been a great sinner? No, but because she repented, demonstrating to all the ages that there is mercy for the chief of sinners. The red cord of divine injunction reaching from her window to the ground, so that when the people saw the red cord they knew it was the divine indication that they should not disturb the premises; making us think of the divine cord of a Saviour's kindness, the red cord of a Saviour's mercy,

The Red Cord of Our Rescue.

Mercy for the chief of sinners. Put your trust in that God, and no damage shall befall you. When our world shall be more terribly surrounded than was Jericho, even by the trumpets of the judgment day, and the hills and the mountains, the metal bones and ribs of nature, shall break, they who have had Rahab's faith shall have Rahab's deliverance.

When wrapped in fire the realms of ether glow,
And Heaven's last thunder shakes the earth below;
Thou undismayed shalt o'er the ruins smile,
And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile.

But Joshua's troops may not halt here. The command is, "Forward, march!" There is the city of Ai; it must be taken. How shall it be taken? A scouting party comes back and says; "Joshua, we can do that without you; it is going to be a very easy job; you must stay here while we go and capture it." They march with a small regiment in front of that city. The men of Ai look at them and give one yell, and the Israelites run like reindeer. They never cut such a sorry figure as when they were on the retreat. You who go out in the battles of God with only half a force, instead of your taking the men of Ai, the men of Ai will take you. Look at the Church of God on the retreat. Tyndall delivers his lecture at the University of Glasgow, and a great many good people say: "Fall back! O Church of God! Do you not see that Christian philosophy is going to be overcome by worldly philosophy? Fall back!" Geology plunges its crowbar into the mountains and there are a great many people who say: "Scientific investigation is going to overthrow the Mosaic account of the creation. Fall back!" But friends of God never have had any right to fall back. Joshua falls on his face in chagrin. God comes and rouses him. How does he rouse him? By complimentary apostrophe? No. He says, "Get thee up. Wherefore liest thou upon thy face?" Joshua rises, and, I warrant you, with a mortified look. But

His Old Courage Comes Back.

The fact was, that was not his battle. If it had been he would have won the victory. He gathers his troops around him and says: "Now, let us go up and capture the city of Ai; let us go up right away." They march on. He puts the majority of the troops behind a ledge of rocks in the night, and then he sends comparatively small regiments up in front of the city. The men of Ai come out with a shout. The small regiments of Israelites in stratagem fall back and fall back, and when all the men of Ai have left the city and are in pursuit of these scattered, or seemingly scattered regiments, Joshua stands on a rock—I see his locks flying in the wind as he points his spear toward the doomed city, and that is the signal. The men rush out from behind the rocks and take the city, and it is put to the torch, and then these Israelites in the city march down and the flying regiments of Israelites return, and between these two waves of Israelitish prowess the men of Ai are destroyed, and the Israelites gain the victory; and while I see the curling smoke of that destroyed city on the sky, and while I hear the huzza of the Israelites and the groan of the Canaanites, Joshua hears something louder than it all, ringing and echoing through his soul, "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

But this is no place for the host of Joshua to stop. "Forward, march!" cries Joshua to the troops. There is the city of Gibeon. It has put itself under the protection of Joshua. They send word, "There are five kings after us; they are going to destroy us; send troops quick; send us help right away." Joshua has a three-days' march, more than double-quick. On the morning of the third day he is before the enemy. There are two long lines of battle. The battle opens with great slaughter, but the Canaanites soon discover something. They say, "That is Joshua; that is the man who conquered the spring freshet and knocked down the stone wall of Jericho, and destroyed the city of Ai. There is no use fighting." "Oh!" says Joshua, "this is surely a victory." "But do you not see the sun is going down? Those Amorites are going to get away after all, and then they will come up some other time and bother us, and perhaps destroy us. See, the sun is going down. Oh, for a longer day than has ever been seen in this climate!" What is the matter with Joshua? Has he fallen in an apoplectic fit? No.

He is in Prayer.

Look out when a good man makes the Lord his ally. Joshua raises his face, radiant with prayer, and looks at the descending sun over Gibeon and at the faint crescent of the moon. Pointing with one hand at the descending sun and the other hand at the faint crescent of the moon, in the name of that God who shaped the worlds and moves the worlds, he cries: "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou moon, in the valley of Ajalon." They halted. Whether it was by refraction of the sun's rays, or by the stopping of the whole planetary system, I do not know, and do not care. I leave it to the Christian scientists and the infidel scientists to settle that question, while I tell you I have seen the same thing. "What!" say you, "not the sun standing still?" Yes. The wicked do not live out half their day, and their sun sets at noon. But let a man start out in battle for God and the truth, and against sin, and the day of his usefulness is prolonged and prolonged and prolonged.

John Summerfield was a consumptive Methodist. He looked fearfully white, I am told, as he stood in the old Sands Street Church, in Brooklyn, preaching Christ, and again on the anniversary platform in New York, pleading for the Bible until unusual and unknown glories rolled forth from that book. When he was dying his pillow was brushed with the wings of an angel from the skies, the messenger that God sent down. Did John Summerfield's sun set? Did John Summerfield's day end? Oh, no! He lives on in his burning utterances in behalf of the Christian Church. He said, "I cannot die now. I am only twenty-seven years of age. Sun of my Christian influence, stand thou still above America,' and it stood still.

But Joshua was not quite through. There was time for five funerals before the sun of that prolonged day set. Who will preach their funeral sermon? Massillon preached the funeral sermon over Louis XVI. Who will preach the funeral sermon of those five dead kings—King of Jerusalem, King of Hebron, King of Jarmuth, King of Lachish, King of Eglon? Let it be by Joshua. What is his text? What shall be the epitaph put on the door of the tomb? "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life." Before you fasten up the door, I want five more kings beheaded and thrust in: King Alcohol, King Fraud, King Lust, King Superstition, King Infidelity.

Let Them be Beheaded

and hurl them in. Fasten the door forever. What shall the inscription and what shall the epitaph be?—for all Christian philanthropists of all ages are going to come and look at it. What shall the inscription be? "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

But it is time for Joshua to go home. He is a hundred and ten years old. Washington went down the Potomac and at Mount Vernon closed his days. Wellington died peacefully at Apsley House. Now, where shall Joshua rest? Why, he is to have his greatest battle now. After a hundred and ten years he has to meet a king who has more subjects than all the present population of the earth, his throne a pyramid of skulls, his parterre the graveyards and the cemeteries of the world, his chariot the world's hearse—the King of Terrors. But if this is Joshua's greatest battle, it is going to be Joshua's greatest victory. He gathers his friends around him and gives his valedictory and it is full of reminiscence. Young men tell what they are going to do; old men tell what they have done. And as you have heard a grandfather, or great-grandfather, seated by the evening fire, tell of Monmouth or Yorktown, and then lift the crutch or staff as though it were a musket, to fight, and show

How the Old Battles were Won

—so Joshua gathers his friends and he tells them the story of what he has been through, and as he lies there, his white locks snowing down on his wrinkled forehead, I ask if God has kept his promise all the way through. As he lies there he tells the story one, two, or three times—you have heard old people tell a story two or three times over—and he answers: "I go the way of all the earth, and not one word of the promise has failed, not one word thereof has failed; all has come to pass, not one word thereof has failed." And then he turns to his family, as a dying parent will, and says: "Choose now whom you will serve, the God of Israel, or the God of the Amorites. As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

Dead, the old chieftain must be laid out. Handle him very gently; that sacred body is over a hundred and ten years of age. Lay him out, stretch out those feet that walked dry shod the parted Jordan. Close those lips which helped blow the blast at which the walls of Jericho fell. Fold the arm that lifted the spear toward the doomed city of Ai. Fold it right over the heart that exulted when the five kings fell. But where shall we get the burnished granite for the headstone and the footstone? I bethink myself now. I imagine that for the head it shall be the sun that stood still upon Gibeon, and for the foot, the moon that stood still in the valley of Ajalon.

A UNIQUE FOREIGN MISSION WORK AT HOME

AMONG immigrants seeking the shores of the New World, the Armenians hold a peculiar place. Other peoples come because they eel that our country offers a better field or labor. and larger opportunities for social, as well as financial advancement. The rmenians came because persecution rove them from home. America was kind them, spoke boldly for their defence in heir hour of peril, sent them food, and heltered their orphans. Naturally, the rmenian, looking for a land where he ight find security and kindness, turned is eyes toward America. Naturally, too, is regard fastened upon New York, since was by way of New York, through THE HRISTIAN HERALD acting as lmoner for many generous riends, that so much help eached his stricken people. In nd around this city a great any Armenians are living. he Christian public which remembered them when they were far off has not become unmindful of them now that they ve among us, and readers of HE CHRISTIAN HERALD will e interested to hear of a mission which is conducted under n American leader by Armenians for Armenians across the iver, in Jersey—the only work f its kind on the continent.

This work was organized in December, 1897, by Rev. Chas. . Evans, pastor of the First resbyterian Church of West Hoboken, to meet the needs of rapidly-growing colony of Armenians, and its care and oversight was undertaken by the session of the church. There re now between five and six undred Armenians residing in hat section of "North Hudson" who are for the most part efugees from persecution in heir own country. The condition of many of them on arival was most pitiable: they found themselves strangers in a strange land, with no knowledge of the English language and with no resources; in the midst of a mixed population of German, French and Italians, with liquor saloons open on every corner, and temptations to which they had not been accustomed meeting them on every side. Employment was secured for many of them in the silk mills; religious services were instituted by Rev. Mr. Evans in a hall rented for the purpose, and within a few weeks a night-school and medical dispensary were established. Mr. B. R. Torassian, a native Armenian, graduate of Union Theological Seminary, and licentiate of New York Presbytery, was secured as Mr. Evans' assistant.

The American visitor to this mission finds himself in a most novel and foreign atmosphere among the swarthy, dark-eyed folk who make up the congregation. Special services, with preaching, in the Armenian and Turkish languages, are conducted every Sabbath morning, and the attendance upon these services has at times exceeded 150, taxing the capacity of the hall to the utmost. The Sabbath School, in which the international lessons are used, is well attended by children and adults, and great interest is shown in the prayer-meeting on Wednesday evenings and the woman's prayer-meeting, Thursday nights. A night-school for young men, in which the usual English branches, history, geography, mathematics, etc., are taught, has been in successful operation for two years. At the night sessions, men past middle age sit side by side with beardless boys. Similar instruction is provided for women and girls in day classes. A kindergarten, recently added, is attended by about sixty boys and girls. The Penny Provident Fund has been found most useful in encouraging the children to be industrious, and in training them to habits of practical economy.

On account of the peculiar customs and ideas common to Oriental people, and prevailing to some extent among the Armenians, it was found impossible for male ministers to do all the pastoral work of the mission. A woman was needed to labor among the women. Providentially, the very woman to do this work was found in Miss Rebecca Krikorian. Miss Krikorian is the daughter of a native Armenian minister distinguished by devotion and service to his people; she was a pupil of Miss Corinna Shattuck, the "Heroine of Oorfa," and well-known to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and she has been engaged in mission work in our country for the past fifteen years. Driven from her native land by the terrible Turk, she came seeking work for the Master among Armenians in America. In the mission at Hoboken, where she entered upon service last May, she has been found invaluable, going from house to house and room to room in the tenements, reading the Word of God to the women, and praying with them, leading their mission meetings, teaching them in the Bible school and conducting their sewing classes. In addition to their other services, both Miss Krikorian and Mr. Torassian have been very helpful in securing work for the unemployed, acting as interpreters in courts and at the immigration offices, and in visiting the sick at the hospitals. Mr. Evans is also greatly aided by members of the Christian Endeavor Society of his church, who conduct the singing at Sabbath services; others interest themselves in social entertainments for the children, and the Junior Christian Endeavor provides the annual Christmas tree. Portraits of Mr. Evans' prominent helpers are presented on this page. Mr. Gabrielian is chairman of the Educational Committee; Mrs. Gabrielian president of the Orphan's Relief Association; Mrs. Diradoorian, secretary, and Mr. Nazarian, assistant superintendent of the Sunday School.

This mission, which teaches the Armenians self-help, is a not only religious, but a patriotic work. Generous assistance has been received from many friends, but more is required to make this important institution a permanent one. A larger chapel and commodious schoolrooms are needed.

...A GREAT...
Sermonic Library

DURING a ministry extending over a period of nearly half a century, Dr. Talmage has come closer to the hearts of the religious world than any preacher of his day and generation. His sermons have reached the remotest ends of the earth, and have been translated into almost every language known to civilization. At the present time, his utterances, published in the daily and weekly press, reach 12,000,000 readers every week. By arrangement with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Dr. Talmage has devoted two years of continuous labor to the revision of his most notable sermons, and these are now published in a set of Twenty Large Volumes of 400 Pages each, beautifully printed and richly bound in Art Vellum with Gilt Top. Taken as a whole, they constitute the most valuable library of Theological lore ever issued. They are thoroughly indexed and cross-indexed, alphabetically, topically and textualy, and are thus made immediately available to the preacher, student, teacher, Christian worker and the general reader. Like the Scriptures, they are "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correct instruction and righteousness."

In these volumes, a wide variety of topics is treated, and every sermon is instinct with the spiritual thought and life of the times. They have no peer in the domain of strong original thought, terse diction and brilliant imagery. They abound in anecdote and illustration, and their unique eloquence, which never fails to touch the heart as well as the understanding, gives to them a spiritual power which is everywhere acknowledged.

If you desire to make a grand holiday gift to your pastor, or your Sunday School superintendent, you can select none that will be more highly prized than a twenty-volume set of these remarkable sermons. In your own library and for home reading or reference, they will be found a treasure indeed. A set in the home library will give the entire household a spiritual uplift. They will be a minister in times of sorrow or sickness, and a trusted counsellor at all seasons.

The entire set of twenty large, finely bound volumes will be sent to you, securely boxed, by freight or express, on receipt of one dollar down and one dollar a month for nineteen months until paid. The price of the set is $20, a discount of 10 per cent. being allowed for cash. Address THE CHRISTIAN HEALD Book Department, Bible House, New York.

THE RICH YOUNG RULER

International Sunday School Lesson for December 2: Matt. 19: 16-26.

"IF THOU WILT BE PERFECT, GO SELL THAT THOU HAST AND GIVE TO THE POOR"

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT: (Mark 10: 24)

"Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!"

ONLY one month more of the old year and the old century, both suggesting the great words "time" and "eternity," and so preparing us for the lesson story of a young man profoundly interested in the "eternal life!" The hardest problem of the Church at the crossing of the centuries is how to interest young men in such a life. Among the little children in the primary department of the Sunday School there are as many boys as girls. When we count the twelve-year-olds in the same school, boys are only half as numerous as girls; and when we count those of eighteen, there are not one-fourth as many young men as young ladies. We might attribute this chiefly to the youthful notion that the Sunday School is a "children's affair," did we not find young men equally scarce in the Sunday morning service, and yet more scarce in the prayer-meeting. On the other hand, the young men are sadly numerous when we look into the saloons and the prisons. By a strange contradiction, deadly dissipation is commonly called "life." Our story to-day is of a young man who saw clearly that true "life" is to be found in an opposite course, but would not pay the price.

Running for Life There ran a certain ruler and kneeled to him, saying, Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may inherit eternal life? The writer was only a block away when, on October 29, a wholesale drug store blew up in New York City, shaking the ground like an earthquake, throwing debris in the air like a volcano. The crowds that had gathered to see the fire, when the explosions began, ran in all directions with utmost speed, and did not relax their pace till they were blocks away. With what energy we run from danger or for rescue of others when bodily life is in peril! But if it is the endless life that is at stake

Our souls how heavily they go
To reach eternal joys!

There is too little enthusiasm in religion rather than too much, and this young man of our lesson is to be commended for the intense earnestness with which he started out for eternal life. It was as if a rich young trustee in one of our churches, moral but not religious, should run down the aisle to kneel at the "penitent form" and cry aloud for the "life" that Christ alone can impart. This young man was a "ruler," not in the State but in the Jewish Church. He had inherited not only wealth, but all the privileges of a Jew, including knowledge of God and truth, but he saw in the overflowing life of Christ and those about him, a fulness of life he had not found in his merely formal religion. He wished to know how he could add this abundant life to his inheritance. He had been brought up to think all religious favors must be purchased from God by deeds of merit, and did not see how his own word, "inherit," proclaimed the higher truth that God, like a father, does not sell, but gives the inheritance. This is beautifully illustrated by the story of the poor woman who gazed longingly at the flowers that grew in the king's garden, wishing to buy some for her sick daughter. The gardener replied rudely, "The king's flowers are not for sale." But the king, overhearing the remark, said, "True, the king does not sell his flowers, but he gives them away." God does not sell "eternal life," but he gives it. Not for deeds of righteousness that we have done, but according to his mercy he saves us. But let us learn something, even for the teaching of this lesson, from the fact that Christ did not declare this theological doctrine, but, by the Socratic method of "developing questions" and by otherwise quickening thought and conscience, compelled the young man to "judge himself unworthy of everlasting life."

Do You Mean What You Say and Sing? Why callest thou me good? This young man had uttered the truth in calling Jesus "Good Master." Nineteen Christian centuries prove that. Even the sceptics admit with Richter that Jesus was "the purest among the mighty, the mightiest among the pure." Renan, the Napoleon of infidelity, said: "Whatever may be the unexpected phenomena of the future, Jesus will not be surpassed. His worship will constantly renew its youth. His sufferings will soften the best hearts. All the ages will proclaim that among the sons of men there is none born who is greater than Jesus." Col. Robert G. Ingersoll said, in a letter to Eli Perkins, "I consider Jesus the one perfect man." Most impressive of all, his Lordship is proclaimed in every date of every "year of our Lord." No infidel can put into his longest book any argument that will not be more than answered by the date he must put upon the title page. What a waste of paper to say that Jesus was no more than Socrates or Seneca or Shakespeare, and then date the statement from the birth of Christ?

But while the title used by the young man was true, Christ saw that even this serious and sincere man, like so many others, was using sacred terms without pondering their meaning. He would by the probe of a question compel him to weigh his words. He needed to see that "good" and God are synonymous words, that he might cease to belittle the word "good" by misapplying it. No other word is more abused to-day. "Good" means a hundred different things in a hundred different sentences, whether spoken by one man or a hundred. Shylock said Bassanio was "a good man," and then hastened to say that he only meant he was "good for his note."

And the word "Master" is used with similar thoughtlessness. When you sing:

Bring forth the royal diadem
And crown him Lord of all, do you mean that you are crowning him Lord of your pleasures, your politics, your business?

The Law as a Looking-glass If thou wouldst enter into life, keep the commandments. This looks like preaching salvation by works, but let teachers note it is only the great Teacher's wise way of making the moralist see that he cannot so be saved. It is what early revivalists called "law work." Preaching the law is the very way to show that men cannot be saved by the law. If a man is to be saved by the law, it must be by perfect obedience. He is bound to keep the law every hour, and so he cannot count the obedience of one hour against the disobedience of another. If he breaks the law, his only remedy must be mercy, forgiveness, atonement. In some way that violation of law must be provided for, and there is no way but the Cross. This young man, like many others to-day, had no sense of sin. If he had been told that he did not keep the commandments, both in letter and spirit, he would have resented and denied the statement. Christ seemed to take him at his word. He had proposed to be saved by works, and so Jesus said, "Keep the commandments" that glassing himself in the perfect law, he might see his need of cleansing. Let any one to-day look in that glass and he will soon discover his many sins, especially if he uses also those penetrating X-rays of Christ: "Covetousness is idolatry;" "He that hateth his brother is a murderer;" "He that looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery already with her in his heart;" "Defraud not."

A Sinner Lovable but Lost All these have I observed from my youth up. What lack I yet? And Jesus looking upon him loved him. A clean young man! No profanity on his lips; no blight of impurity in his cheek; no fraudulent gains in his wealth; no man's blood on his skirts. There is a record as noble as it is rare. Christ loved him for it, thus putting high honor on morality. But it does not satisfy even the young man. Else why this running, this kneeling, this anxious question, "What lack I yet?" That was partly a question of pride, but also a cry out of that aching void in the soul which the world can never fill. The soul is an ocean bed made for Divine love, and nothing less can fill it. That was what Augustine meant when he cried, "O God, thou hast made us for thyself, and our souls are restless till they rest in thee." It was what Browning meant when he wrote:

So the All-great were the All-loving too,
So through the thunder comes a human voice
Saying, "O heart I made, a heart beats here!
And thou must love me who hast died for thee."

The young man's "lack" was not of God's pitying love—every sinner has that—but of pardoning love. And of this he did not yet feel the need. Not even when he looked in the glass of the law had he seen any sin upon himself, and Christ must a third time probe his soul to show him that he who thought he had kept all the Commandments had not even kept the first. Nowhere in the Bible are we more strongly reminded of the need of prayer for cleansing from unconscious sins.

Cleanse thou me from unseen faults.

The young ruler was "near and yet so far." It makes one's heartache to think of such a clean, lovable young man, who has escaped appetite and lust but has been so chained by covetousness that he can turn his back on the Christ to whom his heart is drawing him rather than on the money which is enslaving him.

The Secret Idol Unveiled If thou wouldst be perfect, go, sell whatsoever thou hast and give to the poor. Christ saw that gold had become the god of this otherwise excellent young man. With the firm surgery of love he probed to the very spot where that golden chain of Mammon was eating out his life. Peter might even be an apostle and own a house, but this young man must forsake all, like most of the apostles and prophets and martyrs, to emancipate his soul from its hidden chain. "We can serve God without condemnation only when we serve him without reservation."

Let those who work with enquirers note that Christ did not attempt to make his entrance upon Christian life easy. We have seen Christian lives spoiled because enquirers were not led in the valley of decision to sacrifice their tipple or theatre-going or dancing or something else to which they had previously given the first place which belongs to God. lady who loved all things great a small, not wisely, but too well, saw butterfly struggling to free itself fro a cocoon and rise into its higher lif Its whole body throbbed with the de perate effort. The lady cut the c coon, and the butterfly came out, b only to flop instead of fly, for t very struggle from which it had bee freed was necessary to develop i strength. So another lady, seeing th one chicken from her hatchery w having an unusually hard time in pec ing its way out of its shell, attempte to make its entrance into its new li easy, but the chicken having lost t struggle, lost the strength God giv through it, and shortly died. O reason why our new members in t churches of to-day are so many them weaklings is that they have bee made to feel by false kindness th there is nothing to give up, no mo sacrifices required. In more sens than one the only way to life is by t cross. All through God's world w must come through the struggle f life and the higher struggle for the li of others into the endless life strength and joy that begins here b low.

This young man had the false fee ing about wealth that is so common, th it is to be stored in reservoirs of privat ownership, whereas Christ would have wealt poured out like a river of blessing, as the or tor pours out his eloquence without stint, a the scientist gives all he has of knowedg to the public.

Missing the Mark It is easier for a camel to g through a needle's eye than fo a rich man to enter into the kin dom of God. There were four prominent gate to the city and two small ones. The gate which were heavy, were always closed at sun set. The sentinel called out: "Come, haste ye people, the sun is disappearing, and th gates will close," and the people rushed quickl ly to enter the city before it was too late. I like manner numerous discussions have take place over the words: "It is easier for a cam to go through the eye of a needle, than for rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. The Revised New Testament has "a needle eye," which is better. The needle's eye wa an aperture—of which there were two or mor —in the walls. In Jerusalem, they saw camel going through the eye of a needle every da after the large gate was closed. It was squee ed through the aperture with the greatest di ficulty, and the sentry had to be rewarde with backsheesh, for they took tips even i Jerusalem. Having got the camel's head an neck through the gate, one man pulled hi body through and another pushed him fro behind. The Saviour did not mean that i was impossible for a camel to go through th eye of a needle, but that it was very difficul

Those who boast they are "self-made men usually worship their Creator, but it is so. emnly true that men are partly "self-made. Of the sinner that is especially true. He i prone to say, "I am what God made me," bu in fact he is what he has made himself "Every man's life is a plan of God," and w shall realize that plan in life as a whole if w follow his bidding day by day. To refuse t do that is to miss the mark, to lose the life, a did the young man of whom we have bee speaking.

A CAMEL AT THE GATE CALLED NEEDLE'S EYE

THE ULTIMATE AIM of CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

JOHN WILLIS BAER

YOU will find my theme expressed in the eighth plank of the Christian Endeavor platform of principles. Let me produce the plank herewith and we will see if it is broad ough and strong enough to hold every of the millions of Christian Endeavrs. Here it is:

Christian Endeavor has for its ulite aim a purpose no less wide and y than the bringing of the world to rist. Hence, it is an organization inely evangelistic and missionary in rit and desires to do all it may under direction of the churches and misnary boards for missionary extension."

So my subject is nothing less than the imate aim of Christian Endeavor, and hall try to do as an old colored brother l of whom I have heard, who divided sermon into two parts saying, "Brethn we will discuss fust, all the things in t text; second, all things not in the t, and brethren, we will 'rastle with the ond part fust."

Therefore let me remind my readers of eral very important matters. First, at each local society of Christian Enavor, next to Christ, is amenable to no er authority than that of its own pas and its own church. Like the Sunday hool, it is a subordinate part of the urch to which it belongs, and is of the ne denomination as that church. Each al Christian Endeavor Society is own with the term undenominational! It ould never be applied to Christian Enavor. Second, the Christian Endeavor a has successfully organized the boys d girls for effective service, hence the ousands of Junior Christian Endeavor cieties, and there is no more important anch of Christian Endeavor than that organizing the boys and girls, and savthem for Christ. Third, Christian deavor is also a blessing to the older ys and girls, and for them we have our ermediate societies with a membership of youth ranging from fourteen to hteen, the very flower of the young e of every community. Fourth, in the aduation we come to the Young Peo's societies, just such as Dr. Clark hteen years ago organized in Portland, e., giving the young converts definite d particular work at home and in ir own church through committees, ting them to work for the unsaved, and nding them with cords of love to their urches, their pastors and their denomitions.

The Christian Endeavor idea has been veloped further into the life of some urches, and pastors found that what s good for their boys and girls, their ls and lassies, and their young men and men, would also be a help to them in nding the older people together, and adually Mothers' and Senior Societies ve sprung into existence. Take these ganizations, first and last named, dissect em carefully, and running through them if really entitled to the name Christian deavor, you will find the pledge or venant expressing strenuous loyalty to e local church and to Christ. In this y of rapid growth and organization, of ovincial, State, National and worlde unions, there has been well to the nt the fact that Christian Endeavor ists to-day, as it did the first day,

For Christ and the Local Church.

Let it be always understood, Christian deavor is a religious society. Its useIness, I contend, depends, like the poste stamp, upon its ability to stick to one ing until it gets there. These bright ung Christians stick to this watchword, yalty, and keep it well in the foreound, give it a place upon every platrm, and will insist upon it until every urch in every denomination throughout e world understands it, believes in it, d is ready to defend it, and to be blessed r it. Again let me say, Christian Enavor is a religious society; its home is e local church; its field, the wide world. Christian Endeavor, indeed, as has often been said, is an "influence, and not an institution." True, under God's bidding, a great movement has sprung from the seed sown nineteen years ago, but notwithstanding that, the local societies owe no allegiance whatever to any Provincial, State, Territorial, or National Christian Endeavor union, and the day that Christian Endeavor becomes anything else than an "influence," that day it will begin a backward step. The movement is destined to grow to even greater proportions than it has already, but it will continue to be the same inspiring influence upon the world at large, and never an institution demanding by taxes the allegiance or support, financial or otherwise, of a single local society. True, Christian Endeavorers believe in interdenominational fellowship, but that comes into the "things that are in the text," and will be referred to later. At this time I want to continue to emphasize the denominational loyalty that Christian Endeavor fosters, and in which it rejoices, and to which it is especially amenable and is ready to conserve. But denominational control is a very different thing from sectarian exclusiveness, mind that.

You probably have heard of that large elephant, large enough to be a consort of Jumbo, who, when she was browsing in a field for food, unwittingly uncovered a nest of larks, and as they looked up and peeped for fear, Mother Elephant looked down upon them and allowed a tear to drop from her eye as she said: "I, too, have the heart of a mother;" and immediately sat down on the nest. Please understand from this that there is a kind of denominationalizing of Christian Endeavor which, if put into operation, would not only break the spirit of the young and dampen their enthusiasm, but would destroy the nest as well. There are some extreme denominationalists and their number decreases each year, who would "mother" Christian Endeavor, until it would meet the fate of the larks just referred to. Such extremists sow discord and succeed only in promoting sectarian exclusiveness. Against such Christian Endeavor will always be arrayed, but for those who would encourage self-respecting, real denominationalism, Christian Endeavor may be counted to uphold. Again, I say there is a wide difference between sectarianism and denominationalism. The latter Christian Endeavor believes in, the former Christian Endeavor hates; it is of the devil and with his Satanic majesty Christian Endeavor has eternal war.

When God is in it;

And now it is time to take up "some of the things in the text." If Christian Endeavor is to have as its ultimate aim so lofty a purpose as bringing the world to Christ, its strength and ability to undertake so great a task, humanly speaking, will be equal to the aggregate strength and ability of the individual members, nothing more, nothing less. In all the world there are 60,500 societies, with a total membership of between three and four millions. Formidable army! With a righteous purpose! Under blessed leadership! But until every single individual member is equipped as a faithful soldier of Jesus Christ should be, the Christian Endeavor army will be handicapped and its victory will be delayed. How shall Christian Endeavor raise its standard? How equip its individual members and make the conquest sure?

I have heard a leading minister say that when he was a boy that he was always afraid of thunder, but as he grew older and became better informed, he learned that it was the lightning that was to be feared, and so in his after-life when preaching the Gospel he said he learned to thunder less and to lighten more. Christian Endeavor must be equipped with the Sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God. The lives of its individual members must reflect almost as a lightning flash the life of Jesus Christ. Yes, "Christian Endeavor must thunder less and lighten more." That means that Christian Endeavor covets a better knowledge of God's Word and a better idea how to use it, too, when winning associate members and others into the active list and into the church of Jesus Christ. Oh for a revival of personal Bible study! It means, too, more individual communion and conversation with God through prayer, remembering that he told his disciples when face to face with them, "If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you."

Bringing this lofty purpose of winning the world to Christ, to the test of this divine promise, however enthusiastic Christian Endeavor may be, head and heart on fire, it must get into closer touch with the real meaning of these lines, and exclaim as many have, "Lord, teach us to pray!" To be an active member must mean something. The daily conversation, the every-day life at home and in the office, in school, on the farm, must be Patterned After the Leader's.

Christian Endeavor must make the religion of Jesus Christ more and more attractive to those who know it not. Individual members must be living epistles known and read of all men. Walking advertisements! Christian Endeavor must advertise Christ as the shoemaker does his shoes. The darts of discouragements, criticisms, sneerings, sarcasms, must be turned upon its shield emblazoned with the monogram of Christian Endeavor, and Christian Endeavorers must abide in him.

After having emphasized individualism and all it stands for, let me very naturally seek the cooperation of others. You remember that I have written a great deal about denominational loyalty; that I stand for it and believe in it, that Christian Endeavor promotes it, and now, without being the least bit inconsistent, let me say that to me the crown of Christian Endeavor is its blessed interdenominational fellowship. Now its lofty purpose seems more within its reach. What individuals cannot do alone, they can by proper cooperation with others bring to pass.

Go to the average Christian Endeavor convention and you will find Presbyterians and Methodists, Baptists and Congregationalists, Episcopalians and Disciples of Christ, and others and others. No one can tell by looking at their faces who is a blue Presbyterian, or a red-hot Methodist, but you can see reflected in the faces and shining through the eyes,

The Deep Purpose in the Heart to exalt Jesus Christ. That is the kind of cooperation that will win the world to the Master, and while Christian Endeavor has no monopoly of this kind of fellowship, it is opening the door to its inner circle wider and wider and has done more to promote it in the last nineteen years than has ever been accomplished before.

Christian Endeavor can cooperate in so many ways interdenominationally in answering our Lord's Prayer that "they all may be one." That does not mean organic union, one denomination, one church. It does not mean that all are to become Presbyterians, or all to become Methodists. It does mean that all do stand for spiritual fellowship in Christ Jesus. At the great Washington Christian Endeavor Convention, one of the speakers told a story (and I guess it was not much else) about a widower with children who married a widow with children, and this couple in the course of time were blessed with more children. One morning there was a great commotion and squabbling out in the yard in the rear of their home. The husband impatiently inquired of the wife as to what it was all about. She went out, investigated, and returning said: "Why your children and my children are picking on to our children." And every time I think of that story, I think it describes the needless bickering and petty squabbles that have been going on in the past between the various denominations. Christian Endeavor is putting a stop to it. Pity it is that an unconverted world looks on and sees Christian denominations fighting one another, jealous of one another, emphasizing their differences instead of publishing to the world the things upon which they are agreed. It is not a great way back when they did not enjoy this fellowship to which I refer. It was little thought of, but now that the Church of Christ has had a taste of it, it wants more of it, and Christian Endeavor stands for it, and shoulder to shoulder, Presbyterians and Methodists, Baptists and others will present a united front against the hosts of sin.

Striking Palms One With the Other, in Christian Endeavor, and as iron sharpeneth iron, so will discussions of methods of work and comparisons of aggressive evangelistic work make individuals more and more ambitious to do Christ's will in the homes and in the churches. Believe me, Christian Endeavor admonishes me to be no less a Presbyterian; it bids me to be more of a Christian. I prefer to be called a Christian Presbyterian, rather than a Presbyterian Christian. Christian first, Presbyterian next.

But Christian Endeavor cooperation has widened and deepened; it is not only interdenominational, but inter-state, inter-provincial, and God be praised again, it is inter-national. Christian Endeavor has come into the world to bind together in bonds of holy love and peace, men of all nations; and above the name of every earthly ruler, however dear, and above every flag is the name of the King of kings and Lord of lords, and as one great army its members rally under the blood-stained banner of the Cross.

And now you will notice lastly that it is because Christian Endeavor is missionary and evangelistic in spirit, that it has the high and lofty purpose of winning a lost world. More and more is Christian Endeavor becoming a missionary and evangelistic force. The sooner the movement is thoroughly imbued with that spirit throughout the length and breadth of its individual membership, will it have accomplished its ultimate purpose.

Christian Endeavor is to have a generous part in

at home and abroad. A missionary revival that does not mean fuller emotion merely, but a readiness and a desire to do more and to give more, and that only can be realized by a larger self-denial. Christian Endeavor believes in giving systematically and proportionately to our Lord's work. A better appreciation of what a serious business life is; a greater thirst for souls that can be won for Christ, for his dear sake.

Christian Endeavor is facing the Twentieth Century and its twentieth year of service, and I close this article with a clarion call issued recently by President Clark: "Next February, Christian Endeavor will be twenty years of age; a full score of years will be rounded out since the first little society gathered in the Williston parsonage and each member solemnly agreed, 'Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I will strive to do whatever He would like to have me do.' Let Christian Endeavorers take hold together heartily and enthusiastically upon the programme for Christian Endeavor's twentieth year. Very briefly the suggested twentieth-year programme is as follows: First, some worthy national celebrations. Second, a vigorous effort to unify and strengthen the work of all Christian Endeavor unions. Third, an effort to occupy the field in all the world which God has so providentially opened. Fourth, an effort to strengthen every weak society by establishing it more firmly upon Christian Endeavor principles. Fifth, to make our twentieth birthday a decision day for Christ, and sixth, a thank-offering day for His work throughout all the world."

The Rush After Election

WAS there ever a sublimer scene than the silencing of all agitation as soon as the ballot-box had spoken in the Presidental election? We were to have riot, and cut-throatery. Judges of election were to be imprisoned. There would be blood-shed at many of the polls. If either of the Presidential candidates was elected things generally would go to smash. But fifteen million voters went to the ballot-box and expressed their opinion, and while here and there in some unimportant place there may have been an altercation, in the most part our cities were as quiet as on a New Year's or a Christmas day. All hail American institutions! In comparison with our peaceful modes behold the times before and after election in Great Britain. An Englishman the other day said to me in London, "We do not quit our animosities when the elections are over. You in America seem to drop all angry words and sarcastic behavior the day after the votes are cast." Now we have not seen England and Scotland after the ballot, but we saw them just before the ballot and no such behavior would be allowed in Republican or Democratic meetings as is seen in Liberal or Conservative meetings in England. The morning paper that I opened in London gave account of eight political meetings where the speaker had been howled down, and either had to stop speaking or speak only to the reporters at the table before the platform. Lord George Hamilton, Secretary of State for India, whom Dr. Klopsch and myself saw much of last summer, we consulting him about transportation of bread-stuffs for India (and who is one of the most affable of men), attempting to address a political meeting in September had no sooner said "Ladies and Gentlemen," than a man in front shouted "You're a liar!" I can easily understand that if scenes so violent and outrageous occur in political meetings in England before election, that after election there might still continue acerbity and bitterness such as are seldom seen in America. We have all gone back to our stores, and our offices, and our shops, and our farms and our churches, willing to keep the peace for another four years, and abstain from making ourselves ridiculous.

The Blood of the Grape

UNTIL the last cluster of catawbas is squeezed into the chalice of the last Lord's Supper that this world will ever solemnize, the discussion will probably go on concerning the wine that the Lord made for the wedding in Cana, and the kind of wine that should be used now in the Holy Sacrament. In these last days, unfermented wine is used in many of the churches, and without being at all dogmatic on this subject, we wish that on all sacramental occasions fermented wine might give place to the unfermented.

Let us bear in mind that in all our church memberships there are reformed inebriates, those who were once the slaves of alcoholism, but who by the grace of the Gospel have been liberated, and as one spark may set fire to a building, so one drop of strong drink may conflagrate the temple of a soul. Every communion season with an intoxicant in the passing cup may endanger the mortal and immortal life of a participant. John B. Gough, the mightiest of temperance reformers, sitting at the sacrament, took the bread, but did not dare to take the wine. No reformed inebriate ought ever taste the cup at the Lord's Supper if it have one drop of alcoholic flavor. Those of us who have been mercifully kept from the enthralment of strong drink cannot appreciate the power of the demon who squats at the bottom of the wine-cup ready to snatch the tongue of its former captive. Instead of going into the Greek and the Hebrew languages to find out the character of the wine mentioned in New and Old Testaments, let us use our common sense the best we can. "But did not our blessed Lord make wine for the embarrassed housekeeper at Cana?" Oh yes, he made it out of water, and all the wine the world or the church can make out of water will be harmless. But it would be impossible to imagine Christ making any such strychnined, or log-wooded wine as now curses the earth. While here and there a church, through some especial caterer or expert in grapery, may be able to select wine that is free from adulteration, the most of churches who drink fermented wine at the sacrament, drink that which if honestly analyzed would in many sensitive natures produce regurgitation.

Two instances coming under my own observation have made me favorable to the change proposed in the style of wine to be consecrated in holy ordinance. In my former church in Brooklyn the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States met to commemorate the Lord's Supper. There were over six hundred members of that general assembly. Many of them had their families with them. Then the members of all the churches of Brooklyn were invited to sit with us in the great solemnization. There were perhaps three thousand communicants present. The communion services of ten or fifteen churches were borrowed for the occasion. There were perhaps forty or fifty chalices and tankards gleaming on the long line of tables. The air was heavy with the odors of the wine. A good man, who had in other days been an inebriate, but who for many years had been a consistent and consecrated Christian, told me with a face still flushed with the excitement which he suffered from breathing the air that sacramental night, that he was nearly overthrown by temptation, and he said he thought it would be many weeks before he would recover from the effects of that inhalation. By vote of session we passed a resolution that thereafter we would at the Lord's Supper use unfermented wine.

But the other instance was a tragedy. One summer, while off on my pastoral vacation from Philadelphia, I received a telegram announcing the death of a parishioner, one of the best friends I ever had, and one of the noblest men I ever knew. With a heavy heart I took the train for Philadelphia. The bereft home was filled with sympathizers awaiting the obsequies. I had no time to make any inquiries concerning the illness and the last hours of my friend and parishioner. I poured out my soul in unlimited eulogium of the departed, telling of all he had been to me and to the church. After all was over, and I had made some enquiries in regard to the departure of my good friend, I found the following to be the facts: He was walking the streets of Philadelphia on the hot summer day, and was taken with sharp pains that were almost unbearable, and he went into a drug store to get something for his relief. The druggist gave him something that had in it some drops of strong drink which went to his brain, and passing down the street he came to a liquor store and drank heavily and soon became a raving mani so that he could not be taken to his ho but was taken to the hospital, where i few days he died of delirium treme In early life he had been an inebriate, l had been converted to God and had be thirty-five years a consistent member the church. But those drops given h by the druggist roused up the old ha and flung him out of this life in a m horrible demise. Now, I say, if a f drops alcoholic in a drug store co work such tragedy, a few drops alcoho in a communion cup may destroy a m If to save one man from such an overth any church shall change the kind of wi administered do you not think it wo please the Lord?

Until all the churches shall waken the full sense of responsibility on t subject, let all those communicants w were once the serfs of alcoholism ta the bread at the Sacrament, but bow t head in silence and let the cup pass wi out touching it so much as with the tip the fingers.

HONORING THE BODY

IN the soul there are laid the foundations of true happiness. But the history of every life is the history of a body, as well as a soul; for the body is the handmaid of the soul, nay it is far more, it is the partner and the co-heir of its eternal companion. That a good soul, then, should desire a pure body to dwell in, is a pre-supposition that is self-evident. And physical puritanism is as real a fact as spiritual puritanism; though its importance is far too little insisted upon.

I do not here mean by physical puritanism the mere washing and cleansing, and suitable adorning of the body—though this is a very important factor in a healthy happiness—I am insisting now on that closer moral purity which apprehends the dignity and the destiny of this breathing house of clay, made after the image and likeness of God, and knows that it cannot be defiled without sinning deeply against its Creator.

"I believe in the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. Amen." In this most solemn close of the Apostle's Creed—a creed embodying the faith of the earliest ages of Christianity—we cannot pass by the position which is given to the body. It occupies the central point between "forgiveness" and "eternal life." Do we really understand and fully accept all the vast and wonderful promise thus solemnly declared? For if we do, we have added greatly to the sum of our highest happiness in this world.

I am quite aware that I am bringing to the front a source of happiness not usually taken into account. All the more anxious am I to prove my position and to enrich some lives by a dignity and a promise they have as yet failed to claim. For it is doubtless only too true that in speaking of spiritual things the word "body" is at once suggestive of sin, and the majority have an idea that the further they get away from the bodily the nearer they come to the spiritual. Even in our pulpits how seldom is the body mentioned with the honor it deserves! How rarely is the blessing of its senses, and the charge of ruling its appetites, pointed out to us! And still more rarely do we hear anything about its present rights and its future inheritance. Yet it has both rights and inheritance.

Now, though we may exist partially after a fashion, humanity is the more delightful, the more whole and full it is. Let us each then claim for ourselves, if we have never before done so, the full inheritance to which our body has a legitimate right.

Besides the resurrection the body is also intimately connected with three other vital points of our most holy faith—the visibility of the Church, Christ's intercession in his human body in heaven, and the future judgment of the dead. Without the body, where would be the visible communion of saints? Without the body, how could we be judged for the deeds done in the body? And if there be any point dear to the Christian heart, it is the one expressed in the verse—

"See where he stands at God's right hand,
And pours the interceding prayer;
Points to his hands, and shows his side,
And says that I am graven there."

If we hesitate to accept this doctrine, with all the comfort and happiness it ought to give, then we must look down into the depths our nature for the reason of our hesitati Is it sensuality? Does speaking contem uously of the body, and calling it vile, make easier for us to use it vilely? Alas! it is ea to use up in the passions the life God gave for happiness, and to thus induce that co ness of soul that always follows deliberate cess. On the contrary, the soul becomes re through its empire over the bodily sens Are we desirous to attain unto this royalty—enjoy this freedom from the empire of Sata Then we must fight for the mastery; for in the composition of every happiness enters t thought of having deserved it.

Oh, the mystery of our incarnation! If o bodies are indeed the temples of the Ho Ghost, how shall we dare to defile the sacr place? The father of Origen so surely l lieved this truth, that when the child lay in cradle he was accustomed to lay bare its lit breast and kiss it in prayer over him, entre ing that the Holy Ghost would take poss sion. The father of Sir Thomas Browne f lowed the same symbolical practice; and on God knows how many thousands of prayerf parents, taking the doctrine as the wo gives it to us, may, in the days of great faith, have done likewise.

There is another very solemn thought co nected with this subject—we know there w be differences in glorified souls; will the differences extend to our spiritual bodie The forgiveness of God for sin does not r pair the wrongs sin has done our mort bodies; will it obliterate all traces of it in t spiritual one? Is there to be no differen between those who have used their natur bodies for the service of God and those who though they have repented—destroyed bo their own bodies and the bodies of the victin and the companions of their vices?

But Oh, the joy and triumph of those wh love and honor the body, bought with Christ body! and who keep it in sacred purity, the temple of the Holy One! In weakness an weariness, as well as in youth and strengt they will remind themselves that as they ha borne the image of the earthy, so also the shall bear the image of the heavenly. The will not fear death or the grave, for they wi see in Christ's resurrection the grandeur their own destiny.

Therefore, because we believe in the resu rection of the body, we honor and adore i Creator, and give hearty thanks for the my tery, and the promise, of being "in the body. For behold I show you a mystery: "We sha not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the la trump—for the trumpet shall sound—an the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and w shall be changed. For this corruptible mus put on incorruption; and this mortal must pu on immortality. So when this corruptibl shall have put on incorruption, and this mort shall have put on immortality, then shall b brought to pass the saying, that is written Death is swallowed up in victory. O deat where is thy sting? O grave where is th victory? The sting of death is sin, and th strength of sin is the law. But thanks be t God, which giveth us the victory through ou Lord Jesus Christ!"

In the Land of Gold

MINERS in the Klondike are accustomed to visits of curiosity and inspection, but not to the presence of guests so distinguished as those they entertained some weeks ago. Lord and Lady Minto, the representatives of Queen Victoria in Canada, made a journey to the "Land of Gold," to see with their own eyes some of the wonders that all the world has been talking of. The Governor-General was at some pains to let it be known that the visit was not official, but it was impossible to prevent the miners giving it all the significance it deserved. They came from all parts of the region into Dawson, to tender a welcome to the visitors. They were delighted with the interest manifested by Lord and Lady Minto in the operations and conducted them through the workings, pointing out the new and improved methods adopted for getting the precious metal. They also explained their own ideas of the best system of enforcing law and order in the extremely difficult conditions of a mining camp, all of which the Governor-General heard with a show of interest. At the conclusion of the visit which lasted four days and included a ten mile drive up the Ridge trail, the miners presented Lady Minto with a jewel case made of Yukon gold and filled with choice nuggets. Their Excellencies were conducted in grand procession to their steamer Sybil and were saluted as they sailed away with a volley from the barracks' guns. Lord Minto cordially thanked the miners for the courtesy with which they had welcomed him and his wife. It would not have been in good taste for him to have lectured them after all their kindness, otherwise he might have given them the warning that such men need, quite as much as did the men whom the ancient lawgiver addressed:

Beware when thy silver and thy gold is multiplied and all that thou hast is multiplied, that thou forget not the Lord thy God in not keeping his commandments (Deut 8:11-13).

Valuable Meteorites

The approach of the annual meteorites whose path the earth crosses this month, has led to the examination of our present possessions in that department. It appears that the most valuable collection on this side of the Atlantic is that in the Harvard Mineralogical Museum at Cambridge, Mass., which is second only to the one in the British Museum. The aggregate weight of the Harvard collection is 2,800 pounds. It comprises meteorites which have struck the earth on 275 different occasions. There is a wide difference in the value of meteorites. It is not estimated by weight inasmuch as the stone may be of vast size like that which fell in Canon Diable, Arizona, any small fragment of which would be sufficient to represent the fall. Others are worth a hundred dollars a pound because there is no other specimen of that particular fall known to be in existence. Association, too, is an element of value. Some of the ancient meteorites, like the Palladium which fell at Troy, have been worshiped for generations. A well-known American collector recently secured from the Shah of Persia a number of pieces from a famous semi-sacred meteorite which had been in possession of the royal family for generations, and by disposing of bits to various European museums on his way home, was able to pay all the expenses of his trip to Teheran. People were willing to buy fragments of it on account of its origin and the reverence that royal and other worshipers paid it. It would be well if men who thus appreciate the stones that come down from the heavens had a truer appreciation of that bread of which Christ spoke:

This is the bread which came down from heaven, he that eatheth of that bread shall live forever (John 6:58).

All Night in a Bank Vault

A physician at a town in Kentucky had a disagreeable experience a few days ago. He was returning to his home, soon after midnight, from a professional call, and was crossing the public square when he was roughly seized and held prisoner. His captors rushed him into a bank which stands on the square and there covering him with their revolvers, made him sit still. Burglars were busy picking the lock of the vault, in which the bankers kept their money and securities. When the burglars had secured the valuables and were preparing to depart, the question arose of what should be done with the doctor. He had been brought into the bank by the outside watchers, who thought he had seen that the bank was being robbed and might give an alarm. He might still do so, if they released him, and as that might end in their arrest, they decided to keep him a prisoner. So he was thrust into the looted bank vault and the door shut upon him. He remained there all night and the clerks found him there in the morning when they opened the bank and went to the vault for the money to carry on the business. They would doubtless be grievously disappointed at finding a man in the vault instead of the money. The time has not yet come when that promise is fulfilled that was recorded by the ancient prophet:

I will make a man more precious than fine gold; even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir (Isa. 13:12).

Honored an Old Check

One of the banks in Fort Worth, Tex., paid a check recently that had been drawn more than twenty years ago. It appears that in 1879 a cattle-dealer traveling through Texas bought five head of cattle from a farmer, paying for them with a check for one hundred dollars, on his bankers. The farmer had no occasion to go to the city just then, and as he was busy on his farm, he had no opportunity of presenting the check for six months. When he did so he was told that the cattle-dealer who had signed it had closed his account with the bank and had left the neighborhood. He was not distressed about the matter, feeling sure that the cattle-dealer had not intended to defraud him. He kept the check by him until he could find out where the cattle-dealer was. A few days ago he met him accidentally and told him of his failure to get the check cashed. The cattle-dealer remembered the purchase and the issuing of the check. He was again buying cattle in that locality and had re-opened his account. The farmer this time went at once to the bank, presented the check and obtained the money. He was doubtless glad to get the money after waiting so long, though he lost a considerable sum in the interest it would have yielded if he had not been negligent in getting it at the first opportunity. It is often so with God's gifts. We are glad to see an aged man turn to the Lord though we cannot help regretting the loss of all he might have done if he had turned to him in early life. Seldom is it possible to obtain the fulfilment of the promise:

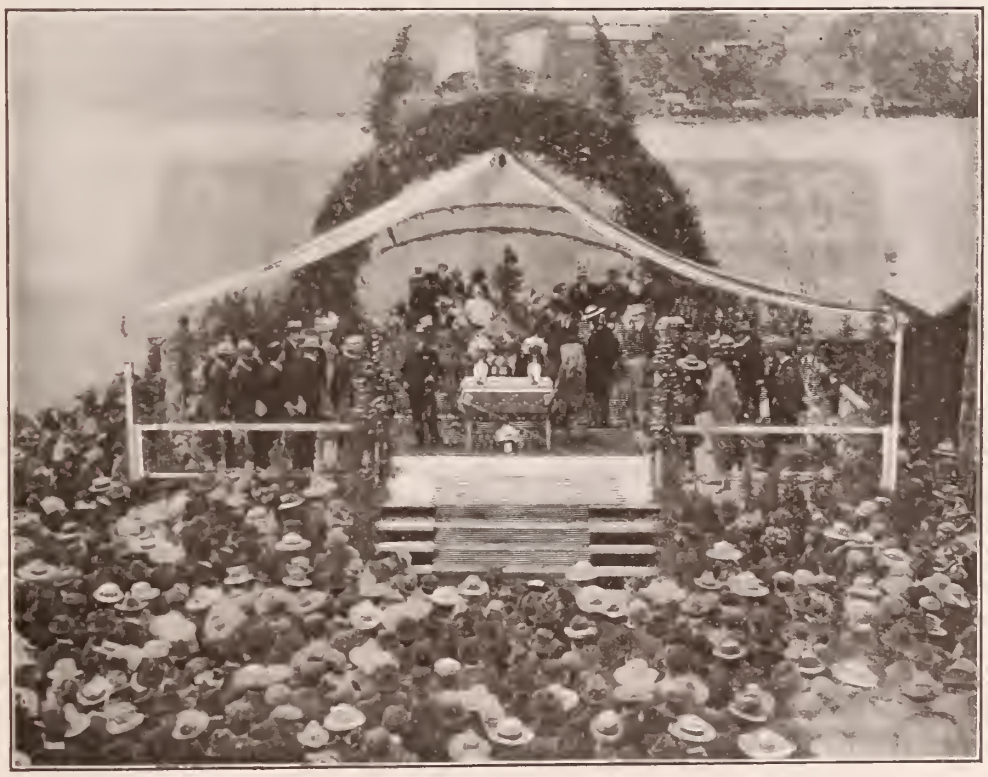
I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten (Joel 2:25).

London's Lord Mayor

The British capital has just witnessed its annual pageant which is the great holiday of the year for the citizens. On November 9 every year the newly elected Lord Mayor dons his civic robes, assumes the gold chain and goes in procession from the Mansion House, his official residence, to the Court of the Royal Exchequer to take the oath of office. His procession is usually made up of emblematical floats and men quaintly dressed in ancient garb. This year Alderman Frank Green, a paper merchant, has received the coveted honor. The election is usually a matter of form. It goes to the Aldermen in rotation and is decided, not as with us, by popular vote but by the votes of the Aldermen and Council. The district over which he rules is not the London of five million population, but only the central part, or the city proper, which contains the chief banks, financial offices, and large business agencies. In the day time there is probably no busier place on earth, but at night there are few people in it save the soldiers who guard the Bank of England, the policemen and the private watchmen who protect the vast wealth in the big buildings. The men who throng the streets and offices in the day go out to the suburbs to sleep. These suburbs forming a belt around the city and being included in the ordinary conception of London, are broken up into different boroughs for municipal purposes. There are twenty-eight such boroughs, each with its own mayor and council. The Lord Mayor receives a salary of $50,000 for his year's services, but his entertainments of distinguished guests are on so lavish a scale that he generally leaves the Mansion House at the end of his term a much poorer man than he entered it. Lord Mayor Green will miss the aid of his wife during his term. She died about a year ago and the duties of Lady Mayoress which are by no means light, will be performed by her daughter. Mrs. Green was a daughter of Joseph Haydn, who compiled the Dictionary of dates. During the year the Mayor will occupy a place of great honor and influence among his people, and his conduct will be an example for good or evil among the citizens. We may hope, therefore, that the words of promise uttered at the inauguration of the new leader of Israel's hosts may apply to him:

THE NEW LORD MAYOR OF LONDON

This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein; for then shalt thou make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success (Joshua 1:8).



RECEPTION OF LORD AND LADY MINTO BY THE MINERS OF THE KLONDIKE

Brief Notes

An immense congregation assembled in Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, on Nov. 11, to hear Dr. Talmage. Hundreds of persons were unable to obtain admission. In an address, Dr. A. C. Dixon, the pastor of the church, said that when they got their new house of worship he hoped that Dr. Talmage would be a frequent visitor. He would like to have him preach there at least once a month.

The Right Hon. Friederich Max Muller, one of the greatest Orientalists and philologists of the day, died on October 28, aged seventy-seven.

The Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip is making rapid progress. Pastors desiring to organize a branch may procure the necessary literature by addressing Mr. C. E. Wyckoff, Irvington, N. J.

An effort is being made by Mr. Moody's successors at Northfield to organize some definite and practical method of reaching with the Gospel country districts in which the population is too small and scattered to support a church.

The International Sunshine Society has begun work on the East Side in New York. At the suggestion of the president, Miss Grace Dodge, a headquarters has been opened at 60 Baxter street, to try to reach the children and young girls of the neighborhood.

The Protestant Armenians of this country are planning to raise a fund with which to erect a monument in Lexington, Mass., over the grave of the benefactor of their race, Cyrus Hamlin, D.D., missionary and statesman.

The islanders of Erromanga, where in 1839 the missionary John Williams was murdered and his body devoured at a cannibal feast, have just sent $750 to the Bible Society toward the cost of printing the Bible in their own language. So much has been accomplished by missionary labor in sixty years.

A form of philanthropy greatly needed in our own cities—that of helping discharged criminals to begin a new and better life—is being conducted with great success in Liverpool, Eng. The number of criminals thus aided last year in that city was 6,969. A few days ago a large number of these were entertained at a breakfast, when the Bishop of Liverpool made a sympathetic and encouraging address.

Under the Evening Lamp

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Her Morning Portion

MRS. ELLENWOOD was perplexed. She had reached a place in life where she was in doubt about the next step. Indeed, it seemed as if there could be no next step, for her husband's salary had been reduced, and her oldest boy, Rob, who was very anxious to get a position, was disappointed wherever he turned. Fanny, her bright ambitious daughter, whose heart had been set on going to college, had been forced to give up her plans and was acting as cashier in a store, and Mrs. Ellenwood was as disappointed for Fanny as Fanny herself was. In a mood of profound discouragement, the lady took up her Bible to read her morning lesson. It happened to be in the prophecy of Jeremiah, 29th chapter. Reading along to the seventh verse, she read: "And seek the peace of the city whither I have caused you to be carried away captive and pray unto the Lord for it: for in the peace thereof shall ye have peace." Was it an angel who whispered in her ear, that just as in the old times God's people were carried away into bondage, so that the home-sick yearning of their hearts was for the gladness of their old home? So in modern days, we may be in bondage to trouble, to debt, to hard and fettering circumstances. Yet, the angel went on to tell her, no matter what the surroundings, the Lord means his children to be at peace; to be happy and to make the best of things, and to pray for the peace of those around them. Some people might have thought the lesson far fetched, but not Mrs. Ellenwood, to whom it came as a real personal word from the Lord himself. And as she laid her Bible down, text after text came to her mind, each with a message of divine sweetness. "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." "In nothing be anxious, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God which passeth all understanding, shall guard your heart and your thoughts in Christ Jesus." "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, to be content. I know how to be abased and how to abound; in everything and in all things have I learned the secret both to be filled and to be hungry, both to abound and to be in want. I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me."

When Mrs. Ellenwood met her family again, husband and children marked a new light in her face, heard a new ring in her voice. She was cheerful and hopeful once more, for her morning portion had fed her as manna from the skies.

When the Grapes Are Ripe

The vine is a symbol of plenty, and the year reaches its altitude of fruitfulness when the grapes are ripe. Can there be a greater contrast than that which is afforded by our happy, well-fed, plump and rosy American children, playing tea with their cups and saucers, their cakes and fruit, as placed side by side with the starving brown children of India! These little ones never knew an ungratified want, their dimpled flesh is firm, they are full of life and merriment. Think of the other little ones whom Dr. Klopsch saw as he traveled up and down India on his Christ-like mission of love; children gaunt with famine, children gasping and dying because they were not fed. Thank God that the want has been partially relieved, that CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have aided in relieving it, and that the rains which promise future harvests have fallen at last. The children playing tea suggest another thought, and that is one of the abundance of fruit in our great and beautiful country. Surely we may praise God that we are the granary and the vineyard of the world at need. And when God gives us grapes let us eat them and be grateful, for in their luscious ripeness, their perfect shape, and their tempting clusters, they satisfy every sense. A grape-cure is often recommended for invalids, but I believe in keeping so well that you do not require a cure, and grapes are good as preventives as well as efficacious as remedies.

God bless the children, the white children, the brown children, the red, and the black children of the world. God bless the yellow children of China, for whom, when the present tempest is past, a new day will dawn. Children are bundles of possibilities. In their play and in their work they forecast the future. May the children of this period grow up into a great army of occupation for Jesus Christ.

A MERRY GROUP, PLAYING "TEA"

Lead Us Not Into Temptation

Mother of sons, mother of daughters, teach your children this petition. The tempter, no mere spirit of evil in you, but a fierce, malignant and Protean power outside your personality, is lying in wait seeking whom he may devour. Teach your daughters to live purely, your sons to live in austere virtue. From both sedulously keep the unclean thing, the bad book, the bad paper, the bad companion. And pray for them and with them every day that they may not be led into temptation, but may be delivered from evil.

Look on the Bright Side

In the mountains the other day, I stood on a lofty spot where all around was sunshine. Down below, the clouds were heavy and a thunderstorm was rolling, with deep crashing reverberations, and vivid criss-crossing of the lightning. The dwellers in the lowlands saw only the gloomy clouds, and felt the downpour of the heavy rain, but there was clear shining above the storm. Let us remember that the upper side of the clouds is always turned to the blue sky and to the sun.

Her Penny

The little maid of six ran in and asked for a penny. Mother found one for her, and then she ran away to spend it. "Nothing makes her so happy as spending a penny," said her mother. Some grown-up women understand the feeling. But we should teach children to save, to give away, and to spend with discretion, even when only a penny is involved.

A Solemn Thought for Parents

Every murderer, every thief, every vile criminal of whatever degree, was once an innocent little child. Not all the convicts in our prisons to-day come from the criminal classes. Many of them have had every worldly advantage, a good education, refined associations and happy homes. We are sorely in need in this land and age of a revival of home training, of the strict training in integrity which shall scorn luxuries dishonestly gained, which shall prize clean hands and a white record, which shall give hard work its honorable place, and teach our young men to seek wages only for thorough work and to avoid speculation. Parents cannot too sedulously train children to obey, to speak the truth, to scorn all forms of theft. The Bible must be restored to its old place in the family as God's word, to be loved, learned and followed, and our Sabbath, now menaced and dishonored, must be again kept holy, if we are not to be often shocked by stories of terrible moral shipwreck.

For half-grown boys after nightfall the street is the worst and the most perilous of schools. Let fathers and mothers insist that the lads shall stay at home in the evening, and then let them make home a pleasant place, avoiding gloom, and, above all, allowing neither harshness nor scolding in the group around the evening lamp.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—JENNIE MCC. Aunt Prudence says yes.

—JESSAMY. Fall back on Shakespeare, when you are tired of current literature.

—"SCOTCH ANNIE." The young gentleman is wrong in the matter. It was his place to write first.

—HENRY HOLTON. The question should be settled by your wife. She certainly knows when she needs a new gown better than you do.

—PERPLEXED. Regrets for all invitations must be sent to the person who invites. In case of wedding regrets your visiting card is sufficient.

WINDY NIGHTS

WHENEVER the moon and stars are set
Whenever the wind is high,
All night long in the dark and wet
A man goes riding by,
Late in the night when the fires are out,
Why does he gallop and gallop about?

Whenever the trees are crying aloud,
And ships are tossed at sea,
By, on the highway, low and loud,
By, at the gallop, goes he,
By, at the gallop, he goes, and then
By he comes back at the gallop again.

R. L. STEVENSON.

The Good News from China

That the allied forces were able to successfully enter Pekin, and that a large number of our missionaries and many native Christian refugees were rescued from a position of great peril, made us glad in the later days of the summer. We may well look forward with curious interest to the developments which may now be expected. Whatever happens, however slowly changes may come, we may anticipate a broader highway for our God, and the dawn of a new day for China.

The Empress-Dowager is said to be a fugitive. She is a woman of strong and dominant personality, a woman with the brain of a man, and with an ambition utterly unscrupulous and cruel. Of her, in her recent book, China, the Long-Lived Empire, Eliza R. Scidmore says: "The few who have looked upon the countenance of the dowager describe her as a tall, erect, fine-looking woman of distinguished and imperious bearing, with pronounced Tartar features, the eye of an eagle, and the voice of determined authority and absolute command. She has the natural undeformed feet of Tartar women and is credited with great activity, a fondness for archery and riding and walking, and with a passion for games of chance and theatrical representations. With advancing years the empresses and Manchu palace women assume more sober colors in their outer robe, which is always the long Manchu gown touching the floor, no matter how thick the soles of their 'flower-pot' shoes may be. There are curious little shoulder cape arrangements around the neck of their ceremonial gowns, which have the Manchu's symbolic 'horse-shoe' cuffs falling over the hand, embroidered plastrons of rank on back and breast, and the large official beads whose use as insignia of high station came in fashion with the Buddhist religion. After the age of twenty-five, empresses and princesses put away their great gold-bar coronets with the pendant showers of pearls and the large bouquet of flowers and butterflies and wear instead a broad fluted gold coronal set with stiff bunches of flowers, a magnificent headdress very like a cocked hat, set crosswise."

A Right and a Wrong Way

Young people are often a good deal concerned on the subject of etiquette. They are afraid of blundering if they are sending invitations, or making calls, or returning the visits of friends. It is to a degree true that there are arbitrary rules which regulate the ways of society, yet these rules are founded on two principles, common sense and kindness of heart. Nobody can err very much who remembers this. In most cases, an appeal to common sense settles the reason of a conventionality, and there are few mistakes possible to those who are genuinely kind. In visiting at a house at a reception, for instance, one always speaks to his hostess as soon as possible after entering the parlor, and she usually occupies a conspicuous position near the door, so that she may greet her guests. Except at a very crowded affair, it is customary to take leave of one's hostess. Formal people are punctilious in acknowledging an invitation very soon after its receipt. An engagement to dinner must not be broken unless there is some extremely urgent reason. Politeness springs from sincerity and amiability, and is the oil which prevents social friction.

THE RHENISH MISSION STATION IN SUMATRA

Heathen Bury Their Idols

THE RESULT OF MISSIONARY EFFORT AMONG THE HEAD-HUNTERS OF NIAS ISLAND : : :

THE little island of Nias, west of Sumatra, is one of the least known, but most fruitful of mission fields. The story of the work of the Rhenish missionaries stationed there, and the type of Christian character they have developed among the and's population, is extremely interting.

At the head of those who are working r Christianity among this simple and olated people is the Rev. Dr. Schreiber. the Rhenish Missionary Society. Last ar Dr. Schreiber opened three new misn stations, one of his assistants, alone aving gathered a congregation of five ndred from the inhabitants of a few llages. Another has a congregation ery Sunday of over seven hundred. he entire population of one village was athered into the Christian fold in a body the eloquent preaching of a missionary ho is hardly more than a boy.

Until the Dutch took possession of ias, it was an untouched heathen field. he first missionary to live on the island as the Rev. L. C. Denninger, who ttled there in 1866. It took him a long me to learn the strange language, and still longer time to get the people to sten to his teachings. At first they would ot send their children to school unless e paid them. They also tried to get him give them tobacco as the price of atndance at the mission services. After even years of patient work, during which ie missionary's life was frequently imeriled, the first convert was reported, nd this was followed soon after by the aptism of eighteen Nias Christians. hen the New Testament was translated, nd some of the young men preached the ospel among their countrymen who now heard the Word gladly, coming as it did from familiar lips.

The natives are of the Malay race, and are a light-hearted people, fond of song and dance and sports. Their property consists principally of pigs and dogs. They live in small villages on hills overlooking the sea. Their diet consists largely of rice and sweet potatoes. They were totally ignorant and untutored until the missionaries came. They covet ornaments of gold or brass and dazzling rings and trinkets. Like the Chinese, they worship their ancestors, and their homes are filled with idols. Theirs is the religion of superstition, and includes the dreadful quest called "head-hunting," on account of which. Dr. Schreiber says, during the past few years, two hundred villages have been destroyed or deserted.

As the religion of Christ spreads among them, however, head-hunting and tribal wars are being abandoned for peaceful pursuits. Not long ago, the inhabitants of a village came to a missionary in a body and asked him to give them the "Jesus" religion. When they returned to their homes they buried all their idols in a hole in the middle of the village.

New York Bible Society's Work

The Seventy-sixth Annual Report of the New York Bible Society shows a remarkable amount of work done during the year ending October, 1900. 38,937 Bibles were distributed. Some of these went to hospitals, some to city prisons others into comfort bags for sailors, public institutions, churches, Sunday Schools, families and individuals were beneficiaries of this agency which gives to the spiritually needy that which is better than meat and drink—the Word of God. 19,633 Bibles were put into the hands of immigrants landing in this country. Records show that for the past ten years more than 1,000 immigrants a day have entered this country, the larger part by far being received at New York, the chief gateway to America. As the endless throng passes through the Barge Office, the missionary gives to these peoples the message of God in their own tongues. The society also supplies the large fleet of merchant ships that leaves this port for different parts of the globe, thus sowing good seed broadcast. Mr. Charles A. B. Pratt, 103 E. 25th street, is secretary of the Society, and Mr. Charles Stewart Phillips is president.

A NATIVE SUMATRA CHIEF

THE GOSPEL IN SONG AND SERMON

An Evangelist Who Sings and Preaches Tidings of Salvation

HOW to reach the hearts of young and old with the offer of salvation through Christ, is a problem that deserves the most intense and prayerful effort for its solution. Happy is the man who combines in his own person two talents which may be used in such a service. From testimonials rendered by pastors in many sections of our land, it would appear that that delightful combination is to be found in an evangelist who is now re-entering the field of work after an absence of four years, due to a domestic bereavement. Mr. William Warren Bentley has won fame as a writer of hymns, a singer and a preacher. He is of New England birth, but while still a boy accompanied his parents to a western home in Illinois, and later to New York. Soon after his conversion he became superintendent of a Sunday School, and in that capacity gave special attention to the musical training of the children. He had taken a course in the Musical Academy of Bloomington, Ill., and had attained a skill which enabled him to do effective service. He wrote a hymn with the title, "Beautiful Shore," which was published and found its way into many collections. Nearly twenty years ago he began his work as a singing evangelist, laboring chiefly in the Southern States. At Louisville, Ky., Baltimore and Laurel, Md., and Washington, D.C., revivals were started, in which he labored with marked success. He also took a western tour, and in several cities, notably at Indianapolis, Ind., God blessed the word sung and preached. In the course of his labors Mr. Bentley has found opportunity to compose hymns which have become popular, and has edited several hymn books. Among the best known are The River of Life, Royal Songs, The Armor Bearer, Songs of the Soul and Bells of Heaven. He is now preparing in colaboration with Bishop McCabe, a new book to be issued early next year entitled, Songs of the Church Militant. Dr. Henry C. Mabie of Indianapolis, writes: "He spent two weeks assisting me in special religious meetings. His rendering of Gospel solos was very effective and blessed to the people. His visit will be remembered gratefully by many souls." Pastors desiring to avail themselves of Mr. Bentley's services may address him to the care of Messrs. Mason & Hamlin, 5 W. Eighteenth St., New York.

WILLIAM WARREN BENTLEY

Around the World with Josiah Allen's Wife

COPYRIGHT, 1899, BY MARIETTA HOLLEY

CHAPTER LI.

BACK IN JONESVILLE

IT wuz a lovely day when we see the towers of Jonesville loom up above the billows of environ'in' green.

(I mean the M. E. steeple showin' up beyend Grout Nickleson's pine woods.)

As the cars drew into the station they tooted their delight agin and agin at our safe return as the train stopped.

As we walked up the platform I see Josiah furtively onbutton his stiff linen cuffs as if preparin' to throw 'em off for life. His face radiant, and hummin' sotey vosey his favorite ballad:

"Hum agin, hum agin, from a furren shore."

Arvilly looked happy to agin touch the sile of home, and be able, as she said, to "tend to her things." And wuz not I happy? I who loved my country with the jealous love that makes a ma spank her boy for cuttin' up. Is it love that makes a ma stand by, and see her boy turn summer sets and war-hoop in meetin'-housen? Nay, verily, every spank that makes him behave is a touching evidence of her warm devotion.

I felt as I stood on the beloved sile of home (better sile and richer than any other), beneath its bright sunshine (warmer and brighter than any other sunshine) I felt that I loved my country with that passionate, jealous love that could never be contented till she rises up to the full glory she might and will have. When she sweeps her long strong arms round and brushes off vile politicians and time-servers, and uses a pure free ballot to elect good men and good wimmen to make good laws. Then will come the Golden Age that I look for, and that will come, when Justice will take her bandages off, and look out with both eyes over a prosperous and happy land. God speed the day!

We parted with the children here, they goin' to their own homes, after promisin' to come and see me and their pa very soon. Tommy throwed his arms round my neck and said he should stay with us half the time. We want him to.

Home Greetings

Well, Ury met us with the mair and warm smiles of welcome, and Philury greeted us with joyous smiles and a good warm meat supper. They set store by us, lots of store, and when we gin 'em the presents we had brung for 'em from foreign shores, happiness seemed to radiate from 'em like light and warmth from the sun. Josiah enjoyed his supper—yes, indeed—his liniment shone with satisfaction as he sot at the table in his stockin' feet and shirt sleeves, and eat more than wuz good for him, fur more. He had begun to onbend, and I knew that for days I couldn't keep clothes enough on him to be hardly decent, but knew also that that would wear away in time.

Feelin' first-rate when we got home, it only took us a short time to rest and recooperate from our tower, and receive calls from the children and grandchildren and Jonesvillians. And the children helped Philury and me to git the house all in order, and prepare for Thanksgiving. I sent out invitations for a party; I laid out to invite all my own dear ones, old and young, Elder Minkley and his wife, Arvilly, and how I did want to invite Ernest White and Waitstill Webb, but he wuz away on a long vacation, and Waitstill I hadn't hearn from for weeks, she wuz in the Philippines the last I hearn.

I wanted to invite all the brethern and sistern in the meetin'-house, but Philury thought she couldn't wait on 'em all, and we compromised on the plan of havin' 'em all here to a evenin' social the week after, when we'd pass round things and not have so many dishes to wash.

I laid out to be dretful thankful Thanksgivin' day. I felt that my heart would keep the holiday with drums beatin' and flags wavin', to speak in metafor. For how much, how much I had to be thankful for! My beloved pardner and I had reached our own home in safety. The Lord had watched over us in perils by water, perils by land, perils by fatigue, perils by Josiah's strange, strange plans.

Tommy wuz as well as ever a child wuz; the doctor said his lungs wuz sound as a bell. All our dear ones at home had been kep' in safety and our home seemed more like a blissful oasis in a desert world than it ever did before.

I always like to be up to the mark in everything and I felt that I had so much to be thankful for Thanksgivin' day that I laid out to git up early so's to begin to be thankful as soon as daylight anyway, and keep it up all day till long after candle light. But as it turned out I begun to keep the glorious holiday of Thanksgivin' three days ahead and had to, for I couldn't help it.

Unexpected Visitors

I believe in makin' preparations ahead; I believe in takin' time by the forelock and leadin' it along peaceable and stiddy by my side, instead of time's drivin' me, rough shod and pantin' for breath over a household path, rocky and rough with belated duties. And it wuz three days before Thanksgivin' I sot in my clean, cheerful-lookin' kitchen seedin' some raisins for the fruit cake, Josiah bein' out to the barn killin' two fat pullets for the chicken pie. Ury wuz down in the swamp gittin' some evergreens and holly berries to decorate with, and Philury dressin' the turkey and ducks in the back kitchen, when I heard a rap at the settin' room door and I wiped my hands on the roller towel and smoothed back my hair and went to the door.

And who do you spoze stood there? His eyes shinin' brighter than the sky did, though that wuz clear blue, lit by a warm sunshine. It wuz Ernest White, and guess who wuz by his side; I'll tell you, for you never could think who it wuz—it wuz Waitstill Webb. I had thought her face wuz as sweet as it could be in sorrow, but I had never seen it in gladness before. She looked like a sweet white rose just blowed out under the warm sun of a perfect June day.

"Ernest White!" sez I, "how glad I am to see you! And Waitstill Webb! can I believe my eyes?" sez I, "is it you?" And I took both their hands in mine at one time.

"Waitstill Webb!" sez I agin, "is it you?"

"No," sez Ernest White, "it is Waitstill White."

You could have knocked me down with a hair-pin. I kissed 'em both smilin' and weepin', laughin' and cryin', we all on us wuz like three fools, or three wise ones, I d'no which. And that's how I begun to keep Thanksgivin' more'n three days ahead.

They come right into the kitchen and made me keep on with my work, which I did after a little, they takin' holt and helpin' me like two happy children. They stayed most all the forenoon, but had promised to go back to Arvilly's to dinner.

Well! Well! I hadn't been so tickled in matrimonial ways and riz up and routed and dumb foundered since Thomas J. and Maggie Snow got engaged. It seems that Ernest White had gone way out to the Philippines after her, and they wuz married in a little American chapel by a missionary of the M. E. meetin'-house.

They wuz goin' right to housekeeping in the widder Pooler's, where he had boarded. The widder had gone to live with her daughter, Mahala, in Michigan, and Ernest White has bought it. It stands in a pretty place near a evergreen grove, just on the edge of Loontown near his people that he loves, and has gin his life work to make better. And, oh, what a sweet love-guarded home Waitstill White is goin' to make for her pardner, and how happy Ernest White is goin' to be with the woman he loves. For besides bein' so congenial and beloved, Waitstill is as good a cook as I ever see, and no matter how much a man's soul soars up to the heavens, whilst his body is on earth he will always appreciate good vittles. Love never did nor never will thrive on a empty stummick. Harmony of soul is delightful, and perfect congeniality is sweet, and so is good yeast emtin' bread if it is made right, kneaded three times, riz in a cool place and baked to a turn. And tender broiled chops and chicken, and hot muffins and fragrant coffee has some the effect on the manly breast of love's young dream.

Waitstill is a real home lover and home-maker. And it seems that by her advice Ernest White had had alterations in the house made that I approved highly on when I see 'em, and they had ordered lots of things to be sent from the city to make it pleasant, all put in first-rate order by the man left in charge, and they invited Josiah and me to take tea with 'em the very next evenin' and go to meetin' with 'em, which we gladly accepted, seein' we had got our preparations so fur along; Arvilly wuz goin' to be there they said. And, of course, I invited 'em to my Thanksgivin' dinner, which they accepted with the same pleasure that we had theirn.

Samantha Visits Waitstill

Well, the next day, or ruther that night I begun to make preparations to go to Waitstill White's. I got a early supper that night so's to git to bed early so's to git up in good season; so's to git a early breakfast the next mornin', so's to git a early dinner, so's to start in good season for Ernest and Waitstill White's. And I kep' sayin' that over and over the next mornin', "Ernest and Waitstill White's," it sounded dretful good to me, dretful.

I sez to Philury, "We must have dinner early for we are invited to Ernest and Waitstill White's."

And I sez the same to Josiah. And he sez, "You've said that to me a dozen times already."

"Well," sez I cheerfully, "mebby I shall say it a dozen times more."

I felt well, dretful well in my mind. It had come out just as I had hoped and prayed for, and why shouldn't I feel good.

Well, they greeted us with warm affection. And you don't know how pretty their home looked. It had been fixed up in their absence and Waitstill had put the finishin' touches to it when she come. It wuz a gloomy spot under the Pooler regeem. But Waitstill wuz a true home-maker and could make a barn seem home like, as folks can that have that gift. You often see folks who think, or say they think, that one set of faculties henders another set from workin'. But it hain't no such thing. Miss Pooler wuz nothin' but a housekeeper, and as poor a one at that as you would be apt to find in a day's travel, whilst Waitstill wuz a philanthropist, a missionary, an angel on earth if ever there wuz one, and a home-maker and a home lover added to it, just as the Bible sez: "Seek first the kingdom of heaven and all these things shall be added unto you," or words to that effect.

The settin'-room and parlor that used to seem like a dark-green curtain mausoleum, sacred to the mournin' piec on the wall, and the hair wreaths of funct Poolers wuz now the sunshiny ha of Beauty and Cheerfulness. Bay w dows bordered with soft-colored gla and curtained with fleecy white, let t sunshine stream into the pretty, fresh decorated room, where it seemed to lo to stay and shine. A conservatory full blossoming plants made the settin' a dinin'-rooms full of cheer and perfume.

A Bright Home Picture

One good stout German girl bore w in'ly the heaviest burdens of housekee ing, but Waitstill and Love and Go Judgment wuz to the hellum, and the sult wuz beautiful. A happier househo I don't want to see, a better supper don't want to eat. Waitstill had sor briled chicken, tender and toothsom some creamed potatoes, fixed just rigl light white rolls, yellow sweet butter ma from their own Jersey cow's milk, cle amber honey from their own beehive sliced peaches from their own peach tre (it wuz a late kind, each one rolled up newspapers, and put in a box in the sull and kep' and purple and white grap kep' in the same way). Some pour cake made from my own reseet, a nob one that fell onto me from Mother Alle and improved on by me, and some ang cake, made by Waitstill herself, and snowy and delicious as if it wuz made b a real angel with wings, some fragra coffee with rich cream to make it, del cious, and chocolate for them that pr ferred it. A big glass bowl of roses an carnations wuz in the centre, and the tab wuz spread with a snowy linen cloth, an sot with beautiful china, white with a gol and pink sprig on it, part of a big quai tity sent by his rich folks, who wuz d lighted to have him marry such a swe girl and settle down, and the heav shinin' silver marked "W. W. W., lookin' some like a runnin' vine, and th glossy linen table-cloths and napkin lookin' like satin covered with posie come from the same source, also marke with her initials. Enough, Waitstill tol me, to last 'em all their lives if they shoul live to be as old as Methusaler and hi wife.

Well, I wuz glad enough to see thei prosperity and happiness and when Er nest White sot to his own table by the sid of Waitstill White and in a few short, elo quent, heart-felt words asked the Lord' blessing on this new home consecrated t his service, and on his dear friends happi ly returned home agin, my heart echoe every word and there wuzn't a dry eye i my head, not one.

After supper wuz over we sot out to g to the meetin' he had spoke on. It wu the openin' night of the new library whic wuz in a pretty little buildin' jined ont the meetin'-house and only a few min utes' walk from Ernest and Waitstil White's.

There wuz a good, large room for the library filled with good books helpful and inspirin' bought partly by Ernest White and partly by voluntary contributions by his people, a reading-room filled with mag azines and newspapers and which with the library wuz to be opened every eve ning and two afternoons in the weeks And there wuz a cozy little settin'-room and bed-room with a kitchen back out fo the librarian. And who do you spoze wuz to be librarian and live here clost to her idol? Oh, shaw! I might just as well told you right out as to have said that; it wuz Arvilly. It wuz congenial work to her and left her plenty of time to go round canvassin' if she wanted to.

We wuz a little late for the meetin', for a man come to see the Elder just as we wuz startin', about marryin' him the next ay, and as anybody knows that has to be nded to tennyrate.

As we drawed nigh the library and eetin'-house we see they wuz lighted up as friendly and pleasant a way as if they uz two beacons set up to light our foot-teps. And as we went in we see a group f happy faced young people gathered ound the organ practicin' a piece they uz learnin' for Thanksgivin'.

It wuz a sweet song of thankfulness and eace, filled with gratitude for all the lessin's of the year. A sweet song full f love to God and man and that would e apt to inspire the singers and hearers ith forbearance, justice, mercy, sane liv-ng and thinking. In another part of the all they wuz practicing some pretty ieces to speak at this celebration, but hen Elder White went in they all met im joyfully as a beloved father is met by is children, and they bestowed a loving reeting on Waitstill too.

These young men and women wuz eady to look through the magnifyin' lass of love at any lesson Ernest White hould set before them to fit 'em for life's attle.

The meeting that night wuz a sort of a ocial, where the young and older folks net to get better acquainted with each ther, and had a good time visitin' back nd forth and comparin' notes and bein' ntroduced to Waitstill and the new brary. One attracted just about as uch attention as the other, both wuz xceedingly interestin' to 'em and beloved.

Arvilly, "the Dantless"

Elder Cross wuz there, he sets store by Ernest White, though he is so different rom him. He is good natered and a Christian. I believe, though Arvilly said e would have to be fixed over quite a ood deal before he got into the Kingdom.

And I sez, "Well, we all shall, Arvilly."

"Ernest White won't," sez she, "all hey will have to do to him, will be to ick on a pair of wings and pin his crown n. He's a saint on earth now," sez she.

Well, Elder Cross come up to Arvilly nd welcomed her home and said a few ords about Ernest White's overwhelm-n' success, which he considered a mericale, nd he couldn't understand it.

"Well, I can understand it," sez Arvilly I have always said that no power could tand before the Church of Christ when t is fully awakened to the enormity of he sin it is encouraging by its indifference nd neglect, and bands itself together to ght against it. The saloon votes solid," ez Arvilly, "they are faithful to their ause, they are fiery hot with zeal, the hurch a good many of 'em are luke-varm, some like the Laodocians, and ome like dish-water ready to be opened own into the drain. America is ruled by er cities, and they are ruled by the aloon and unrighteous trusts and poli-ical bosses. Foreigners from the old vorld slums flaunt the banner of inde-endence in the face of American woman-ood. And the church of God that might emedy the evils lets 'em go on."

Sez Elder Cross, "I know well that the aloon is a mighty power for evil, it ruins ur youth, soul and body, and I know hat Monopoly is the thief that steals the ewards of labor. But I pray, sister Arvilly, I pray without ceasing that the Holy Spirit will come down, and smite hese offenders."

Sez Arvilly the dantless one, "You don't depend on prayer alone in your church ervices, in taking up collections, etc., or n worldly affairs," (Elder Cross is real ich, he keeps a hen dairy).

Sez Arvilly, "If you should depend on prayer alone to keep your big shanghai ooster from fightin' the little bantys I guess you would be apt to have consider-able of a wake in your hen-yard. And you don't kneel down and shet your eyes and pray for your young turkeys and chickens when a pair of big wicked hawks are swoopin' down on 'em or a heavy thunder-storm comin' on. No, you drive your little onprotected broods into the irst shelter you can find and go at the old hawks with a club. Not that I ap-prove of fightin'," sez Arvilly, "but there is a time to pray and a time to use a horsewhip; our Lord, who was and is our divine example, prayed thy kingdom come, and then helped it to come by driv-ng out the money-changers, and them that defiled the temple. He might have prayed for them to be driv out and then folded his hands and waited for the millennium.

But he didn't, nor he didn't say that human nature wuz too hard to handle, and that evil things had got to be changed gradual. He didn't take their rich gifts, he didn't make 'em church wardens, nor hang their pictures up in college halls to stimulate young men to go and do like-wise. And that is what ministers of our Lord and his disciples want to do to-day, to drive out of the temple and the coun-try the fat thieves that infest it, and the sanctified rascals wearin' sheep's clothin'. They have got a powerful whip in a con-secrated ballot that will drive the thieves out and make them disgorge their ill-got-ten gains."

Elder Cross wuz agitated; the argu-ment wuz driving him into a corner where he didn't want to stand; he turned the conversation:

"This is a great work dear brother White is doing, but some criticize the idea of his opening the house of God every evening for amusements as well as prayer. Some don't believe in mingling secular things with sacred."

Sez Arvilly, "What is more sacred to the Lord than a saved soul, a lost one re-deemed, a prodigal brought back What headway is one church opened three hours a week goin' to make aginst twenty saloons open every day and night." Ar-villy begun to be powerful agitated and I spoke up quick, for I knew how hash she wuz when she got to goin', and I didn't want this beautiful day marred by hash-ness even if it wuz deserved.

Sez I, "We all know how much good the church has done in the past. And now that the churches are beginning to band themselves together, and vote as they pray, this enormous force of righteousness is going to be victori-ous over sin and darkness, and the Saloon and the Canteen, the licensed houses of shame, monument of woman's degradation, the unjust monopoly, the high fence separating the few enormously rich from the masses of the suffering, starving poor, will all have to fall. Christ did not die in vain," sez I, "nor the blood of the martyrs has not been in vain. The Lord has promised, and he will fulfill."

"God speed that day!" sez Elder Cross shettin' his eyes and claspin' his hands.

"Amen!" sez I.

But I hearn Arvilly behind me mutter, "You'll have to open your old eyes, Elder, and go to work, or you won't have much hand in it."

But I guess he didn't hear her.

Well, goin' home that night, my heart sung for joy a anthem, more than a ordi-nary sam tune. The bright moonlight rested on the democrat and my pardner, and gilded the way in front of us, and further off we could see it lay on the lake, and it seemed to make a silver path on it. Life seemed worth livin', the cold waves of death seemed lit up with a heavenly glow, the hosts of evil seemed to back off before the Angel of Deliverance.

Angus Fisher, Sarnia, Ont., and Paul Keeton, Woodstock, Ala., were greatly troubled with boils. Mrs. Delia Lord, Leominster, Mass., had pimples all over her body; so did R. W. We smile when we read that the "gold brick" game has succeeded in parting another victim from his money but how much harder to understand is the success of the "substitution game" which is practiced daily in many stores that are otherwise respectable. We say this is hard to understand because one would suppose that a person who is sure Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are the only remedy that will benefit him and who goes to a store for a further supply, would insist upon getting just what he asks for. That such is not always the case is shown by the following incident:

Mrs. Delia Willis, of No. 243 Crescent Street, Brockton, Mass., says:

"When I started to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People I was a total wreck. For two years I had endured the tortures of nervousness, headache, muscular weakness and loss of appetite. My weight was only 75 pounds while I had weighed over 100 pounds. I was subject to severe headaches, mostly in the morning and at times I was so dizzy that I could scarcely distinguish one object from another.

"Last winter I got so much worse that I was obliged to go to a hospital for treatment and after six weeks of care and skillful attention, I was but little, if any, better. About March 1st, after leaving the hospital, I began to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People upon the recommendation of a friend who had been benefited by them and they have done more good than all the doctors combined.

"I had taken only a few doses when I began to feel better and within one week had gained three pounds. After finishing my first box of pills I went to one of the largest drug stores in Brockton for the second box. The clerk talked me into taking a box of pills which he claimed were the same as Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, only put up in a different form. I had taken only one or two doses, however, when I discovered that I had been imposed upon. The substitute acted altogether differently from Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and made me so weak that I could scarcely stand. I am now using nothing but the genuine Pink Pills and am thankful to say that they are putting new life into me.

"I have so much confidence in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People that I recommend them whenever an opportunity presents itself and all those who have used them speak very highly of them."

A League of Ministering Children

LADY MEATH, FOUNDER, WRITES OF THIS INTERNATIONAL ORDER

READING in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD or in other journals of work for little waifs at beautiful Mont-Lawn, which is winning international reputation as an ideal home for children of the poor, friends in various parts of the world send accounts of good works done for and by children, sure of this paper's interest in little ones.

LADY MEATH

Warm welcome is given the following letter, transmitted to this office through Miss Taylor, of South Carolina, who received it while abroad from Lady Meath, the founder and Hon. Secretary of the Ministering Children's League, of which the Duchess of York is patroness; many distinguished ladies besides, and various prominent clergymen being its earnest advocates and promoters. The League, which started very modestly eleven years ago in a London parish, for the purpose of teaching children of the rich to take an active interest in relieving the necessities of the poor, has since traveled far and wide until it has branches in nearly every country in the world and a membership roll of over 36,000. It seems, too, as the fact of its being world-wide in its work is especially emphasized this year, as it is hoped to add no less than four new institutions to those it already possesses. These buildings are to be situated, respectively, in England, Egypt, New Zealand and Tasmania. The most interesting promises to be the School of Industries, to be established in Alexandria for those deprived of sight, because, though blindness in Egypt is frightfully prevalent, no institution appears to be in existence for their benefit. Consequently, though this undertaking is going to be very quietly commenced, it may become a very important pioneer institution.

"Of the ten other buildings devoted to religious and philanthropic work which are already connected with the M. C. L., one of the most remarkable is a small chapel, erected for some Christian red Indians living in South Dakota. This place of worship was the gift of one branch established in New York. It must not, however, be imagined that the sole object of the Ministering League is to start institutions; these are a natural outcome of an association which seeks to accustom its members to render loving-service at home and abroad. They are taught daily to pray that they may become 'loving, kind and useful to others' and to regard every day as wasted during which they have not tried to do at least one kind deed. They are free to choose the object of their benevolence, consequently the girl or boy who assists a dear one at home or a poor person just outside of the home is learning just as much the lesson of 'ministering' as the member who is giving up time to help an institution or a mission in a far-distant land. In Australasia this League has been fortunate in finding great appreciation. Its branches are very numerous.

"Besides the institutions likely to start in New Zealand and Tasmania, a beautiful 'cottage by the sea' in Victoria, Australia, has for years been rendering splendid service to ailing children, whilst an existing convalescent home in West Australia is about to be very much enlarged. It seems a pity that in the United States there is somewhat of a danger of the society being crowded out by larger associations, but it has warm adherents and excellent branches. Amongst the former I must specially mention Mrs. Benedict, 54 Lefferts Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., who for long years has most kindly devoted much of her leisure to promoting the interests of a society which, working on the simplest and broadest lines of love and kindness, has not quite inaptly been termed the 'Practical Christianity Society.'

"I remain, sir, yours very faithfully,

M. J. MEATH,

Hon. Secretary and Foundress Ministering League."

THE MINISTERING CHILDREN'S HOMES AT OTTERSHAW

Lady Meath omits mention of the beautiful Ottershaw Homes for Destitute Children, near London, to which, in 1898, "she completed," says an English paper, "her last generous gift in purchasing and handing over to trustees the adjoining house and grounds of Ottershaw." Coffee houses at Richmond and Twickenham, a Convalescent Home for Children at Exmouth, Children's Home, Hayling Island, Hospital for Children, Ottawa, Canada, are among the institutions established by the M. C. L. The Earl of Meath takes a warm interest in his wife's beautiful work and lends his hearty co-operation to her noble endeavors. To teach little children the beauty of service is surely a worthy undertaking.

letter indicates, to have broadened in character, although the conditions of membership remains the simplest imaginable, viz.: "To do one kind deed every day." Definite work is not laid down but branches are advised to assist in the support of a child at an M. C. L. or other charitable institution, and to cooperate with pastors and other relief agencies in getting supplies for the many charities dependent on them. Lady Meath's letter reads:

"DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH, DEAR SIR: "May I be permitted to draw the attention of your readers to The Ministering Children's League, a society little known in the United States but which has been the means of doing good work in your great country and in many other lands?

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health anu Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges: they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefitted by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

The "Lend-a-Hand" Mission

A FEW years ago, a Southern minister and a teacher applied to Miss Sarah P. Brigham of Boston, Mass., for second hand publications for free distribution among people in the rural districts who had no money. Generous supplies from northern friends were promptly sent. Other calls came, and every contribution of reading was followed by touching expressions of gratitude from the recipients. This practical educational effort, under the name of the "Lend-a-Hand Book Mission," has gained in sweep and value until its influence cannot be measured. The method of carrying forward the work is as follows: Societies of Christian Endeavor, Epworth League, King's Daughters, and sometimes only a few persons engage in the work. They solicit second-hand books and publications from individuals, or through the local papers. The most acceptable donations are useful and entertaining books, magazines, juvenile Sunday School papers, Bibles, hymn books, scripture and picture cards, etc. The coworkers meet often, carefully examine the publications, and devise ways of sending this literature free of cost to destitute schools, churches, jails, prisons, mining districts, mountain villages, and other barren regions. Thousands of luxurious homes contain an accumulation of publications of which the owners rejoice to be relieved. In striking contrast are the thousands of humble homes, where the inmates have good capabilities, but are held down by restricted conditions, and have little or nothing to read. To connect those who have a surplus of reading matter with others who are scantily supplied, is the object of the various branches of the Lend-a-Hand Book Mission. All communications and contributions should be addressed to Miss Sarah P. Brigham, Lend-a-Hand Society, Boston, Mass.

The Bowery Boys' Thanksgiving

Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, "the mother of the Bowery boys," has sent us this touching little Thanksgiving appeal in their behalf, which we warmly commend to our readers:

"This winter we have gathered into our Bowery Mission hundreds of boys from twelve to twenty years of age. These boys, in almost every case, are homeless as well as motherless, for when we ask them where they live they reply 'nowhere.' They come largely from country towns, north, south, east, west. I spoke to-day with a boy from Cairo (Egypt). The mother dies, the home is broken up, and as the one dream of boyhood is to 'see the world,' their first thought is to come to our big city, and here they are. No money; can't find work; no friends; no place to sleep, and they amuse themselves through the night in the dance-halls, saloons, and low dives. But they are not yet so deep in sin that their hearts are hardened; for as we try to encourage them by kind words, the big tears will come, and we know they are homesick and often heartbroken. We, who almost live in the Bowery, know something of the mighty temptations which assail these boys; but no matter how far from the right the boy has strayed, no matter how deep into sin he has gone, he is 'somebody's boy.' Now it is to such as these that we want to give a Thanksgiving dinner; and while you are planning for your dear ones in your own happy home, will you remember these sad, hungry, friendless boys? May we, through your generosity, send gladness and the remembrance of their Father in Heaven into the hearts of those who gather on Thanksgiving day in the Bowery home?

"Please send all gifts of money to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

How They Love Samantha

The announcement of the approaching close of Miss Holley's delightful "Trip Around the World" has called forth a chorus of regrets from many of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers. The letter below is one of a number received, all of them lamenting the anticipated deprivation of Aunt Samantha's genial society in these pages:

CHARLESTON, S. C.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: I read your announcement in this week's HERALD, with a heavy heart, that Miss Holley's writing for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will cease after three more issues. We have enjoyed the "Trip Around the World" with dear, loving, charming Aunt Samantha very much, and I write to ask if you can possibly get Miss Holley to continue to write for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She has so endeared herself to us that we cannot give her up. We are proud of such a noble countrywoman, and somehow we feel closer to her, if we read every week something from her uplifting pen. I love to look at her dear picture. She is a noble woman, with a beautiful soul. May God bless and keep her always. MISS A. M.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Our First Slave-Ship*

ON a hot day late in the month of August, 1619, while the people of the little British settlement called Jamestown, in what is now the State of Virginia, were busily engaged in the work of establishing homes on the borders of the great American wilderness, an alarm was raised that a ship was coming with the tide up from the sea.

The stranger was a queer-looking craft, if we may judge her by modern standards, for she was, as all ships then were, short and thick—bluff-bowed and round at the stern—while she towered so high out of water at each end that the term "forecastle," which was then and is now applied to any structure at the bow of a ship, was a word of obvious significance. There was literally a castle on her bow, and another, called a poop, on her stern. Her sails, too, of which she carried, doubtless, two on the fore and the main masts, and one on the mizzen, were like great bags bellying out before the wind. When compared with the flat canvas of a modern ship it is easy to see that one would have difficulty in securing a crew for such a ship in these days. But more interesting than the form of either hull or sail was the row of black-muzzled cannon that projected through the bulwarks on each side; and altogether it is not mere fancy to say that the alarm of such a ship approaching Jamestown carried tremors of fear to the breasts of the weak, and added throbs to the hearts of the strong, as they hurried to get their weapons and go down to the river bank to receive her.

But as the stranger drew near, the trained eyes of the colonists saw many signs to allay their fears. She was flying the Dutch flag, for one thing, and the Dutch were then the leading traders of the world. Moreover, it was apparent that her cannon were neither manned nor cast loose for action; the attitudes and the work of her crew told convincingly that trade, and not war, was wanted, and, seeing this, the ready muskets of the colonists were laid aside that a friendly welcome might be extended.

Then came the ship to the shore, where her lines were made fast to the near-by trees, and her captain walked over a gangplank to greet the colonists under the wide-spread, thick-leaved branches, and tell them that he had brought merchandise to exchange for the products of the settlement.

Few more interesting ships than this are known to the history of America. The Mayflower only, of all the ships that followed Columbus, may be compared to her, and that by way of contrast, because the New England ship came with men who sought a form of liberty, while the Dutchman came to introduce a kind of slavery. Among the articles of merchandise that the Dutch captain had to offer the colonists were twenty human beings, negroes brought from the coast of Africa, and his ship was probably the first slave-trader to visit what is now the coast of the United States.

From a sailor's point of view, also, the story of this slaver is remarkable; in fact, it is one of the most singular stories known to the history of commerce. Thus, we know that she hailed from Flushing, and the number of slaves that she brought. There is no doubt about her shape and rig. We are well enough assured as to where she landed, and we are even justified in saying how she was secured to the river's bank. There is an old record containing the names of some of the slaves she landed. But her name and the name of her commander have been lost beyond recovery. She appears above our horizon like a strange sail at sea, showing unmistakably from our present point of view that something is wrong with her; we pass her close enough at hand to see on her decks men and women in distress whom we are wholly unable to relieve, and then she fades away in the mists astern, and is lost forever.

* The American Slave-Trade. By John R. Spears. Illustrated by Walter Appleton Clark. A most interesting and comprehensive history of slavery in America, compiled from the earliest records on the subject. Pp. 232; price $2.50. Publishers, Charles Scribner's Sons, Fifth Avenue, New York City.

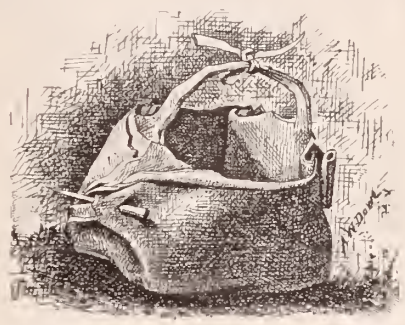
THE GOSPEL IN CUBA

Progress at El Faro Cristiano—Circuit-Riding and Colportage

MR. J. B. Wood, of the El Faro Cristiano (Christian Lighthouse Mission), Aguacate, Cuba, writes the following interesting letter concerning the work there:

"Thanks to the good offices of THE



A CUBAN PALM-LEAF BASKET

CHRISTIAN HERALD, in presenting our work, we have had many offers from people who wanted to join our mission; but from force of circumstances, we have had to limit our accessions to those who could pay their expenses. All have proved most acceptable workers; some have given up much: one, a college education; another, a salary of $75 a month. We believe in self-support, and when it is known that we are seven in number, and that the mission has been almost entirely sustained during the past year by our own funds or labor, it will be understood that we practice our own precepts. But a little help would be greatly appreciated just now, for we need two horses and equipment for real old-fashioned circuit work. Surroundings here are similar to those of Kentucky and Ohio eighty years ago. The houses of natives are small and it is not our business to criticize their modes of living, but we prefer, when traveling among their little towns, to sleep in the clear air, wrapped in our own rubber blankets and swinging in the tree branches in our own hammock. Two of our number are ready to travel over the island, on horses laden with tracts and Bibles.

"In Cuba, we have felt no lack of food and raiment, although, until we came here, we never understood the fulness of the prayer, 'Give us this day our daily bread.' At home, we used to lay by supplies: here we have hardly a meal ahead. By night the larder is empty; we have given all that we can spare from our own necessities. One of our first presents struck us as unique. We knew the palm-tree had 300 uses. Years ago, our Sabbath School teachers told us so, but when we saw men using a leaf, we cried, 'How curious to make a palm-leaf into a mackintosh!' Seeing our need of a market-basket, our grocer presented us with the one (made of a single palm-leaf) which our artist missionary has sketched for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We rather love that basket; it has gone out five hundred times from our humble home empty, but always returned full."

Is He the Oldest Minister?

Mr. E. S. Saunders, of Wyoming, Ia., writes as follows:

In your paper of October 3, 1900, you said that Lorenzo Waugh, who has just died, September 2, 1900, was said to be the oldest minister in the world. We have one here who is older. He is Rev. Asel Bronson, of the Wyoming Conference, latterly of Upper Iowa Conference, and he is now ninety-three years old, in fair health, and attends morning services on Sunday almost regularly. He attends to a good deal of business. Once in a while he preaches and attends funerals. One would hardly believe he was ninety-three years old. His first work was under the presiding elder of the New York Conference in 1831. Then he became a member of the Wyoming Conference at its organization, and about forty years ago a member of the Upper Iowa Conference. Rev. Asel Bronson's name has been on your subscription list in the days gone by.

If any of our readers know of a minister still able to preach and work, who is older than Mr. Bronson, we would be pleased to hear of it.

The Plot of a Remarkable Story.

A Mount Holyoke graduate, a bright and beautiful girl, fails to get a position as school-teacher, and, unwilling to be dependent upon her widowed mother, accepts a position as "hired girl" in a Christian family.

Her trials and tribulations, her social ostracism, the cold shoulder turned by the church as well as the world, are all graphically described.

The trials and perplexities of the mistress are not forgotten, but are dealt with fairly and truly.

The minister of a wealthy church falls in love with the hired girl, and she with him, and new complications arise.

After a while the tables are turned, the servant becomes the mistress, and, together with her husband, she strives to work out the servant-girl problem.

This is the plot of Rev. Charles M. Sheldon's new story, "Born to Serve," to begin in The Christian Endeavor World in December.

It is not simply a charming tale. It is an honest, earnest effort to help solve the servant question.

Mr. Sheldon's profits go in part to build a servant-girls' training-school in Topeka, Kan.

Stead, the famous English reformer; Ian Maclaren's series on "The Homely Virtues"; Joseph Cook on Great Orators; Dr. Cuyler's and Joseph Parker's brilliant articles, and a score of attractive features, all published exclusively in The Christian Endeavor World, Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass. BAD DREAMS Caused by Coffee.

"I have been a coffee drinker, more or less, ever since I can remember, until a few months ago I became more and more nervous and irritable, and finally I could not sleep at night for I was horribly disturbed by dreams of all sorts and a species of distressing nightmare.

"Finally, after hearing the experience of numbers of friends who had quit coffee and gone to drinking Postum Food Coffee, and learning of the great benefits they had derived, I concluded coffee must be the cause of my trouble, so I got some Postum Food Coffee and had it made strictly according to directions.

"I was astonished at the flavor and taste. It entirely took the place of coffee, and to my very great satisfaction I began to sleep peacefully and sweetly. My nerves improved, and I wish I could warn every man, woman and child from the unwholesome drug, ordinary coffee.

"People really do not appreciate or realize what a powerful drug it is and what terrible effect it has on the human system. If they did, hardly a pound of it would be sold. I would never think of going back to coffee again. I would almost as soon think of putting my hand in a fire after I had once been burned.

"A young lady friend of ours, Miss Emily Pierson, had stomach trouble for a long time, and could not get well as long as she used coffee. She finally quit coffee and began the use of Postum Food Coffee, and is now perfectly well. Yours for health. Don't publish my name." ——, Herington, Kan. ANSWERED PRAYERS

E. S., Massachusetts, writes:

I wish to acknowledge through your columns God's wonderful love and care. I have had many direct answers to prayer. Being greatly troubled of late, I besought him to touch the heart of one who seemed very cold and indifferent to his grace, and he has granted my request.

F., Massachusetts, writes:

I thank my heavenly father for the many times he has answered my prayers, and this time especially for one in behalf of a boy friend.

L. B. H., Germantown, N. Y., writes:

I, too, must join your "Answered Prayers" column in giving God the praise. In a recent illness, when no human friend could be near, my heavenly Father, in answer to prayer, was graciously with me through it all.

M. C., South Carolina, writes:

I prayed God to send peace where there was no peace. He heard. My hour of prayer is dearer to me than food or raiment.

F. I. J., Texas, writes:

I prayed for my child to be brought back to Christ, and now I know God answers an earnest petition.

E. F., Missouri, writes:

Encouraged by answered prayers in your paper, I began weeks ago to pray for my wayward brother. He is greatly changed. His old companions can hardly recognize in him their comrade of the past.

Mrs. E. R., Texas, writes:

My little daughter drove into Galveston the morning of the storm. I prayed the Lord to save her, and he did. We lost all but life. My husband and I are thankful for our preservation.

B. J. W., Pennsylvania, writes:

At three critical epochs in my life God has sent me answer to prayer. This I know beyond all doubt.

M. W. S., Vermont, writes:

I promised the Lord that if he would move the mind of a debtor to pay us a certain debt, my wife and I would take two little India Famine Orphans for one year or longer. The Monday following just exactly the sum required was received from this debtor, with a promise of the whole soon.

J. W. F., Nebraska, writes:

I write to acknowledge through your paper God's kind answer to three earnest prayers. No one but God can know the importance of these answers to me.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have been received from Mrs. E. M., Otis, Kan.; Epworth Leaguer, Devil's Lake, N. D.; M. J. H., Hutchinson, Kan.; J. D., Millbrook, Pa.; Mrs. L. C. A New Mission in Barbados

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD interested in the work of Rev. Antoinette Esterbrooks, who founded the Anchor Mission in Barbados, will be glad to read of the success which continues to crown her labors. Recently, the Parker Memorial Hall was dedicated as a home of prayer in Parker's Village, Barbados. The building, a neat stone structure accommodating 200 people, is the gift of Mrs. Parker, a wealthy lady of this country, who was influenced to this kind act through Miss Esterbrooks' representation, while on a visit here, of the needs of the island. At the dedicatory service Miss Esterbrooks' congregation from the Anchor Mission were largely represented, while crowds came in from the adjacent villages. Miss Esterbrooks led the opening prayer and Rev. Reuben A. Sealy, Superintendent of the A. M. E. Church, delivered the service and pronounced the words of consecration. The building is a memorial of Mrs. Parker's husband.

Mr. Sankey on Gospel Song

Ira D. Sankey recently addressed two great gatherings in Edinburgh, Scotland, on the subject of "Sacred Song and Story." Having told several interesting stories regarding various hymns and their authors, Mr. Sankey then stated that it had been borne in upon him that there was a great power for good in sacred song, and he had made up his mind to try to organize a training school for Gospel singers as soon as he returned to America. There are schools, he said, for all other kinds of music, but in all the world there was no school for Gospel singing. He then announced that a collection would be taken up, and, after expenses were paid, the balance would go toward the establishment of such a training school, under his control.

Taking Pains for Christ*

Character Tried by the Crises of Christian Experience

THERE is an old saying that "the strength of a chain is only the strength of its weakest link." The Parable of the Ten Virgins, which is the passage associated with the topic, is an illustration of this fact. The ten virgins were all in the same category so far as appearances went until the time of emergency came. They all went forth to meet the Bridegroom, all were anxious to honor him, and all had the lamps alight which, in an Oriental land, the attendants of a bridegroom are expected to carry. Then, too, all employed the time of waiting in sleeping. There was nothing wrong in that. The wise and the foolish, alike, slept during the interval. It was when the Bridegroom appeared suddenly that the difference in their character was revealed. Five of them had prepared for just such an emergency as had occurred. They had brought a supply of oil with them, with which to replenish their lamps. The others had brought no oil, apparently supposing that the oil in the lamps would be sufficient to keep them burning until the celebration was over. Then they sought to borrow from their sisters, but each had a supply sufficient only for herself and could not help the others.

There should be no difficulty in identifying the spiritual condition which this momentous difference represents. Christ was deeply conscious of this radical separation of characters. In another parable it had a place as the hearers of the rocky ground variety. They, like the five foolish virgins, propose to follow him. They are even precocious in their development. They spring up more rapidly than the hearers represented by the seed which fell on good ground. But it is their staying quality that is defective. They have no root in themselves, no resources of their own, no connection with the Holy Spirit from which inexhaustible stores of grace may be obtained. Such characters are present in all our revivals. Their sorrow and their joy are genuine enough, but the surface only of their natures is stirred. It is a superficial change which soon wears off. A little worldly amusement, a little ridicule, a little persecution, and they are back again in the world with nothing to show that any change has occurred. The wise virgins have realized the sinfulness of their own natures, their inability to cleanse them and their powerlessness to control evil proclivities, and they have gone to the Source of Strength for the help they need. Having learned their weakness and the means of augmenting their power, they are not taken by surprise, but know how "to stand in the evil day."

The time of stress and strain comes to all, sooner or later. The crisis may come in sudden temptation, or heavy affliction, or grievous disappointment, or in sickness. Then the sufferer shows whether his religion is of any value to him. His light may burn dimly for a time, but if he has entered into living union with Christ, it does not go out. The divine hand goes forth to his fainting child and new strength is imparted. The crisis actually brings forth the Christly character more vividly. The sufferer on the sick bed surprises us with songs of triumph and a patience that is superhuman. The man stripped of his possessions astonishes us with his cheerfulness in adversity. He must have had bread to eat that we know not of. This knowledge of the source of power, this trained habit of applying for it, this unfaltering, unwavering faith is the oil that replenishes the lamp and keeps its light burning. But the connection must be established in quiet times. In the time of sorrow and distress and physical pain, woe to the soul that has not made use of its resources and knows not which way to turn for help. Neither the preachers nor Christian friends can help in that emergency. Their power is available for themselves, but they cannot impart it to others. Gladly, oftentimes, would they lead the trembling soul along the path familiar to their own feet, but the darkness is too dense for all but those accustomed to the road.

REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D., Editor NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 28, 1900 PRICE FIVE CENTS

THE · CRANE'S · THANKSGIVING

. . . MARY B. SLEIGHT . . .

THE Reverend Josiah Crane had been for ten years the faithful pastor of the little village of Hardacre, and, in fact, of the entire region within a radius of four miles, there being but the one church in the neighborhood.

It was chiefly a farming community, but the farms, though small, were so well managed that the owners had an abundance of all that was necessary for health and comfort, and though they handled but little money they would have felt insulted had anyone called them poor.

They paid their pastor a salary of five hundred dollars, and five hundred dollars seemed to most of them a small fortune. Very few of them ever spent that amount in "hard cash" in the course of the year, and as many of them were in the habit of supplementing their subscription with a load of wood or a barrel of potatoes, they listened to the good man's sermons with a clear conscience, feeling that as far as his salary was concerned he had no cause to complain.

Mr. Crane was a frugal man, content for himself with "plain living and high thinking," and as he had to be his own gardener and wood-sawyer, he had usually an appetite that gave a relish to the simplest fare. His chief weakness was a fondness for good stationery, but even in this he had learned to deny himself—often drafting his sermons on wrapping paper—and had he been a bachelor the five hundred dollars would have been more than enough for all his needs. But with a wife and six little Cranes to provide for, it became by degrees, as the little Cranes grew apace, a puzzling question how they were all to be clothed and fed.

"Why not find a new field?" asked a friend, who having on one or two occasions exchanged pulpits with him, had discovered how matters stood. But to this proposition Mr. Crane turned a deaf ear. His ten years' service had endeared the people to him; he had christened their children and married the young men and maidens; he had rejoiced with them when life went prosperously, and sympathized with them when trials and afflictions came. Besides, he had a horror of being a rolling stone. He felt that, like the sturdy cedars of the dunes, he had struck root, and that, however buffeted by adverse winds, he could not bear transplanting.

And so for another year they struggled on.

Mrs. Crane, a "sweet girl-graduate" at the time of her marriage, had assumed the duties of a minister's wife with a fine enthusiasm, meaning to keep pace with her husband and in touch with the thinkers of the day. But with her growing family, and the necessity of being nursery-maid, laundress and cook, she rarely found an hour for self-improvement. She held out heroically, but her cares told upon her, and as the years went by she became so changed that old friends chancing to meet her had to have an introduction, while others, meeting her for the first time, wondered how a man like the Rev. Josiah Crane could have fancied a woman so quiet and uninteresting. But in her husband's eyes she was lovelier than when he first wooed her. Lover-like, in those days, he had called her an angel; now her face wore for him the meek beauty of a saint. But it was a beauty that of late sometimes startled him it was so ethereal, and the fear of losing her drove him finally to reconsider his friend's suggestion. He had for the last year or two been trying to eke out his salary by writing for journals and magazines; but though capable under favorable conditions of producing very acceptable articles, he found the compensation a poor dependence. For several weeks two of the children—the twins—had been so ill that it had been necessary to have a nurse from the city for them, and in one way and another the outgo had proved so heavy that he had been obliged to overdraw his salary. Nothing more would be due until the first of January, and when one dark day in November the mail brought him, "declined with thanks," a manuscript for which he had hoped to receive something toward bridging the gulf, he felt that a decisive step must be taken at once. His wife came into the room at the moment with her work-basket, and her pale, worn face helped to clinch this determination.

But at the thought of all the strain and heart-ache that the change involved, his head went down into his hands.

"Don't, dear! don't!" she entreated, dropping the shirt she was mending and putting her arm over the heaving shoulders. "He who feeds the sparrows won't, I am sure, forget us." And with a laugh that was lost in a sob, she slipped from the room.

Her husband started up when the door closed behind her and began pacing the floor. No, the Lord would not forget them, he was confident of that: and if he wanted them to leave Hardacre, he would surely open the way. So, through another week he prayed and waited.

It was the day before Thanksgiving, one of those soft-skied Indian summer days when all the outer world seems calling to those indoors.

"Come out and fare a-field," but the Thanksgiving sermon was still unwritten, and the minister, resisting with a sigh the luring voice of the sea and the whispering wind that stole landward between the dunes, seated himself at his desk, desperately intent on finding cause for gratitude.

The twins were better, for that he was thankful indeed—they had seemed so near life's boundary line—and old Doctor Hurd had refused to send in his bill—it was a part of his subscription, he said—and for this, too, the minister gave thanks. But, on the other hand, with not a dollar in the house, how was he to feed his family till the next payment was made?

A six weeks' drought had seriously damaged the crops, and the contributions of farm products, usually so generous, had been few and chary; even his own little patches of cabbages and potatoes had disappointed him.

In his despondency his eye rested aimlessly on the open Bible at his elbow, and presently he found himself reading: "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vine: the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold and there shall be no herd in the stalls, yet will I rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation."

"DEACON JESSUP WALKED IN CARRYING A HUGE TURKEY."

The grand old pæan roused him. Here was his text. The ancient prophet had met his need. But before he could put pen to paper. Mrs. Crane opened the door.

"Is the baby here, Josiah?" she asked anxiously. "I left him playing on the porch while I went up-stairs to give the twins their medicine, and when I came back he was gone. Where can he be, Josiah?"

The minister absently stuck his pen behind his ear and joined in the search. The child had been playing with his little cart, and the wheels had left two narrow ruts in the sandy path that led to the gate.

"I'll find him," said the father confidently, hurrying on without his hat. "He's probably trudging down the street."

But outside the gate the wheel tracks took a new trend, and the man caught his breath, for that way lay the beach, the silvery beach, where the white-capped billows that the baby loved were breaking over the shingles.

"God help us!" he cried, thinking of the little one alone on the shore with the treacherous waves lying in wait for him. And throwing out his hands he ran as one runs who has a prize at stake. Perhaps he could overtake the boy before he reached the water. But on and on he went the zig-zag lines with the little footprints leading, till at the base of a sand dune the runner came upon the wheels tangled in a clump of beach-plum bushes. But the box was gone, and it was easy to see where the child had pushed it over the sand toward the sea.

In another minute the minister was scanning the shore. But neither up nor down the glistening reach was any living creature, save here and there a slender-legged sand piper pecking among the pebbles—and there were no more tracks.

Of a sudden the man sighted something floating on the water, a little box that bobbed up and down with every rise and fall of the waves, and above the rim—he could see it plainly now—a mass of wet curls glittered in the sunlight. Already, with quick forethought he had off his coat and shoes, and, praying as he ran, he plunged into the surf.

He was a good swimmer and the tide was with him, but the box with its precious freight was steadily drifting seaward. Still, little by little, he gained on it, and at last, all but spent, he had the child in his arms. Then, suddenly, the sky grew dark and the sea surged in his ears.

But now there were shouts on shore, and the next minute a boat was cutting its way through the long low billows.

"They're alive yet, thank the Lord, but it was a pretty close call for 'em both," said Captain Dawson, as he helped his men lift the half-drowned minister from the dory and loosened the little arms that clung to his neck.

And as soon as the rescuing party reached the parsonage there was of course a call for dry clothing, and poor Mrs. Crane could produce nothing in the way of underwear but some much-patched flannels and a shirt that was not ironed, having been laid aside for repairs.

"'Pon my word I did feel sorry for her," said Mrs. Deacon Jessup, when she related the story to her husband. "An' when we was comin' away, me an' Mrs. Hedges, we happened to go through the dinin' room—it was a little after twelve, an' Tom an' Sadie, just in from school, was hurryin' to eat—an' all they had on that table was some shaved beef an' bread an' apple sauce, with not even a scrap o' butter."

"Well, I do n' know who's to blame," said the deacon. "Seems to me with five hundred a year they ought to keep better supplied than that."

"Oh, the five hundred was all very well when there was only three or four of 'em, but you must remember that now there are eight mouths to fill, an' while the twins was sick they had to have a nurse, an' of course she had to be paid.

"An' now, what I want you to do, David, is to go right out to the barnyard an kill one o' them big turkeys for 'em. An' you might as well take along a bushel or two of potatoes an' a bag o' them bell flowers."

About the same time it chanced that Mrs. Hedges was giving her husband similar instructions.

"Pick out the fattest one there is, Ezry, an' a basketful of them turnips an' onions," she said, "an' bime by I'll run over with one of them mince pies I baked to-day."

The two deacons were dutiful husbands, and an hour later, just as the Cranes had seated themselves at the supper table, Deacon Jessup walked in carrying a huge turkey. And before the minister and his wife had finished thanking him, the big iron knocker on the front door clanged again, and Deacon Hedges presented himself, a fat turkey in one hand and a basket of vegetables in the other.

The children, following the example of their father and mother, had left the table to greet the visitors, and while the two men waited for their baskets to be emptied, they mentally inventoried the bill of fare: Bread, baked apples, and at each plate a bowl of mush and milk. But everything was tidy, and a vase of chrysanthemums for a centre piece gave the table a touch that redeemed it from the commonplace.

Deacon Hedges had come in his top buggy, and finding that Deacon Jessup was afoot, he invited him to ride.

"Well, brother Jessup, what do you think of it!" he asked, as he gathered up the reins.

"I think we're a mighty careless set to let our minister's family get down to such short rations, when our own barns and cellars are filled to overflowin'," said Deacon Jessup, emphatically.

"That's a good 'eal the way it strikes me," responded Deacon Hedges. "To be sure crops have been a leetle short this season, but we've all got enough an' to spare, an' we'd ought to seen to it a month ago that the parson's folks was n't lackin' for anything. An' what's more, we hadn't ought to let him get down to his last penny. It don't matter how well supplied the pantry and cellar is, a man likes to feel that he's got a dollar or two in his pocket for 'mergencies, an' I'm afraid that's what the parson ain't had for a good many days. I've been makin' a rought estimit of what it'd cost me to live if I had to pay out cash for everything as he does, an' though there's only five of us, I don't see how on earth I could make the two ends meet on less'n eight hundred."

"I know I couldn't," said Deacon Jessup, "an' I've got a mighty savin' soul of a wife, too, an' only four of us all told. To be sure she don't do the washin', but that's 'cause I won't let her. She ain't strong enough for that sort o' work, an' the parson's wife ain't either."

"Indeed she ain't," said Deacon Hedges. "A slender little woman like her, with five or six babies to look after, oughtn't to be spendin' her strength in that way, an' she wouldn't have to if we paid her husban' a decent salary. Fact is, I'm gettin' sort o' 'shamed of havin' outsiders know that we don't pay him but five hundred, an' I'm goin' to start a subscription paper. Any one of us can afford to give ten dollars more a year an' not feel it, an' if we can get twenty names for that amount it'll bring it up to seven hundred slick as a whistle."

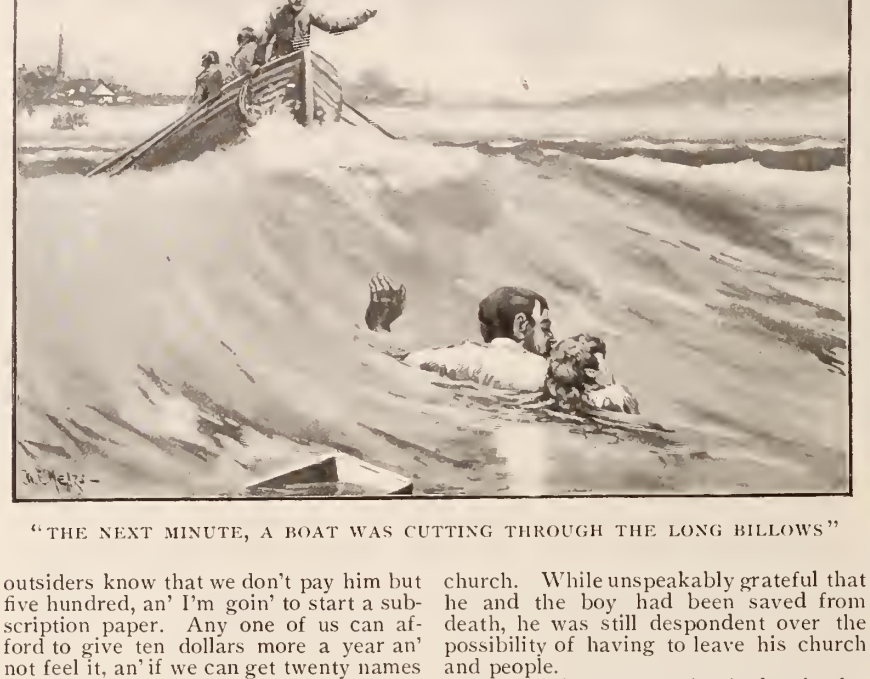
"That's so," said Deacon Jessup. "Put me down for ten. An' le's see," he added eagerly, "if we can't raise the rest before meetin' time to-morrow."

"Good!" cried farmer Hedges, and with the ardor of a boy in for a lark, he shouted "G'lang" to his horse.

The short November twilight had merged into brilliant moonshine, and by ten o'clock the two men had gone the rounds of the neighborhood.

"The rest of 'em we can waylay in the mornin'," remarked Deacon Hedges, as they said good night, "but we're sure of a hundred and fifty anyway."

The next day the minister went early to church. While unspeakably grateful that he and the boy had been saved from death, he was still despondent over the possibility of having to leave his church and people.



"THE NEXT MINUTE, A BOAT WAS CUTTING THROUGH THE LONG BILLOWS"

None of the congregation had arrived—it lacked a full hour of the time for the services to begin—but in the empty pews before him he saw as in a vision the faces of the people he had learned to love. Here was one who through much tribulation had been brought into the kingdom, and here one whose besetting sin ha made him always in need of a helpin hand. There were gray-haired pilgrim to whom his words of cheer had give new courage; and, most precious of al the youthful members of his flock, whor he was striving to lead into broader an greener pastures than their elders ha known.

Ah, how dear they were to him, an how well he knew "their simple usu ways and work-day deeds." They wer his own people; he had cast in his lo with them for better or worse, and th possibility of a separation made hir groan in spirit.

But reminded at last that the time wa passing, he turned to the desk to look u the hymns.

There, in bold relief on top of the big B ble, lay a letter addressed to him in Deaco Hedge's handwriting. The thought cam to him that it might possibly be a re quest for him to resign, and he opened i with quaking fingers. But in an instan foreboding was changed to thankfulness for, in addition to the information that hi salary had been raised, the letter cor tained, as the first instalment of the in crease, a check for fifty dollars.

Before he had fairly rallied from th happy shock, the people came flockin in, and every one seemed to catch a re flection of the shining face behind th desk.

Then he opened the Bible, and hi voice rang out like a clarion, "Bless th Lord, O my soul." But he broke dow midway in the psalm, and bowed his hea to hide his tears. Whereupon Deaco Jessup started, in stentorian tones, the tun of "Blest be the Tie that Binds," and b the time the hymn was sung he had man aged to pull himself together.

But it was useless to try to go on witl the services in the usual way—all heart were so full—and the sermon had to giv place to a love feast.

"It's well I wasn't there," said the littl wife, "for I know I should have made a simpleton of myself, just as I am doing now," she added, wiping her eyes. "Ah Josiah, didn't I tell you the Lord would take care of his Cranes?"

AS true happiness is the result and reward of a certain self-discipline and effort, it becomes a matter of very important and interesting study how best to attain unto it. There are means to every end, and in this case the means are widespread and various; some of them acting specially on the individual; others on the family; others on the world at large; but all in their ultimates, unselfish; and seeking not their own good, apart from, or reckless of, the good of others.

The first aid to personal happiness is to be found, with all the authority of a divine dictum, in the first commandment. It governs all the other commandments, for if we love God with all our heart, we shall want to tell him so. Besides, our days will ravel at the ends, unless we hem them night and morning with prayer. Is it not foolhardy to leave our bed-rooms in the morning without asking for the wisdom and protection we are sure to need? How can we tell what may happen—what doors may be opened or shut—what new elements may come into our lives—what new work we may find to do—what dangers we may go into—what enemies we may meet? A thousand "peradventures" confront a man every morning. But if he puts all these peradventures into God's care, he goes into the world calm and happy. He is armed for every conflict. There are more with him than can be against him.

AND with what a shining face of content a woman comes down-stairs if she has first had a few moment's confidence with her Father in heaven! If she is a wife, she has told him all her anxieties about her husband; she has asked for protection and guidance; and she can leave him with God, and not be afraid. If she is a mother, she has put her children in the care of their angels; they may run into danger, but in that powerful guardianship she feels no harm can come to them. Many unexpected things may arise in her household that day, but she has brought away from her morning supplication strength to help in every time of need. If there are no domestic claims, there are perhaps love troubles, or financial difficulties, or social hopes or perplexities. There is no need to hesitate about any care. None of them are too small to pray about.

SURELY if he thus defends, and instructs, and blesses us all through the day, we may well offer him thanks at night. And there are many of us whom the night terrifies. We are like children in the dark. We do not know what dangers it conceals—not only dangers of the elements, and dangers of wicked men, but also of that supernatural world that lies so close to us in the day, and presses all round our beds at night. Yea, if we could be silent all day long, we must call upon God in the night season. Often it is the most spiritual natures that have these night terrors; and that wake and watch while others sleep, till their sight and hearing aches for some object, that may keep > "The awful inner sense unroused,

> Lest it should mark,
> The life that haunts the emptiness,
> And terror of the dark."

In such hours prayer is salvation. To rise and stand with folded hands and call upon that name, before which angels and men worship, and devils fear and fly, is one of those spiritual conflicts which fill the soul with triumphant happiness and strength in believing. I know a woman who has drunk of every cup of life, joyful and sorrowful; who has met dangers of the sea and the land; who has faced poverty, suffering and death cheerfully; who in nearly three-score years and ten, has not once found God's mercies too small; yet who has never escaped from a spiritual dread of the night and the powers of darkness; and who, therefore, never omits to add to her night prayer two lines from Bishop Ken's evening hymn:

> "May no ill dreams disturb my rest,
> Nor powers of darkness me molest."

NOT only is prayer absolutely necessary to that peace of the spirit, which is the very atmosphere of happiness, but every soul needs to go apart one hour each day. I know that business—that duties not to be put off—that inconvenient circumstances must in a large number of cases prevent a mid-day seclusion; yet for every one who can "enter into silence" for an hour between the morning and the afternoon, it is a restoration beyond price. To put aside, just for a little while, the things that fret and worry; to shut ourselves in our rooms, and lock the door, and close our eyes, and dismiss the world. Whenever, or wherever, a soul thus separates itself, God draws near to that soul.

THE soul that loves God has always longed to go apart with him. Isaac wandered off into the fields at eventide, and met God alone there. Nathaniel sought the thick foliage of the fig tree, and Jesus saw him there. Happy Nathaniel! Pray God that all our solitudes may be such that we shall not fear to have Christ say, "When thou wast there, I saw thee." These blessed hours of going apart are the hours that tinct all other hours with the spirit of true happiness. Will Jacob ever forget Bethel? or David the hill Mizar? or Nathaniel the fig tree? or John, Patmos? No more shall we forget, no, not through eternity, the places and the hours when we went apart to wait for our God, and he visited us, and said a word to our souls, even though it was only the word "Peace!" There are little rooms in humble cottages that have been the very gate of heaven; there are lonely fields, where men ploughing, and thinking of God, have tasted of the joys to come. There are common highways from one little village to another that have been royal roads to the celestial kingdom.

EVERY true cry of the human soul enters into the ear and the heart of God: therefore we will pray. If we have a beloved being beside us, does it suffice to think of him? No; we wish to speak to him, to ask his advice, to tell him of all that pleases or troubles us. It is just so if we love God. And it was not to those who loved God that Jesus forbid repetitions. The widow's opportunity was given us for an example. We may come to God; and then we may come again. We may tell him all; and then tell him all, again. What else is prayer but this? We need not consider any form of words. What do we say to our father? What do we say to our mother? Is any eloquence required when we speak to them? We just tell them what is in our hearts, and our father is satisfied, and our mother comforts us. This is the kind of prayer that prevails. And after it, we go down to our house justified, encouraged, happy beyond the power of earth to trouble.

THE CENTURY'S LAST THANKSGIVING

THE CELEBRATION OF THE ANCIENT FESTIVAL IN MANY LANDS

THANKSGIVING Day will be observed in New England this year, for the two hundred and seventy-eighth time, and throughout the United States, as a national holiday, for the thirty-seventh time. We will give thanks on this last Thursday in ovember not only for the mercies and essings of the year 1900. but for our pros- rity as a nation during the past one undred years; for this is the last Thanks- ving Day of the Nineteenth Century. Ve gather as a people to express grati- ude to the Divine Providence that has afe-guarded our country over the peril- us periods of the last ten decades: for e preservation of the Union through evitable wars; for the establishment of brotherhood of all men. ack and white; for the onderful progress we ve made in industry. ience and art; and for e growth of the religion Christ throughout ery section of the land. Ve give particular thanks r, the fact that at the ose of the last year of e century, we are practi- lly at peace at home and road; that the lives of r Government repre- ntatives in China were ared; that the harvest roughout the United tates is more than ever undant.

THANKSGIVING be- gan as a distinctively gricultural festival: but s the Christian spirit was fused into it, philanthro- y entered more and more to the observance of the ay. It is now a day which e benevolent find par- cularly fruitful for od, on which the rich pen their purses, on hich the poor are help- l to forget the struggle for existence. risons, hospitals, poorhouses, asylums, nements, lodging houses—wherever the ery poor or afflicted are gathered, the ay is one of outward gaiety and reason- ble plenty. In every church, mission nd chapel from Maine to California, a rvice in accordance with the meaning f the day is held. But more than all, is a home day, a day of family re- nions, when all quarrels are forgotten, ll differences ignored around the hospit- ble board, upon which the turkey holds e place of honor.

The custom of sending gifts to absent nes is not followed as faithfully at hanksgiving as at Christmas time, yet s the end of November comes round ch year, the express companies report n enormous number of parcels marked Perishable," "In haste," "This side up," ll presumably Thanksgiving gifts. Pies, lum-puddings, fruit cake, nuts, apples nd gingerbread are the favorite means f conveying the love of the dear ones at ome to those who are far away. Some- mes even a plump chicken, a duck or a rkey is sent from the old farm to the lative or friend in the city. The United tates transports leaving New York or an Francisco, for Cuba, Porto Rico, uan, the Philippines or China, are carry- g free hundreds of boxes to our soldiers and sailors abroad. Every man of the cloth of blue who receives such a box divides its contents with his "bunkies," and thus the thoughtfulness of those who pack the good things, to be eaten with such care, brings a ray of sunshine, a touch of home to many a young man doing his country's work in a far-away clime who would otherwise be unable to distinguish Thanksgiving from any other day.

ALMOST every country has its day of Thanksgiving, though it may not be given that name. In most cases, it may be called Harvest Day, or the Festival of the Harvest, the day specially set aside for a jubilee over the ingathering of the crops. July is the harvest month in our Northern states, but the celebration is put off until November to give all the states time to get the product of the soil actually under cover. In other countries the Harvest months are as follows, each, of course, according to climate:

January.—The greater part of Chili, portions of the Argentine Republic, Australia, and New Guinea.

February to March.—The East Indies.

April.—Mexico, Egypt, Persia, Syria.

May.—Japan, China, Northern Asia Minor, Tunis, Algiers, and Morocco.

June.—Spain, Portugal, Italy, Sicily, Greece, and the south of France.

July.—The larger part of France, Austria, and Southern Russia.

August.—Germany, England, Belgium, Netherlands, part of Russia, Denmark, and part of Canada.

September.—Scotland, Canada, Sweden, Norway, and north Russia midlands.

October.—The northern parts of Russia and of the Scandinavian peninsula.

IN tropical countries, and in the east, where the crops are dependent upon one long annual rain, the people hold two festivals, each of which is a Thanksgiving. The first celebrates the coming of the rainy season, and the second the gathering of the harvest. These twin festivals or holidays are common in India, Siam, China, Burmah, Mexico, the West Indies, and South America. In certain parts of England a festival still takes place at the close of the reaping, not the ingathering. When the sickle is laid down, it is said that they have "got the kern." The reapers announce the fact by loud shouting, and an image, crowned with wheat ears and dressed in a white frock and colored ribbons, is hoisted on a pole by the tallest and strongest men of the party. All circle round this "kern baby" or harvest queen and proceed to the barn, where they set the image on high, and proceed to do justice to the harvest supper. In some places "this nodding sheaf, the symbol of the god," is quite small, fashioned with much care and neatness, and plaited with wonderful skill; in others, it is large and cumbersome, taking a strong man's strength to bear it.

A RURAL celebration akin to the English, and known as the "Fete of the Big Sheaf," survived until recently in Canada, and closed the harvest season among the inhabitants in the neighborhood of Bay St. Paul. The last sheaf, made large, was put on the last cartload of grain as an emblem of abundance; the lads and lassies, decorated with ears of grain, walked on each side of the load, and sang their national songs on the way to the house. "The master of the house sits in a large arm-chair at the head of the room," says a writer, in describing the ceremony, "and awaits with a joyful and contented air the arrival of his people. These soon come trooping in, led by the eldest son, who carries in one hand a fine sheaf of wheat all decorated with ribbons. He advances to the master of the house, gives him the sheaf, wishes him as good a harvest every year of his life. The old gentleman thanks him, after which they pass to the next room for supper, composed of mutton, milk and pancakes with maple sugar. Songs, dances, and other amusements close the festival."

The feast of Ingathering or Harvest Home, known in Scotland as "the Kern," was a peculiarly secular method of celebrating the close of the harvest. This still has its local survivals, although they are fast passing away before the modern innovation of a general harvest festival for the whole parish, to which all the farmers are expected to contribute, and which their laborers may freely attend. This festival begins with a special service in the village church, beautifully decorated for the occasion with fruit and flowers, followed by a dinner in a tent or in some building sufficiently large, and continued with rural sports, and sometimes including a tea-drinking for the women.

In old-time harvest festivals in Holland, traveling groups went around to help the threshers at harvest-time, and their leader was called upon to immolate a ram with a garlanded knife, thrusting it in to the cry of "Ram! Ram!" The girls, who helped in the threshing, had first to wash their faces in spring water strewn with flowers. When night came there was dancing and feasting. As Christianity spread, Holland left off sacrificing rams, and, with steam-threshing machinery, adopted better customs. As Hollanders have always been noted for their agricultural skill, so they have been distinguished for piety and a thankful spirit, and it has been urged that America, to some extent at least, has inherited its Thanksgiving customs from its Dutch ancestors.

A WESTERN POULTRY-YARD IN THE THANKSGIVING SEASON

THE Jewish Thanksgiving is the Feast of Tabernacles, the modern observance of which, however, bears but slight resemblance to the ancient Judean splendor, when great multitudes of people gathered in Jerusalem, and the plains around the Holy City were green with bowers of palm, myrtle, and olive. By day, the world was gay with the populace waving lulabs (branches bound together), and, at night, the mighty concourse waved flambeaux in the Temple court. Such grand oratorios the world has never heard since those old Judean festivals, when the pealing of silver trumpets led melodious choirs in psalms of thanksgiving.

MARK 10: 46-52

THE HEALING OF BLIND BARTIMEUS

GOLDEN TEXT, Mark 10 : 51

THE Christmas month has become pre-eminently the giving month, through the blessed contagion of God's "unspeakable gift." Utmost tact should be used to prevent impressible childhood from placing the selfish idea of receiving uppermost. Parents and teachers should study to make the children forget that they may receive something, in the nobler enthusiasm of planning to give. "It is more blessed to give than to receive," and let us see to it that the little ones do not miss this higher blessedness which their parents know so well. Let the Bartimeus lesson show the philanthropy of Jesus, who "went about doing good," giving help wherever he went, especially that best charity, helping men to help themselves; and let the Zaccheus lesson take up the same Christmas strain by showing the philanthropy of men from the example of that saved sinner who followed repentance, not alone with restitution of ill-gotten gains, but also with a bountiful charity, devoting half his goods to the poor. In practical illustration of these lessons and also of the parable of the "pounds," which is to be combined with the Christmas lesson, let word be given out that on Christmas eve every teacher and pupil in the Sabbath School is invited to bring to the church a pound of something to be given to the poor, wrapped so that only God will know whether it is a cheap or costly pound.

Have mercy on me. . . . Rise; he calleth thee. A persistent human cry for help and its abundant divine answer! Three blessings are here suggested:

1. Blessings in words.
2. Blessings for the body.
3. Blessings for the soul.

Blessings in Kindly Words To the blind beggar it was no small comfort to have even a word of sympathy. Words are not "cheap," but golden when they express heartfelt sympathy. It would have changed that blind man's midnight to starlight if Christ had given him nothing else but that kindly word. How much more should we appreciate the many words Christ gives us from his own lips in the Gospels! On the Gospels we might write, as we present them to the sinner: "Rise; he calleth thee." Rise, like the prodigal to go to the Father, whose heart yearns for thee; whose written Word, whose living Word, whose Spirit calleth thee. When Jesus came to Bethany, after the death of Lazarus, the bereaved Martha hastened to him for comfort, but Mary remained in the house until her sister returned, saying, "The Master is come and calleth for thee." By bereavement, by prosperity, Christ calls us to his side, that his Word may scatter our darkness like the rising of the sun. Who can measure the blessing that is brought to our hearts and homes this Christmas month by the answer God has made to the cry of the human heart in the Word that was made flesh and dwelt among us? Job, in sickness, bereavement, adversity, unable to understand how God could allow such sorrow to come upon a good man, and feeling for the time as if God was his mighty enemy, exclaimed: "O, that mine Adversary had written a book!" There was yet no Bible to explain how God chastens his children in love, and his heart cried out for an explanation of the mysteries of pain. Even when God does not remove the affliction, it is a great blessing that he has given us the Bible to explain its meaning and mission. Even Nature hints at what Scripture declares, that pain is not the supreme evil, nor pleasure the supreme good. God is aiming in our lives not at pleasure, but perfection, which is often sculptured with the chisel of Pain. Alas, how many do not half appreciate the blessings in the Word God has put in their hands!

"I WAS EYES TO THE BLIND AND FEET WAS I TO THE LAME" JOB 29: 15

A station agent at a town in New Jersey saw a man walking on the tracks of the Lehigh Valley Railroad. On his back he carried a huge package, apparently containing household utensils as well as clothes. He seemed tired, though he trudged sturdily on. The agent stopped him and ordered him off the track, telling him he was liable to arrest for trespass, besides incurring the risk of being killed by a train. The man, who was a Hungarian, demurred and produced a railroad ticket, good from Jersey City to Scranton, Pa. The agent looked at him in amazement, and asked him why he was walking when he might ride. The Hungarian replied that he thought the ticket gave him only the privilege of walking over the road. His right was explained to him, and the tired man delightfully boarded the first train that stopped. A similar mistake is often made by Christians, who do not avail themselves of th privileges. They toil through life beari their burdens of care, despite the Bible's vitation to cast their burdens on the Lord.

Blessings for the Body But in the case of Bartime there is something more tha word of comfort. To it Jes adds blessings for the body, the restoration light, and so escape from beggary. Chr had helped him to help himself, which is t best charity. The relief that Christ broug to the sick and the poor he has prompt good men in every age to scatter about the

When Job sat in sackcloth, bereft of weal of property, of reputation, he found comf in remembering how he had used his hea and wealth when he had both. "I was ey to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. was a father to the poor, and the cause tha knew not I searched out." A well-kno pastor in a Western city was greatly belov by his people. One of the boys in the Su day School said that he saw his pastor goi along the sidewalk one day, and it seemed him that there was a little bit of sunshine f lowing him wherever he went. Christi philanthropy, once individual, has develop into great asylums, refuges, hospitals, t "greater" miracles Christ promised to when he had ascended and again descend in the Holy Spirit upon the church. The Christian institutions have made street be gary so unnecessary in many places that it forbidden as a crime easily lending itself fraud. Let us not be too severe in saying will help only the worthy, reminded in th Christmas month that on that basis G would never have given the great gift Christ to this wicked world, nor the less gifts he has poured upon the evil and t good alike. But let us so love our neighb as ourselves, that putting ourselves in l place we shall refuse to cultivate a spirit dependence in a weak brother that will d grade his manhood, when by more thoug and effort we can conserve his self-respect helping him to help himself. Let us ent our generous Christmas season by the "bea tiful gate" of apostolic charity: "Silver a gold have I none; such as I have give I th —a brother's hand to help you on your fe that you may help yourself in manly inc pendence."

There is no other philanthropy so far-reac ing as that which helps childhood, helps it health, to education, to purity. A belov professor and his little daughter having di suddenly and tragically, the friends built th memorial, not in an idle monument, but in children's hospital.

Blessings for the Soul But the charities of Chri never stop with the body, human charity too frequent does, as if it were enough to cure the diseas to relieve the hunger, regardless of the ills the soul, which will never be permanent removed except by the healing of the so What would it have profited the blind man only physical sight had been given, and h had remained in soul as blind to the chara ter of Christ as the Pharisees? Christ pour light into soul as well as body, and he f lowed Jesus in the way.

LUKE 19: 1-10

THE CALLING OF ZACCHEUS THE PUBLICAN

GOLDEN TEX Luke 19 : 10

JESUS had just saved a blind beggar, and now he was to save the rich chief of the publicans, as if in these two extreme cases to spell out, "Whosoever will let him take of the water of life freely."

The blind man was more unfortunate than sinful, and himself first called to Christ. The chief publican was a "hard case," from a human point of view, and Christ made the first call in that instance. We note the following grand divisions in the story:

I. Jesus seeking the lost.
II. Jesus saving the lost.
1. Repentance with restitution.
2. Bountiful benevolence.

Zaccheus, chief among the publicans, was rich. In our visit to Palestine we found the "publicans" as dishonest and as despised as of old. From a foreign despot an ambitious scamp buys the right to collect the taxes imposed in unjust measure upon his neighbors, knowing that while the government requires a tenth, which is all too much, it will not interfere with his extorting a fifth. Every farmer must bring his unthreshed grain to the public threshing floor for the publican to take out the government's tenth, and nothing can be taken from it until the government's share is removed. The publican delays to take this day after day till the farmer, in desperate need of the grain and the money it would bring, surrenders to the trick he is helpless to prevent, and says, "Take a fifth and let me sell the rest." By such devices of "legal thieving" the publicans of Bible times, as to-day, got not only a commission on the government's tenth, but an extra tenth of their own through forms of fraud that would not make them liable under the law. There are two classes among the rich, one that desires wealth in order to be esteemed, and another that is ready to sacrifice the good opinion of others at any time in order to get money. Zaccheus belonged to this second class, which is not unknown in our day, including the traffickers in intoxicants, who are known to-day in England very appropriately as "publicans." There has always been a certain degree of deference paid to wealth however obtained, but increasingly the public is asking about a man's riches not only, "How much?" but, "How gotten?"

Once upon a time an ass was laden with idols, which were to be conveyed to a temple in another part of the city. As it passed along the streets people threw themselves on their knees, others strewed the way with flowers, and the air rang with shouts. The animal, seeing the adoration of the people, refused to budge another inch; whereupon the master belabored him with a stout stick, saying: "Go on, you donkey, it is not you they are worshiping, but the burden you carry." So when men of ill-gotten wealth are puffed up and flattered by the attention paid them let conscience say, "It is not you they are worshiping, but the burden of gold which you carry."

But the sequel shows that even a Zaccheus is not without a conscience to appeal to. When such a man repents and reforms it is a needed assurance that we might, if we would, bring to Christ the bunco steerers and green goods men and stock gamblers.

And he sought to see Jesus. There was probably nothing but curiosity in the effort of Zaccheus to see Jesus. The fame of his miracles had come from far and had been intensified by the report of the miracles upon Bartimeus and others just performed at the city gate. With no more spiritual interest than prompts a rich man to-day to hire a window to see a parade, Zaccheus climbed a sycamore tree by the roadside to get a good view of this wonder-worker. So to-day curiosity or some equally shallow motive—perhaps the desire to be in the company of some friend—has brought many a man to the place where the call of Christ would be heard and heeded. Of the three thousand converted at Pentecost not one came to be saved, but all for the social enjoyment of a national holiday. Of the young men converted in the Y. M. C. A., a great majority, no doubt, join it for the gymnasium, the games, the baths, and the evening classes in which they "learn more" to "earn more." Let us study how to get the Za cheus of to-day near the moving current Christian influences. There is a golden mea between "sensations" and stagnation.

Zaccheus make haste and come down. Th divine Shepherd "calleth his own sheep b name," even his wandering sheep. Even th eminent sinner was known by name to Chris Probably he was the greatest sinner in the ci in the total of his frauds, but it was a gre Saviour who was passing by. Despite the "s of faces" all about him, Jesus "looked u straight into that one eager face and beyor it into that sinful heart, which was convicte by that penetrating look. It was a case sudden conversion, and as sincere as sudde Jesus had called him "Zaccheus," a nam meaning the just, the name his father gav him when, in his innocent childhood, h dreamed of what his boy was to be. Ho many a boy has thus contradicted in his li the ideal his parents had set up for him i some saintly name. Many a "John Wesley many a "John Knox" is in jail, and many mo ought to be. Perhaps Jesus put such a pit ful, awakening accent on the name as mad Zaccheus think how false he had been to h mother's prayers and teachings and h father's hopes. In any case a day with Jesu roused his seemingly dead conscience to fu activity. His repentance did not end wit words and tears, but proved itself by four-fol estitution to those he had wronged, and hen, as if to cover beyond question all those ases that death or removal had put out of is reach, he solemnly dedicated half his ealth to the poor at large.

epentance with estitution

Preachers and teachers should make the most of this conscience-stirring in- tance of restitution. Manifestly even in accheus there had been two men at war, raging the old warfare of light and darkness, f flesh and spirit (Rom. 7 : 19 ff).

The fabled Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde are ctualized in the life of every individual. The ing and the peasant, the learned and the un- earned, all have the same experience. An xchange tells the following incident which illustrates our thought: "An old Indian once asked a white man to give him some tobacco for his pipe. The man gave him a loose handful from his pocket. The next day he came back and asked for the white man. 'For,' said he, 'I found a quarter of a dollar among the tobacco.'

"'Why don't you keep it?' asked a bystander.

"'I've got a good man and a bad man here,' said the Indian, pointing to his breast, 'and the good man say it is not mine; give it back to the owner.' The bad man say, 'Never mind, you got it, and it is your own now.' The good man say, 'No, no; you must not keep it.' So I don't know what to do, and I think to go to sleep, but the good and bad men keep talking all night, and trouble me; and now I bring the money back, I feel good.'"

Even the Talmud teaches that in restitution of money wrongfully obtained, in order to escape the divine wrath, we must give conscience most generous benefit of the doubt. Having restored to individuals what we have fraudulently obtained, let us not also reject that devilish theory that soulless corporations can neither cheat nor be cheated, and include in our restitution the government or any association we have wronged. No doubt the dedication of half of Zaccheus' goods to the poor at large was really partly restitution, which suggests that others should learn from his case that justice to the poor is better than tardy restitution in charities.

In any case this bountiful beneficence of Zaccheus comes before us with beautiful fitness in this Christmas month, which celebrates his gifts, who, "though he was rich, for our sakes became poor." Zaccheus loved his poor neighbors literally as himself in this equal division with them of his riches. He had suddenly learned what so many in our better day have not, that he was in the world, as one has said, not for what there was in it for him, but for what there was in him for it. As we feed the outcasts of society on Christmas with generous hand, let this story of Zaccheus give us new faith in the possibility of soul relief as well.

THANKSGIVING DOXOLOGIES

...For Blessings Hereditary and Climatic

PRONUNCIAMENTOS of President and Governors call us to anthem, and mention particular auses of national gratitude, but they annot mention one-half of our blessings. n our imagination we see the wonderful rops of the year, and while we look at he lustrous cotton, we fancy we see the usky toilers of the Georgian plantation, he snowy globes shining amid dark green eaves, and the men, now sweltering in he noonday sun and now at the evening ime making the cabins resound with usic and dance. Cotton—suggestive of armth and wealth, comfort and interna- ional commerce. Blessed be the name f Eli Whitney, who invented the cotton in, and of Richard Arkwright, who howed one spinner how to do the work of ne hundred and thirty spinners. While e look at the corn, we see the plowing nd the planting, four grains in a hill, and he shooting up of the green blades, and nally the corn-silk and the cutting frolic, nd hear the shout of the huskers. Good ld-fashioned corn! What would we do vithout it? Blessings upon the head of hose who planted it, cut it, shucked it, usked it and garnered it. While we look t the sugar cane, we see the hard work mong the Southern fields of long stalks, nd the mills pressing out the saccharine, nd remember that all our exquisite yrups had a plain ancestry of molasses, nd we see all over the land the gay groups of candy pulling, and wonder if he painted banks of modern confectionery re half as healthy as the dark-colored iquids that come up from the sugar plantations of Louisiana. And how suggestive the wheat—the monarch of all grains, the sublimest thing on earth—a ripe wheat field. Sown before winter and enriched by the snows as a Christian by chilling sorrow, and waving its green in he early spring, and then under ripening benediction of sun and shower preparing ts invitation, embossed with gold, to the farmers to come and get bread and feed the world's hunger. Minnesota wheat fields. Dakota wheat fields. Illinois wheat fields. Lancaster wheat fields. Long Island wheat fields. A planet girdled and sandaled and coroneted with wheat fields. And who sees in imagination the piled up apples without thought of the orchard and the time when we used to shake the trees for them, and crunch enough in one afternoon to bring into use all our mother's medical skill before morning. Apples, supposed to be the kind of fruit that grew on Eden's forbidden tree, because of the temptation we all felt in boyhood to steal apples. But boys should not steal apples. An apple Solomon's favorite fruit, for with the fruits of all zones growing in his conservatory, he cried out: "Comfort me with apples." And there is the much satirized pumpkins, robed in color like the day dawn, with great round corporations, the aldermen among vegetables, so fat that they are as tall when they sit down as when they stand up. What would New England do without the pumpkin—mother of queenly pies and patron of the last century of thanksgiving?

THANKSGIVING IN THE ARMY

AND now clear out of the old channels of conventional Thanksgiving, I call to mind something you may have forgotten or never thought of. Among the things to be grateful for are our hereditary blessings. Have you ever thanked God for good parents? But for the raising we got, we would have probably been in poorhouse or penitentiary. Show me the cradle and I will make a prophecy of everything clear on to the grave. What a glorious race of old folks those who passed off in the last generations. Talk about your doctors, allopathic, homeopathic, hydropathic and eclectic. I believe in all of them, but was there ever a better doctor than your old-fashioned country mother? What boneset tea to sweat out colds! What catnip to soothe the restlessness! What herbs for the whole race of distempers! What hot pillow for toothaching face until the village doctor drove up the lane, and with one jerk of the terrific turnkey took out the tooth, leaving you under the impression that jaw and head and shoulders had gone with it! Was there any one like your old mother to poultice without hurting a run-around finger, or make a boil stop boiling? You were not ashamed to let her see you cry, though you were so big the world would have called you a cry-baby. I take the responsibility of the medical colleges for conferring degrees, and I doctorate all that generation of mothers, bestowing on them M.D.—Maternal Doctor. Would that we could have treated them as well as they treated us! for, perhaps, we might have kept them with us, and to-day at our Thanksgiving table those vanished faces might have beamed upon us among the home group, and we might have taken from them one more blessing before their final departure. Some say they would not bring the departed to this poor world again if they could; but I would be willing to risk it, and if I could bring back to your dining hall the two old folks to-day, I would put them one at each end of your table, and you and your wife could afford to stand and wait on them while the celestial visitors tarried in your dwelling. But I must quit this, for it blurs my eyes with something that makes it difficult to write these reminiscences. Glorious race of old folks! Have placed where you can see them their staff, their spectacles, their Bible, and thank God that your manhood and your womanhood had such advantageous launching.

BUT pass now for Thanksgiving purposes from blessings hereditary to blessings atmospheric. Have you bethought yourself of the fact that the most of the millions of the human race are in climates frigid or torrid or horrid? Take up the map of the world and thank God that you are so far off from arctic icebergs on the one side and the five-foot long cobras on the other. For what multitudes of the human race life is an arctic expedition. Underground huts. Nine months of winter. Immeasurable barrenness. Life a prolonged shiver. Our front door steps on a January night genial compared to their climate. Ask some Arctic explorers about the luxuries of life around the North Pole. Instead of killing so many brave men in polar expeditions, we had better send messengers to persuade those inhabitants of polar climes to say good-by to the eternal snows and abandon those realms of earth to the walrus and white bear, and shut up those gates of crystal and come down into a realm where the thermometer seldom drops below zero. What must life be at Nova Zembla, every breath freezing on the beard? Oh, the beauties of Baffin's Bay—only six weeks in the year open. What a delightsome thing when they milk their cows and milk nothing but ice cream! Let all those who like yourselves live between thirty and fifty degrees of north latitude, thank God, and have sympathy for the vast populations of the hemispheres who freeze between sixty and eighty degrees of latitude.

THEN compare our atmosphere with the heated air, infested with reptilian and insectile life, in which most of the human race suffer. Think of Cochin-China, and Ethiopia, and India. Travelers tell you of the delicious orange groves, but ask them about the centipedes. They tell of the odor of the forests, but ask them about the mosquitoes. They tell you of the rich plumage of the birds, but ask them about the malarias. They tell you of the fine riders, but ask them about the Bedouins. They tell you of the broad piazzas, but ask them about the midnights with thermometer at an insufferable 110. Vast cities of the torrid clime without sewerage and without cleansing; crowded and packed and piled up wretchedness, and all discomfort. What beautiful hyenas! What fascinating scorpions! What pleasurable tarantulas! What captivating lizards! What wealth of bugs! What an opportunity to study anatomy and herpetology! What a chance to look into the open countenance of the pleasing crocodile! Hundreds of millions in such surroundings. I would rather live in a house with two rooms in these regions than to live in the torrid lands and own all Mexico, all Brazil, all Hindustan, all Arabia, and all China; in other words, I would rather live between thirty and fifty degrees of latitude and own nothing, than to live between ten and twenty degrees of latitude and own everything. Forty years of life here are worth more than eighty years of life anywhere else. You have here the furs of the arctic and the fruits of the torrid, with all the pleasurable respiration of the temperate. God seems to say, "Come down, north wind, with a tonic, and come up, south wind, with a balm, and mix a healthful draught for the lungs of this American nation." Sons and daughters of the temperate zone, thank God for your surroundings. For multitudes of people it was a disaster that they were born at all. In fiction a story is told of one Pantagruel, who came into the world accompanied by eighty-one sellers of salt, each leading a mule by a halter; nine dromedaries laden with ham and smoked tongue; seven camels laden with eels; besides twenty-five wagons full of leeks, garlics, and onions. Only think of one arriving in this world under such embarrassing circumstances. But that fiction is only suggestive of real people that you and I have known, who seem to have been overweighted from their start in life, as by their stubbornness leading forth quite as many mules, by their uncertainty of action quite as many eels, by their offensiveness quite as many garlics, by their cloudy utterances quite as much smoked tongue. In this Thanksgiving week not only praise God for the blessings bestowed, but for dispositions capable of appreciating them.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

The Gadabouts

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Jeremiah 2: 36: . . . . } Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way?

HOMELY is the illustration by which this prophet of tears deplores the vacillation of the nation to whom he wrote. Now they wanted alliance with Egypt, and now with Assyria, and now with Babylon, and now they did not know what they wanted, and the behavior of the nation reminded the prophet of a man or woman who, not satisfied with home life, goes from place to place gadding about, as we say, never settled anywhere or in anything, and he cries out to them: "Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way?"

Well, the world has now as many gadabouts as it had in Bible times, and I think that that race of people is more numerous now than it ever was. Gadabouts among occupations, among religious theories, among churches, among neighborhoods, and one of the greatest wants of the church and the world is more steadfastness and more fixedness of purpose.

It was no small question that Pharaoh put to Jacob and his sons when he asked, "What is your occupation?" Getting into the right occupation not only decides your temporal welfare, but may decide your eternal destiny. The reason so many men and women are dead failures, is because, instead of asking God what they ought to be or do, they, through some vain ambition or whimsicality, decide what they ought to be. Let me say to all young men and young women in homes, or in school, or college, do not go gadding about among to find what you are fitted for, but make humble and direct appeal to God for direction.

While seeking divine guidance in your selection of a lifetime sphere, examine your own temperament. The phrenologist will tell you your mental proclivities. The physiologist will tell you your physical temperament. Your enemies will tell you your weaknesses. If you are, as we say, nervous, do not become a surgeon. If you are cowardly, do not become an engineer. If you are hoping for a large and permanent income, do not seek a governmental position. If you are naturally quick-tempered, do not become a minister of the Gospel, for while any one is disadvantaged by ungovernable disposition, there is hardly any one who enacts such an incongruous part as a mad minister. Can you make a fine sketch of a ship or rock or house or face? Be an artist. Do you find yourself humming cadences, and do the treble clef and the musical bars drop from your pen easily, and can you make a tune that charms those who hear it? Be a musician. Are you born with a fondness for argument? Be an attorney. Are you naturally a good nurse, and especially interested in the relief of pain? Be a physician. Are you interested in all questions of traffic and in bargain-making, are you apt to be successful on a small or large scale? Be a merchant. Do you prefer country life, and do you like the plow, and do you hear music in the rustle of a harvest field? Be a farmer. Are you fond of machinery, and are turning wheels to you a fascination, and can you follow with absorbing interest a new kind of threshing machine hour after hour? Be a mechanic. If you enjoy analyzing the natural elements and a laboratory could entertain you all day and all night, be a chemist. If you are inquisitive about other worlds, and interested in all instruments that would bring them nearer for inspection, be an astronomer. If the grass under your feet and the foliage over your head and the flowers which shake their incense on the summer air are to you the belles lettres of the field, be a botanist. If you have no one faculty dominant and nothing in your make-up seems to point to this or that occupation, shut yourself up in your own room, get down on your knees, and reverently ask God what he made you for and tell him that you are willing to do anything he wishes you to do. Before you leave that room you will find out. For the sake of your usefulness and happiness and your temporal and eternal welfare, do not join that crowd of people who go gadding about among businesses and occupations, now trying this and now trying that, and never accomplishing anything.

Last summer a man of great genius died. He had the talents of twenty men in surgical directions, but he did not like surgery, and he Wanted to be a Preacher.

He could not preach. I told him so. He tried it on both sides of the sea, but he failed, because he turned his back on that magnificent profession of surgery, which has in our time made such wonderful achievement that it now heals a broken neck, and by the X ray explores the temple of the human body as if it were a lighted room. For forty years he was gadding about among the professions. Do not imitate him. Ask God what you ought to be, and he will tell you. It may not be as elegant a style of work as you would prefer. It may callous and begrime your hands, and put you in suffocating atmosphere, and stand you shoulder to shoulder with the unrefined, and may leave your overalls the opposite of aromatic, but remember that if God calls you to do one thing you will never be happy in doing something else.

All the great successes have been gained through opposition and struggle. Charles Goodyear, the inventor, whose name is now a synonym all the world over for fortune added to fortune, waded many years chin-deep through the world's scorn, and was thrust in debtor's prison, and came with his family to the verge of starvation, but continued his experiments with vulcanized rubber until he added more than can be estimated to the world's health and comfort, as well as to his own advantage. Columbus and John Fitch, and Stephenson and Robert Bruce, and Cyrus W. Field and five hundred others were illustrations of what can do. "Hard pounding," said the Duke of Wellington at Waterloo, "Hard pounding, gentlemen; but we will see who can pound the longest." Yes, my friends, that is the secret, not flight from obstacles in the way, but "who can pound the longest." The child had it right when attempting to carry a ton of coal, a shovel full at a time from the side-walk to the cellar, and some one asked her, "Do you expect to get all that coal in with that little shovel?" And she replied, "Yes, sir, if I work long enough." By the help of God, choose your calling and stick to it. The gadabouts are failures for this life, to say nothing of the next.

Tenacity and Pluck

There are many who exhibit this frailty in matters of religion. They are not sure about anything that pertains to their soul or their eternal destiny. Now they are Unitarians, and now they are Universalists, and now they are Methodists, and now they are Presbyterians, and now they are nothing at all. They are not quite sure that the Bible was inspired, or, if inspired, whether the words or the ideas were inspired, or whether only part of the Book was inspired. They think at one time that the story in Genesis about the Garden of Eden is a history, and the month after they think it is an allegory. At one time they think the Book of Job describes what really occurred, but the next time they speak of it they call it a drama. Now they believe all the miracles, but at your next interview they try to show how these scenes had nothing in them supernatural, but can be accounted for by natural causes. Gadding about among religious theories, and never satisfied. All the evidence is put before them, and why do they not render a verdict? If they cannot make up their mind with all the data put before them they never will. There are all the archæological confirmations of the Bible brought to view by the "Palestine Exploration Society;" there are the bricks of Babylon, the letter "N" impressed upon them—"N" for Nebuchadnezzar, showing that he was not a myth—the further goes, the more is revealed of that most wonderful city of all time. Professor Hilprecht, of the University of Pennsylvania, presents us tablets found in the far East ratifying and explaining Scriptural passages which were before in mystery. As the builders in Jerusalem to-day dig for the foundation of new houses they turn up with their pickaxes the ashes of the animals that were used for burnt offerings in the temple ages ago, demonstrating the truth of the Bible story about the sacrifices of lambs and heifers and pigeons. There is the history by Josephus, describing on uninspired page, scenes which the Bible depicts. On the banks of the Dead Sea there are pieces of the very brimstone that fell in the sulphurous storm that destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah. Make up your mind whether the Bible is a glorious revelation of God or the worst imposition of the centuries. Why go gadding about among infidels, atheists and deists, asking questions, and surmising and guessing about the authority and value of a book which involves the infinities? It is either a good book or a bad book. If it be a bad book you do not want it in your house, nor have your children contaminated with its teachings. If it is a good book your eternal happiness depends upon the adoption of its teachings. Once and forever make up your mind whether it is the book of God or the book of villainous pretenders.

So, also, many are unfixed in regard to their spiritual condition, and day after day, and year after year go gadding about among hopes and Fears and Anxieties.

They sing with great emphasis that old hymn which we have all sung:

'Tis a point I long to know,
Oft it causes anxious thought;
Do I love the Lord or no?
Am I his or am I not?

Why do you not find out whether you are his or not? There are all the broad invitations of the Gospel. Accept them. There are all the assurances. Apply them. There are all the hopes of pardon and heaven. Adopt them. There is the King's highway. Start on it. Traveling any road, you are not satisfied until you have found out whether it is the right road or the wrong road, and you climb up in the darkness to read the words on the finger-board at the roadside to see if it be the right road, and if it be the wrong road you cross over to the right road. If you are on the sea you want to know into what port you will run, or upon what rocks you are in danger of crashing. This moment you have all the information pointing to the road that terminates at the gate of the Golden City, and the voyage that anchors in the haven of eternal rest. Why go on guessing when you have all the facts before you? You ought to know by examination of chart and compass and thermometer in what latitude and longtitude you are sailing, whether in the arctic or the tropics. A man who does not know whether or not he is a Christian, is like a man who does not know whether he is a millionaire or a pauper. Better go to the records and find out. The Scriptures are the records. If you cannot there read your title it is because you have no title, and you ought to begin anew. Start a new prayer; sing a new song; open a new experience.

Vagabondage

So, alas! There are those who gad about among particular churches. No pastor can depend on them for a single service. At some time when he has prepared a sermon, after all prayer and all research, putting nerve and muscle and brain and soul into its every paragraph, these intermittent attendants are not there to hear it. While an occasional absence is excusable for the gratification of s wish to hear that which is consecrate religiously oratoric in some other pu when the pastor of a church with his calls the roll of attendance, by your ence in the old place practically ans saying: "I am here to get the benefi all the useful thoughts you may utter. of all the hymns you may give out, an all the prayers you may offer. I, a sol of Jesus Christ, am in my own plac the company, in the battalion, in the ment, and when you command 'Mar ! will march, and when you comm 'Halt!' I will halt, and when you o 'Ground arms!' I will ground arms."

But, oh, how the gadabouts injure churches! Instead of staying in t own prayer-meeting or Sunday Sch they afflict other prayer-meetings Sunday Schools. I meet them on e street going the wrong way on Sun morning or evening, and I accost ther the words of the text: "Why gaddest t about so much to change thy way?"

Seeking Happiness

My text also addresses those wh search of happiness are going hither yonder looking for that which they not. Their time is all taken up "musicales," and "progressive euchr and teas, and yellow luncheons, and homes," and dances, and operas, and atres; and, instead of finding happin they get pale cheeks, and insomnia, indigestion, and neuralgia, and exh tion, and an abbreviated lifetime. Ther more splendid womanhood sacrifice that way in our cities than in any ot way. The Judgment Day only can rev the awful holocaust of jangled nerves, the suicidal habits of much of our so life. The obituary of such reads well, the story is suppressed about how t got their death while standing in attir gauze, waiting for the carriage on a night, on the front steps. While in th lifetime they possessed all the ability the relief of pain and impoverishment, they have no time for visitation of poor, or to win the blessing of such comes upon those who administer to th who are ready to perish. Enough flow in their dining-halls to bewitch a prin but not one tuft of heliotrope to perfu the room of that rheumatic on the b street, to whom the breath of one flo would be like the opening of the fr door of heaven. Find me one man or woman, who in all the rounds of pleas and selfishness, has found a piece of ha ness as large as that half dollar which benevolent and Christ-like soul puts i the palm of the hand of that mother wh children are crying for bread. Queen V toria, riding in triumph through Lond at her jubilee, was not so sublime a fig as Queen Victoria in a hut near Balmo Castle reading the New Testament t poor dying man. Let all the gadabo for happiness know that in kindness a usefulness and self-abnegation are to found a satisfaction which all the gaiet of the world aggregated cannot afford.

Among the race of gadabouts are the who neglect their homes in order that th may attend to institutions that are really cellent and do not so much ask for help demand it. I am acquainted, as you a with women who are members of so ma boards of direction of

Benevolent Institutions,

and have to stand at a booth in many fairs, and must collect funds for many orphanages, and preside at so ma philanthropic meetings, and are expected be in so many different places at the san time, that their children are left to t care of irresponsible servants, and if t little ones waited to say their prayers their mother's knee they would never s their evening prayers at all. Such woman makes her own home so unattrac ive that the husband spends his eveni at the club house or the tavern. T children of that house are as thorough orphan as any of the fatherless and mothe less little ones gathered in the orphana for which that gadabout woman is toilin so industriously. By all means let Chri tian women foster charitable institution and give them as much of their time they can spare, but the first duty of th mother is the duty she owes to her hom s long as life shall last. How they atched in time of sickness and always ave the medicine at the right time. and ut for their vigilance there are members f our families now living who would long go have disappeared from the home ircle! Blessed the ships that brought ıose employees to our shores! Blessed ıe day when they entered our house-olds! And who will ever do justice to ıose who were affectionately called, and believe are still called the "mammies" f the South? I have had Governors and enators of the United States with tears ı their eyes talk to me about those old olored women of the South, who rocked ıem in their cradles and bound up their ounds when they got hurt, and wept ith them at graves, and looked in from ıe hall door at the weddings, and greeted ıem home from college or from the wars ith motherly endearment. Ask those ho know them best about those old ammies. We have all had in our em-loyment those so near and dear to us ıat we went to them in childhood and ld them all our griefs and all our joys, nd they sympathized with copious tears nd resounding laughter.

But no one can take a mother's place, nd it is an awful mistake that that mother ıakes who sacrifices r any meeting, however important, or ny hospital, however merciful, or any utside beneficence, however glorious and rand. Not understanding this, we mis-ke when we try to give statistics as to ow many Christians there are in our hurches and in the world. We under-tate the facts. We look over our church udiences on the Sabbath or our week-ight service, and conclude that they rep-esent the amount of piety in that neigh-orhood. Oh, no! There are many most onsecrated souls that are not found in hurches. Look into those houses with rge families of children and little or no ired help. For much of the year there someone ill, and a special, guardian are is requisite. How much time can ıat mother give to churches and prayer-ieetings when most of the family are own with scarlet fever or have colds ıat threaten now one kind of disease and ow another? That mother watching at ome as much pleases the Lord as the mother who at church takes the sacrament, or in the mission school tells the waifs of the street how they may become sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. That mother at home is deciding the destiny of the state by the way she leads that boy into right thinking and acting, and is deciding the welfare of some future home by the example she is setting that girl; and though the world does not appreciate the unobserved work, heaven watches and rewards. On the other hand, you have known women who are off at meetings humanitarian and philanthropic, planning for the destitute and the outcast, while their own children went unwashed and unkempt, their garments needing repairs, their manners impudent, and themselves a general nuisance to the community in which they live.

Home Duties

Crippled Children

The book of Samuel gives a photograph of Mephibosheth lame in both feet. When we see any one lame in one foot or lame in both feet we always wonder by what accident he was lamed. Perhaps it may have been in battle for his country, or he may have been run over by some reckless driver, or some explosion did the damage. So you wonder how Mephibosheth became lame in both feet. The Bible, for a good reason, gives us the particulars. It tells us that when he was a child his nurse dropped him. She must have dropped him very hard, for he never again got over the effect of that fall. Long after the accident we find him at King David's table, but still our attention is called to the fact that his feet were crippled, though so long before his nurse dropped him. And, mark you that to-day in all departments of life there are those crippled in habits, crippled in morals, crippled for all time. The accident happened in this way: Their mothers were gadabouts and neglected their homes, and the work of training them was given over to incompetent nurses, and the nurses let them fall into bad habits, told them depraving stories, and gave them wrong notions of life, and practically ruined them. But as Mephibosheth was taken by King David into the palace and seated at the royal table, so by the grace of the heavenly King these unfortunate ones may yet be seated at the King's table in the King's palace, though the nurses did drop them so that morally they were lame in both feet.

One bad habit these gadabouts, masculine or feminine, are sure to get, and that is of scandal-distribution. They hear so many deleterious things about others, and see so much of wrong behavior that they are loaded up and loaded down with the faults of others, and they have their eyes full, and their ears full, and their hands full, and their mouths full of defamation. The woman who is endowed of gossip can so easily untie her bonnet strings and sit down to spend the afternoon. A man can afford you a cigar as a retainer if you will patiently hear all he has to say about those who cannot pay their debts, or are about to fail, or are guilty of moral mishap, or have aroused suspicion of embezzlement. All gadabouts are pedlers, who unpack in your presence their large store of nux vomica and nightshade. Such gadabouts have little prospect of heaven. If they got there they would try to create jealousy among the different ranks of celestials, and make trouble among the heavenly neighbors, and start quarrels seraphic, and would be on perpetual run, now down this street and now up that, now in the house of many mansions, and now in the choir of the temple, and now on the walls, and now in the gates, until they would be chased down and pushed out into the pandemonium of backbiters and slanderers, after Jeremiah had addressed them in the words, "Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way?"

Now, what is the practical use of the present discourse? This: Whereas so many have ruined themselves and ruined others by becoming gadabouts among occupations, among religious theories, among churches, among neighborhoods; therefore, resolved, that we will concentre upon what is right thought and and waste no more time in vacillations and indecisions and uncertainties, running about in places where we have no business to be. Life is so short we have no time to play with it the spendthrift. Find out whether the Bible is true, and whether your nature is immortal, and whether Christ is the divine and only Saviour, and whether you must have him or be discomfited, and whether there will probably ever be a more auspicious moment for your becoming his adherent, and then make this twelve o'clock at noon of November 25, 1900, the most illustrious minute that you will ever have passed since the day of your birth until the ten millionth cycle of the coming eternity, because by complete surrender of thought and will and affection and life to God through Jesus Christ you became a new man, a new woman, a new soul, and God the Father, and God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, and all angeldom, cherubim, and seraphim, and archangel became your allies.

Found among the papers of the learned Samuel Johnson, was a prayer inscribed with the words: "When my eye was restored to its use;" and it is a great moment when we get over our and gain spiritual eyesight. That is a moment from which we may well date everything. All the glory of Henry II., of France, vanished when in a tournament a lance extinguished his eye; and the worst disaster that can happen to us is to have the vision of our soul put out. If you have gone wrong so far, now go right. If the morning and noon of your life have been a moral defeat, make the evening of your life a victory. The battle of Marengo, lost at three o'clock in the afternoon, was gloriously won at six; and in your life and mine it is not too late to achieve something worthy of an immortal. Start right, and keep on. Do not spend too much time in tacking ship. David felt the importance of fixedness of purpose when he cried out: "My heart is fixed! O God, my heart is fixed!" In that state you will feel the placidity which an old friend of mine put into rhythm:

God holds the key of all unknown,
And I am glad;
If other hands should hold the key,
Or if he trusted it to me,
I might be sad.

I cannot read his future plan
But this I know,
I have the smiling of his face
And all the refuge of his grace.

Enough; this covers all my want,
And so I rest;
For what I cannot, he can see,
And in his care I sure shall be Forever blest.

This Woman Founded a Church

MRS. SUSAN BELL
Who Founded the Church Fifty Years Ago

JOY bells rang out in Hoboken, N. J., on the days from November 11 to 16, announcing the golden jubilee of the First Reformed Church in that city. This church has a remarkable history, being the only one in the state, if not in the whole Union, that has the distinction of having been founded by a woman. Mrs. Susan Bell, who founded the church fifty years ago, is now a very old lady, but hale and cheerful, and with a keen zest in everything that relates to the progress and well-being of her great project. She has been a constant attendant at the jubilee services, taking a part in each day's programme.

The semi-centenary celebration began Sunday morning, November 11, with a reminiscent historical address by the pastor, Rev. Conrad Bluhm. Services and meetings were held every succeeding day and evening, closing the following Friday with a roll-call of all members who had united with the church since it was organized, after which a banquet was served. The edifice was appropriately decorated, and at each meeting the most cordial tributes were paid to Mrs. Bell, while from New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania congratulations were sent to her by members who could not be present.

Half a century ago, when Mrs. Bell came to Hoboken, where she has lived ever since, there was no church of her faith in the town. The Rev. Alexander Clemons, a Presbyterian minister, suggested to Mrs. Bell that she should try to establish a church. She said she would do all in her power, and promised that she would speak with her neighbors on the subject. The result was that a church was started with twelve charter members, eight joining by certificate from other churches and four by confession of faith. From this modest beginning, with its twelve humble disciples, there has sprung a great and glorious work.

The first place of worship was the old engine-house on Washington and First streets, where the City Hall now stands. Later, a brick church was built in Church Square Park, on property donated by Mr. Edwin Stevens, who intended that it should be a general home for the churches of the town. After the incorporation of the city, the question arose as to the title of the property, and the churches were forced to abandon their plots. Mrs. Bell again set to work and a lot was purchased on Hudson street, and the corner-stone of a new church laid August 7, 1855, and dedicated November 25 of that year. This church was patronized by many of the foremost citizens of the town, and for years was known as the leading church home of Hoboken.

THE FIRST REFORMED CHURCH OF HOBOKEN, N. J.

Its membership was greatly depleted by the Civil War and its halcyon days seemed to be ended. Then the building was destroyed by fire, nothing but the pulpit and Bible being saved. In the early nineties a plot was secured on Bloomfield street between Eighth and Ninth, and the present edifice erected at a cost of $35,000. About three years ago there were fifty active members; now there are one hundred and fifty.

During the church's half century career no less than fifteen ministers have served in its pulpit. Its apparent decline at one time was partly due to the fact that the pulpit of the Reformed Church seemed to be the stepping-stone to pulpits of greater influence and emolument in New York and other cities. There were internal differences, too, in the fold, and the church seemed fated to waste away under its many trials and difficulties. But from the gloom of those days the Reformed Church of Hoboken has in more recent years emerged into a new and more vigorous existence and a greater usefulness than ever before. Its "golden jubilee" is a significant expression of the earnest labors and heartfelt work which was started by Mrs. Susan Bell, so many years ago.

Around the World with Josiah Allen's Wife

CHAPTER LII.

ILLUSTRATION BY H. M. PET

SAMANTHA'S THANKSGIVING

I DON'T spoze that from Maine to Florida, or from Jonesville to San Francisco there wuz a happier Thanksgivin' party than we had. Havin' such sights and sights of things to be thankful for, I laid out as I say to begin to be thankful before candle light in the mornin' and keep it up all day long till bed time, and so I did.

It wuz a lovely day, the sun shone into our bedroom winder through the beautiful knit fringe, made by my own hands, and rested on me lovin'ly as I combed my hair in front of the lookin'-glass. There had been a fall of snow the night before, as if nater had done her best for the occasion and spread her white ermine down for the feet of the angel, Thanksgivin'.

Philury got breakfast most ready by candle light, and I'd been bein' thankful ever since she put the tea kettle over.

"Josiah," sez I, "do you realize what a glorious day this is and how much, how much we have to be thankful for?"

He had broke one of his shue strings and wuz bent down breathin' kinder hard and tusslin' with it and his answer wuzn't what I could wished it wuz. But I knowed that it wuz because the blood had rushed to his head. He got it tied up in a few minutes and eat his breakfast with a splendid appetite. Philury had good tender lamb chops and baked potatoes and light muffins and a fragrant cup of coffee, and Josiah recovered his usual flow of sperits before we got half through. And we read together a chapter out of The Book, and Josiah made a prayer full of thankfulness that come from his very heart for the blessings of home and love and all the precious gifts the Father bestowed on us durin' the year.

The children come early and brought some lovely presents to us. We make a practice of givin' presents in our own family Thanksgivin', for it always seemed so kinder appropriate that while we wuz givin' thanks we might just as well give a few more. And their presents to us wuz just what we wanted and ourn to them proved to be just what they wanted. Of course it wuzn't all a happen; we had throwed out hints and perspected round as well as we could before we selected 'em, kinder throwed out the line of wonder and surmises, and ketched opinions and wishes on it.

A Sleighride to Meetin'

At ten A. M. we all got into two big sleighs and went to Jonesville to meetin'. It wuz a union meetin' and Elder White wuz chose to preach the Thanksgivin' sermon. It wuz a beautiful discourse, it come from the depths of a thankful, lovin' Christian heart and went right to ourn.

The party I had invited went home with us from the meetin'-house, Philury had the house all warm and it wuzn't long before we had dinner ready, of course we had got everything cooked we could the day before.

The dinner, though of course I ortn't to say it, but they all said, and of course it must be so, they said it wuz the best Thanksgivin' dinner that wuz ever cooked in this world, and Josiah whispered to me as he helped himself to the third helpin' of turkey and dressin', that he knowed that there never wuz such a meal cooked in Jupiter or Mars or any other planet.

But I whispered back, it wuzn't safe to say such things, sez I. "Most probably they have manny and lots of things we don't know anything about."

"Manny!" sez he, "how would manny show off by the side of this dressin'?" and he took another spunful.

I spoze my dressin' duz go ahead of most though it hain't made me hauty. Well, how happy everybody wuz; how good they looked to me and I to them, I knew it by their liniments. How the children doted on me and their Pa, how dear little Tommy hung round us.

"CHEERS AND BLESSINGS FOLLOWED THE CARRIAGE TILL THEY REACHED THEIR OWN DOOR"

How softened down Arvilly wuz by her happiness in havin' Waitstill back agin, but still she kep' her faculties from rustin', and sold two books that day for presents, and one to Elder Minkley for a Sabbath School prize.

How adorable Waitstill looked in her pretty cashmere gown of pale violet color with white roses at her bosom and belt, she had throwed off her black as a reasonable widder should, I never approved of mournin' for one man whilst weddin' another, that is mournin' in public in crape and weeds. I don't believe she had a black rag on her, she might you know if she had been sly have put a black bindin' on her petticoat or a black pocket. I remember the Widder Doodle did, but I never approved of it. No, mournin' weeds are right in their place, and orange blossoms in theirn, but I never believed in mixin' the two.

Down deep in Waitstill's heart, hid from every eye but the one who made that heart, wuz a place where her thought must retire into now and then and weep. Yes, I knowed that whilst her loyal love and respect and reverence wuz all given to the man she loved, who wuz strong, her thought would anon or oftener have to go into that sombry room and weep for the young lover who wuz weak, but whose weakness would never have blossomed into crime had not his country hung the Sodom apple before his eyes and his weak appetite yielded to it, had overthrown the labor and efforts of years, tempted him with low temptations that had been stronger than love, stronger than religion, stronger than life. All his life long he had fought against inherited tastes as they fought with wild beasts at Ephesus, and he would have come off conqueror had it not been for licensed evils and the weaknesses in high and low places that permitted it to be

Waitstill's Secret Sorrow

Yes, into that closely locked, sombry chamber I knowed that Waitstill would go alone, and stay there for quite a spell. But after a time I mistrusted the sweet peace and happiness of her life would be such that she would go seldomer and make shorter visits when she did go. And its black gloom would be lighted by tones of living love and gleams of light and warmth from tender eyes. And I hoped that the time would come when dimpled baby fingers would gently bar the doorway and she wouldn't go there to stay for any length of time.

Well, the happy company stayed till nine P. M., when they departed with many pleasant and loving words, I being thankful every minute of the time, even when I see 'em drive off. You know sometimes as glad as you are to have company, and as well as you like 'em, you are kinder glad to set down quiet, and think over all the happy time, and rest your head.

Well, the next day after Thanksgivin', early in the afternoon, Josiah said he had got to go over to Jonesville, and proposed that I should ride over with him. He said the mair kinder needed shuein', and sez he, "We might bring Tommy home with us, for there wuzn't any school Saturday, and he could stay over Sunday with us."

It duz seem now as if we can't h settin' a little more store by Tommy t we do by the other grandchildren. Bu better not be told I said it, it would m feelin's amongst the rest.

Well, we made lovely calls on the c dren, and got Tommy who wuz more t willin' to come, and returned home ab ten A. M., Tommy settin' between us a drivin' the mair, Thomas J. and Mag sayin' they would drive over Sunday ni after him and take tea with us.

We stopped at the post-office, a Tommy run in and got three letters me, two on 'em which I opened and re when I first got home, whilst Josiah a Tommy drove over to Deacon Henzy's a errent. As I say I read two on 'em, I of the third one more anon. One of letters wuz from Cousin John Richa who had gone back to Victor workin'. his Lord in his own appointed way, tea ing the young, comfort the aged, and exhortin' t strong, helpin' to bear t burdens of the weak, a doing it all in the na of Him who is invisib waitin' patient till the su mons should be sent h to go home to his o land, for the Bible sez t them that do such thin show plainly that th seek a country."

Fur acrost that da continent from anotl oasis like Victor beginni to be illuminated with t white light beamin' fr the uplifted cross, co a message to me from a other consecrated missi ary and child of Heav Evangeline Noble. S told me of the bless work she wuz doin' Africa and how hap she wuz in it for her M ter wuz with her tellin' h what to do from day to da and she happy in carryi out that work and see the light from heav stream into dark min and souls.

How much store I set l her, I lay out to send h a barrel of things this fa some dried apples, ca ned fruit, good books, piece of rag carpet and crazy quilt, not rari ravin' crazy, but sort beautifully delerious, embroidered wi cat stitch round every block.

Dorothy's Wedding

And the other letter wuz from Mi Meechim. I read Cousin John Richard and Evangeline's, but I put hern on t mantletry piece and thought I wouldn read it till about a hour after dinner, mi trustin' that it would agitate and work m up, so that my food wouldn't set good.

Dorothy's marriage to Robert Stron had took place a week before, but not word had I heard from Miss Meechin and I didn't know what effect the blo had had on her. Josiah and I had bee warmly invited to attend the weddin', bu not feelin' willin' to embark on anothe tower we sent her a pretty present an love, lots and lots of love, and the earnes best wishes of our hearts.

They wuz married in Dorothy's hom in San Francisco, and went immegiatel after the ceremony to their new home i the City of Justice to begin their life wor there. Dorothy had writ me all the parti culars of their marriage. They didn' want any show and display she said, an they took the money they would have ha spend to make a big wedding with a rowd of guests, elaborate dressing, rich ands, music, flowers, etc. They took is money and gave a holiday to the hildren in the City of Justice, a beautiful inner, music and gifts for all.

And they wuz married in a plain, quiet ay in the presence of a few relatives nd close friends, she dressed in a pretty hite muslin (and lookin' sweet as a rose knew, though, of course, she didn't say o). And after a simple lunch, they drove it to their new home. But I hearn, and come straight, too, that the children of he City of Justice, just worshipin' obert Strong as they did, they all on m dressed in white, their pretty heads owned with roses, filled baskets with he sweetest flowers they could find and ent out to meet the young couple beyend he gate. And as they approached, they et' em with rejoicing songs sung in their veet clear voices and scattered roses and veet posies in their path, their bright, appy eyes and smilin' lips givin' 'em just s sweet a greetin'.

A Pretty Home Welcome

And as they entered into the city at inset, the workmen met 'em all dressed holiday attire, and their cheers and lessings followed the carriage till they eached their own door, which wuz banked p with odorous blossoms as high as ever snow drift blocked up the houses in onesville, and they had to fairly wade hrough the sweet posies to git to their oor.

So, surrounded and blessed with love nd rejoicings rising from grateful ador- g hearts, Robert and Dorothy Strong egun their married life. Love and Mercy andin' right by their sides like maids of onor, and Honesty and Justice like sher and best man, usherin' 'em into a seful and happy life of work and toil veetened forever with gratitude and ve. Lovin' each other as dearly as ever man and woman did, lovin' their Lord premely and showing that love in the way he bade his disciples to in caring for and blessing humanity. They begun that day a power of helpful inspiring influences that would bless the world, go through life with 'em and wait on 'em clear through the swellin' flood and lead 'em up onto the other shore from their City of Justice and love here, to that sweet continuing City of Rest and Reward.

I felt well about Robert and Dorothy, yes my heart sung for Joy carryin' the hull four parts, base, altore, bear tone and sulfireno. That is to say the different faculties of my head and heart all jined in and sung together in happiness and made a full orkestry.

You know when you hear of some marriages a part of you is pleased, mebby it is Common Sense, whilst Romance and Fancy has to set dumb and demute. Or mebby Fancy sings whilst cold Reason is spreadin' a wet blanket on her part of the band, chillin' the notes and spilein' the instrument. But here Reason, Romance, Love and Common Sense all jined in together and sung the wedding anthem loud and clear.

But Miss Meechim, I felt dubersome about her; Dorothy didn't mention her in her letter, bein' so took up with Robert and Love, so I spozed. I knowed well how repugnant matrimony wuz to her and how sternly resolved she wuz that Dorothy should go through life a bachelor maid.

I hated to read Miss Meechim's letter, I dreaded it like a dog. How did I know but her great disappointment and crushin' grief to see her hull life work smashed and demolished, had smit her down, and she had passed away writin' my name on a envelope with her last flicker of life and some stranger pen had writ me of the tragedy.

I put the letter up on the mantletry piece and thought I wouldn't read it till about a hour after dinner.

And whilst I wuz gittin' dinner and eatin' it and went about doin' up my work afterwards, I eyed that letter some as a cat eyes a dog kennel and hung off from readin' it. But wantin' to git the hard job over before night sot in, about the middle of the afternoon I read a few verses of Foxe's Book of Martyrs, put two cushions in the rockin' chair, took a swaller of spignut and thorough-o'-wort to kinder hold up my strength, and a few whiffs of camfire, and then I put on my near-to specs, opened the letter with a deep sithe and begun to read. But good land! I needn't have foreboded so; I might have knowed that though her hatred of matrimony wus great, her egotism and self esteem wuz bigger yet.

Miss Meechim's Discovery

The letter stated in glowin' terms her gratefulness to her Creator to think she had a nephew so bound up in her interest and welfare. She said that she had mentioned one day, durin' a severe attack of bilerous colic her fears and forebodin's about Dorothy's future if she should succumb to the colic and leave her alone. She said that it wuzn't a week after this that her nephew and Dorothy had confided to her the fact of their engagement.

Sez she, "Not one word to Dorothy have I mentioned or ever shall mention as to Robert's reasons for sacrificin' himself to ease my mind, and make me more care free. I wouldn't for the world," sez she, "have Dorothy suspect why Robert has made a martyr of himself, and to no one but you, Josiah Allen's wife," sez she, "shall I ever breathe it." But she felt that she could confide in me, and wanted me to know just how it wuz.

So her colossial self esteem carried her through safely, and she wuz as happy as any on 'em. She wuz goin' to live in a little house Robert had bought for her in San Francisco. Martha, the steady English maid, wuz goin' to live with her, as she had proved faithful. And she added a few heart breakin' words of grief and mournfulness about our dear lost Aronette.

And she gin me to understand that sence Aronette's dretful death in New York she had gradually changed her mind about drinking.

I believe Arvilly's talk helped convince her, though Miss Meechim would never own it to her dyin' day, and I d'no as Arvilly would want her to, they just naterally abominate each other.

But 'tennyrate she said she felt that nothing that could lead on to that awful termination and terrible tragedy, could be called genteel. And she said she had had a argument with Rev. Mr. Weakdew, in which they had both got genteelly angry, (tearin' mad I should call it from what she told me of their interview). But I will pass over particulars which filled eight pages of large note paper, the upshot bein' that she had left his church for good and all, and jined a Temperance mission church down in the city. And she wuz now writin' tracts to prove that intemperance wuz the beast with seven horns mentioned in Scripture.

Good land! it has got more than seven horns I believe, and all of 'em dagger sharp and wet with tears and heart's blood.

She expected, she said, that these tracts would make a end to the liquor power and the social evil, and temperance would rain in the world some time durin' the comin' fall.

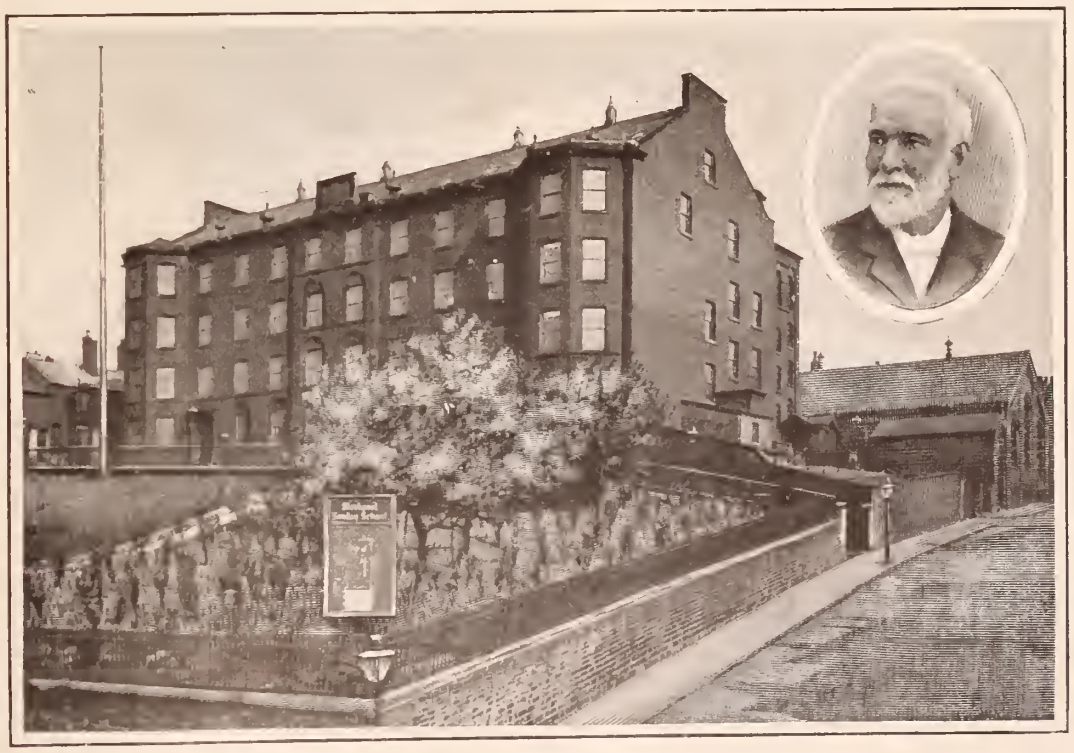
But they won't. These evils are sot too firm on American soil, it will take a greater power than Miss Meechim's tracts to upheave 'em. But I am glad she is sot that way, for every little helps, and the breath of Miss Meechim's converted soul is blowin' the right way and when the hull Christian world shall be converted, the united influence will move along a mighty overwhelmin' power that will sweep these ungodly evils from the face of the earth. Then will come the golden days of peace, righteousness, the reign of the Lord Jesus, for which we pray every day when we say "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven."

[THE END].

· THE · WORLD'S · LARGEST · SUNDAY · SCHOOL ·

MANY stories are told of the journeys made by children and teachers to attend Sunday School, but the record of a rooklyn citizen is probably the most nique in the world. For many years he as gone every summer across the Atlanc to take his place in the nnual parade of the Sunday chool which he joined as a hild seventy-four years ago. Ir. Thomas W. Weathered as long been an American tizen, and, after a career of ctive business work, is now ving in peaceful retirement Brooklyn. But he has ever forgotten the Sunday chool in England in which is first knowledge of Scripure truth was acquired. He as always cherished a love or the old place and the eople, and has enoyed mingling with them nce a year. He now has he distinction of being the ldest living pupil of the chool, and still holds office n the organization as a rustee. His affection for the chool has survived all the hanges of life, and remains ith him in his old age uniminished by newer experinces, by distance, or the pasage of years. The school self has a unique history, nd it certainly can challenge omparison with any other rganization in such a manistation of fidelity as that isplayed by Mr. Weathered nd other gray-haired pupils.

Six miles from Manchester nd thirty from Liverpool is he manufacturing town of tockport, one of the great hives of he cotton industry, which fill the warehouses of the city which has the soubriuet of "Cottonopolis" with its staple f trade. It is by no means a beautiful own. Lying partly in Cheshire and partly in Lancashire it is near some of the most charming scenes, but the artistic eye regards it as a blotch on the landscape. It is made up of huge factories with tall chimneys and dull houses in which the operatives live. It is a depressing town to live in, for the chimneys catch every passing cloud and there are few days, even when other parts of the country are enjoying fine weather, that the Stockport citizen can safely venture abroad without his umbrella. But the people are not depressed by their surroundings. Perhaps their surroundings lead them to think more of that fair land to which "our God is moon and sun." Certain it is that to go into a Stockport Sunday School or prayer-meeting is an experience worth having. The enthusiasm and piety found there are proverbial.



THE FAMOUS SUNDAY SCHOOL AT STOCKPORT, ENGLAND—T. W. WEATHERED, A 74-YEAR-OLD PUPIL

The Sunday School, which is the pride of Stockport's Christian people, and the one to which Mr. Weathered belongs, was founded in 1784, only four years after that momentous day when Robert Raikes, the Gloucester printer, gathered his first class of children for instruction on the Lord's Day. It is probable, therefore, that it is one of the oldest Sunday Schools in Great Britain, if not in the world. It also claims to be the largest in the world, for it has a membership of five thousand pupils. Since its organization it has had a roll of more than 6,100 teachers and 106,000 pupils. Every pupil on admission receives a number, which belongs to him for life. Mr. Weathered says that he has met members of the school in many lands, all of whom could give him their number on the books. One night in 1849, seated around a camp-fire in California, with a band of miners, he was astonished to hear one of them describe the school, and to proudly declare himself a member of it. It was with a thrill of genuine pleasure in the strange meeting that the two men greeted one another as brothers. An interesting feature of its membership is the family one. At the centenary exercises held a few years ago, the front seat was occupied by members of four generations. These were Mrs. Betty Crowley, who became a teacher in 1814, and her children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, twenty in all, who were on the rolls of the school.

The school is practically undenominational. Its meetings are held in the plain red brick building, of which a picture appears on this page. It was erected in 1805, and was enlarged in 1835, and again in 1884. It contains eighty separate class-rooms besides the main room, and is excellently arranged for its purpose. It has also a library of three thousand volumes, many of them the gifts of former pupils, who never forget the school

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

EVENING HYMN

NOW, the day is over
Night is drawing nigh.
Shadows of the evening
Steal across the sky.

Jesus, give the weary
Calm and sweet repose;
With thy tenderest blessing
May our eyelids close.

Grant to little children
Visions bright of Thee.
Guard the sailors tossing
On the deep, blue sea.

Through the long night-watches
May Thine angels spread
Their white wings above me
Watching round my bed.

Thanksgiving

TO offer thanks to a human benefactor is the natural impulse of every generous soul. Only the churl and the ingrate, only the low and the mean refuse and forget thanks. But how do we treat our Father in Heaven? Can we conscientiously claim that in our closet prayers and at the family altar, praise and thanksgiving occupy the largest share in our petitions? Is the dominant note in our spiritual life the note of thanksgiving? Few of us alas! dwell ever in that sweet frame of mind that unconsciously sends praise as incense to the ever blessed Master. "The world is too much with us, late and soon, getting and spending we lay waste our powers." One thing is certain and that is the possibility of cultivating the gratitude of our hearts. In the night when we lie wakeful we may repeat texts of scripture and verses of psalms. We may devote some part of our daily prayers to a definite and positive recital of our individual reasons for thankfulness. And when, as is our nation's historic and beautiful custom, we keep an annual Thanksgiving Day, we may go to church with our families, listen to a sermon, join with the congregation in choral praise, and allow ourselves to be reminded of all God's good gifts to us.

When I was a child, I learned a hymn by Dr. Watts, in which was this couplet:

"I was not born a little slave
To labor in the sun."

On the negative side there are always many things to be grateful for. No illness has laid waste our homes. No little coffin has been carried out of our door. No disgrace has touched our good name. No child of our house has wandered into evil ways. Let us enumerate the negatives and bless God.

On the other hand, there are our children growing up in beauty and strength. There are the honest faces of our dear ones, the venerated faces of aged parents, the baby faces in the cradle, and hovering unseen above the home, the saintly faces of those who have gone before. Every house has its band of guardian angels. Do we thank God for their care of us, that we walk so safely through unsuspected perils?

The harvests have been abundant and the fruit almost an embarrassment. For this, too, we thank God.

Knock at the Door

A cardinal point in good manners in the home is to knock at a closed door. Neither husband nor wife if genuinely courteous will open the door of a private room without first knocking for admission. At the door of a drawing room or a dining room, or other public apartment open to the whole family a knock is not necessary. Well-bred children and young people always observe this rule, and so do well-trained servants. Only boorish persons presume to open a closed door in the home without the ceremony of knocking first. In offices, people must be guided by common sense. Certainly at the door of a private office the incomer would best knock. Large and public offices are not thus defended from intrusion and any one may enter them at will.

Some English Marriage Customs

A writer in an English paper recalls some curious marriage customs. In Yorkshire it was once considered only right for the parson who performed the wedding service to be the first person to kiss the bride, and an amusing story is told of a clergyman who did not understand the local custom. Being unacquainted with the ways of the neighborhood, he was astonished, after performing a marriage in a Yorkshire village, to see the party keep together as if expecting something more. "What are you waiting for?" he asked at last. "Please, sir," was the bridegroom's answer, "ye've no kissed Mollie, an' I musn't do ut until ye have." In Nottingham it was customary "from time immemorial," in the Parish of Wellow, when the banns of marriage was read out, for a person in the church, previously selected by the clerk, to arise and say aloud, "God speed them well!" Whereupon the clerk and congregation responded fervently, "Amen." In Cheshire, elaborate wreaths of flowers were laid down along the path the bride would have to tread to church. These were made by her friends and well-wishers, who brought them after dark on the wedding eve, and vied with one another whose wreath should decorate the doorstep. The bridegroom's path used also to be strewn with fragments indicative of his profession — shavings for carpenter, scraps of cloth for a tailor, bits of leather for a harness-maker, etc.; but it is said that the practice was given up when a highly popular butcher entered the bonds of matrimony, and the only appropriate suggestion offered was that bones should be scattered in his honor.

Photographed From Life

"LITTLE RED RIDING-HOOD"

Old New York

In 1679 a bear was killed in an orchard near what is now Maiden Lane, in our crowded city of New York. Somewhat earlier than this a man who lived near the Bowery offered to give away his property because he disliked to walk through two miles of dense forest to reach his work. In 1673 a regular mail was established between New York and Boston, the letters being carried by a messenger, who made the round trip once a month. The first ferry to Jersey City, then called Paulus Hook, was started in 1763. These bits are taken from a book by Mrs. C.W. Alden, entitled Manhattan, Historic and Artistic.

RED APPLES

"APPLES are ripe and red," she said,
In the sunny orchard roaming.
"I'll hurry home with my rosy store,
Ere the shadows of the gloaming."

"And mother 'll have them served for tea,
And Reuben—I decry him!
He was to gather fruit with me.
My apples I'll deny him!"

She paused—for lo! in her way there stood
A hamper overflowing.
Now, who should place such treasure there?
She looked—her sweet eyes glowing.

"O, Laddie, do you hide from me?
I see—I see you coming!
Together we'll our apples bear
To mother ere the gloaming!"

"Little Red Riding-Hood"

Pet wolves are not uncommon in the Western States, but to have one which possesses the intelligence of the one pictured here, is indeed rare. He was one of the largest specimens of the species to be seen anywhere, and the pet of the family. He followed any of the members around like a dog, and was invaluable as a watcher, giving instant warning of the approach of a stranger. Owing to his enormous size nobody ventured near the premises of the owner, if the wolf seemed in any way inclined to resist, and many a tramp retraced his steps after getting a good look at him in the front yard. He was raised from a cub, and by kind treatment was taught to respect the family, and he was considered extremely peaceable; but one day a visitor started to tease and annoy him beyond endurance until the wolf, in desperation, had to defend himself, and he inflicted severe flesh wounds on his tormentor. The family reluctantly had to shoot him, but his stuffed form now occupies a conspicuous place in a window of the mansion. He belonged to Mr. Zack Mulhall, of Okla., and the family take great pride in telling visitors of the many good qualities possessed by their pet in life. The illustration shows Mr. Mulhall's four-year-old daughter posing as "Little Red Riding-Hood."

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—JOHN P. No; you are not in love, except with yourself.

—EMILY. The field of elocution is overcrowded. Try something else.

—A SUBSCRIBER. As a rule, a young lady should accept no attentions in public, as at a picnic, from a man whom she knows very slightly.

—INDIAN SUMMER. A widow never wears orange blossoms at her second marriage, and dresses by preference richly, but plainly, for that occasion.

—HUGH C. You are most unreasonable. Apologize to your wife at once. With whom shall she attend a concert if you refuse your escort?

—L. R. K. Any bookseller will procure the book you want. Eben Holden is published by the Lathrop Co., Boston. If there is a library in your town, you can get it there.

—SISSY. Pray do not say "gentlemen friends" and "lady friends." In these days we prefer to say men and women. You are so young that you need be in no haste to marry.

—C. M. K. I quite agree with you that the type of old-fashioned wife and mother still exists in ten thousand homes, and that no children are so fortunate as those brought up by good mothers.

—INQUIRER. I would not apologize to a man by letter. Wait until you meet. A woman must not be too abject. Probably the man was as much in fault as she. By all means ask a man to write if you wish to correspond with him.

—B. M. No gentleman would presume to do what you suggest. It is not now customary for a girl to take a man's arm in the street. About inviting your escort in on your return from a party your mother must decide. Certainly you would not do so at a late hour. Yellow-covered novels is a term applied to silly and sentimental fiction; stuff not good to be read by young girls or older ones.

Anxiety in the Palace

ALL Europe is troubled by the news from Livadia, in Southern Russia, that the Emperor Nicholas has been attacked by typhoid fever. His death at this critical period might involve consequences so serious that the statesmen of many countries are disturbed by the possibility of such an event. It appears that a few weeks ago the Emperor caught cold, but as he was at the Livadia palace where the climate is mild, it was thought that he would speedily recover. But the cold turned to influenza and now it has been followed by typhoid. As he is a young man—only thirty-two years old—there would not be much reason for anxiety, were it not that his constitution, never robust, has been weakened by influenza. The bulletins of the physicians indicate that the disease is taking its normal course and so far are reassuring. The situation, however, is deemed sufficiently serious to require the presence of the heir-presumptive to the throne, the Grand Duke Michael, who was on a visit to the court of his grandfather, the King of Denmark, and he has accordingly started for Russia. He is a younger brother of the Emperor and is twenty-two years old. Unless a posthumous son of the Emperor is born, Michael would become Emperor if his brother were to die. Very little is known of him, hence the anxiety that is felt in view of the possibility of his succeeding to the throne. Nor would the situation be improved by the birth of a son to the Emperor, for that would involve a long minority during which rival Russian statesmen might cause divided counsels in the management of imperial affairs. The Emperor has manifested so strong a desire for peace, not only by convening the Peace Conference at the Hague, but by his personal assurances given to Dr. Talmage in an interview last summer, that his life is exceptionally valuable at a time when international jealousies are accentuated and a widespread war might be precipitated by the policy of a less peaceful monarch. We may hope that the prayers which are being offered by his people for the Emperor's recovery will be heard, and that if God sees fit to grant their petition the future life of the Emperor will be even more useful than the past.

He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous, but with kings are they on the throne, and if they be bound in fetters and be holden in the cords of affliction, then he showeth them their work (Job 36:7-9).

An Ancient Palace Exhumed

A wonderful discovery of extraordinary value to the antiquary has been made in the island of Crete. Two explorers named Evans and Hogarth having obtained from the new Governor of the island permission to make excavations, have been searching for a year past. They have uncovered an ancient palace, which is believed to have been the home of Minos. It is in excellent preservation, and its treasures are intact. The throne of the king—possibly Minos himself—has been found, a magnificently carved seat of alabaster. The walls of the halls are covered with bas-reliefs, showing the appearance of the people of those days. They are evidently historical in character, and will probably, under the study of scholars, carry back our knowledge many centuries. In the vaults below the palace a still more important discovery was made. This was a number of ancient chests sealed with many official seals. In the chests were clay tablets bearing inscriptions partly in ancient Greek and partly in cuneiform character. These are evidently the government archives, and will doubtless, when deciphered, be of the utmost interest. They relate to a period of at least three thousand years ago—before Solomon built the temple. Sufficient has already been learned from the records to show that much of the Greek mythology was merely the poetic rendering of actual history. It is significant that in these days when the tendency has been to regard the Scripture history as mythology, this discovery has been made, which indicates that even the stories we have regarded as myths prove to be historical. It is an unexpected reproof to the rashness of the critics and may well strengthen the hands of those who have held with the apostle:

We have not followed cunningly devised fables when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ (II. Peter 1:16).

NICHOLAS II., EMPEROR OF RUSSIA

GRAND DUKE MICHAEL, CZAREWITCH

A New Polar Expedition

Preparations are now being made for the dispatch of a Russian expedition to the Arctic next summer. Last year the Russian government ordered from an English ship-building firm a steamer of a peculiar character. Its hull was unusually strong, and it was equipped with an apparatus for cutting a way through ice. The exact nature of the apparatus is kept secret, but its appearance resembles ploughshares which are attached to the engines and made to revolve. The steamer was tested this spring in the ice in the Baltic and proved entirely successful. It cut a broad channel through a huge ice-field at the rate of nearly three miles an hour. The steamer, the name of which is the Vermak, has been strengthened, and one or two improvements have been made in its machinery, to prepare it for operations in the Arctic. It will be sent North as soon as the ice breaks up, and when it strikes the frozen region around the Pole, an attempt will be made to force a way through. It will be a much harder task than was encountered in the Baltic, but additional power has been put on the steamer. The difficulties in the way of reaching the Pole have put men on their mettle, and there is little doubt that very soon they will all be overcome. Would that the same earnestness and intense effort were displayed in trying to reach the kingdom of eternal blessedness!

The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force (Matt. 11:12)!

In the Dead-Letter Office

An impressive illustration of the carelessness of letter-writers is furnished by the report of the dead-letter office in Washington, D. C., for the past year. The number of pieces of matter received from all sources was 7,536,158, against 6,855,983 for the preceding year. Letters and parcels held for postage numbered 144,619, and the misdirected 422,739. Nearly 35,000 letters were received which bore no addresses whatever. The letters addressed to the guests of hotels and undelivered numbered 269,624. The total number of unclaimed parcels of all descriptions was 180,914. There were 660,461 pieces of mail matter addressed to foreign countries and returned from there as undeliverable. There were 50,553 letters containing an aggregate of $44,140, and letters containing drafts, notes, money orders, etc., of the face value of $1,136,645. Doubtless many of these careless writers blamed their correspondents for not replying to their letters, when the fault was really their own. Most singular of all was it that so many letters were mailed without any address. The writers were like the people who wonder why their prayers are unanswered, when those prayers were so formal and perfunctory that those who listen to them wonder whether the speaker remembers the character of the Being he is supposed to be addressing.

God is a spirit, and they who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth (John 4:24).

Fall of a Boulder

The people of Ouray, Colo., have had a narrow escape of the loss of life and property. A few days ago a boulder weighing hundreds of tons broke from a precipice above the town and fell. It dropped three hundred feet and broke in three pieces, each of which rolled through the town, doing much damage. Happily, the course they followed was not that in which most of the residences are situated, otherwise many must have been killed. A large storage building and a few smaller structures were wrecked. In one of the houses a sick woman was lying in bed. She was hurt by the falling walls, but is expected to recover. No one else was injured. Ouray is in constant danger from slides of this kind. All over the town are scattered great boulders which have fallen from the precipice, most of them before the town was built. Gradually and silently through many years that boulder must have been separating from the precipice, and at last, in a moment, it fell. So it will be at the final catastrophe, of which warning has been given, that is but little heeded:

There shall come in the last days scoffers walking in their own lusts and saying, Where is the promise of his coming: for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation (II. Peter 3:3).

An Afflicted Town

A deplorable condition of affairs is reported from the small town of Cementon, Pa. A press dispatch to the New York papers says that there is an epidemic of typhoid there. Of two hundred families in the town, more than half have some member prostrated by the disease. In twenty-two families every member from the father to the youngest child is suffering. There have already been many deaths and there are many of the living in imminent danger. The physicians are now prostrated by overwork, so that the danger is increased. It is believed that the epidemic has been produced by a polluted water supply. The town gets its water from the Lehigh River, which this past summer was unusually low. The towns north of Cementon have turned the river into a drain, and it is fully expected that the State Board of Health, which is now making an investigation, will report the water as responsible for the epidemic. This trouble shows how much mischief may be done thoughtlessly. The northern towns had no enmity toward the people who are suffering, yet their conduct has brought misery and death upon them.

None of us liveth unto himself and no man dieth to himself (Rom. 14:7).

BRIEF NOTES

Owing to the necessity of going to press a month ago on our annual million edition, which will be published next week, and which will contain our various premium propositions, it was impracticable to publish the Sunday School lesson in that issue, and therefore we publish two Sunday School expositions in this issue, each of them necessarily somewhat curtailed. In the issue of December 12 we shall resume the usual full Sunday School page, which we are happy to say has been constantly growing in interest and in popularity with our readers.

Rev. Thomas Harrison has been greatly encouraged by the meetings he is holding in Indianapolis, Ind. The Roberts Park M. E. Church has been crowded from the beginning. At the first service sixteen hundred persons were present. Already a large number of hopeful conversions are reported.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been holding evangelistic meetings at Keene, N. H. Many young people have given in their names, pledging themselves in Christ's strength to live for him in the world.

A remarkable service will be held at Richmond, Va., on Thanksgiving day. Sometime ago the Grove Avenue Baptist Church was destroyed by fire. The Jewish Beth Ahaba synagogue invited the Baptist congregation to hold its services in their building and the offer was accepted. Now the Jews have proposed a joint service for Thanksgiving day and the Baptists have agreed to meet with them.

To our ideas, one of the strangest anomalies in the British constitutional system is the plural voter. A citizen has a vote for property he owns in other constituencies than the one in which he resides. Thus in the recent election of members of Parliament it was found that a large property owner named Baxendale might, if he chose, vote in forty-three places. As the elections are not in that country all held on the same day, it is quite possible for such a man to cast all the votes in his power.

Mr. Wm. Phillips Hall, well known as the business man evangelist, has presented to the Bowery Mission 400 copies of the hymn book compiled jointly by himself and Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, entitled, Christian Hymns No. 1, and published by The Hall-Mack Co., of Philadelphia. Mr. Hall, during a recent visit to the Mission, expressed his appreciation of the work being done there and has given these books as a tribute of his interest for use in the devotional services of the Mission.

Questions of the Week

1. What is the difference between Christian tact and human policy?

Christian tact is doing and saying the right thing at the right time. It is a gentle deference to the opinions and actions of others, with an intent to thereby win them to higher views and nobler deeds. In this deference there is absolutely no compromise of principle for a moment. The tactful worker in approaching even a sinner, finds something about him to commend, notes something which may assist him to regain a little of his lost self-respect Christ exhibited Christian tact when he said to the repentant woman, "Neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more." It was no vindication of guilt, but a vision of a higher life granted to the fallen. Human policy is doing and saying the expedient thing at the convenient time. It works upon the theory that the end justifies the means. When Pilate washed his hands of the blood of Jesus, and thereby violated his sense of justice and stultified himself to appease the Jews, he illustrated human policy. These two instances will distinguish between the two principles of action.

LOUIS A. WALKER.

2. The same metaphor is used in three passages to symbolize respectively a king, an empire and God's people. Name the passages.

The word cedar is used as a metaphor to symbolize (1) A king. See II. Kings 14:9, "And Jehovah the King of Israel sent to Amaziah King of Judah, saying, The thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife; and there passed by a wild beast, and trod down the thistle." (2) Empire. See Ezekiel 31:3, "Behold the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches and with a shadowing shroud, and of an high stature; and his top was among the thick boughs." (3) God's people. See Psalm 92:12, "The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree; he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon."

3. What should be the Christian's attitude toward the higher criticism?

A certain suspense of opinion is perhaps the best attitude to be maintained toward the higher criticism, of which we hear so much nowadays. In some respects it is certainly an evil, but perhaps not an unmixed evil. It has done harm, just as rationalism has always done harm, by leading some to lose faith in the supernatural, and even to doubt whether the Bible is in the deepest sense the word of God. So far as it tends to this result, it is doing great harm. On the other hand, it may have cleared up some doubtful interpretations, may have corrected some misapprehensions and errors, and thus have been productive of good. It cannot be suppressed, and it would be rash absolutely to condemn and oppose it. But its results are not really settled as yet by the critics themselves; and until they are, we may surely be excused from acquiescing in all that is put forth in its name.

4. What is the difference between the two kinds of sin mentioned by the Apostle in I. Timothy 5: 24?

A man's life is seen from two standpoints. First, that from which God alone sees him. Second, that from which the people see him. A sin may be just as wicked which is committed against God or his people and which is only seen by God, as a sin which is committed before the eyes or in the knowledge of the people. In the first case the sin is not open to the condemnation and judgment of the people, but is decided only at the Judgment Day. In the second case God causes the sin to be open beforehand, and the person committing the wrong is subject to the judgment and condemnation from the people before the rendering of the final decision. Therefore in the first the judgment follows after; but in the second his sins are opened beforehand and he goes before to his judgment (from the people).

5. Are frequent changes in fashion to be deprecated, or do they answer some good end?

Both. They are to be deprecated (1) because in seeking to follow the dictates of "fashion" many live sham lives by wearing cheap, flashy imitations, thereby lowering themselves in their own estimation, in the estimation of others, and in the sight of God; (2) because so much time, which should be used for better purposes, is wasted. So much jealousy and envy are aroused; so many are led to live beyond their means to such an extent that crime is often committed, thus bringing sorrow, misery and disgrace into many homes, and, above all (3), because by walking in the footsteps of fashion, one neglects the development of his body physically, mentally, morally, and spiritually. On the other hand, these changes do answer some good end, for through them business is increased, the price of labor is raised, the prosperity (financially) of the country becomes greater, and employment is given to many who need the work in order to sustain themselves and their families.

6. Ought a Christian to refuse to accept an invitation to a social party, if he knows a person of immoral life is also to be a guest?

Very much depends on the nature of the party. If that is unquestionable, go, and do not let one man's immorality outshine the characteristics of a Christian within you. Why should people note one person's wrong conduct more than they respect your strong moral one? Why should not your influence counterbalance his, and thus make your presence a blessing to society? You do not hesitate to go and vote side by side with an immoral man. In this case, also, cast your vote and let it count.

ALICE MANAHAN.

Much would depend upon the kind of Christian, i.e., his stability and his ability to make his demeanor Christlike wherever he may be. Assuming that this Christian is a man of unblemished reputation as to his past so that no reflections may be cast upon him by such an act, I think that it would be safe to follow the example of our Lord in the matter. He did not hesitate to attend social parties when he knew that many persons of immoral life were to be present. He ate with publicans and sinners and allowed the fallen woman to serve him by washing his feet with her repentant tears. If a Christian can go to the social party in the spirit of the Master, he should go; but if he fears that in that company he would part with any of his Christian devotedness, he had better stay away.

7. From what do we derive the polite custom of lifting the hat by way of salute?

Among the many acts of courtesy which can be traced back to the influence of the age of chivalry, ending with the fifteenth century, none is more direct than that of lifting the hat to acknowledge the presence of a friend. During that time knights never appeared in public except in full armor, but it was customary upon entering the assembly of friends to remove the helmet, signifying, "I am safe in the presence of friends." It was frequently also a necessity for the knight to prove to his friends that he was the person that his coat of arms and other insignia proclaimed him to be, and this was impossible, completely concealed as he was, so that even his voice was muffled, without uncovering. The age of the custom, however, is much earlier than this, for the practice of uncovering the head as a means of salutation was employed by the ancient Greeks, Romans, and Phrygians, and originally signified disarming, and defencelessness, in the presence of a superior, which earlier idea is also intended to be conveyed by our custom. Many explorers, notably Capt. Cook, report somewhat similar customs, uncovering not only the head, but even the shoulders and waist, among the natives of the islands of the South Seas. How the custom originated here is unknown; it certainly shows remote antiquity.

8. Should a father in making his will give unmarried daughters a larger share than sons, when he has only a small fortune to divide?

Circumstances so alter cases that it is difficult to give a cast-iron rule. All things being equal sons and daughters should share alike. A woman now stands on so nearly an equal footing with a man, that it is unnecessary to make a difference as regards her inability to support herself. If one in a family, be it son or daughter, is incapacitated through no fault of his own from earning his living, that one should receive a larger portion than the others. If a daughter, from love or duty, has remained at home to work, perhaps thereby foregoing a promising career, and has never received pay for such labor, an estimate should be made of the value of said labor, and such sum should be paid out of the estate before division is made among the other children equally with this daughter.

9. Can one be successful as a salesman where exaggeration is the rule of trade, and yet be a Christian?

If one must be a successful liar in order to be a successful salesman most certainly the Christian can not enter that vocation. But in nine cases out of ten, is it not true, that the salesman follows his own bent in offering his goods to a customer? If he has an eye only for the present, he may unduly exaggerate the value of his goods, in order to make a large sale. But if he is far-sighted and really wishes to gain the confidence of his customer, he will not unduly exaggerate his wares. When once men and women discover a man like that behind the counter, they will come again. I know a man who has been employed by one firm for years. He resolved when he first went to work for them that he would not misrepresent his goods. He has stood by that resolution. As a result his employers, not long ago, raised his salary in order to induce him to remain with them. He was too successful and valuable a man to lose. What is true of him is true of others and might be true of many more if they only had back-bone enough to stand by their principles.

10. When a member of a church notices an inconsistency in another member, and has pointed it out to him and has failed to induce him to reform, should he let the matter drop, or should he call the attention of the pastor or the church to the misconduct?

Church members should feel this interest in each other's proper Christian conduct. When the personal relation is such as to justify him in making the demand, one should point out the fault of another. When he feels prompted and impelled to do so he should not stop the kindly effort till he has done all that can be done to restore the offender. If the pastor or the church could add nothing to the influence which is needed, then they should not be called upon especially. If they can add anything or have good hope of success, the matter should be carried on. One should take the next step when the first fails, and never be satisfied till the erring one has been restored.

C. P. ATKINSON.

MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

We are receiving a vast number of letters asking us for magazine combinations differing from those recently published in our columns. In reply, we would say that we have entered into certain unalterable arrangements with other papers which makes it absolutely impracticable to make even the slightest change. In publishing the proposition, we submitted to our readers the very best offer that we could possibly make, and were any change possible it would of necessity have to be far less favorable to our subscribers.

At the request of many of our subscribers who last year availed themselves of the most popular Magazine Combination of the day, we now add the same Combination to the list recently published. It is as follows:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—Weekly
SUCCESS—Monthly . . . . . }
THE COSMOPOLITAN—Monthly. .

All Three for $2.00

The Quiver may be substituted for either Success or The Cosmopolitan.

Miscellaneous Questions

J. D. J., Statesboro, Ga. When a person has the power to write or speak in measured lines and in rhyme, is it the gift of poetry or not?

It by no means follows because a person can write rhymes that he is therefore a poet. There are unfortunately more imaginary poets than real ones.

Mary L. Where can the hymn be found containing these much-quoted lines.

"I heard the voice of Jesus say,
Come unto me and rest."

In Songs for the Wilderness, No 2, 1844. By Horatius Bonar.

F. L. S. What is the limit of vision of a person standing on a cliff thirty yards above sea level?

Between twenty and twenty-one miles. The limit varies with elevation. On a clear day, an object one foot above a level plain may be seen one and one-third miles; an object ten feet high, over four miles; twenty feet high, nearly six miles; one hundred feet high, thirteen miles.

A. E. H., Salem, O. What city was destroyed by silence?

Amyclæ, in Laconia, on the Euphrates. It was conquered by the Spartan King, Telechus. The inhabitants had been so often alarmed by false reports of the approach of an enemy, that it was decreed a public offence to make any further like reports, so that at last, when the Spartans really approached, no one dared announce the fact, and the city fell without a struggle. Hence comes the Latin proverb; "More silent than Amyclæ."

Mary L., Pustinhill. Who has been Vice-President of the U. S. since the death of Hobart? What is the law on this subject?

The Vice-President is always President of the U. S. Senate. When the Vice-Presidential chair becomes vacant, for any reason, the Senate elects a President pro tempore, who becomes the acting Vice-President. Since the death of Hobart there has really been no Vice-President, though U. S. Senator William P. Frye, of Maine, President pro tempore of the Senate, would be considered as Vice-President.

A. E. H., Salem, O. What Queen was crowned after death?

Ines de Castro, wife of the Crown Prince, Dom Pedro, of Portugal. She was assassinated by the servants of her father-in-law, King Alfonso IV. Upon his accession to the throne, Dom Pedro caused his wife's body to be exhumed, placed on the throne, clothed with the insignia of royalty, and crowned "Queen of Portugal."

School-boy, Denver, Col. Please give some figures showing magnitude of our postal service?

Weight of matter carried year ending June 30, 1899, 664,286,868 lbs.; pieces handled 6,576,310,000; miles traveled, 445,744,845; stamps issued, 4,917,269,025; revenue from service, $95,021,384; cost of service, $101,632,160. Total length of routes for domestic service, including rail, steamer, pneumatic tube, street car and star routes transportation, 496,948 miles. Number post-offices, about 75,000; employees, 200,000. A letter can be sent from Florida to the Klondike, some 7,000, miles, occupying thirty days or more for two cents.

M. E. R., Middleboro, Mass. 1. What has been the increase in the population of the State of New York within the last decade? 2. The population of the United States in the same period? 3. What is the population of the Philippine Island? 4. How many on Islands in the group?

1. The population of New York according to the census of 1890, was 5,997,853; estimated population 1900, 7,100,000. 2. United States, 1890, according to census, 62,622,250; estimated population, 1900, 75,000,000. 3. Accurate census has never been taken; the estimate is 7,000,000 to 8,000,000. 4. Exact numbers unknown; estimate 600 to 2,000.

The Four Soils*

How to Listen so as to turn to Account the Seed of the Spirit

A NOTABLE illustration of the perpetuation of types is furnished by the Parable, which we call the Parable of the Sower, but which German theologians more appropriately call the Parable of the Four Soils. The teaching of the Parable does not relate to the Sower or the seed, but to the different kinds of soil. The Sower in all cases is the same, the seed is the same, and the difference in results is due to the difference in the qualities of the soil. That fact is deeply significant. It shows the important part every soul takes in its own conversion. In this instance God does not deal with men as we deal with children, compelling them to do right; he deals with them as reasonable, responsible beings who are free to take the wrong or the right course, and who must take the consequences of their action. The seed falls, it is good seed capable of bearing fruit, but it will not bear fruit if there is no receptivity in the soil, and even when it does bear fruit there are degrees of fruitfulness not depending on the seed but on the character of the soil. In this matter men have not changed since Christ himself scattered the good seed in Palestine nearly nineteen hundred years ago. The same kinds of hearers are in our churches to-day and the same varying results are produced.

LITTLE COLONISTS ON THE WAY TO SERVICE

The wayside referred to in the Parable was the path through the field which was trodden hard by pedestrians, and which the ploughman did not turn up, when he prepared the field for the sower. Some of the seed thrown from the hand of the sower fell there, but it was wasted, it never even sank into the soil. The type is familiar. How often have we seen people sit unmoved under the most earnest and impressive preaching, as if they were not at all concerned in it, as a blind man might listen to a lecture on colors! Hard experiences, the rough wear and tear of life, the hardening effect of habitual sin may produce this condition of mind. It is also sadly true that regular attendance on the preaching of the Word may do it, for the preacher's words will fall on the ear like an oft-told tale, if the hearer is Gospel hardened.

The stony ground is not soil with which stones are mixed, but a substratum of rock covered with a layer of soil. The seed finds an entrance there, and there is a quick response, but the shallowness of the soil is a fatal defect, for the roots of the seed strike the rock and can go no farther. They get no moisture, and the heat of the sun withers the plant. That type, too, we know only too well. In times of revival there are always such converts. Easily moved, they readily yield to the appeals of the preacher, but only the emotions are touched, and a little ridicule, a little worldly pleasure, or some other claim on the attention suffices to obliterate the transient effect of the preaching. The conversion was too easy; it did not reach deep enough, and in a short time the convert who has only tasted the spiritual feast is back again in the world.

In the next type there is a further advance. The seed does take root in this case, but there are other seeds there which compete with it and finally overcome it. Sad beyond measure is this type so common everywhere. Christ tells us what these weeds are: Riches, Ambition, Cares, and Pleasures. They have a power that every man feels, more or less. Their influence is the more to be dreaded because we cannot avoid it. The business man must attend to his business, otherwise he would fail. He must give his mind to it. Pleasure, too, is a necessity, otherwise we should become dull and spiritless. The wife must attend to her household and the needs of her children. The problem is to do all this without allowing the cares and pleasures to usurp the chief place. As soon as a man becomes so eager and so much absorbed in his business that he curtails or omits the morning devotion, or so tired at night that he goes to rest without prayer, the choking process has commenced. Christ's prayer for his people was not that they should be taken out of the world, but that they should be kept from the evil. This is the prayer we have need to offer continually.

It is a relief to turn from these types to the good ground. Thank God there is good ground in which the seed grows and bears fruit! There are souls in which it is nourished and developed. To be among them is an ambition worthy of the best and highest natures. The surest way to attain it is by prayer. The effect of communion with Christ even subjectively is immense. No one can pour out his soul before God, telling his difficulties and temptations and sorrows, without being strengthened for the day. And objectively, who can measure the result? God loves his children and is abundantly able to give them all the help they need. "My grace is sufficient for thee," he said to Paul, and it is sufficient for every one. If the desire to live near to him is sincere, help will be given. Then, too, there is a great virtue in work. Even the good ground varied in production. Not alone in the graces of Christian character, but in the souls won for the Master is the fruit shown. To those who abide in him the promise is made that they shall bear much fruit.

Thanksgiving on the Plains

THANKSGIVING Day among those who live "far from the maddening crowd," in the great western plains, will be celebrated by long rides to attend divine service, visits to neighbors, and a long ride home at night. The colonists, for example, on the farms established by the Salvation Army on waste land in Colorado, California and Ohio, will ride many miles to the little school-house, which they use as a place of worship. They have much to give thanks for, because they are far better off out there than when they were living in poverty in the crowded city. The picture on this page shows how the children of the colonists will be transported to church on the day of thanks. They will go mounted on the gentlest of horses. The five youngsters mounted on this patient animal seem to be enjoying themselves, and we hope that on Thanksgiving day the grown-up colonists will be quite as happy as the youngsters.

Chinese Sympathy

The Chinamen on the Pacific coast are contributing freely to the fund for the relief of the Christian Chinese, who lost their property in the recent outbreak in China. One day recently the American Board received a check for $100 from three schools of Chinamen, contributed through the Rev. Jee Jam, the first Chinaman who was ordained to the Christian ministry in America.

Sick Headache

Bilious headache is the same thing.

Most people that are subject to it do nothing for it until it prostrates them. Then they only take a dose of physic or an emetic.

And so it comes on soon again,—just as soon as the stomach is again disturbed by the bilious habit of the system.

Mrs. M. A. McLeod, Goderich, Ont.; Joseph Cole, Reno, Ohio; Geo. W. Doll, Locust Valley, Pa., and J. Van Hee, Pultneyville, N. Y., were all subject to it, and have thankfully testified, as many others have done, to the satisfactory effect of

At 91 Lincoln Avenue, Cortland, N. Y., was once a house of sorrow and sadness. The daughter of George Loucks, the pride of the household, seemed going into a decline as she reached her early womanhood and her condition caused the greatest anxiety in the family. The happy ending of the matter caused considerable excitement in the neighborhood and, when questioned by a reporter, Mr. Loucks made the following statement:

"About two years ago my daughter, who was then in her sixteenth year, was in bad health. She was pale and thin, without strength or vitality, in fact her condition was that which is generally called all run down. We were, of course, worried about her and employed the best physicians to attend her. They studied her case and, although they did everything possible, gave her no relief which was permanent. The late Dr. Angel had first called my attention to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and my wife had heard they were a fine tonic, so we decided to try them for my daughter. We did so and inside of eight weeks the primary cause of her trouble was removed and she showed a decided gain in health, strength and flesh.

"A great many people will buy a medicine and take a few doses. Then if they are not cured they throw it aside as no good, or take it spasmodically. We believed in a fair trial in strict accordance with directions and our faithfulness was rewarded for she was greatly benefited by them. Her color came to her cheeks and she continued to gain in weight and strength. So you see both my wife and myself believe in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and have found them a wonderful medicine. We have told a great many people about them and have been glad to do so."

STOCKMAN'S FINGERS

Same on Both Hands.

W. E. Beckham, a corking heavy-weight of Burton, Kan., is in the live stock business. He did not need to pay much attention to the food he ate, until about two years ago an attack of the grip left him partially paralyzed. His experience with food is well worth reading.

"The third and little finger on each hand became partially paralyzed, and my spine was affected just below the back of the neck. This came from a severe attack of the grip two years ago. I almost entirely lost the use of my hands.

"This condition continued several months, in spite of all kinds of baths and treatments. In the meantime my stomach, bowels, and digestive organs became affected and deranged. My liver seemed to have no more action than if I had no liver at all. No food of any kind tasted right, and I run down from 210 pounds to 160.

"One day the groceryman asked me if I had ever tried Grape-Nuts food. He told me that it was recommended as a brain and nerve food and that it was predigested.

"So I commenced the use of Grape-Nuts, and carried some in my pocket. Now and then when I felt hungry would take some of the food into my mouth and allow it to melt before swallowing. The food has a delicious taste and I began to improve right away. In three day's time I was very much better.

"I continued the use of Grape-Nuts, and continued to improve steadily. In a few weeks longer I was strong and had regained the use of my hands perfectly. In less than five months I was back to over 200 pounds, as you see me in the picture which I send. Am now 51 years old and never had better health in all my life. I passed a first-class medical examination about four months ago in a life insurance company.

"My recovery to good health is solely due to the use of Grape-Nuts food. As a brain and nerve food, there is nothing equal to it. You can use any part of this letter, and I hope it may lead some unfortunate invalid to health."

When in trouble some few weeks ago I prayed God to lead me out of darkness into light, and my prayer was answered.

Fanny Crosby's Hymn His Text

Rev. Erwin Dennett, pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist Church, Brooklyn, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:

Last night I preached from the hymn of Fanny Crosby, which you published recently, and also from the beautiful picture on your first page, "I Have Reached the Rock at Last." One of my young men reproduced the picture on the blackboard in a very beautiful manner, and eighteen of our young Sunday School girls sang the hymn from copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I took for my text Psalm 94: 22, "My God is the rock of my refuge." I told my hearers that all the sermons ever preached to sinners were in this picture.

Here is the sea of life, sometimes calm when the sun shines, but again the sky darkens, and the wind lashes the sea into fury, and the frail barks of humanity are driven before it. Like this angry sea, the sinner's heart is never at peace. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." God's word declares this scene to be a picture of the human heart. He says, "The wicked are like the angry sea when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt." Here is a Rock. Rugged, hoary, strong, it lifts its head above the waves. That Rock represents God, eternal, abiding. Amid the storms of the centuries the old Rock has stood immovable, unchangeable. On the Rock is a massive cross. That represents Jesus; planted on the Rock, a pillar of hope, a place of salvation, a refuge from the storm and the sad wrecks of self. Millions have climbed upon the old Rock, and, flinging themselves down before the Cross they have cried out, "I have reached the Rock at last!" Thank God many are on the Rock to-night. We have a right to sing and rejoice. We are the happiest people in the world. We are the richest people in the world, for the Rock and the Cross are ours, and that means God and Christ are ours.

The Love that Passeth Knowledge

THE love that passeth knowledge, that never weareth out,
Though men that precious love may mock, its gifts may scorn and flout;
The love that waiteth patiently, that standeth at the door,
The wondrous love of Jesus, that endureth evermore.

Of that dear love we sing and pray; to that true love we turn.
In all our trials here below, for that strong love we yearn;
That deathless love, which saves from death, which washes sins away;
That love of Christ our blessed Lord, of that we sing and pray.

We wander in the darkness, and are often sore afraid,
But Jesus bids us take his hand, and cease to be dismayed.
We often trip and stumble, and the foe is on our track,
But thanks to God we rise again; we march and look not back.

Dear Christ unto us every one, this grace we pray thee give,
That in thy love-surpassing life, we all our days may live.
The love surpassing knowledge, so mystic and so sweet,
May we its matchless secrets learn, low bending at thy feet.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The Spread of the Bible

AT a recent meeting in New York an exhaustive statement was made of the work of the American Bible Society. Not only in New York is there an efficient printing agency, but also in China at Shanghai, at Foochow, and at Hinghua; in Japan at Yokohama; in Siam at Bangkok; in Turkey at Constantinople, and in Syria at Beyrout. From all these presses the number of volumes issued during the past year, including New Testaments, Gospels and other portions aggregated 1,406,801, of which 780,943 were printed in New York. Many of these were sold, some at a very small profit and some below cost, while a large number were gratuitously supplied to various missionary societies and religious associations which are propagating Christianity at home and abroad. During the eighty-three years of its life the American Bible Society has issued 65,962,505 volumes, thus doing important missionary work on its own account, besides rendering invaluable aid to other organizations. Such a statement as this shows that the American Bible Society deserves the most hearty support from the Christian public of the United States, and particularly the loyal and energetic cooperation of local auxiliaries. Money cannot be better invested than in aiding this venerable society in its great undertaking of putting the Bible in the homes of the people. It is reaching not only the English-speaking people of our own land, but the Indians, who now have it in their own languages, and the foreign immigrants who land on our shores, thus taking the surest of all means to make them good citizens.

Jamieson, Fausset, and Brown's Bible Commentary

By Robert Jamieson, D.D., of St. Paul's Glasgow; Rev. A. R. Fausset, A. M., St. Cuthbert's York, and David Brown, D.D., Professor of Theology, Aberdeen. A Complete commentary—critical, explanatory and practical—on the Old and New Testaments.—1380 pages, bound in cloth. Former price, $7.50.

It is enriched with the results of learning, the researches of travelers who have visited every region on which the light of revelation originally shone, and the expository labors of scholars and critics. Far in advance of the older works now in use, this explanatory and practical commentary has been prepared by three eminent divines, distinguished alike for their scholarship and their piety.

Rev. H. Clay Trumbull, Editor of the Sunday School Times: I do not know of its equal, within its scope and cost, and I believe it will have, as it merits, a very wide circulation, and will do great good.

Rev. J. H. Vincent, Bishop M. E. Church: "This immense book deserves a place on the table of every Bible student. It is the cream of the commentaries carefully collected by three eminent scholars."

Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (2 vols.)

The Authorized American Edition. By Alfred Edersheim, M. A., Oxon. D.D. Lecturer, Oxford University.

Two volumes, regular price, $6.00. Royal 8vo, 1,524 pages, handsomely bound in silk cloth.

A famous book for clergyman, student or general reader. Its long continued success and the many favorable notices are sufficient evidence of the popularity this new edition will achieve. Gives a full account of society, life and development,—intellectual and religious—in Palestine, to serve as a frame and background for the picture of Christ.

This great life of Christ will prove particularly valuable to every Sunday School worker as the International Lessons are now on the life of Christ.

The Sunday School Times recommends it: "It is positively refreshing to read a life of the Savior which is critical in the best and truest sense of the word, and is biblical at the same time.

Critical and Expository Bible Cyclopædia

Compiled and written by Rev. A. R. Fausset, A. M., joint author of the Jamieson, Fausset and Brown Bible Commentary. It contains 750 three-column pages; 600 illustrations. Regular price, cloth binding, $5.00.

This great work is the result of seven years of labor by the author, contains three thousand seven hundred articles, and presents a completeness, conciseness, and thoroughness, such as to make it a perfect Bible Cyclopædia.

The work contains a valuable Index of all the books and chapters of the Bible in consecutive order, with references to the articles which illustrate them.

J. W. Hashford, D.D., President Ohio Wesleyan University: "It is a most admirable aid. I hope ten thousand teachers will use it inside the next six months."

Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage: "It is in advance of all books in that line,—unique, learned, accurate, and valuable."

The Life and Epistles of St. Paul

By the Rev. W. J. Conybeare, M. A., of Cambridge; and J. S. Howson, D.D., of Liverpool.

Contains 1014 large octavo pages, many fine illustrations, maps, charts, etc., is printed on the same quality of paper, and is the same in size, as Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, and bound in uniform style. There is no work that will compare with this in giving a life-like picture of the great apostle and the work which he did.

Smith's Dictionary of the Bible

Edited by William Smith, LL.D., Classical Examiner of University of London.

Contains 1024 large octavo pages printed on excellent paper, finely illustrated, and handsomely and strongly bound in cloth. An indispensable aid to ministers, teachers, families, Sunday-school superintendents and Bible readers generally. This is, undoubtedly, the best work of its kind in the English language.

Rev. G. C. Morgan and Northfield

A STATEMENT recently appeared in some of the leading daily newspapers, announcing that the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, the eloquent English preacher, would shortly come to Northfield, Mass., as successor to the late Dwight L. Moody. To ascertain the facts in the case THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cabled to Mr. Will R. Moody, now in England, and received a reply stating that the rumor was inaccurate. It is now learned authoritatively that Mr. Morgan was asked last August if he would consider a call to give up his church in England and come here and identify himself more closely with Northfield and its work. An effort is now being made to secure his services permanently in connection with the Northfield Extension movement, in which case he would hold meetings in different centres as he and Rev. F. B. Meyer and Rev. H. W. Pope have been doing for the last five or six years. Mr. Will R. Moody will continue at the head of the entire Northfield movement, carrying out the plans and purposes of his father, in whose work he has had so large a share during the great evangelist's lifetime.

The Countess in Germany

Friends of the Countess Schimmelmann, of whom there are many among us, will be glad to learn of her recent movements. She went from this country to England, where the warm sympathy of English friends touched and cheered her. She left England with the idea of raising the money needed for her work ($10,000) by literary work, but this will be impossible, as the requests calling her to hold meetings are so urgent that she cannot refuse them. At Bielefeld, in Prussian Westphalia, although she had never before been in the city, the large hall was filled long before the time for commencement. The iron-spiked gates had to be shut, but the people took ladders and climbed over, in spite of the police. A lady who has visited the Home for Fishermen at Gohren speaks in high terms of that institution, which is under the direction of the Countess. The Crown Princess of Denmark lately invited the Countess to pay her a visit and describe the work. At another town the factory girls filled the place of meeting, and many were in tears as the speaker told of the love of Christ. The Countess is preparing for an evangelistic tour through the chief cities of Southern Germany.

The Criterion Library

Seventeen Thousand pages of the best writings of the world.

A work of 48 volumes of interest to all at a price within the means of every one—small monthly payments.

The first announcement of the Criterion Library appeared in The Christian Herald in September. The response was immediate. The number of requests for the Library to be sent for examination far in excess of what was expected. This is the result of offering a well selected library, covering the more important and interesting branches of reading from the pens of authors of reputation, at a price so attractive all feel that they can avail themselves of the present opportunity.

Serious attention has been given to the selection of this library; it embraces history, biography, adventure, fiction, natural history, poetry and travel, and each volume is an authority upon the field it covers and is written in an entertaining style. With this library in your house no one need pass a dull evening, for all can find something here to interest and instruct them.

The library includes the works of such famous authors as Lockhart, Southey, Williams, Bush, James, Bell, Memes, Mrs, Jamison, Thatcher, Russell, Paulding, Rennie, Irving, Head, Fenelon, Segur. Stone, Bacon, Sargent, Florian, Halleck, Scott, Bryant, Barrows, Galt and Croly,

The set consists of forty-eight volumes, well printed from clear type upon special book paper, attractively bound in red cloth of special weave, with appropriate design upon the cover in two colors. It is a well made book in every respect, and one that will give entire satisfaction, yet I am enabled to offer this work at a price far below what any subscription work has heretofore been sold for.

Upon request the complete library of forty-eight volumes will be forwarded for your inspection and consideration.

If you decide to retain the work you are to remit only 37½ cents a volume; this amount, if you desire, can be paid at the rate of $1.50 per month for one year.

I will prepay delivery charges upon the library to your home, and if you should not desire to keep the books after you have seen them, you are to return at my expense. The list of authors and books will convey an idea of the value and interest of the library.

I have had especially bound, after the style of limited de luxe editions, a few sets of the Library. These have leather back and corners with gold veined marbeled sides, litho end sheets, gilt tops, silk head bands, with back stamped in gold lettering, with fillet top and bottom. The Library in this binding presents a richness rarely equaled, and the price for the few sets I have had bound is but 75 cents a volume. They can be paid for, if desired, at the rate of $3.00 a month for one year. The present price is offered to those who take advantage of this offer now. The price to be advanced in January.

Racine Baths

Turkish, Vapor and Medical

A Racine folding bath cabinet means a Turkish bath room at home. It is a strong, double-walled room rubber-coated inside and outside and fitted with a door. Loosen two braces and tip it, and it folds like a screen into a 6-inch space.

Light the heater, close the door, and in three minutes the bath is ready. The heat is maintained at 150 degrees. For a vapor bath, pour a pint of water into the vaporizer. For a medical bath, put the proper drugs into the water. We furnish thirty-five prescriptions. The baths cost but three cents each. A face steamer, with breathing tube, goes on top.

The bath opens five million pores, cleansing the skin, purifying the blood, curing rheumatism, nervousness, sleeplessness and all blood diseases. Stops a cold in a minute. Keeps mind and body up to the highest vigor.

PATENTED.—We control, by patents, the four essential features in bath cabinets, without which no cabinet can be satisfactory.

SOLD ON APPROVAL.—We sell on approval, guaranteeing that the Racine is by far the best of all bath cabinets. Return at our expense, if not entirely satisfactory, and get your money back. Prices $5 up, freight or express prepaid; heater, vaporizer and face-steaming attachment included. Not sold in stores nor by agents. All discounts go to the user. Write to-day for catalogue.

THANKSGIVING

WE thank thee for thy gifts bestowed,
Dear Lord, thy blessings all,
We thoroughly appreciate,
The greatest and the small.
We thank thee for thy constant care,
To guide our souls aright,
And keep us from the ways of sin,
Within thy guiding light.

Thanksgiving Day, and every day
Our hearts to thee we raise,
In gratitude for all thy love,
And we thy mercy praise.
Thou never hast forsaken us,
But many blessings sent.
And may our lives in thankfulness
To thee, henceforth, be spent.

Father John of Cronstadt

In a recent issue of Travel, a London magazine, a correspondent gives some very interesting facts concerning the celebrated Father John or Ivan of Cronstadt, a famous figure among the leaders of the orthodox Russian Church. He has ever been credited by the superstitious with the power of working miracles. It will be remembered that Father John was called in to pray at the bedside of the late Czar. Many of the wealthy Russian nobles, including some of the ladies very near to the throne, make him their private almoner, and entrust him with large sums of money, to be bestowed among the poor as he thinks fit. He gives away every day a "dole" to those who like to ask for it; but the Cronstadt authorities do not look very favorably on this, as it is found to attract a large number of beggars and idlers from other places. The photograph which appears on this page is the only one of Father John ever printed in this country.

Y.M.C.A. Work in Our New Colonies

The International Committee of the Y.M.C.A. is doing excellent work among our soldiers and sailors in the Philippines, Cuba and Porto Rico. Twenty-five men are now giving their whole time to this work, establishing buildings and headquarters wherever large bodies of men are to be permanently located, especially in the Philippines. At these places free writing material, papers, books, magazines and innocent games are provided, besides regular Bible classes and religious meetings.

Over sixty tons of reading matter, stationery and supplies have been forwarded to the troops this year. The cost of the work will be fully $40,000. Friends are invited to support the work generously and promptly.

Ringing noises in the ears, sometimes a roaring, buzzing sound, are caused by catarrh. Hood's Sarsaparilla is a specific for catarrh because it purifies the blood, thereby removing the cause of disease.

Writers of Renown in the New Sunday School Times

More famous writers have been engaged for contributions to the forthcoming issues of The Sunday School Times than at any other period of its history. Each issue will be an issue of exceptional value to every home lover—to every Christian of every denomination.

Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis will write on the problems that face the 20th Century minister. His treatment of the subject will stimulate thought whether or not his views are agreed with by those who read the article.

Robert C. Ogden will write of some striking examples of strict adherence to high moral principle on the part of men active and prominent in the business world, —a message of encouragement from a man who knows.

Rev. F. B. Meyer will give seven reasons for joining the Christian Endeavor Society. Mr. Meyer has a world-wide circle of admirers. He is a staunch believer in this young but powerful organization.

Articles for everybody—young and old—will be written by Ian McLaren, Dr. Timothy Dwight, Amos R. Wells, Israel Zangwill, J. R. Miller, Dr. Schauffler and a host of others equally well known. The famous Lesson Helps will be better than ever.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Jericho and the Dead Sea*

I ARRIVED in Jericho about three o'clock, and stopped at the Jordan Hotel, and stayed two nights for forty cents. This, with three or four other houses, is all there are now except the mud shanties of the Arabs. In the eastern part of the town stand the walls of a stone building some sixty feet square and twenty-five feet high. It is said to be the house of Zaccheus. A little further east is quite a large tract covered with ruins, which are thought to be ancient Gilgal. The course of the walls of the houses and the streets can still be seen, but the walls are all leveled to the ground. Some Arabs suspicioned I was going to the Dead Sea, and told me it would not do to go alone, as the Bedouins would run off with me. I knew they were laying plans to get a job as guide, so I watched for a chance, and slipped away without being seen, and made tracks for the sea. The first hour I walked across a barren plain, then there was an offset of sixty or seventy feet that goes down to the plain that borders the water. The soil here is more like ashes than dirt, and very salt. In some places I would sink in over my shoes.

It is the most natural thing in the world for this place to be called the Dead Sea, for it is surely a perfect emblem of death. The plains and mountains about it are very barren, and no vegetation grows near it. I see no bird, insect, or living thing in or about it, except a flock of old-fashioned sandhill cranes, which were flying over, and must have been out on a sight-seeing trip. I tried to get into the water, but it was a failure; it seemed unwilling to be disturbed. I would bob up like a cork, and when I would kick and try to swim my feet would fly out into the air. I was determined not to be mocked in this way; so I got a newspaper, and by lying on my back and holding it up in the air I could read as comfortably as on a lounge, and the breeze wafted me out to sea. But I soon got enough of the awful silence of the Dead Sea and made tracks for the ford of the Jordan, about five miles to the northeast, across a barren plain.

The Jordan runs in deep and muddy banks, along which a rank fringe of reeds grows; the water has a milky color. It was the dryest part of the season. The water at the ford was nearly five rods wide and four feet deep in the deepest place. This is no doubt the same place the Israelites crossed, and where Elijah and Elisha divided the waters; also where Jesus was baptized, and where the Spirit descended on him like a dove. And where the voice was heard from heaven, saying, "This is my beloved son; hear ye him."

*From Around the World on Sixty Dollars, by Robert Meredith. An expense account at the end of the book shows that the total cost of the journey was $237. All but $60 of this was made at work in different countries, at wages ranging from 40 cents to $2.50 per day. Illustrated. Pp. 372. Laird & Lee, Chicago, publishers.

Pp. 371; price $1.50; publishers, Dodd, Mead & Co., New York City.

SENSIBLE TEMPERANCE

A Word to Temperance Ladies.

It is universally admitted that temperance women work for their cause with a desire to make life happier; that is, intemperance in drink causes an immense amouut of misery in human life, and the temperance movement is an effort to replace this misery with happiness, peace, and comfort.

Many temperance women make the mistake of going at the subject hammer and tongs and proposing to force people to believe their way. It is far better to exercise a broad charity and take the position that one's own peace of mind and happiness, not only of the individual, but of the family and friends, depends upon sensible habits of life.

A very much greater foe to human happiness, than whiskey, exists, and it will startle many an honest temperance worker when the name of that foe is given. It is spelled c-o-f-f-e-e. "I don't believe it," some ardent temperance worker says, who is really a slave herself to the coffee cup.

Cast your thought among your sick friends, nervous, irritable, broken down women whose homes are anything but peaceful homes because of the irritation and friction brought about by their physical and mental condition. In ninety-five cases out of a hundred, the nervousness, irritability, dyspepsia, kidney trouble, female troubles, and various diseases which such people are subject to, come directly from a broken down nervous system, brought about by the daily use of coffee. Careful chemical analysis proves this statement to be absolutely true and personal experiment will prove the same to any one who cares to make it.

You may have a few friends who are made miserable by whiskey, but you have scores of friends whose lives are made miserable, as well as the lives of their families, by the use of coffee. Hard to believe, isn't it? Many of the most profound truths are not accepted by humanity when first brought to humanity's attention, but they are truths, nevertheless.

Try for yourself, reader. Leave off coffee altogether and start in with Postum Food Coffee, which can be obtained at any first-class grocery store. You will find within ten days an improvement in the sum total of happiness for yourself and for your friends about you. Life will take on a new aspect; strength, vigor, and vitality will begin to come back for your use. You can do things that you have heretofore been unequal to. You can accomplish something in this world, and you can quietly and without ostentation become a most efficient worker in securing to humanity that peace, content, and happiness that we are all seeking.

The Prisoner's ...THANKSGIVING...

By CHAPLAIN MUNRO, of the New York Tombs

WITH the advent of prison reform during the last part of the present century, and the onward movement of civilization, Thanksgiving as a national festival has become a day of joy and gladness, and as such has been observed in nearly all of the penological institutions of the country. This is certainly praiseworthy. As the life of the prisoner behind the bars is, necessarily, not a happy one, it is only right that something should be done for his moral and physical welfare, especially at this season of the year. But this day seldom comes to the prisoner without bringing in its train some good cheer, which shows that in recent years efforts have been made to ameliorate the hardships of those whose liberty society is compelled to restrain for the present.

In the Tombs, the great metropolitan prison of America, are found persons from every part of the world. And almost every state in the Union is sometimes represented. The majority, however, come from Eastern States, and are not only familiar with the New England Thanksgiving, but look forward to it with much interest.

To the question often asked many of these young men: "Where did you spend last Thanksgiving day?" there is no answer; but the head is bent down, and the eyes glisten, and perchance a tear may fall. Then the young man answers: "I was at home with the old folks"; and as he continues to recall the memories of that occasion, he feels a choking sensation in the throat and his voice becomes tender when he replies: "Yes, I had a fine time last Thanksgiving day." As he thinks of his present surroundings and the prison experiences through which he has passed since that happy occasion, the words of the people's bard come to his memory:

> It minds me of departed joys,
> Departed never to return.

To the question: "Have you anything to be thankful for this Thanksgiving?" he replies: "Yes, although my lot has been hard, brought about by my own doings, I know it might be worse. But I feel thankful for the blessings of this day."

The authorities in charge of the jails, penitentiaries and prisons of Greater New York, as well as the sheriffs of New York and Brooklyn, usually provide for the welfare of the prisoners on Thanksgiving day, when funds are specially appropriated for that purpose. The prison on this occasion is dressed in holiday attire. It is more like a Sunday, with the exception that there is greater joy on the part of everybody. A sermon is preached by the chaplain in the morning on the subject of Thanksgiving, in which he endeavors to show that even a prisoner behind the bars may have something to be thankful for. But the great thought on all such occasions is, thankfulness on account of God's unspeakable gift to man.

At noon, the gong is sounded, and everybody prepares for dinner. The menu usually consists of a large plate of roast turkey, soup, bread, potatoes, mince pie, cranberry sauce and coffee. Everybody has an abundance. Those in charge on such occasions are able to satisfy the most fastidious appetite of an epicure. This makes everybody feel well, as Thanksgiving usually does in all the prisons of the country; and there is generally an overflow of joy and good feeling.

In some of the larger prisons there is a concert in the afternoon, made up of the best voluntary talent from the outside world, which invariably adds to the enjoyment of the day. After the evening meal is over, Thanksgiving day is closed. Everybody with a heart overflowing with gratitude to God, feels that through the kindness of loving friends the season has been a blessing to him, and when the mantle of night falls upon the building he forgets his trials, and, like the great Apostle Paul himself, a prisoner on his way to imperial Rome, "thanks God and takes courage."

'Silver Plate that Wears."

These Handsome Pieces in

"1847 ROGERS BROS."

Spoons, Forks, etc.,

are only a few of the many made in the old reliable brand, for over half century the standard of quality.

They have all the good qualities in design, workmanship and finish of solid silver, at one-fourth to one-eighth the cost.

Much of the sterling silver nowadays is made entirely too thin and light for practical use, and is far inferior in every way to good plate—"Silver Plate that Wears."

Ask your dealer for "1847" goods. Avoid substitutes. Our full trade-mark is "1847 Rogers Bros;" look for it. Sold by leading dealers everywhere. Before buying write for our little book, S.

JESUS SET HIM FREE

THE story of the conversion and work of Joseph McDonald, of Springfield, Mass., is in some respects is as marvelous as that of Jerry McAuley, founder of the famous Water Street Mission in New York. Seven years ago Joe was a drunkard and a vagrant, and for many years he had spent much of his time in the city and county prisons. Sometimes he worked as a stonemason, sometimes in a saloon, but wherever he was, very little of his earnings went for anything else but drink. "I sunk so low in the mire," he explained to the writer, "that even my own dog would follow me no longer, and the night I found salvation I hadn't a cent of money in my pocket."

After his conversion he gave testimony publicly in mission hall, on the street, and at the Baptist Church prayer-meeting. But his newly-awakened zeal was not satisfied with this. He opened a little hall on Stockbridge street, Springfield, which had formerly been used as a mission, and there he sought to bring other outcasts into the light. Three years of continual, faithful work in that mission followed. Many and severe were the trials that came upon him, but through them all he maintained his faith and integrity, and at the present time the "Joe McDonald Mission" is known throughout Springfield and a large part of the state for its spiritual work.

Nearly a year ago the mission moved to North Main street, where the accommodations were better. The hall is neatly furnished with seats, a piano, and an organ, and has a seating capacity of about one hundred. In this mission many wanderers have been converted, and not a few are now leading exemplary Christian lives. Drunkards have reformed, and families shattered and scattered abroad through vice or misfortune have here been reunited, and have found friends.

Joe's talks to the audience at the little mission are unique and full of helpful suggestions. "I am not a saint, I am not as good as I might be," he says, "but I know I am a thousand times better than I used to be. Thirty-seven times I was in jail, but what iron bars and prison doors could not do the Lord Jesus, in his infinite mercy did for me. When he saved me he paid my fine, opened the prison doors and set me free. He made a sober man out of a drunkard, a truthful man out of a liar, a praying man out of a blasphemer, and an honest man out of a thief."

Before Joe was converted he could not read. He studied hard and soon mastered the spelling-book, and now he reads his Bible with comparative ease, and any chapter in the Bible. Prominent pastors and Christian workers of Springfield have spoken in this mission, and workers from other cities are gladly welcomed.

CUBA'S CLEVER WOMEN

They are Emerging from Seclusion into More Active Life, Like their American Sisters . . . .

NOT in any spot in the western world are the women so intensely feminine as in Cuba. There the last survival of Moorish customs, seen in the very architecture of the houses, hints at that repression of the sex which has forced upon them a life secluded, confined, devoid of large interests, and bounded by matrimony, domestic cares, a hackneyed social round and a formal religion. Living among and observing these women for much of the time during the past two years, it was impossible not to note the gulf that yawns between the Cuban woman and her modern American sister.

No trace of business life is apparent in the Senoras and the Senoritas of the "Pearl of the Antilles"; no evidence of active participation in politics, art or music is visible, and if I add that no club has left its mark on her, I may trust to a large and intelligent clientele not to be misunderstood. None of these has crossed the existence of half the race cradled on that sunny isle. And because of this, the women of Cuba exhibit phases puzzling at first, curious on further acquaintance, and usually disappointing in the end. Yet their beauty never fails to charm; their graces are part and parcel of their personality. Every condition of her life is unlike that of an American woman. The climate invites to repose, and ordinary household duties are more commonly relegated to servants than with us, one result attendant upon the fact that there is no middle-class in Cuba, and even the impoverished aristocrats have their old retainers. In some great but now almost ruined and dismantled palace in the suburbs of Havana, you may, if you are on fortunate terms of intimacy with its mistress, still see the liveries of old servants, embroidered in gold and silver, and the trappings of horses rich with precious metals, and sometimes even jewels, kept as souvenirs of vanished grandeur. But you will not see many of them. Most of them long since found their way to the pawn-shops on Obispo street, to be bought by relic-hunting Americans. Yet their former owners could far outstrip the purchasers of their valued heirlooms, if their sugar and tobacco estates were rehabilitated.

Such leaders of Cuban society as Senora Seraphina Jorrin, Senora de Zayas, the Countess Fernandina and others, prominent both in social and philanthropic life, are typical grande dames of the old, aristocratic school; yet there is not one of all of them who has not suffered the loss of male relatives and the destruction of estates. Upon the women, as always in war, has fallen the burden of sorrow and privation.

The future, however, holds more of advancement for the women of Cuba than they had dreamed of. Already women typewriters and stenographers—unheard of during the Spanish occupation—are filling many offices, with salaries of from $1,200 to $1,500 a year; women are now teaching in the public schools, knowing that they will receive their salaries, which they never did under the Spaniards, and many of them even dare to walk down the street or out on the Prado alone in broad daylight, which is the most astonishing innovation of all. The establishment of the public school system and the systematic and efficient care taken of all public institutions by the government, as well as the unusual attention paid to a more scientific pursuit of agricultural interests, are bound, sooner or later, to result in the development and growth of a middle-class in Cuba. The average guajiro, or countryman, is already a fine type of peasantry: frugal, industrious, sober, devoted to his family, and possessed of an unbounded generosity toward the passing traveler. Happily for the children, the boys and girls who, in the next generation, will make or unmake the island, have such advantages as no young compatriots of theirs in previous generations ever had.

"What Man Has Done Man Can Do"

ABRAHAM LINCOLN at twenty-two simply knew how to read, write and cipher.

ANDREW JOHNSON, President of the United States, NEVER ATTENDED SCHOOL. His wife was his only teacher. She taught him how to read.

HIRAM SIBLEY, formerly President of the Western Union Telegraph Co., left his father's farm at fifteen to learn a trade. After having given away millions of dollars during his life-time, he died worth many millions more a few years ago.

PETER COOPER, whose name will ever be cherished in the hearts of the many thousands of young men and young women who have been graduated, free of expense, from the night school of Cooper Institute, himself never had more than one year's schooling.

Now if these men, under such unfavorable circumstances, succeeded in achieving fame and fortune by dint of industrious application to study and work, why need any of the tens of thousands of young people who have in them the making of great men and great women, despair of reaching the height of their ambition with such an opportunity as this, placing within their easy reach everything necessary for a liberal education?

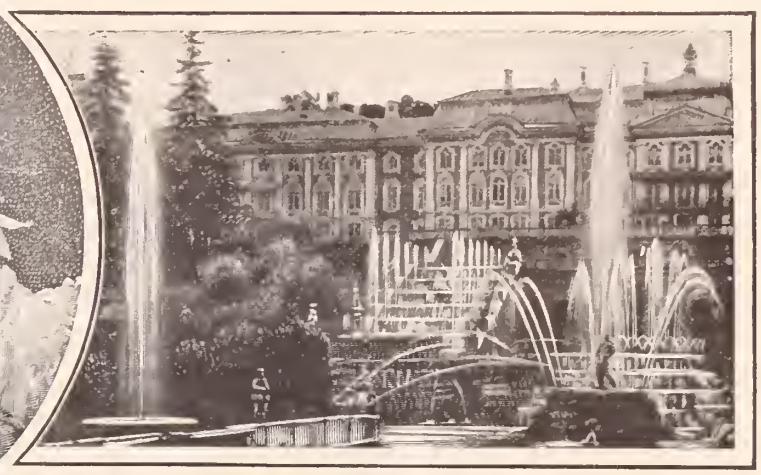
IMPERIAL PALACE AT BERLIN

MRS. T. DE WITT TALMAGE



SUMMER PALACE OF THE CZAR AT PETERHOF

MY · SUMMER · AMID · ROYAL · PALACES

. . . By Mrs. T. DE WITT TALMAGE . . .

NO sooner had I stepped ashore from the Oceanic than the question was asked me for publication: "You have had abundant opportunity this summer of studying royalty in Europe. What do you think of it in comparison with republican simplicity?" As this question has come to me the third time, I proceed to answer it, though somewhat reluctantly.

Yes, we have had an opportunity of seeing the inside of palaces, and communing with princely and imperial households, such as has seldom been granted to persons unofficial. The publication of my husband's sermons in all the languages of Europe for many years, seemed to open every door we might wish to enter. And the first remark I desire to make, in reply to the question as to the contrast between republican simplicity and royal manners, is that there is no contrast at all. The higher in station the more unpretending the personage. It is the people who are afraid of losing their place, or who are struggling for something higher, that take on airs. The higher the Prince or Princess, the Emperor or Empress, the more unconventional. Republican simplicity is no more marked than royal simplicity.

EMPEROR WILLIAM SURROUNDED BY THE REIGNING PRINCES OF GERMANY

While the "show-rooms" of palaces may be bejeweled, and richly upholstered, and embanked with lustrous statuary, and aglow with masterpieces of painting, the "living rooms" of European potentates are for the most part as plain as the rooms of people ordinarily prosperous. While the tourist, catalogue in hand, is permitted to pass through sleeping-apartments which were once occupied by some Marie Antoinette, or Napoleon, or Maria Teresa, and the pillows of the couch and the canopy are ablaze with splendor, for the most part the sleeping-apartments are as unpretending as a hundred homes in the same city of Berlin, or Vienna, or St. Petersburg, or Copenhagen. While the banquet of a king or queen might easily swamp what we would call many thousands of dollars, and the gleam of the chalice, and the flash of the plate are something to be remembered for a lifetime, the ordinary breakfast or luncheon or dinner of a palace is as plain as ordinary cutlery, and table-cloth, and ice-pitcher can make it. The breakfast-room at Stockholm where King Oscar and his Queen sit, morning after morning, is probably as simple as the breakfast-room of many of those who read this sketch. When Emperor Francis Joseph invites any one to dine with him at Vienna, he sometimes apologizes for the plainness of the meal. Mr. Gladstone, who was in some respects a king, called the repast to which he invited my husband at Hawarden "a few snacks."

The pomp of royalty is seen on great occasions, but no persons, however highly born, can always walk on stilts. The vast expense of princely and imperial households is in the support of official attendants, who must be ready to respond at the first call, though that call may not come more than once a year, or once in five years. Hundreds of horses must be ready, though some of them may never be harnessed for service except at a royal marriage, a coronation, or an imperial obsequy, and those occasions are very far apart.

The conversation of these people is surprisingly familiar. The Empress of Russia, without any hesitation, expressed to me the preference she had for the Chinese above the Japanese. She said: "The Japanese may pretend to be friendly, but they stab you in the dark." She cannot forget that when Nicholas, now her husband, was traveling in Japan, he received a ruffian stroke that felled him senseless, and that now, when the Emperor is excited or overworked, that Japanese wound of many years ago still disturbs him.

The Crown Prince of Denmark, in style and language that we are familiar with in our own homes, said to us: "Come, let me show you into my den," and then took us through his study. And the Crown Princess said to me: "Come, let me show you my garden. You will find it as quiet as though it were many miles from human habitation, though only five miles from Copenhagen." With what simplicity the Dowager Empress of Russia showed us her pictures and asked us about where we had been, and invited us to come again on the morrow. Simplicity reigns in all the high places we were permitted to visit.

But one must go abroad in order to fully appreciate home life in America. There are more happy people in our country than in any other land. Great palaces and royal families, however kind and benevolent and exemplary, imply a multitude of people with not enough to eat or wear or shelter them. I had rather live ten years in America than thirty in any other country. While there is no contrast between republican simplicity and royal manners, there is a contrast, wide and awful, between our country—where every healthy and industrious man can make a comfortable living—and monarchial lands, where poverty is the common inheritance of the people. Thus much have I learned from my journeyings this summer in the capitals of Europe.

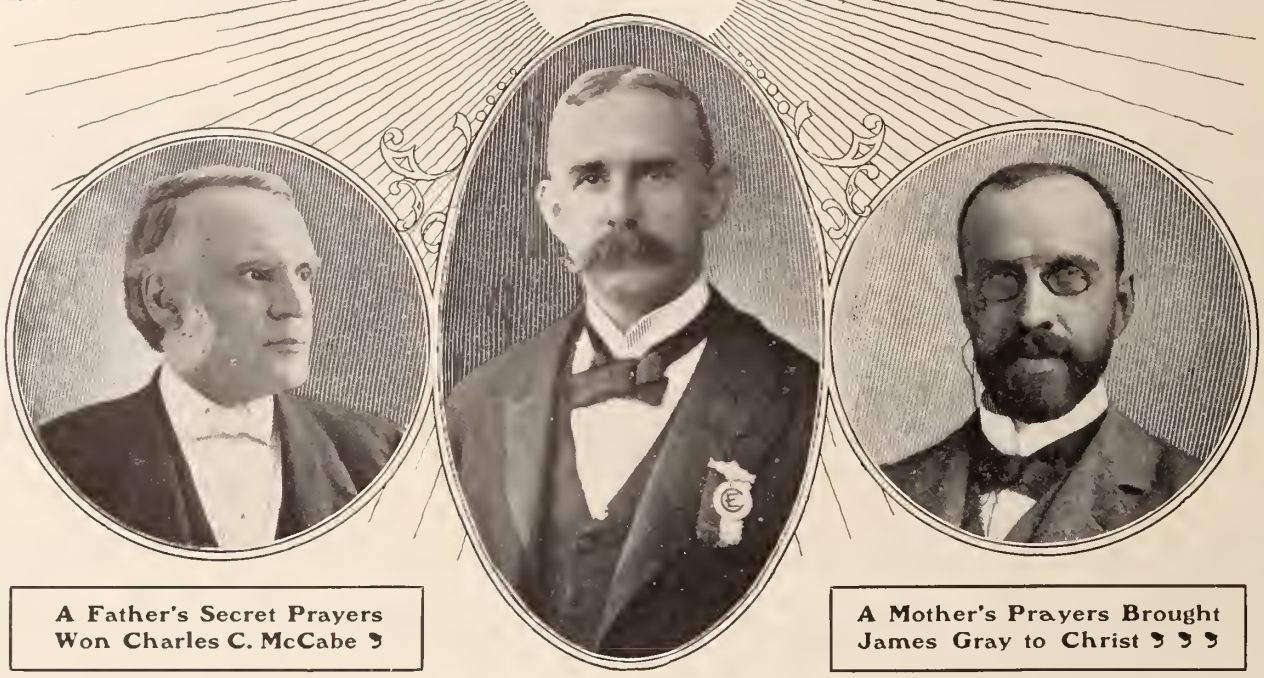
HOW THEY FOUND CHRIST

THREE GREAT SOULS THAT WERE LED INTO THE LIGHT THROUGH LOVING PARENTS' PRAYERS.



A Father's Secret Prayers Won Charles C. McCabe

A Pious Mother's Prayers Drew Francis E. Clark

A Mother's Prayers Brought James Gray to Christ

WHEN Charles C. McCabe was only eight years old he came into conscious fellowship with Jesus Christ. His father and mother were devoted members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The Bishop inherits from his father his remarkable gift of Christian song. His father often led the singing in the church, and his mother was often called on to pray in the public congregation. She was mighty in prayer. The family altar was faithfully kept up in the home of the McCabes. Bishop McCabe says: "If anyone should ask me what most impressed me in my boyhood days, I would answer: The sight of my father coming out from his secret place of prayer every day at noon." The boy knew he had been there from the gleam on his face and the peaceful and serene expression of his countenance.

The home in which Charles McCabe saw his childhood was one of boundless hospitality. His mother never was so happy as when all her spare beds were full of guests and the table was enlarged to its fullest extent. This often occurred at quarterly meeting, which was a great event in those days. The presiding elder was sure to be there and numerous brethren from the country circuits. One Sabbath morning, Charles came down stairs into the kitchen when his mother was getting breakfast. She stood in the centre of the room holding a skillet in her hand, and listening to a hymn from "Saint" Minton, as the singer was called. Mrs. McCabe was transfixed. Her eyes gleamed with holy joy as she listened. After the lapse of fifty-six years Bishop McCabe can recall the very words and manner of that song:

"What's this that steals—that steals upon my frame?
Is it death? Is it death?
That soon shall quench—shall quench this vital flame?
Is it death?

"If this be death, I soon shall be
From every pain and sorrow free.
I shall the King of Glory see.
All is well! All is well!"

Bishop McCabe avows that no tongue can tell the power that song had over him. That old man, with his face shining with the glory of the Lord; his mother standing there, exulting in her conscious full salvation, made a picture which has hung on the walls of his memory through all the years, and one to which he has often turned his reverent gaze.

That night, after the sermon, the pastor of the home church put "Saint" Minton up to exhort. There were four or five boys about the age of Charles, from eight to ten years, sitting on the front seat. In the midst of the exhorter's impassioned appeal he turned to the lads, most tenderly, and said, "Boys, you come!" They went immediately to the altar. When they knelt in prayer, almost at once Charles McCabe felt the peace of pardon and the joy of salvation enter his soul. "Fifty-six years have rolled away," says Bishop McCabe, "since that night, but its bright memory remains with me. The peace and the joy of that hour still abide."

DR. FRANCIS E. CLARK is one of the best-known Christians in the world. His face has probably been seen by more who are now living than that of any other living man. For years he has lived in the atmosphere of great Christian conventions in every part of the habitable globe. The millions of the Christian Endeavor host look up to him as leader, and love and honor him as the wise and providential founder of that great movement, which has been an inspiration to the Church during the last twenty years.

To find the beginning of Francis Clark's Christian career one must look into a little book entitled, "My Mother's Journal," which Dr. Clark has printed for private circulation. There one catches a glimpse of one of the sweetest and most beautiful characters that has ever blossomed in our American history. It is the private journal of a saint of God which a loving son has printed for circulation here and there among heavy-laden, sorrowing souls, hoping that thereby they might learn to drink of the fountain of patience and happiness.

The source of Lydia Fletcher Clark's beautiful Christian character is seen in the lines copied into her journal January 1, 1857. I quote them, hoping they may prove as great a comfort to some one else as they have proved to my own heart:

Cling to the Mighty One, cling in thy grief;
Cling to the Holy One, he gives relief.
Cling to the Gracious One, cling in thy pain;
Cling to the Faithful One, he will sustain.
Cling to the Living One, cling in thy woe;
Cling to the Loving One, through all below.
Cling to the Pardoning One, he speaketh peace;
Cling to the Healing One, anguish shall cease.
Cling to the Bleeding One, cling to his side;
Cling to the Risen One, in him abide.
Cling to the Coming One, hope shall arise;
Cling to the Reigning One, joy lights thine eyes.

Lydia Clark's life was fragrant with prayer and thanksgiving. Her husband died when Francis was but a babe, and she sought to be both father and mother to him, and though she went home to heaven when the boy she loved so well was only seven years of age, she left behind her a memory so sweet and a faith so abundant that it laid the foundation for the strong and robust Christian manhood that has since been built thereon with such grand results. On the death of his mother, Francis Clark was adopted into the family of an uncle, who was a Congregational minister in Massachusetts. The good influences of his earlier years were continued in his new home, and the truth was constantly pressed home upon him that he ought to be a Christian, and make an open confession of Christ. When he was twelve years old, his adopted father was living at Claremont, N. H., and was pastor of the Congregational church in that place. One evening, at the ordinary prayer-meeting, when there was no great excitement in any way, but some little interest that led the pastor to give the invitation to those who desired to be Christians for life to manifest it, Francis felt that the hour had come for him to take an open stand for the Lord. He set his face like a flint that day to be the friend and disciple of Jesus Christ. A few months afterward he joined the church. A few years later it would have been much more difficult, and perhaps the moment of opportunity would have passed by for him. Naturally, Dr. Clark has always believed in child-conversion and in a steady, unexcited approach to Christ on the part of children, and the absolute importance of an early commitment to the Saviour.

What a blessing Lydia Fletcher Clark has been to the world in giving it, through her son, the benediction of the great Christian Endeavor Society which has been an influence throughout the world.

THERE were three epochs in the causes which led James Gray to become the devout Christian that he is to-day. The first was in early childhood, when as a boy of six or seven years of age, he prayed to God at a certain family crisis, and his prayer was answered. His oldest brother—the stay of the family after his father's death—had been led astray and left home, to the unspeakable distress of his mother's heart, and the sore trial o the household. On night the mother wa sitting alone in th little parlor, with n light but that of th moon shining in th room, her eyes strain ed through her tear looking out into th dimly-lighted stree for the return of he absent boy.

James saw her fron his little bed in a adjoining room an was moved to run ou to her and say "Mama, does not Go hear prayer, and wil he not answer me i I ask him to bring brother back?" Then falling on his knee by her side, the little lad poured out his heart in his first rea supplication to his Heavenly Father, an returned to bed an to sleep comforted Before morning he was suddenly awak ened by unusual sounds of rejoicing in the next room, and running in he learned that he who had been lost was found. From that moment James Gray was bound to the Divine Being who answered that prayer. Prayer was thenceforth his daily habit. He felt that he had come into relationship with a great Friend.

The second epoch touched the time when he had almost attained his majority. His companionships were becoming more and more not only of a worldly but a sinful character. At this crisis, some of the active members of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York City, where he was then living, became interested in him. They prevailed on him to devote the natural gifts he possessed to the work of the Association on semi-secular lines, and soon gave him positions of honor and distinction. For the first time in his life he then began to see what Christianity, the Gospel, and salvation really meant. The lives of those young men with whom he was thus continually thrown in contact, were like the opening of a new world to young Gray. He began to meditate and to examine himself, and as he did so the scales fell from his eyes.

The third epoch in Dr. Gray's spiritual life followed when there came into his hands a book written by Dr. William Arnot, of Edinburgh, Scotland, entitled, Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth. It was a popular series of discourses on the book of Proverbs, and one night in reading it, his eyes fell on this sentence: "The soul not already won to Jesus is already lost." In an instant James Gray saw himself to be that soul, and in the next, he was upon his knees before God. God put his arms around him that night; he lifted his feet out of the miry clay, planted them upon the rock, and put a new song upon his lips. Politics and every form of worldliness lost their charm for him, and once more he began to prepare himself for the Christian ministry, which had been the desire and prayer of his mother's heart from the time of his birth. "Perhaps, therefore," says Dr. Gray, "I should say that the first cause or circumstance of my becoming a Christian was that desire and prayer of my mother, that I might be called to God into the ministry of his Son."

WASHINGTON'S NAME IN THE HALL OF FAME

REPUBLICS are ungrateful, but ours, its best-loved son
Still keeps in memory green and wreathes the name of Washington,
As year by year returns the day that saw the patriot's birth
With boom of gun and beat of drum and peals of joy and mirth,
And songs of children in the streets and march of men-at-arms,
We honor pay to him who stood serene 'mid war's alarms;
And with his ragged volunteers long kept the foe at bay,
And bore the flag to victory in many a battle's day.

We were a little nation then; so mighty have we grown
That scarce would Washington believe to-day we were his own.
With ships that sail on every sea, and sons in every port,
And harvest-fields to feed the world, wherever [food is short,
And if at council-board our chiefs are now discreet and wise,
And if to great estate and high, our farmers' lads may rise,
We owe a debt to him who set the fashion of our fame,
And never more may we forget our loftiest hero's name.

Great knightly soul who came in time to serve his country's need,
To serve her with the timely word and with the valiant deed,
Along the ages brightening as endless cycles run
Undimmed and gaining lustre in the twentieth century's sun,
First in our Hall of Fame we write the name all folk may ken,
As first in war, and first in peace, first with his countrymen.

THE BUSINESS SIDE OF THE WHITE HOUSE

THE PRIVATE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, IN THE WHITE HOUSE

IF, as has been claimed, the President of the United States receives every day more letters and telegrams than any other single official in the country, if not in the world, certainly nowhere is there in existence a more complete system for promptly considering and replying to communications of all kinds than at the Executive Mansion, at Washington. For transacting all the business that must come under the personal attention of the highest official in the nation there are available five moderately sized rooms in the second story of the White House, and yet in these cramped quarters there is at work a staff which never comprises less than twenty persons, and often aggregates twice that number.

The one individual who stands between the Chief Executive and the general public, whether it seeks to reach his ear by mail, or telegraph, or personal visit, is the Secretary to the President. This official receives a salary of $5,000 a year. The daily mail at the White House ranges all the way from two hundred letters, when affairs are tranquil, to three times that number when a new president has just been elected, or war or other serious trouble seems to be impending. Ever since the present incumbent came into office, it has been a rule that every person who addressed the President should have the courtesy of a reply, and, moreover, that, whenever possible, the reply should be dispatched by return mail.

Of course, only a small number of letters, perhaps not more than eight or ten a day, actually come under the eye of the President, although it may be necessary for the Secretary to inquire his wishes in matters brought up in some of the others. An even smaller number of communications represents the President's actual letter-writing. Indeed, save an occasional letter to a relative or close personal friend, he writes nothing by hand, preferring to dictate to one of the assistant secretaries and sign the letters, as does the average business man. These assistant secretaries, by the way, relieve the Secretary of some of the work of dictation in the case of letters requiring stereotyped or commonplace answers. Between them, they keep three or four stenographers working at the highest possible speed.

In this busy, rushing age, the mails are entirely too slow for many of the President's communications, and thus it comes about that the telegraph and cipher bureau, which adjoins the President's private office, constitutes one of the most important adjuncts of the White House. From this little telegraph office, which is not closed for a single minute during the year, there have been sent out an average of ten thousand telegrams every month during the past three years. One or two dozen operators who work here in three "shifts" of from four to eight men each, are the most expert telegraphers in the country, and they can "take" messages from the wire direct to a typewriter at a rate of seventy words a minute. All of the operators are what are known as "code" men, which means that they are capable of sending and receiving messages in any one of the dozen different codes used by the President and the State, War and Navy Departments.

All that has been said relative to the completeness of the telegraph equipment of this greatest of information bureaus, may apply with equal force to the telephone facilities, for whereas twenty telegraph wires enter on one side of the room, fifteen telephone wires have a terminus on the other. By this means the President may talk direct to any city in the country, and the value of this was demonstrated during the Chinese trouble in the summer of 1900, when the President, during his vacation sojourn at Canton, talked for hours daily with the White House. In this novel bureau there are also private 'phones connected with the Senate and House of Representatives, and most wonderful of all, an automatic telephone whereby the President is enabled to communicate privately with any of his cabinet members without the possibility that anybody will overhear the conversation.

* * *

A word should perhaps be said regarding an interesting feature of the President's system of communication in the provision of what might be termed identification map. Covering the walls of the telegraph and telephone room are immense maps of America's new possessions, and, indeed, of all parts of the world. Upon these giant maps are marked, by means of pins carrying miniature flags, the position of every organization (infantry, cavalry, artillery and engineer) in the United States Army, every transport, and every war vessel, in the Navy. The name of the company, battery, squadron, or ship is plainly inscribed on the flag, and the pin is adjusted to correspond to every move of the force which it represents. Thus, the President may determine at a glance the exact whereabouts of any officer with whom he may desire to communicate.

LEADING EVENTS OF THE CLOSING ONE HUNDRED CENTURY

AN eventful century truly has been this Nineteenth Century of the Christian era, now within a month of its close. From whatsoever standpoint it is regarded, its history is marvelous. In the knowledge we have gained during its progress, of our own globe, it stands unparalleled. A glance at the two maps on this page shows the contrast between the map as it was in 1800 and the map as it now is. In the former, blank spaces representing unexplored regions appear in America, Australia, Asia and Africa, but, thanks to daring travelers, these are now filled in our present maps, and expeditions are now pressing northward and southward to discover the conditions existing in the Arctic and Antarctic regions. There has been wonderful progress also in science, in education, and in the adaptation of natural forces to human purposes. Political and territorial changes, too, have made this a very different world from that of 1800. It is not possible in small space to even mention the events which make the century memorable, but it may be interesting to recall a hundred, which, if not the most important, are those that have had the greatest influence in shaping and developing the condition of the nations.

MAKING THE MOST OF WEALTH.

MISS GOULD'S HOME AT LYNDHURST

THE MISTRESS OF LYNDHURST WRITES OF THE OPPORTUNITIES OF THE RICH

GREAT WEALTH A STEWARDSHIP AND NOT A MEANS OF PERSONAL GRATIFICATION : : :

MISS HELEN MILLER GOULD needs no introduction to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They are familiar with her many good works and with those sterling qualities of character that have made hers the leading and best-beloved name among American women. In all that has to do with benevolence, philanthropy and human kindness, she has for a number of years borne an active and prominent part, and her gentleness, no less than her modesty and the excellent discrimination she exercises in the uses to which she puts her great wealth, have won her the admiration of the nation. Our soldiers and sailors well-nigh worship her. Her generosity to the children of the poor and to invalids has made her name a household word in the humble homes of the land.

We are privileged to-day to publish a letter from Miss Gould which cannot fail to interest everyone who has given even a passing thought to the subject of the responsibilities that attach to the possession of great riches. Is wealth a stewardship, and are we responsible for the use we make of it? In her letter, Miss Gould clearly takes this view. She discusses the various methods in which wealth may be made a blessing; how it may be applied to the highest advantage and to the noblest purposes. Her whole life is a beautiful illustration of the practical application of the great principles she advocates. This is her letter to the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

LYNDHURST, Irvington-on-the-Hudson.

MR. LOUIS KLOPSCH: Dear Sir—Your letter of recent date is at hand, asking my opinion on the subject, "How to Make the Most of Wealth." It is a topic on which I am not well-qualified to speak, and I would suggest that you make this same inquiry of some of our leading clergymen, whose views on the subject would be a great inspiration to us all.

The Christian idea that wealth is a stewardship, or trust, and not to be used for one's personal pleasure alone, but for the welfare of others, certainly seems the noblest; and those who have more money or broader culture owe a debt to those who have had fewer opportunities. And there are so many ways one can help!

Facsimile of a Paragraph of Miss Gould's Letter on Christian Stewardship

Children, the sick and the aged especially, have claims on our attention, and the forms of work for them are numerous: from kindergartens, day-nurseries and industrial schools, to "homes" and hospitals. Our institutions for higher education require gifts in order to do their best work, for the tuition fees do not cover the expense of the advantages offered; and certainly such societies as those in our churches, and the Young Woman's Christian Association and the Young Men's Christian Association, deserve our hearty cooperation. The earnest workers who so nobly and lovingly give their lives to promote the welfare of others, give far more than though they had simply made gifts of money, so those who cannot afford to give largely need not feel discouraged on that account. After all, sympathy and good-will may be a greater force than wealth, and we can all extend to others a kindly feeling and courteous consideration, that will make life sweeter and better.

Sometimes it seems to me we do not sufficiently realize the good that is done by money that is used in the different industries in giving employment to great numbers of people under the direction of clever men and women; and surely it takes more ability, perseverance and time to successfully manage such an enterprise than to merely make gifts.

You will, I am sure, be sorry you have made the inquiry of me, since I have given you so little information, but I think you can easily obtain opinions that will probably be far more helpful than mine. Believe me, very truly,

DRESS AS AN AID TO HAPPINESS

...BY...
AMELIA E. BARR

DRESS is a very important stepping-stone to happiness. As all nature is the garment of God, by which he is manifest to us; as the Spirit is clothed by the body, and the body in turn is made beautiful or repulsive by the indwelling soul, so is dress related to the body. For, supposing a man or a woman to have sufficient money to dress according to desire, then attire becomes to mind all that form is to substance. It is an index, a symbolic language: so much so, that a lover having seen his mistress in her various costumes has the key to her character, if he have wit enough to use it.

Taken as a national index of character, dress is the outward sign of a people's peculiar genius. Their square, graceless, scant clothes were as characteristic of the Egyptians as their pyramids and obelisks. The loose, ample robes of Asiatics are the natural drapery of a luxurious temperament. The elegance of the ancient Greek costume was the raiment of a race to whom form was more than color. The homeliness of Saxon fashions, the rude magnificence of Norman barons, the picturesque garb of the Scotch clans; indeed, all national costumes, have a far deeper significance than vanity: and some Daniel will yet arise who shall judge the centuries by the way in which they have dressed themselves.

More familiar to us, is the cosmical change going on under our own eyes—a change that as a sign of our era, is quite as remarkable as any indicated—the rapid disappearance of all national and class costumes. The pretty, suitable dresses that clothed the peasantry of all countries are being rapidly abandoned; and men and women grow more and more cosmopolitan in matters of attire. In every land, women now wear the same gowns and bonnets; and every respectable man on the planet is supposed to have a tweed suit and a Derby hat. This means much more than fashion and vanity; it means the grinding to powder in the democratic mill, of all signs and symbols of slavery, feudalism, and man's inequality. It means that men and women are everywhere throwing off the bondage of caste, and asserting through their coats and hats and dresses that one human being is just as good as another.

MRS. AMELIA E. BARR

Now if dress has such a pronounced and wide national significance, its personal power is even more remarkable. We are all influenced, not only by what others wear, but by what we wear ourselves. The business suit of good, dark tweed, the white, fine linen, the stiff collar and cuffs, give a kind of moral support, and inspire confidence. A loose, careless dress conduces to a loose, careless habit of mind. There is a positive value in the different suits that men wear, because they are a positive help to the frame of mind necessary for the occasion.

A suit that is associated with the respect due to the sanctuary is best for that purpose; there is a sober respectable dress that fits naturally into business moods; another that seems proper—because usual—in formal festivities; another of loose, easy comfort for domestic relaxation and rest.

A man's happiness, yea, his success, in a far greater measure than is suspected, depends upon such auxiliaries. And it may be taken as an axiom, that a man careless as to his dress will be careless about every other matter. And there is no excuse for such an one at this day; for in spite of criticism, the male dress of our period is sensible and healthy, and highly conducive to comfort and happiness; the soft hat, the easy coats, the light flannel garments and soft ties permissible in hot weather, leave nothing to be desired, especially as men have generally abandoned black, the most unhealthy of all colors.

The fundamental theory of clothes, then, asserts the existence of harmony between human beings and their artificial covering; and also harmony between human beings and the work in which they are occupied, or the circumstances in which they are placed. Will Honeycomb says that he "can tell the humor a woman is in by the color of her hood." The saying is a profound one, and if husbands would make a study of their wives' ribbons and gowns and toilet peculiarities they might avoid many matrimonial blunders. I knew once a very wise man who always went softly and considered his words well when his wife came to the breakfast table in a certain red shawl. I have not the slightest doubt that an individual observance of this sympathy between dress and moods would save many a domestic quarrel, and so conduce to much happiness.

It is indeed impossible for the most arbitrary fashion to eradicate, in sensitive women especially, certain tendencies to symbolize their states of mind by their dress. Most of my female readers, I dare say, possess bonnets and gowns that they can only wear on days when they are "at their best," when they "are equal to them." There are days and moods in which curled, or loose wandering hair is intolerable. Any man of ordinary tact or intelligence may know that when a woman's hair is brushed tightly back and rigidly coiled, when her bright ribbons are hidden in drawers, her pink and blue dresses hung at the back of her wardrobe, and when she herself appears severely clad in her black alpaca, that the woman is in an inquiring, reforming temper; that she is going to look into expenses, and call children and servants to account. And if he is discreet, he will not interfere nor ask questions, for the plainly-dressed woman means business, which may fairly be called "happiness-making."

It is a very useless thing to advise a young man as to the girl he ought to marry. Yet the marrying man may well take dress into close consideration. He may, for instance, be sure that any girl who, without appearing singular, can keep at a good distance from any prevailing fashion will make a good wife. This, not because it is a proof of her being quiet and modest, but because it gives evidence of her possessing an art of great importance in domestic happiness—the art of making the best of herself. Most modes of fashion carried to extremes are ugly. It is a hunch here, and a bunch there, too much drapery in one place, and not enough in another; health, propriety, and beauty are sinned against, without compromise. The girl, then, who knows how to steer clear of these evils and yet no look singular, is an adroit girl, who wil make the best of herself, and of all th circumstances she may encounter in life.

Women, as well as men, require variet in dress in order to be happy, not onl for their moods but for their work Work is easier when we come to i with a dress that makes it possible Pleasure is not pleasure without the rai ment of festivity. Into the sanctuary, a good woman likes to come clothed wit the grave, spotless garments of worshi As an adjunct to happiness, dress has a importance we hardly realize. It is conservative, not only of good tempe and self-respect, but also of love. Th woman who dresses herself to pleas those she loves wears an enchanted robe embroidered with affection. The dres may be of ordinary stuff, but it has bee touched by her life-thought and embalm ed in her love. A different colored dress a bow of fresh ribbon, a bit of white lace Such little things as they are! Such great things as they are!

"Vanity, vanity!" is an old, worn-ou cry with regard to dress. Men an women both have a right to make th most and the best of themselves. It i not vain to clothe the body suitably ac cording as we can afford it, with beaut and grace. A woman without the ar lacks one of the greatest of movin forces. She neither does herself, nor he husband, nor her family, justice. We ar constantly told that beauty is only ski deep—that beauty is vain—and so on But there are twenty things just as vai as beauty. As far as domestic satisfac tion goes, the pleasure of being beautifu is just as keen a pleasure as that of bein clever; and perhaps the more amiable o the two. It is no more sin in a woma to thank God for the fair looks an pretty clothing which enable her to de light others, than it is for a man to than God for his accumulation of money, an his ability to use it in making other happy.

The value of dress does not diminis with age. Not only for the young i recognition of this necessary. In clothe clean and fresh there is a kind of youth with which age should surround itself There are men and women who are mor beautiful in their age than in their youth Beautiful the faded hair and complexion the softer smile, the tenderer eyes! Th white hair may be shaded with lace whiter still; and the neck covered wit snowy kerchief; and the fading form draped in soft, dark colors. This perfec harmony is as fair in its order as that o the most buxom youth; it is the autumn o life, and its loveliness lasts until heaven' eternal spring begins.

· · · LITTLE · MAIDS · OF · CUBA · · ·

THE little maids of Cuba, here reproduced in pictures, all belong to well-to-do families. The little daughters of the upper classes are seldom seen in the public streets, for the first thing they are taught is that it is not modest to exhibit themselves to the stare of passing strangers. Every Cuban house has a patio, or courtyard, filled with flowers and birds, and often a fountain playing in the centre, and in these the little daughters of the best families of the island must pass their play hours. Here, and not in the streets, they must take their dollies, or study their school lessons, or tame their little paroquets—a favorite bird in most tropical islands. Thus, from childhood, Cuban girls are taught the virtue of modesty. They may not play with boys, unless a duenna, or chaperone (who may be mama or any member of a household), is present. They may not go alone through the streets to school, but must be accompanied by a governess or some grown-up person. Every little girl of good family can play the piano, for Cuba is a music-loving country. But she may not play before strangers until she can play whole "pieces" and use the pedal. As part of her education, too, she is taught the duties of a housewife, for she is given to understand that it is right and proper to marry as soon as possible after her sixteenth birthday. So she is taught to cook, to sew, to "clean house," to entertain, and above all, to economize.

As a rule, the little maids of Cuba, with their bright, black eyes, and their wealth of shining, black hair, are the sweetest and fairest of their sex in the sunny tropics.

There is another side to this pretty picture of child-life. To those who have been interested in the little reconcentrado orphans of Cuba, it will be a pleasure to know that many schools are being established in their behalf. One school and home established by an American, Mr Hubbard, at Matanzas, has about fifty little Cuban children, who are being trained in truthfulness and honesty. One young American lady sold her watch to pay for her ticket to Cuba to help teach these poor children. She is still mothering the little Cuban girls "without money and without price." Mr. Hubbard, who opened and supported the school with his own means, has sacrificed his library and a collection of curios gathered while he was in Japan, to maintain his work among the poor Cuban children.

What Christian America is Doing for India

8,000 FAMINE ORPHANS NOW PROVIDED FOR—AN EYE-WITNESS TELLS OF RELIEF WORK

DURING his recent tour in India, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was accompanied through the famine districts by Mr. Gilson Willets, a well-known American writer, who was a deeply interested and sympathetic observer of the misery and suffering that confronted the visitors on every side. Together they went to the famine villages, the crowded hospitals, the poorhouses and orphanages. They saw the crowds of emaciated children parentless or deserted, like poor little stray lambs, slowly perishing of starvation in the fields and on the highways. They noted the keen, eager faces of the adults when they were told that the good people of America had come to their rescue, and they heard the blessings that poured, amid sobs and tears, from the lips of those that were given timely help.

What Mr. Willets saw impressed him with the splendid opportunity that was presented of bringing the suffering multitudes of India into the Christian fold by the power of kindness. He felt, too, that the opportunity of rescuing and caring for the child-waifs, orphaned and homeless through the famine, was a precious one, through which the Christian world might accomplish more toward the ultimate evangelization of India than by any other means. Mr. Willets gives this touching picture of the famine children of India, as he saw them:

"In the streets of Bombay there were hundreds of them wandering about. With sunken eyes, hollow cheeks and indented temples; with weary, weak, skeleton legs, they dogged the footsteps of Europeans, crying, 'Salam, sahib,' which is their way of saying, 'Peace to you.' Then, slapping their hollow and naked stomachs to emphasize their need of food, they continued their piteous supplications, begging for just enough food to keep them alive for another hour. One day, in a big village, I was watching the grain dealers doling out rice to those who could buy, when two little starving boys, the elder one leading his little brother, fell down in front of the shop from sheer exhaustion. The grain dealer never noticed them, though he might have helped them very practically. The younger boy's chest heaved up and down rapidly, his mouth flew wide open, he rolled on his side, and presently his limbs stiffened in death. His brother looked on for a few moments stupidly, then suddenly, in great affright, sprang to his feet and ran away. That was all there was in the death of a child in India just then.

"Once inside a mission compound, however, the poor little starveling, if care and food do not come too late, is supported by funds sent to the missionaries by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Among the many starving orphan children gathered in from the fields by Dr. Taylor and his wife, missionaries at Ahmedabad, there came one little girl who insisted upon entering the house. She came into the library, and after a brief look about lisped in her own tongue, 'Please, may I die here?' and then threw herself down on the floor and went to sleep. It is gratifying to add that the long sleep and the hot milk afterwards given to this child saved her from death, and she is now a most promising member of the flock of orphans in Mr. Taylor's missionary care.

"Throughout our long journey through the famine area Dr. Klopsch was indefatigable in his efforts to secure facts and in studying how best to help the sufferers. After facing all the perils of cholera camps and the infected wards of hospitals and poorhouses, he returned to America without availing himself of the opportunity for visiting any of the famous places for which India is renowned. On the return voyage, we passed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD steamship Quito, loaded with its magnificent gift of American corn, somewhere in the Red Sea. That corn, I doubt not, saved thousands upon thousands of lives. The grand reception given the corn-ship on her arrival in Bombay, the gratitude of the natives wherever the grain, the 'heavenly food' they called it, was distributed, are now matters of history. The distribution of the relief fund of $600,000 raised by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the coming of that cargo of corn affected the religious future of the whole Hindu race in a larger degree than anything has done since the Gospel was first preached there. The fact that it was sent by a people living ten thousand miles away, out of pure benevolence, has moved the hearts of the Indian people as ten thousand missionaries and a million sermons could never have moved them.

"The Hindus themselves have expressed deepest gratitude. One venerable native, watching the issue of the corn to the poor, emaciated sufferers, turning to a missionary, asked: 'Was this grain sent out of pure charity, given outright, free of any charge?' Upon receiving the reply that it was given for the love of God and man, he said: 'Well, sir, I am an old man, and in all my life I have never seen or heard of anything equal in unselfishness to this.'

"During the distribution of the corn, the bags served the famine children as umbrellas during the rains. The eager little ones found it hard to wait their turn till the bags were emptied, one by one; they then wore them proudly over their heads while going to and from school or working in the gardens.

"While visiting the various relief camps and poorhouses, I was impressed with the predominance of children among the starving. Everywhere scores of them sat patiently on the ground in perfect silence, and almost immovable, staring vacantly into space, as if stupefied by their sufferings. Through our interpreters I talked to them. To the questions, Where is your mother? your father? your brothers or sisters? the invariable reply was: 'Don't know, sahib,' or 'Dead, sahib.' Little boys and girls, only two years old, tottered about, compelled to look after themselves at that age, like little men and women. Their food was handed to them once or twice a day, but beyond that they received no attention. The majority of the children survived, and students of the India famines have found that the proportion of little ones who succumb is far less than among adults. Hence it is that, when the famine is over, those who most need help are the boys and girls who have lost their parents through separation or death.

"The saddest, most touching sight to be seen in India is that of a child wandering along the highway, not knowing which way to turn, ignored by all of his own race, and utterly lost unless picked up by a missionary. While crossing the barren fields from one poorhouse to another, I frequently chanced upon just such a waif, sitting in solitary misery on the ground, unaware that he was simply waiting for Death to come and take him. Some of the members of our party saw to it, of course, that each such bit of human driftwood was taken to the nearest mission station.

"In from three to five years these adopted waifs will be self-supporting men and women, and will themselves become missionaries of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, of a higher civilization, of thrift and economy, of clean character and clean bodies.

"It is very gratifying to see that the American people through the same source, are continuing the good work by adopting and providing for the thousands of famine orphans. By this glorious work of child-saving, I believe the East will be more than ever impressed with the Christian religion, so different from their own, since it both preaches and practices 'Help ye one another,' no matter where, or who. The fact that a child in India can be fed, clothed, sheltered and educated in a missionary orphanage for a whole year for the trifling sum of $15 ought to lead to the adoption of many thousand orphans by our generous-hearted people, especially as a patron may designate the sex of the protege, and even the particular denomination into which he wishes it to be received. I understand that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already received more than 3,000 adoption pledges, all of which have been forwarded to missionaries in India.

"What a vast array of little folks these 3,000 would make! The other day, in speaking before the Brooklyn branch of the Y. M. C. A., I called attention to this fact, and also that the proprietor of the same journal had already cabled a year's support for 5,000 additional famine orphans, making 8,000 in all, for which he and his readers have provided for up to this time—5,000 little heathen children practically transformed into Christians by a single cablegram—for that, under Divine blessing, will be the result. Just think of it! The average Sunday School does not exceed 250. If any one person, or group of persons, were to adopt and provide for the support—the clothing, feeding, sheltering and training—of 8,000 Sunday School children, the whole attendance of thirty-two Sunday Schools, it would be a theme for every pulpit and newspaper in America."

Our Plan for India Orphan Adoption

BETWEEN now and January 1, 1901, for the purpose of adopting all the famine orphans now in the hands of our American missionaries in India—who should be supplied with the necessary funds for the support of these orphans, and not be compelled to divert missionary funds for that purpose—we call upon every Church in the United States, of whatever denomination, to adopt one single orphan. And we appeal to the reader of this announcement to present it to the pastor of the Church to which he belongs, and to urge upon him compliance with the foregoing request. Should it be impracticable for any Church to undertake the support of one orphan, at the rate of five cents a day, the members of the Sunday School, or the Young People's Society might be induced to assume the obligation. In its first issue in March next, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will publish the names of every Church, Young People's Society, Sunday School and Foreign Missionary Society which, responding to this call, has undertaken the support of at least one orphan. We hope that every denomination will be largely represented in this monumental Christian charity, which is the crown of glory of the closing nineteenth century.

The Quality of Patience

...A NEW SERMON BY...

REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

TEXT: Hebrews 10: 36:
"Ye have need of patience"

YES, we are in awful need of it: some of us have a little of it, and some of us have none at all. There is less of this grace in the world than of almost any other. Faith, Hope and Charity are all abloom in hundreds of souls, where you find one specimen of patience. Paul, the author of the text, on a conspicuous occasion, lost his patience with a coworker, and from the way he urges this virtue upon the Hebrews, upon the Corinthians, upon the Thessalonians, upon the Romans, upon the Colossians, upon the young theological student, Timothy, I conclude he was speaking out of his own need of more of this excellence. And I only wonder that Paul had any nerves left. Imprisonment, flagellation, Mediterranean cyclone, arrest for treason and conspiracy, the wear and tear of preaching to angry mobs, those at the door of a theatre and those on the rocks of Mars Hill, left him emaciated and invalid, and with a broken voice, and sore eyes, and nerves ajangle. He gives us a snap-shot of himself when he describes his appearance and his sermonic delivery by saying, "In bodily presence weak, and in speech contemptible," and refers to his inflamed eyelids when, speaking of the ardent friendship of the Galatians he says, "If it had been possible ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me." We all admire most that which we have least of: those of us with unimpressive visage most admire beauty; those of us with discordant voice most extol musical cadence; those of us with stammering speech most wonder at eloquence; those of us who get provoked at trifles and are naturally irascible, appreciate in others the equipoise and the calm endurance of patience. So Paul, with hands tremulous with the agitations of a life-time, writes of the "God of patience" and of "Ministers of God in much patience," and of "Patience of hope," and speaks of those "strengthened with all might to all patience," and looks us all full in the face as he makes the charge, "Ye have need of patience."

When Patience is Easy

Some of the people ordinarily most excellent have a deficit in this respect. That man who is the impersonation of amiability, his mouth full of soft words, and his face a spring morning, if a passing wheel splash the mud across his broadcloth, see how he colors up, and hear him denounce the passing Jehu. The Christian woman an angel of suavity, now that some social slight is put upon her or her family, hear how her utterance increases in intensity. Oh, it is easy enough to be patient when there is nothing to be patient about. When the bank-account is good, and in no danger of being overdrawn, and the wardrobe is crowded with apparel appropriate for the cold, or the heat, or the wet, and all the family have attested their health by keen appetites at a loaded table, and the newspapers, if they mention us at all, put right construction upon what we do or say, and we can walk ten miles without getting tired, and we sleep eight solid hours without turning from side to side, the most useless grace I can think of is patience. It has no business anywhere in your house; you have no more need of it than of a life-preserver while you are walking the pavement of a city. Do not boast that you are placid and optimistic and free from the spirit of scold. If those who are unfortunate could change lots with you they would be just as sunshiny. It is not religion that makes you so happy, but capacity to digest your food in three hours and enough coupons cut off to meet all your expenses, and complimentary mention, and capacity to leave your horses in the stable because you need a brisk walk down the avenue. All your sublime equilibrium of temperament is the result of worldly success. But suppose things mightily change with you, as they sometimes do change. You begin to go down hill, and it is amazing how many there are to help you down when you begin to go in that direction. Under the harrowing worriment you get a distressful feeling at the base of your brain. Insomnia and nervous dyspepsia lay hold of you. Your health goes down with your fortune. Your circle of acquaintances narrows, and where once you were oppressed by the fact that you had not time enough to return one-half of the social calls made upon you, now the card-basket in your hallway is empty, and your chief callers are your creditors and the family physician, who comes to learn the effect of the last prescription. Now you need something that you have not. But I know of a reinforcement that you can have if you will accept it. Yonder comes up the road or the sidewalk

A Messenger of God.

Her attire is unpretending. She has no wings, for she is not an angel, but there is something in her countenance that implies rescue and deliverance. She comes up the steps that once were populous with the affluent, and into the hallway where the tapestry is getting faded and frayed, the place now all empty of worldly admirers. I will tell you her name if you would like to know it. Paul baptised her, and gave her the right name. She is not brilliant, but strong. There is a deep quietude in her manner, and a firmness in her tread, and in her hand is a scroll revealing her mission. She comes from heaven. She was born in the throne-room of the king. This is Patience. "Ye have need of patience."

Many of the nations of the earth have put their admiration of this virtue into proverb or epigram. One of those Eastern proverbs says, "With time and patience the mulberry leaf becomes satin." A Spanish proverb says, "If I have lost the rings, here are the fingers still." The Italian proverb says, "The world is his who has patience." The English proverb declares, "When one door shuts, another opens." All these proverbs only put in another way Paul's terseness when he says, "Ye have need of patience."

First, patience with the faults of others. No one keeps the Ten Commandments equally well. One's temperament decides which commandments he shall come nearest to keeping. If we break some of the commandments ourselves, why be so hard on those who break others of the ten? If you and I run against one verse of the twentieth chapter of Exodus, why should we so severely excoriate those who run against another verse of the same chapter? Until we are perfect ourselves, we ought to be lenient with Our Neighbor's Imperfection.

Yet the man most vulnerable is often the most hypercritical. Perhaps he is profane, and yet has no tolerance for theft, when profanity is worse than theft, for while the latter is robbery of a man, the former is robbery of God. Perhaps he is given to defamation and detraction, and yet feels himself better than some one who is guilty of manslaughter, not realizing that the assassination of character is the worst kind of assassination. The laver for washing in the ancient tabernacle was at its side burnished like a looking-glass, so that those who approached that laver might see their need of washing, and if by the Gospel looking-glass we discovered our own need of moral cleansing, we would be more economic of denunciation. The most of those who go wrong are the victims of circumstances, and if you and I had been rocked in the same iniquitous cradle and been all our lives surrounded by the same baleful influences, we would probably have done just as badly, perhaps worse. In most cases you had better pity more and scold less. Here is a man down in the ditch of misdoing. A self-righteous soul comes along and looks down at him and says, "There is a man down in the ditch. He had no business to fall into it. He is suffering the consequences of his own wrong-doing. No one but himself is to blame." And the hard-hearted man passes on. But here comes a warm-hearted, sympathetic, Christian man. He says, "There is a man down in the ditch, I must get him out. God help me to get him out." And standing there on the edge of the ditch, the good man soliloquizes and says to himself, "If I had had as bad a father and mother as he had, and all the surroundings of my life had been as depraving as those that have cursed him, I myself would probably have been down in the ditch; and if that man had been blessed with as good a father and mother as I have, and he had been surrounded by the kindly influences which have encompassed all my days, he would probably have been standing here looking down at me in the ditch." Then the good man bends over and says to the fallen one, "Brother, give me your hand," and with one stout grip, lifts him up to God and heaven. There are wounds of the world that need the probe, but the most of the wounds want an application of ointment or salve, and we ought to have three or four boxes of that in our pocket as we go out into the world. We all need to carry more of the "Balm of Gilead," and less caustic; more benediction and less anathema. When I find a professed Christian man harsh and merciless in his estimate of others, I silently wonder if he has not been misusing trust-funds, or beating his wife. There is something awful the matter with him.

Gospel Medicament

We also have need of patience with slow results of Christian work. We want to see our attempts to do good immediately successful. The world is improving, but improving at so deliberate a rate. Why not more rapidity and momentum? Other wheels turn so swiftly, why not the Gospel chariot take speed electric? I do not know. I only know that it is God's way. While I was thinking of this sermon I looked out of my window of Hotel Metropole, London, and I saw fifty-eight men busy on some lots where a great building, or a row of buildings, is to be erected. Some were managing a derrick with which the earth was being swung to carts that were to carry it off; some were with sledge hammers pounding the iron into the hard ground so as to loosen it; some were with pick-ax striking into the embankment; some were delving with the shovel; some were pushing the loaded wheelbarrow. I do not suppose that one of them had seen the architect's plan, and none of them lay awake nights anxious lest the building be not completed at the right time, or for fear the structure would be badly proportioned. After it is all done, they may sometimes pass by with a kit of tools and say, with some satisfaction, "I helped build those storehouses." So we are God's workmen, and all we have to do is to manage our own hammer, or ax, or trowel, until the night comes in which no man can work; and when the work is all completed we will have a right to say, rejoicingly, "Thank God, I was privileged to help in the rearing of that temple. I had a part in the work of the world's redemption."

Again, we have need of patience under wrong inflicted, and who escapes it in some form? It comes to all people in professional life in the shape of being misunderstood. Because of this, how many people fly to newspapers for an explanation. You see their card signed by their own name declaring they did not say this or did not do that. They fluster and worry, not realizing that every man comes to be taken for what he is worth, and you cannot, by any newspaper puff, be taken for more than you are worth, nor by any newspaper depreciation be put down. There is a spirit of fairness abroad in the world, and if you are a public man you are classified among the friends or foes of society. If you are a friend of society you will find plenty of adherents, and if you are the foe of society you Cannot Escape Reprehension.

Paul, you were right when you said, not more to the Hebrews than to us, "Ye have need of patience." I adopted a rule years ago which has been of great service to me, and it may be of some service to you: Cheerfully consent to be misunderstood. God knows whether we are right or wrong, whether we are trying to serve him or damage his cause. When you can cheerfully consent to be misunderstood, many of the annoyances and vexations of life will quit your heart, and you will come into calmer seas than you have ever sailed on. The most misunderstood being that ever trod the earth was the glorious Christ. The world misunderstood his cradle, and concluded that one so poorly born could never be of much importance. They charged him with inebriety and called him a wine-bibber. The Sanhedrim misunderstood him, and when it was put to the vote whether he was guilty or not of treason, he got but one vote, while all the others voted "Aye, aye." They misunderstood his cross, and concluded that if he had divine power he would effect his own rescue. They misunderstood his grave, and declared that his body had been stolen by infamous resurrectionists. He so fully consented to be misunderstood, that harried and slapped and submerged with scorn, he answered not a word. You cannot come up to that, but you can imitate in some small degree the patience of Christ.

I admire exceedingly the behavior of that farmer at Sedan, who, when the great battle was going on between the armies of Germany and France, and the air was full of the sound of whistling bullets and bursting shells, kept right on ploughing in his field, making straight furrows, now this way and now that. He had his work to do, and as he did not feel called to fight, he Felt Called to Plow.

Bravo! I say for that man. Bravo! I say for you, if you allow nothing to divert you and nothing to alarm, though all the artillery of human and Satanic hate rage about you, keep right on plowing.

Again, this grace is needed to help in time of physical ailments. What vast multitudes are in perpetual pain while others are subject to occasional paroxysm! Almost everyone has some disorder to which he is occasionally subjected. It is rheumatism, or neuralgia, or sick-headache, or indigestion. A draft from an open window or hasty mastication, or overwork, brings on that old spell, and you think you would rather have almost anything else: but that is because you have not tried the other. Everyone has something which he wishes he had not. There are scores of diseases ever ready to attack the human frame. It is amazing how persistent and methodic those disorders are in their attack on the world, and how regular is the harvest which with the sharp scythe of pain they mow down for the grave. They do their work in the order I name, and you may depend upon their keeping on in that same order for a good while yet: first of all tuberculosis, next organic heart-disease, next pneumonia: next in number of its victims is apoplexy, next Bright's disease, next cancer, next typhoid fever, next paralysis. Those eight diseases are the worst despoilers of human life. The doctors with solutions and lancets, and anodynes and cataplasms, are in a brave fight against these physiological devils that try to possess the human race. But after all the scientists can do there is a demand for patience. Nothing can take the place of that. It is needed this moment in every sick-room, and along the streets and in business places and shops where bread-winners are compelled to toil, when physically incompetent to move a pen or calculate a column of figures, or control a shovel. But every pastor could show you instances of complete happiness under physical suffering. He could take you to that garret or to that hospital, or to some room in his parish where sits in rocking-chair or lies upon a pillow, someone who has not seen a well day in ten years, and yet has never been heard to utter a word of complaint. The grace of God has triumphed in her soul as it never triumphs in the soul of one who is vigorous and athletic. That grace helped the soldier during the American Civil War. His arm had been amputated, and he said to a delegate of the Christian Commission: "It seems to me I cannot be grateful enough for losing my arm; it made me thoughtful, and opened the way for your delegates to visit me." My friend, do not give up useful activities because you are in pain. Some of the world's best work has been done while in physical distress. Walter Scott was in agony of pain while writing Ivanhoe. Oh beautiful grace of patience! It takes discords and turns them into harmony. It smooths the chopped sea. It kindles gloom into glow. It turns requiem into grand march. It trusts when it cannot understand. It forgives before forgiveness is asked. Gracious God! Give it to us; give it to us now; give it to us in abundance.

Now, let us this hour turn over a new leaf, and banish worriment and care out of all our lives. Just see how these perversities have multiplied wrinkles in your face and accidulated your disposition, and torn your nerves. You are ten years older than you ought to be.

Do Two Things

one for the betterment of your spiritual condition and the other for the safety of your worldly interests. First, get your heart right with God by being pardoned through the atonement of Jesus Christ. That will give security for your soul's welfare. Then get your life insured in some well-established life-insurance company. That will take from you all anxiety about the welfare of your household in case of your sudden demise. The sanitary influence of such insurance is not sufficiently understood. Many a bread-winner long since deceased, would now have been alive and well but for the reason that when he was prostrated he saw that in case of his decease his family would go to the poorhouse, or have an awful struggle for daily bread. But for that anxiety he would have got well; that anxiety defied all that the best physicians could do. Supposing these two duties attended to, the one for the safety of your soul in this world and the next, and the other for the safety of your family if you pass out of this life, make a new start. If possible have your family sitting-room where you can let in the sunlight. Have a musical instrument if you can afford it. Let bright colors dominate in your room. If there are pictures on the wall let them not be suggestive of battle-fields which are always cruel, of death-beds which are always sad, or partings which are always heart-breaking. There are enough present woes in the world without the perpetual commemoration of past miseries. If you sing in your home or your church do not always choose tunes in long metre. Far better to have your patience augmented by the consideration that the misfortunes of this life must soon terminate. Hardly anyone lives to a hundred years, but few live to eighty, while the majority quit this life before fifty. You ought to be able, God helping you, to stand it as long as that, for then by the grace of God you will move into an improved residence and be compassed by all benign and excellent surroundings, into an atmosphere every breath of which is balmy, and a region where every sound is music, and every emotion rapture. A land without one tear, without one parting, without one grief.

This last summer I stood on Sparrow Hill, four miles from Moscow, Russia. It was the place where Napoleon stood and looked upon the city which he was about to capture. Down Sparrow Hill, and through the beautiful valley, and across the bridges, and into the palaces, which surrendered without one shot of resistance, because the avalanche of troops was irresistible. There is the room in which Napoleon slept, and his pillow, which must have been very uneasy, for oh how short his stay. Fires kindled in all parts of the city simultaneously drove out that army into the snow-storms under which 95,000 men perished. How soon did triumphal march turn into horrible demolition. To-day, while I speak, we come on a high hill, a glorious hill of Christian anticipation. These hosts of God have had a long march, and fearful battles, and defeats have again and again mingled with the victories, but to-day we come in sight of the Great City, the capital of the universe, the residence of the King, and the home of those who are to reign with him for ever and ever. Look at the towers, and hear them ring with eternal jubilee. At what hour we shall enter we have no power to foretell, but once enlisted amid the blood-washed host, our entrance is certain. It may be in the bright noonday or the dark midnight. No raging conflagration shall drive us forth, for the only fires kindled in that city will be the fires of a splendor that shall ever hoist, and never die. Reaching that shining gate, there will be a parting, but no tears at the parting. There will be but no sadness in the utterance. Then and there we will part with one of the best friends we ever had. No place for her in heaven, for she needs no heaven. While Love and Joy and other graces enter heaven, she will stay out. Patience, beautiful Patience, long-suffering Patience, will at that gate say, "Good-by! I helped you in the battle of life, but now that you have gained the triumph you need me no more. I bound up your wounds, but now they are all healed. I soothed your bereavements, but you pass now into the reunions of heaven. I can do no more for you, and there is nothing for me to do in a city where there are no burdens to carry. Good-by! I go back into the world from which you came up, to resume my tour among hospitals, and sick-rooms, and bereft households, and almshouses. The cry of the world's sorrow reaches my ears, and I must descend. Up and down that poor suffering world I will go to assuage and comfort and sustain, until the world itself expires, and on all its mountains, and in all its valleys, and on all its plains, there is not one soul left that has need of Patience."

An Eternal Farewell

MY FATHER'S PRAYER

Will R. Moody, the Son of America's Greatest Evangelist, Writes of His Father's Abounding Faith in God

In all His Prayers, His Praise Exceeded His Supplications, and He Asked Divine Blessing in Every Enterprise

IN our own day, no less than in the olden time, there are spiritual giants, abundant in faith, and whose petitions prevail with God. Evangelist Moody was one of these great spiritual natures. In the article below, his eldest son and successor gives us a glimpse of the grand old soul-winner on his knees:

"In nothing was the naturalness of my father's Christian life more manifest than in his prayers. They were ever the spontaneous expression of his inmost heart, and were made in the evident confidence that they were heard. He never made long prayers, nor did he use phrases that were simply beautiful in themselves. I never heard him in public or family worship offer a prayer of more than two or three minutes' length. There was never an enterprise on which he entered that he did not inaugurate with prayer; and no detail in the Lord's work was too insignificant for him to seek God's will about.

Seeking to Know God's Will

"Many godly men have had experiences of 'wrestling in prayer' for hours at a time. Whatever may have been my father's earlier experiences in this direction, it is certain that during the last twenty years of his life he did not have such times. With unbounded faith in God he would make known in all earnestness the desire of his heart, and seek every means available of learning what might be God's will for him. Then he would throw off all anxiety, and devote his every energy to doing all in his own power to answer the prayer. If he had some great project on hand he would carefully consider the wisdom of undertaking it; but once assured in his own mind what he ought to do, he entered upon it with determination. If the work required the raising of large sums of money, he would first pray for it, and then write letters to all quarters asking the aid of Christian people in the enterprise; but I never knew him to spend a sleepless night from worry about such an undertaking. He prayed, did his best to answer his own prayer, and then could rest, because of his abundant faith in God and in His unfailing goodness. I have said that he never made long prayers, but I should, perhaps, modify that statement by saying that his very life was a prayer. Certainly, it contained all the elements of true prayer. Praise to God was one of his most pronounced characteristics. His heart was ever overflowing with thanksgiving, and he could see the love of God in all his works. Even in his audible prayers, his praise usually exceeded his supplications. With praise he expressed adoration, and never did he weary of recounting the goodness of God. Often on a drive on the country road with some intimate friend, he would remain silent for some minutes at a time, then suddenly give expression to his thought, and thus show that he was even thus worshiping God in his heart.

THE LATE DWIGHT L. MOODY
Photographed shortly before his last illness

Prayer was His Mainstay

"But with it all there was never any cant in his prayers or his conversation. As a young man, he had determined never to go to any place where he could not pray, and in his home life and among his students it never seemed incongruous to end a discussion on matters of business, or a social gathering, with a few earnest words asking God's guidance and blessing on the occasion.

"Never did my father make his prayers the means for preaching a sermon, or expressing his own opinions. There was never any irreverent familiarity, and with all his love and devotion to the Heavenly Father, he always impressed his hearers with the fact that his prayers were to God—not to man.

"People sometimes question the success of the work that God permitted Mr. Moody to inaugurate. It is all revealed in the fact that the several branches of the work were undertaken in prayer, and were conducted in prayer. God grant that they may ever continue to be administered on in the same spirit!"

W. R. Moody

A MORNING HYMN OF PRAISE

See colored illustration on first page

O FOR a thousand tongues to sing
My great Redeemer's praise;
The glories of my God and King,
The triumph of his grace!

Jesus! the name that charms our fears,
That bids our sorrows cease;
'Tis music in the sinner's ears,
'Tis life, and health, and peace.

He breaks the power of canceled sin,
He sets the prisoner free;
His blood can make the foulest clean;
His blood availed for me.

Hear him, ye deaf; his praise, ye dumb,
Your loosened tongues employ;
Ye blind, behold your Saviour come;
And leap, ye lame, for joy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Jan. 2

1. What single occurrence during the present century has had the greatest influence on the welfare of the human race?

2. How should we dispose of the old minister, when he is worn out in the service of the Church and unable, physically or intellectually, to keep up with the times?

3. What is the surest way of discerning God's will and distinguishing between it and our own strong wills?

4. Is it possible to accumulate a great fortune in business, and yet conscientiously follow Christ's teachings through one's business career?

5. Is it wise for husbands and wives to criticise each other's faults, or should they keep loving and charitable silence regarding them?

Questions of the Week

1. Will you tell me what I must do to become a Christian? I never had Sunday School privileges, nor church. As I grow older, I see the sin of the world and feel the need of Christianity. I desire to be able to train my children as Christians. I love to talk to Christians, but cannot feel so certain as they appear to feel about spiritual things. I have tried to pray but cannot. I wish to become not an artificial believer in Christ, but a real one.

You ask what to do to become a Christian. Continue days and nights in prayer? No. Precede the work by reformation of habit and thought? No. By a long-continued process of planning how to become better than you are now? No. But by instantaneous action of the will, give yourself to God through Jesus Christ for time and eternity. Becoming a Christian is simply making a choice, and as you may instantly make a choice as to whether you will travel this road or that, put on this garment or that, seek this one's friendship or the friendship of another, so you may instantly choose Christ or reject him. Zaccheus was converted between the long limb of the sycamore tree on which he sat and the moment he struck the ground, and you may be converted in less time than you have taken to read these lines. From the remark you make about "artificial Christians," I think you may be severely critical of professors of religion, and that Zaccheus may not yet have come down out of the tree. If so, come down out of the tree of your pride, and drop at the feet of Jesus, willing to be any kind of a Christian that the Lord chooses to make you. Whatever kind of Christian you get to be, some one will criticize, and call you inconsistent, or canting, or self-righteous, or peculiar, or artificial.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE.

2. What is the true basis of marital happiness?

There can be no true happiness in the marriage relation without (1) genuine love and affection; (2) mutual consideration and forbearance; (3) mutual respect; (4) mutual confidence, trust and frankness, and last and best of all (5) mutual faith in God, and trust in him in all the affairs of life. Mutual happiness will be realized in proportion to the degree in which these conditions exist in the home and hearts of the united pair. They must have a joint faith and a joint hope; a joint interest for the things of time and for those of eternity.

ROBERT VYSE.

3. What words were certainly spoken by Christ and yet are not recorded by any of the evangelists nor in the Apocalypse?

I find by my Red Letter New Testament that they are quoted by Paul in Acts 20: 35: "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive." They are not recorded in any of the Gospels. EDWARD WRIGHT.

4. What is the best method for a pastor to follow in order to attract young people to church and to keep them there regularly?

There is no one method, but there is one word that may be the key to many methods, and that word is "Sympathy." The pastor needs to know the young people of his congregation, to tactfully lead them to talk with him and confide in him. He should find out their difficulties and their dangers and should try to help them individually. They will soon find out that he wishes to be their friend, and will respond to him. This mutual confidence will affect his sermons and he will take care to preach so that they will understand him. This will not be a bad thing for older people, too. He will have a meeting specially for them during the week, which ought to be made interesting with stories from history and readings of an amusing, entertaining character. There ought also to be a class or society managed by the boys themselves, and another for girls managed by the girls, in which there shall be essays read, debates held and other modes of spending an hour or two pleasantly. If it is known that the church is a place of happy social intercourse and the pastor a man who loves children, the children will be attracted to it and will be kept there regularly. MINISTER.

5. What is the exact difference between vanity and self-esteem?

Philosophers tell us that vanity is always a weakness, a fault, but that proper self-esteem is a degree of strength—almost a virtue. Vanity is an overweening admiration of self, an inward flattery and adulation, a craving of admiration from others. Self-esteem is a proper estimate of oneself which enables one to place a true value on character and attainments. In phrenology, self-esteem is the faculty that gives dignity and self-reliance or the desire to excel. It is almost synonymous with self-respect, and impels an observance of the proprieties in all things. ARTHUR SMITH.

6. What is the duty of the Church of Christ to the fallen woman?

In the Gospel we see Christ, on at least three occasions, facing this problem and making disposition of it (John 8: 4–11; John 4: 7–41; Luke 7: 36–50). It was to Mary of Magdala, out of whom had been cast "seven devils," that our Lord first appeared after his resurrection. Each woman, save the first, became, as sacred history shows, Christ's messenger; and thus, Christ's attitude of forgiveness is not more plainly shown than his power to save such women to the uttermost. For its own protection, society demands their reclamation. The Church must bring them to Christ, take Christ to them; and by the provision of shelter and occupations for them, enable them to make an honest living.

M. W. A.

7. Should any man be appointed on the officiary or governing board of a church who is not an out-and-out Christian?

As the Church is organized for a purely spiritual purpose, the leaders in church affairs should be men of Christian experience, spiritually minded and well-grounded in the faith. Leaders without such qualifications would be "blind leaders." There may be instances where expediency dictates the selection of a man who is not specially distinguished for his Christian principles, for certain offices in Church work which he may fill acceptably; but these are exceptional. The Church official should be one who can be looked up to by the congregation with respect and confidence, and who is capable of applying the highest principles to all matters under his direction. S. VAN RENSSELAER.

8. Do the words of Christ on the cross (Matt. 27:46), "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" suggest that he had not accomplished the work God assigned to him; in other words, that his life was not a success, as mankind at this present time think of success?

The words by no means indicate failure. They were the pitiful cry of his nature in the supreme moment of trial. Hitherto, his support had been the unfailing consciousness of his Father's constant presence with him; but in that last crisis, he was to learn the agony that many men have endured of spiritual darkness in the hour of death. He was to be made in all things like unto his brethren. God's face was hidden from him and to such a nature as his there could be no more fearful calamity. It was intolerable desolation. We cannot believe that even for a moment God had forsaken his Son, but the cloud of physical agony and mental anguish over his rejection by the world he loved so well, had interposed and his spiritual vision failed to perceive his Father's countenance. It is not an unusual thing in time of extreme suffering. Some modern Christians on their death-bed have lost hope and have given themselves up for lost. But even in his agonizing cry, Christ showed the triumph of his own faith. With the consciousness of sonship, he says "My God, my God." So far from failure it is triumph, the triumph of One who passed victoriously through an experience that must have tried him more than any other being, because it removed from him the source of his comfort. ROBERT WYNN.

9. Is a foreign missionary justified in holding a political office in the country where he is laboring for souls, or in exerting his influence in any way except for the social and spiritual welfare of his community?

There are instances in which missionaries have filled the office of consular agent in their foreign field, while others have accepted office as judges, and still others have engaged in ordinary commercial pursuits, to a limited extent. In almost every case, the added function has proved an embarrassment to Christian work. It is not possible for one who entangles himself in the affairs of the world, whether in the government service, the professions or commerce, to act at all times as freely in spiritual matters as though he were doing missionary work alone. The missionary who has a double function, sooner or later faces a crisis in which one or the other interest must suffer.

J. B. RANDOLPH.

10. Is a child born with or without a character?

It would not be possible in the space you allow, and I am not sure that it would be of any distinct advantage, to state the various theories which Locke and other philosophers have advanced on this subject. Our own senses tell us that the child's body is affected by its parents. There are resemblances which show that physically the child inherits both features and peculiarities of form. The connection between the body and the mind is so close, so intimate that we cannot conceive of a tainted physical constitution being without influence on the mind and morals. The drunkard's child will have a greater tendency to become a drunkard than will the child of abstemious parents. The child of the gambler to become a gambler, and so on. The moral fibre is affected by the physical organism. The child's character is there in embryo, but it is not there so fixedly or permanently that it cannot be checked or neutralized by education and environment. Besides this, there is the influence of the Holy Spirit to be taken into account. This, which Christ said was equivalent to a new birth, brings out a new character, though as we often see, the qualities of the old character survive but are turned in a new direction. As an illustration, Saul the zealous persecutor became Paul the zealous apostle.

"ROLL, JORDAN, ROLL"

In this beautiful picture, the artist has shown the group of youthful singers in a colored church choir at the opening service, the song being that famous negro jubilee hymn:

"Roll, Jordan, roll; roll, Jordan, roll; I want to go to Heaven when I die,
To hear Jordan roll."

In chapel or at camp-meeting, negro music has a quality and attraction peculiarly its own. Looking at the quartette, one hears in imagination the quaint old melody, piped in shrill treble, with its accompaniment of tenor, alto and thunderous bass.

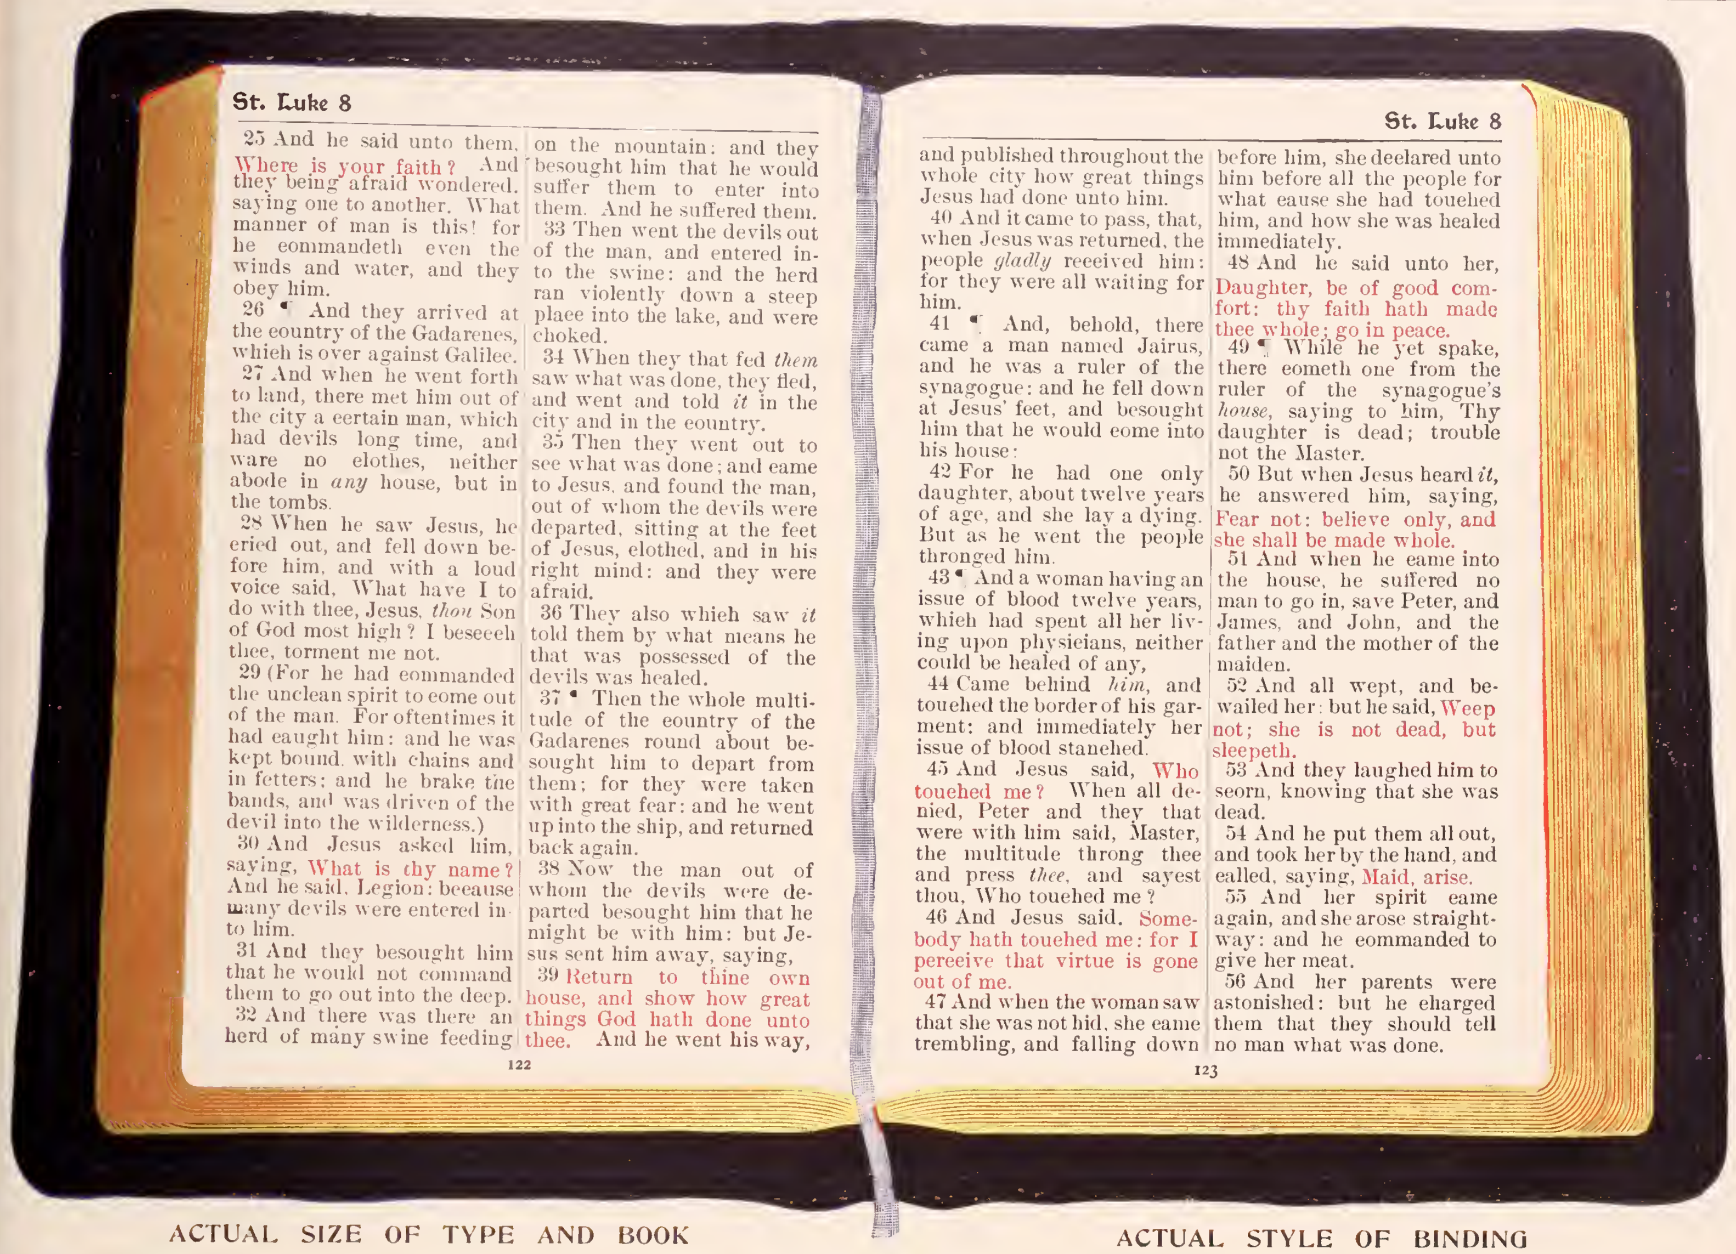
EVERY WORD SPOKEN BY OUR LORD PRINTED in RED



St. Luke 8

25 And he said unto them, Where is your faith? And they being afraid wondered, saying one to another, What manner of man is this! for he eommandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him.

26 ¶ And they arrived at the eountry of the Gadarenes, whieh is over against Galilee.

27 And when he went forth to land, there met him out of the city a eertain man, which had devils long time, and ware no elothes, neither abode in any house, but in the tombs.

28 When he saw Jesus, he eried out, and fell down before him, and with a loud voice said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God most high? I beseeeh thee, torment me not.

29 (For he had eommanded the unclean spirit to eome out of the man. For oftentimes it had eaught him: and he was kept bound with chains and in fetters; and he brake the bands, and was driven of the devil into the wilderness.)

30 And Jesus asked him, saying, What is thy name? And he said, Legion: beeause many devils were entered into him.

31 And they besought him that he would not command them to go out into the deep.

32 And there was there an herd of many swine feeding on the mountain: and they besought him that he would suffer them to enter into them. And he suffered them.

33 Then went the devils out of the man, and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently down a steep plaee into the lake, and were choked.

34 When they that fed them saw what was done, they fled, and went and told it in the city and in the eountry.

35 Then they went out to see what was done; and eame to Jesus, and found the man, out of whom the devils were departed, sitting at the feet of Jesus, elothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid.

36 They also whieh saw it told them by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed.

37 ¶ Then the whole multitude of the eountry of the Gadarenes round about besought him to depart from them; for they were taken with great fear: and he went up into the ship, and returned back again.

38 Now the man out of whom the devils were departed besought him that he might be with him: but Jesus sent him away, saying,

39 Return to thine own house, and show how great things God hath done unto thee. And he went his way, and published throughout the whole city how great things Jesus had done unto him.

St. Luke 8

40 And it came to pass, that, when Jesus was returned, the people gladly reeeived him: for they were all waiting for him.

41 ¶ And, behold, there came a man named Jairus, and he was a ruler of the synagogue: and he fell down at Jesus' feet, and besought him that he would eome into his house:

42 For he had one only daughter, about twelve years of age, and she lay a dying. But as he went the people thronged him.

43 ¶ And a woman having an issue of blood twelve years, whieh had spent all her living upon physieians, neither could be healed of any,

44 Came behind him, and touehed the border of his garment: and immediately her issue of blood stanehed.

45 And Jesus said, Who touehed me? When all denied, Peter and they that were with him said, Master, the multitude throng thee and press thee, and sayest thou, Who touehed me?

46 And Jesus said, Somebody hath touehed me: for I pereeive that virtue is gone out of me.

47 And when the woman saw that she was not hid, she eame trembling, and falling down before him, she deelared unto him before all the people for what eause she had touehed him, and how she was healed immediately.

48 And he said unto her, Daughter, be of good comfort: thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace.

49 ¶ While he yet spake, there eometh one from the ruler of the synagogue's house, saying to him, Thy daughter is dead; trouble not the Master.

50 But when Jesus heard it, he answered him, saying, Fear not: believe only, and she shall be made whole.

51 And when he eame into the house, he suffered no man to go in, save Peter, and James, and John, and the father and the mother of the maiden.

52 And all wept, and bewailed her: but he said, Weep not; she is not dead, but sleepeth.

53 And they laughed him to seorn, knowing that she was dead.

54 And he put them all out, and took her by the hand, and ealled, saying, Maid, arise.

55 And her spirit eame again, and she arose straightway: and he eommanded to give her meat.

56 And her parents were astonished: but he eharged them that they should tell no man what was done.

CHAPTER 1.

IN the [a]beginning [b]God created the heaven and the earth.
2 And the earth was [c]waste and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep: [d]and the spirit of God [1]moved upon the face of the waters.
3 [e]And God said, Let there be light: and there was light.
4 And God saw the light, that it was good: and God divided the light from the darkness.
5 And God called the light [f]Day, and the darkness he called Night. And there was evening and there was morning, one day.
6 ¶And God said, [g]Let there be a [2]firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters.
7 And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were [h]above the firmament: and it was so.
8 And God called the firmament Heaven. And there was evening and there was morning, a second day.
9 ¶And God said, [i]Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so.
10 And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he Seas: and God saw that it was good.
11 And God said, [j]Let the earth put forth grass, herb yielding seed, and fruit tree bearing fruit [k]after its kind, wherein is the seed thereof, upon the earth: and it was so.
12 And the earth brought forth grass, herb yielding seed after its kind, and tree bearing fruit, wherein is the seed thereof, after its kind: and God saw that it was good.
13 And there was evening and there was morning, a third day.
14 ¶And God said, [l]Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years:

The Bible Dictionary Illumines The Word

WHEN we remember that the books of the Bible were written by men living in a remote land and at a period separated from our time by nearly three thousand years, it is marvelous that we can understand and appreciate this literature, and that it should continue to be our most cherished possession. The spiritual truth contained in the sacred volume has made it immortal, and it will assuredly be to the end of time the guide of youth, the strength of manhood, and the comfort and solace of old age.

Can You Answer These Questions?

It was inevitable, however, that while its main purpose and its direct teaching are so clear that none can mistake their meaning, there must be local allusions, and metaphors and similes, and references to Oriental customs, which we cannot understand. All that we do understand is so precious and so full of valuable teaching that we grudge the loss of any sentence that we must pass over because of its mysterious reference. What, for example, does the Psalmist mean by saying (Psalm 89: 17) that the man who lives in God's favor has his horn exalted? What does Solomon mean by his warning (Prov. 17: 19) that he who exalteth his gate seeketh destruction? Who or what is Maschil, a name appearing at the head of Psalm 32 and several other Psalms? What are the "wimples," the wearing of which so exasperated the prophet (Isa. 3: 22)? These and a hundred other questions are put by the children, and not every parent or Sunday School teacher can answer them.

Odd Usages Explained

It is to enable every one to obtain ready, concise information on such obsolete customs and mysterious allusions, and so to make the Bible imagery as clear to the student of to-day as it was to Daniel reading in his study in Babylon, or to Paul sitting at the feet of Gamaliel, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is putting this renowned Bible Dictionary within reach of all its readers. It answers such questions as we have mentioned fully, not with a long, elaborate disquisition that requires hours to read and comprehend, but in a few lines, generally with a picture, in which the article or custom is explained in clear, simple language, giving the result of possibly years of scholarly research by Oriental travelers and archaeologists.

A Complete Gazetteer

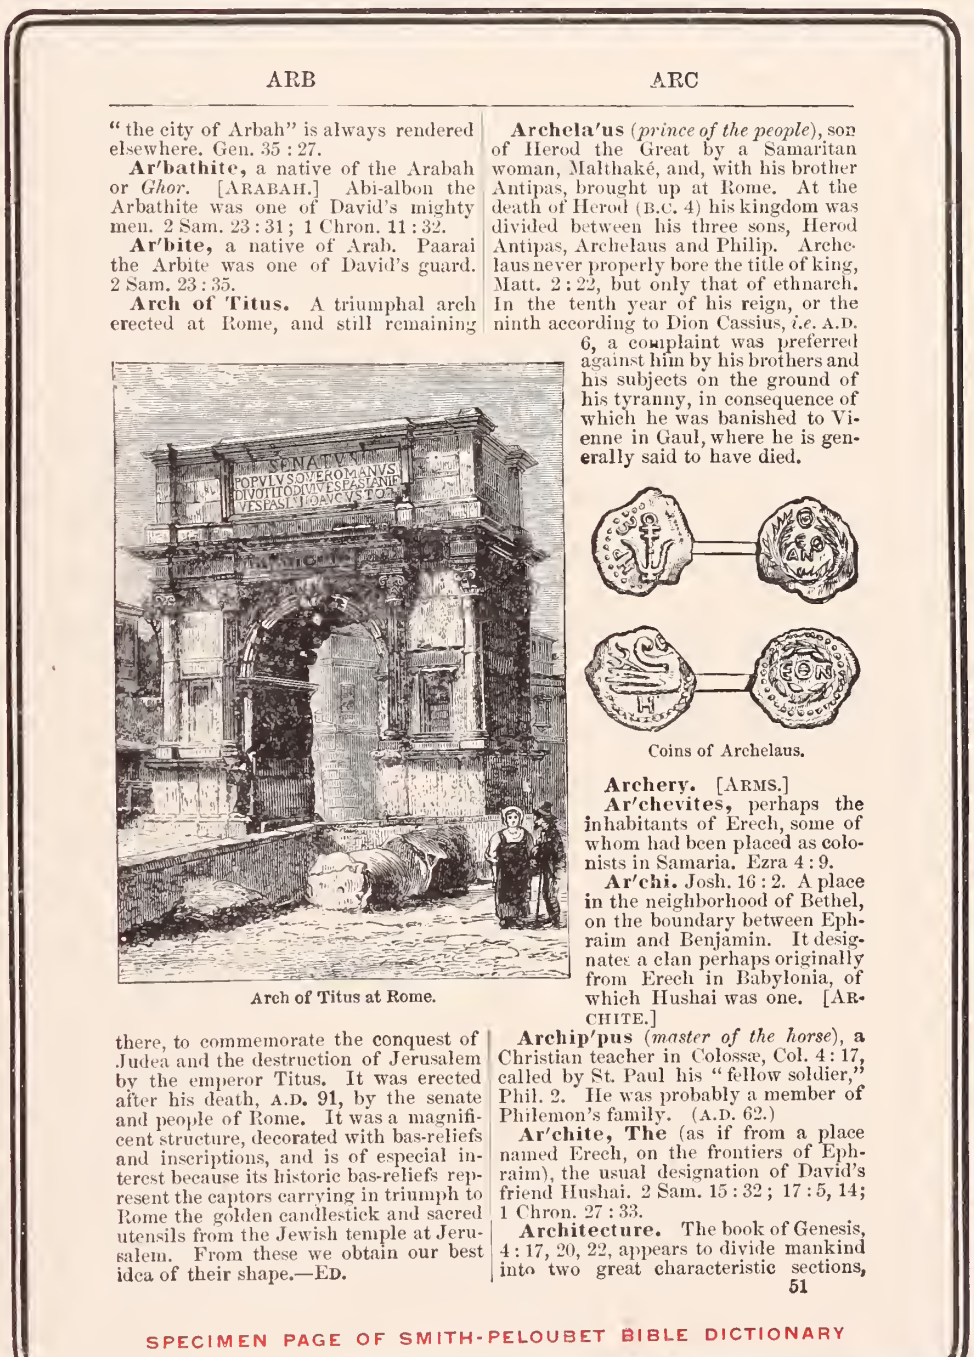
This, however, is but a small part of the information which makes the Bible Dictionary the best companion to the Bible ever produced. It is a complete gazetteer of Scripture lands, describing their typography, their products, their climate, the people, their habits, customs and religion, and giving an outline of the history of the various nations. A most useful method is pursued with famous localities, such as Jerusalem, Hebron, Bethoron, Esdraelon, etc., etc., by which not only is the locality described and a picture of it given, but the incidents which occurred there and gave it its fame are mentioned, identifying it with events in Old and New Testament history.

Weights and Coins Explained

Useful information is furnished also as to various articles of dress, household use and religious symbolism, such as the phylacteries, to the widening of which Christ referred; to rings, seals, musical and agricultural implements, weapons, the value of the piece of silver and the shekel and other moneys mentioned in the Bible. References to time, the watches, the months, etc., and to the weights and measures of Scripture are also explained. The articles on the Talmud, the sect of the Essenes, the Nicolaitans, and other religious and philosophic orders are especially valuable. Descriptions of marriage and burial customs, of divorce and education, shed light on many other allusions in the prophets and the Gospels, while the Chronological Tables are practically invaluable.

Valuable Biographical Dictionary

An ingenious system of grouping, always strictly following alphabetical arrangement, makes it also the most valuable Biographical Dictionary of Scripture characters that could be conceived. It is not easy, for instance, to identify a man by his name, or to be sure in what Bible book to look for his history. For example, there are twenty-four men mentioned in the Bible who bore the name of Azariah. There were ten Josephs and nine Ahijahs. The student who has the Bible Dictionary at hand can place them all and tell the time when they lived and in what books each is mentioned. In some instances the biography of a man is found in more than one Scripture book. In such cases the Bible Dictionary skilfully combines the different accounts into a well-rounded life. Nor is this feature limited to the canonical books. It contains interesting facts about the Maccabees, Tobit and other men who figured in Jewish history, that will be new to many Bible readers.



ARB ARC

"the city of Arbah" is always rendered elsewhere. Gen. 35 : 27.

Ar'bathite, a native of the Arabah or Ghor. [ARABAH.] Abi-albon the Arbathite was one of David's mighty men. 2 Sam. 23 : 31; 1 Chron. 11 : 32.

Ar'bite, a native of Arab. Paarai the Arbite was one of David's guard. 2 Sam. 23 : 35.

Arch of Titus. A triumphal arch erected at Rome, and still remaining there, to commemorate the conquest of Judea and the destruction of Jerusalem by the emperor Titus. It was erected after his death, A.D. 91, by the senate and people of Rome. It was a magnificent structure, decorated with bas-reliefs and inscriptions, and is of especial interest because its historic bas-reliefs represent the captors carrying in triumph to Rome the golden candlestick and sacred utensils from the Jewish temple at Jerusalem. From these we obtain our best idea of their shape.—ED.

Arch of Titus at Rome.

Archela'us (prince of the people), son of Herod the Great by a Samaritan woman, Malthaké, and, with his brother Antipas, brought up at Rome. At the death of Herod (B.C. 4) his kingdom was divided between his three sons, Herod Antipas, Archelaus and Philip. Archelaus never properly bore the title of king, Matt. 2 : 22, but only that of ethnarch. In the tenth year of his reign, or the ninth according to Dion Cassius, i.e. A.D. 6, a complaint was preferred against him by his brothers and his subjects on the ground of his tyranny, in consequence of which he was banished to Vienne in Gaul, where he is generally said to have died.

Coins of Archelaus.

Archery. [ARMS.]

Ar'chevites, perhaps the inhabitants of Erech, some of whom had been placed as colonists in Samaria. Ezra 4 : 9.

Ar'chi. Josh. 16 : 2. A place in the neighborhood of Bethel, on the boundary between Ephraim and Benjamin. It designates a clan perhaps originally from Erech in Babylonia, of which Hushai was one. [ARCHITE.]

SPECIMEN PAGE OF SMITH-PELOUBET BIBLE DICTIONARY

Its Pictorial Wealth

We have left ourselves little space to describe the pictorial beauties of this incomparable book. Almost every page has some illustration explanatory of the text. Pictures of persons in Oriental costume show the significance of the fringes, which meant so much in Jewish society. Pictures of various implements of husoandry, musical instruments, household utensils, etc., are interspersed. Besides these, are views of famous places taken from recent photographs, and beautiful full page engravings of the Sea of Galilee, Ephesus, Smyrna, Tiberias, Emmaus, Mt. Hermon, Tyre, Sidon and the Valley of the Jordan.

Good for Busy People

In addition, are eight exquisite, artistically colored maps of Bible lands, showing the great political divisions at various periods. In all there are 811 pages of the most concise, succinct and available information on the Bible, ever compressed into one volume. There are many busy editors whose libraries contain all the great encyclopedias, who, in search of information, turn to this volume because they know it is the quickest and most direct way of getting accurate information, historical, geographical, or archaeological on any Biblical topic. * * *

Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary contains 811 pages, 440 illustrations, and eight splendid maps. It is bound in two styles: cloth, plain edges; and flexible American Levant with red under gold edges. We offer both styles.

A Genuine Bargain

The regular price of the Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary bound in flexible leather is $4.00. THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WOMAN

Her New Opportunities

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE twentieth century brings to women many opportunities for self-help, and a thousand labor-saving appliances which the women of other days knew little about. But the stuff of which womanhood is made remains essentially the same in every century. I want to talk to you, friends, on the soft invincibility, the matchless strength and influence of womanhood.

I find, as I read my Bible, that in the early days, just as at present, men were very dependent upon women for counsel, comfort and help. I have no doubt that it took all Eve's tact, cheerfulness and composure to convince Adam that his lot was not wholly desolate, even when he had lost Eden. "Hear my voice ye wives of Lamech," said that ancient patriarch to Ada and Zillah, with a man's imperative need of an audience. Deborah, the wise prophetess, calmly ruled Israel from her seat under a palm tree. Rahab's wit and cleverness saved from capture the daring spies of Joshua. Jezebel, the beautiful Tyrian princess, the Lady Macbeth of the Scriptures, bold in her iniquity and brave as a lioness, frightened Elijah when he did not quail before Ahab and the assembled nation. Mary and Martha in the days of our Lord upon the earth, entertained him with graceful and lavish hospitality, and gave him, when he would come to them, the only earthly home he ever knew. At the house of Lydia, the first prayer-meeting on record was held.

Passing into secular history, we find Cornelia, whose children were her jewels, and the devoted wife of Coriolanus, who prized her husband's honor as her life, and Fedegundes of the dark ages, superb but wicked, as Jezebel was in the period of Elijah. Nearer our own times are the peerless Lady Jane Grey, the heroic Joan of Arc, the manful Elizabeth of England, and the beautiful Louisa of Prussia. Among the saints and martyrs are such woman as Elizabeth, the wife of Bunyan, as Margaret Wilson of Scotland, who sang the Twenty-third Psalm till the tide came up to the stake where she was chained and drowned the song upon her lips: and on the starry roll of the missionary efforts of the Christian era are the names of hundreds of noble and great-hearted women who counted not their lives dear for the love they bore the Master. Thus, womanhood has ever been strong in weakness, fertile in resources, crowned in maternity.

To us, who have the advantages of the present day, there is given an open door to do good outside our own households, while we are by no means absolved from the supreme duty of looking first to our own people and our own homes. A woman if married holds the happiness, the usefulness, and the esteem in which her good man is held in the hollow of her hand. A man stands forth in the glare of the fierce sunshine of publicity. Back of him, in the shadow, is the dear wife who day by day heartens him for life's struggles and braces him against depression. It is no small thing to send a man to business or to politics, or to his study, day by day, cheerful, hopeful and confident; but this the woman does, if she be a good wife, and this she has always done. And the twentieth century mother, may Heaven guard her from too many theories and defend her against too much advice.

She too, as never mother before her, may make her children healthy, educate them to be truthful and fearless, and prepare them for Christian citizenship. God bless her, the twentieth century mother and wife. And God bless also the twentieth century spinster, who is far more fortunate than spinsters used to be, since she may have her choice of a hundred wage-earning occupations, and need never depend on the kindness of others if she wishes to stand in her own lot.

Hearthstone and Battlefield

The three little girls have a pet apiece, and the eldest, Lena, would not exchange her proud little mother puss for Gretchen's Puff, or Lisette's Fluff. Grandmother is teaching knitting, sewing and housewifery to her three little maidens, while their mother sits by, busy now with her work and again with a book. The scene is very peaceful, but tranquil and lovely as it is, there is a side not shown in the picture. Away off in China, fighting or waiting, in the service of his Emperor and of humanity, is the lieutenant, whose eyes were fixed with admiration on that sweet-looking woman when she sat in her pew, with a restless flock of children around her, the merry brood of the parsonage. A boy told me that he intended to be a football player. His imagination was fixed on success in that field as more than any other worth while. The fact is that under fourteen or fifteen a child is not usually called upon to choose what may be his chief work in life. Nature, however, may choose for him. One little fellow has a decided bent for mathematics and is handy with tools. He may become a civil engineer, or find some niche as an electrician. Another, a dreamy child, with the slender hands and large eyes of the artist, is designed for quite another line. Parents, when there is an undoubted bent in one direction, should favor it. If a boy hates the farm and mother and wife and daughters never forget to pray for him by night or by day. One of these days, please God, the brave soldier will come home, and then what laughter, what kisses and tears of joy, what overbrimming praise!

AWAITING THE SOLDIER'S RETURN

What Are You Going to Be?

The question is often asked of a boy or girl by a grown person, to the confusion of the child, who is living for the day and has not yet given any thought to his future vocation: What are you going to be? If the little fellow is candid, he says he does not know; but childhood is subtle and has its queer reserves and its poses. To keep a candy store or a peanut stand, to be a soldier and go to war, or a sailor and tread a deck, are among the ambitions of many children. The little girl is often inclined to be a teacher. That profession is very tempting in her sight, and her teacher is usually a very much adored personage. One little girl avowed her intention to be the minister's wife. Her longs for business activities, give him the very best preparation you can.

"E-ne-me-ni-mi-ne-mo"

Children's games, all around the globe, and in every rolling age, are much alike. A curious resemblance runs through the cabalistic utterances of the gibberish of the children of all countries. They have their mystic rhymes, their mystic circles, their magical countings, and their muttered spells and mysterious touches, as they play, indicative of a common origin, in the dim recesses of antiquity. Little girls in China, seated on the ground, play "E-ne-me-ni-mi-ne-mo" with their feet. They are closely grouped with their feet in the middle and at each round one foot is excluded until all the players are out.

CHINESE CHILDREN PLAYING "E-NE-ME-NI-MI-NE-MO"

BOYS OF TO-DAY

Tune—"Tell It Again."

INTO and out of our households they go,
Only the boys, but we're loving them so.
Full of their laughter and full of their play,
Eager and happy—the boys of to-day.

CHORUS

Boys of to-day, boys of to-day;
Manhood is coming, they'll soon be away.
Oh let us be earnest to save while we may
Those who are dearest, the boys of to-day.

Shall we be idle while cards lead astray
And the dime novel is thrown in their way;
Or the cigar and the vile cigarette
Lead to a life of unceasing regret?

Shall we be silent with your boy and mine
Treated to lager and tempted with wine,
Till the saloon, with its terrible blight,
Ruins their future, so glowing and bright?

Shall we be sleeping while friends are awake
Seeking our dear ones, their victims to make?
Or at the ballot speak loudly and say,
They are worth saving—the boys of to-day.

Pittsfield, Me. MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

A Happy Family

Blessings on the red-cheeked children of the country. They play out of doors: they have pets, and pastimes which pets share. Cooped in a cramped and crowded home, the children of our modern cities have not half a chance. Mother Puss is on very good terms with Gretchen and with Gretchen's mama and sister. She knows she has nothing to fear from these friends, and the rabbits and chickens and goats and the old dog and all the other farm animals know it too. So Gretchen is growing up in beauty, a darling child, the sweeter and bonnier for her daily care of her nice pets.

"To Be Let Alone"

"All I ask," said a patient and long-suffering husband, "is to be let alone." His wife had commented for the fifth time in an hour on some trifle, as for instance his way of sitting which destroyed the crease in his trousers, his pouring hot tea into his saucer, an old-fashioned and out-of-date custom be it known, which used to be in vogue, and is now thought "horrid," his forgetfulness to fold up his napkin, his leaving the door open when he went out, etc., etc. None of these actions were criminal; none were even unrefined, but Mr. Goodman had a nagging wife to whom petty things seemed of great importance. She was to be pitied as well as he. The woman who nags has a distorted vision. From her view-point trivialities loom up immensely magnified. Her eyes see every home matter out of proportion; out of the true perspective. This makes her temper uncertain, and sharpens her tones, and in turn the family tempers grow unamiable. It is a great art, that of letting people alone—an art worth cultivating.

OUR MILLION EDITION

ONCE more THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S annual "Visiting Day" has come around, when, with an edition of one million copies, it goes into a countless multitude of homes all over this continent, from Maine to Mexico, and Bering Sea to the Gulf, and into the hands of a reading circle of well-nigh ten million souls. Such a visit is without a parallel, unless we except that of good old Santa Claus himself; and we doubt whether even he, in his most liberal moods, ever took with him a pack so overflowing with things both precious and attractive as those we set before our good friends in this mammoth edition.

It will no doubt interest our readers to know just what it costs to produce an edition of this magnitude. In round figures, the total expense is $46,000. In the work of producing the million copies of thirty-six pages each, 405,000 pounds of white paper—equal to over twenty ordinary railway car-loads—are consumed. If this vast roll were cut up into ordinary-sized books, it would make a larger library than any in the United States, for it would furnish 850,000 volumes in all. Assorted into libraries of 5,000 volumes each, it would supply a literary feast for just 170 American cities of fair-sized population.

As to the purely mechanical work of this edition, 25 bronzing machines, 125 color presses, and 106 black-and-white presses are required to produce the million copies in one week. All this gives employment to an army of workers, from the setting of the type to the final folding, wrapping and mailing of the complete paper. The postage on the edition alone is over $4,000.

We bespeak for our Million Edition the same generous and hearty welcome that is always accorded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, wherever it goes. Through all the details of its preparation, there has been an earnest effort and a prayerful wish to make it helpful to those into whose hands it may fall. May each separate copy be made the means of bringing a blessing into the home where it comes, and may it add to the happiness of every reader who scans its pages!

GLOOMY HOUSEHOLDS

BOYS and girls are often spoiled by parental gloom. The father never unbends. The mother's rheumatism hurts so she does not see how little Maggie can ever laugh. Childish curiosity is denounced as impertinence. The parlor is a parliament, and everything in everlasting order. Balls and tops in that house are a nuisance, and the pap that the boy is expected most to relish is geometry, a little sweetened with the chalk of blackboards. For cheerful reading, the father would recommend Young's Night Thoughts and Hervey's Meditations Among the Tombs. At the first chance the boy will break loose. With one grand leap he will clear the catechisms. He will burst away into all riotous living. He will be so glad to get out of Egypt that he will jump into the Red Sea. The hardest colts to catch are those that have a long while been locked up. Restraints are necessary, but there must be some outlet. Too high a dam will overflow and inundate all the meadows.

WORK AND PLAY

IT is the earnest man, with an earnest work to do, who in unexpected moments puts the lever of his witticism under your soul and sends you roaring with laughter that shuts your eyes, and rends your sides, and makes you thankful for a stout waistcoat, which seems to be the only thing that keeps you from explosion. Workingmen have a right to be facetious. We have no objection to a hen's cackle if it has first laid a large round egg for the breakfast table. But we had on our farm a hen that never did anything but cackle. The most rousing wit ever uttered was by stalwart men like Robert South and Jean Paul Richter. With them, wit was only the foaming flake on the wave that carried into port a magnificent cargo. It was only the bell that rang you to a banquet of stalled ox and muscovy. But, lackaday! if, at the ringing of the bell, we went to find nothing but a cold slice of chuckle, a hash of drollery, jokes stewed, and jokes stuffed, and jokes panned, and jokes roasted, and jokes with gravy, and jokes without gravy. Professor Wilson, the peerless essayist, could afford to put on "Sporting Jacket," and mould the snowball for "The Bicker of Pedmount," and go a-picnicking at Windermere, and shake up into rollicking glee Lockhart, Hamilton, Gillies and his other Blackwood cronies, if, in that way refreshed for toil, he could come into the University of Edinburgh to mould and shape the heart and intellect of Scotland with a magic touch that will be felt a thousand years. He is the most entertaining man who mixes in proper proportion work and play.

CHILDREN IN THE MORNING

CHILDREN will wake up early in the morning. Perhaps you have been disturbed in the night, and gone wandering around the room in your somnolent state, as much confused as ourselves on one occasion when, at midnight, we heard a croupy cough in the nursery, and gave the ipecac to the wrong baby. Just as you begin your last morning nap, you hear a stir in the adjoining room. The trundle-bed is evidently discharging a lot of bare feet on the floor. You hear suppressed laughter at the door, slipping out into an occasional shout as one of them applies the force of a tickle to the bottom of the other's feet. You are provoked to be interrupted at such unreasonable hours, and proclaim children a nuisance. You are glad that the door is locked. But they rattle the knob. They blow through the keyhole. They push slips of paper under the door, and, getting more and more bold, they knock. Ten fingers, tipped with the rosy tints of the morn, are running races up and down the panel. Your indignation begins to cool, and your determination not to admit is giving way. The noise of fingers is intermingled with the stroke of dimpled fists. At last you open the door, and there bursts in a snow-flurry of night-gowns, and they bound along, brunette and blonde, wild as young Arabs. The lock that would have confounded burglar, and the bolt that strongest hand could not have broken, flew open at the touch of the tip end of a baby's fingers.

KEEP YOUR PLACE

LET the young be sure to begin right. Not once in a thousand times does a man successfully change occupations. The sea of life is so rough that you cannot cross over from one vessel to another except at great peril of falling between. Many have fallen down to nothing between the mason's trowel and the carpenter's saw; between the lawyer's brief and the author's pen; between the medicine-chest and the pulpit. It is no easy matter to switch off on another track this thundering express-train of life. A daffodil and a buttercup resolved to change places with each other, but in crossing over from stem to stem they fell at the feet of a heart's-ease. "Just as I expected!" said the heart's-ease, and she added: "You might better have stayed in your places!"

FAMILY PRAYERS

NO child ever gets over having heard parents praying for him. I had many sound thrashings when I was a boy; but the most memorable scene in my childhood was father and mother at morning and evening prayers. Your son may go to the ends of the earth, and run through the whole catalogue of transgression, but he will remember the family altar, and it will be a check, and a call, and, perhaps, his redemption.

The King of Books

THAT the Bible is the most popular book in the world is proven not only by the reports of the various Bible societies, but by the experience of publishers and booksellers in all countries. The most famous books of recent years fall far short of the sale of Bibles. The sale of a novel is either ephemeral or local, while that of the Bible is general and perennial. In the great department stores, where Bibles are sold one at a time, the annual sales amount to hundreds of thousands of copies. In one large New York store alone the average daily sale is 140 copies, and an annual sale of 40,000. There is always a big demand in the fall, when people return to town and churches open, and an especially large demand at Christmas time, when innumerable Sunday School teachers, fathers and mothers and friends purchase Bibles for holiday presents.

The American Bible Society last year issued 1,406,000 Bibles, and the British Society 4,479,000. In eighty-four years the American Society has sold 67,369,000 Bibles, and the British Society, in ninety-five years 160,000,000. The Holy Book, or parts of it, have been issued in 350 languages and dialects.

One of the greatest agencies in Bible circulation, in recent years, has been THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It was the first publication in the world to distribute the Bible broadcast among its readers. Through its efforts, many hundreds of thousands of copies of the Sacred Word have been circulated here and abroad, and large editions of Art Bibles, Teachers' Bibles, and the Red Letter New Testament besides. Our Army and Navy New Testament (Soldiers' Vest Pocket Edition) was read by the light of the camp-fires in Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines, and our American and Spanish (parallel column) Gospel of St. John found its way into a great multitude of native homes in Porto Rico, where, owing to the course of the priests, the Bible had hitherto been a stranger.

A Medal for Heroism

The Christian Herald's Plan for the Popular Recognition of Personal Bravery : : : :

ALL the world loves a hero and admires a brave and daring deed, especially when it is done for the sake of others. There is no higher quality than that courage which unhesitatingly faces danger and death under such conditions. There are hundreds of humble heroes, men and women, whose acts deserve enduring reward and commemoration, yet their deeds of high courage and self-sacrifice, splendid though they may be, are permitted to pass without adequate recognition and are soon forgotten, though the world is richer and better through such noble souls having lived in it.

In the Hall of Fame, now building in New York, our nation's great ones in art, literature, science, philanthropy, war and statesmanship are to be immortalized. But who shall immortalize the man who saves the life of a drowning child, the woman who flags an express-train and averts a holocaust, the youth who seizes a mad, runaway team, or he who rescues human beings in peril of fire, flood or danger in any of its manifold forms? Not a week passes without some such brilliant deed, that brings a thrill to all hearts. Why should these be the wonder of a moment and then forgotten?

We believe our readers will be glad to know that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has in preparation a plan for the fitting recognition of humble, every-day heroism—not that heroism which is in the line of paid, professional duty; but that which has absolutely no emolument, and which is voluntary and spontaneous. We invite every reader to forward to us the earliest accurate information obtainable of any deed of true heroism occurring in his own vicinity. It is the purpose of the proprietor of this journal to award, once a week, beginning with the New Year, the opening of a new century, a medal for the most meritorious case of personal bravery occurring during the week. No candidate for this honor will be barred by reason of age, sex, race or social condition. Care must be taken to furnish only absolutely accurate accounts of the heroic occurrences: and in every case, the writer should tell the story from his own personal knowledge and not from hearsay. The facts, as presented, will be laid before a Committee in New York, whose duty it shall be to meet once a week and determine which of the thoroughly authenticated cases of personal heroism brought to its attention is the one most deserving of recognition. As many cases will doubtless be presented, the work of the Committee will probably consume some time in order that all its inquiries may be satisfied, and that the various claims for recognition may be fully investigated.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD medal is of bronze, chaste and elegant in design, and of exquisite workmanship. On one side is the inscription, "For Christ and Humanity. Christian Herald, N. Y.," and on the other side, "This medal was struck in commemoration of the heroism of —— —— in saving life on —— ——, 1901."

In addition to the weekly award, honorable mention will also be publicly made of all who have most notably distinguished themselves during the same period, and whose names, together with the story of their heroism, have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

All letters on this subject should be addressed to "Chairman Medal Committee, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York."

America's Pantheon

GENERAL interest has been aroused by the selections for the Hall of Fame. As has already been explained in the press, the Hall of Fame is a colonnade on University Heights, in New York, which connects two buildings of the New York University. It is semi-circular in shape, and is five hundred feet in length. It is understood that the cost of its erection is being defrayed by Miss Helen Gould. When completed, it will contain tablets with spaces for the names of one hundred and fifty famous Americans, whose character or achievements entitle them to the foremost places in the admiration of their countrymen. The only restrictions are that they must have been born on land which is now part of the United States, and that ten years must have elapsed since they died. No one is eligible who was of foreign birth, nor any whose death has occurred since the year 1890. One hundred eminent persons were chosen as judges, including college presidents and professors, justices of the United States Supreme Court, statesmen, authors, etc. Their decision was to be submitted to the Senate of the University of New York, which was at liberty to confirm or amend the list. It was decided to begin with fifty names and add five more names every five years until all tablets were filled. This would allow the admission at a future time of such names as Phillips Brooks, Oliver Wendell Holmes and others whose deaths were too recent to bring them within the eligible list. As it has turned out, the first count has resulted in the selection of only twenty-nine, and it has been decided to take another poll two years hence, for the selection of the remainder of the fifty. The failure was due to the rule laid down by the Senate that only such names should be accepted as were endorsed by a majority of the hundred judges. The following is the list of names, all of whom received more than fifty votes: Washington, Lincoln, Webster, Franklin, Grant, Marshall, Jefferson, Emerson, Fulton, Longfellow, Irving, Jonathan Edwards, Morse, Farragut, Clay, Hawthorne, George Peabody, Robert E. Lee, Peter Cooper, Eli Whitney, Audubon, Horace Mann, Beecher, Kent, Story, John Adams, Channing, Gilbert Stuart and Asa Gray. How varied the list is in the characters of the men who are in the opinion of the judges entitled to a place in the Hall of Fame! Yet each had done something that distinguished him in his particular path of life. There are some names, such as that of Adoniram Judson, one would like to have seen among the number, but these will lose nothing by the omission. More important for them as for the great multitude who can never hope to attain that distinction is it that their names may be inscribed in that book of which Christ spoke:

Rejoice because your names are written in heaven (Luke 10 : 20).

THE HALL OF FAME ON UNIVERSITY HEIGHTS, NEW YORK

Re-Discovery of a Pass

Explorers in South America have reported that in the region of Lake Nahuel Huapi there is excellent soil capable of producing many kinds of crops and is already covered with rich grass. Their descriptions have attracted settlers from Chili and Argentina: but, though the region was as rich as reported, it proved to be almost inaccessible. The high mountains barred the way to it, on both the Atlantic and Pacific sides. There was an old legend in circulation that more than a hundred years ago a Roman Catholic priest had found his way over the mountains and had declared that there was a pass which might easily be turned into a good wagon-road. He said that through this pass one might go from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast. People in those days had no great desire to penetrate to Patagonia and little notice was taken of the old priest's discovery. Now, however, it has become a matter of importance and men have been engaged to find the pass. But the sides of the mountains were covered by dense tropical vegetation and the searchers returned without finding the pass. Some lost faith in the existence of the pass, but others who had struck the route in part of its course were convinced that it was in existence. Now the Chilian explorer, Captain Barrios, has found the whole pass which, as the old priest said, leads right across the continent. It is easy to see what encouragement in the search would be derived from the finding of parts of the path. It is so in human efforts to understand God's ways. We know but little of his infinity, but the little that we do know fills us with wonder and stimulates to further study.

Lo, these are parts of his ways; but how little a portion is heard of him (Job 26 : 14).

An Ungrateful Protege

A lady in San Francisco is bemoaning the ingratitude of an adopted son. He was left an orphan in his infancy and this lady took care of him and brought him up as her own son. When he was ten years old, a heavy financial loss befell her and her health broke down. She loved him devotedly, but began to doubt her ability to take care of him. A gentleman who knew the circumstances offered to relieve her of the child. He was going to live in New York, and said that he would be glad to take the boy with him and educate him. Reluctantly the lady consented, and the boy accompanied his protector to New York. But his foster-mother pined for him and longed to have him back. She recovered part of her lost fortune and her health improved. She made a will leaving everything to her boy, and denied herself comforts that she might increase his inheritance. She corresponded with him regularly, and one day, after he had been away six years, she learned to her joy that he had quarreled with his guardian and was coming back to her. She gave him a hearty welcome, and lavished her affection upon him. But the boy soon tired of her. He longed to get back to New York, and finally he declared that he would stay in such a dull home no longer. The fascinations of the big city in which he had spent six years had captivated him. She wept and pleaded, but to no purpose: he cast her off, and having secured work that would take him part of his way back he left her. She is broken-hearted, and cannot be persuaded to forget him as he deserves. She is living in squalid poverty that she may leave him a little fortune when she dies, while he cares nothing for her. It is astonishing that she can love one who has treated her with ingratitude so base. We wonder at it and deplore the boy's perversity, but how many act in the same way toward God, whose patience and long-suffering they treat with neglect, and he complains:

I have nourished and brought up children and they have rebelled against me (Isaiah (1 : 2).

A Bewildered Immigrant

One of the most remarkable cases of mental disturbance is described by a police surgeon in Brooklyn, who was called to prescribe for a patient. It was the case of a man who had come to this country from Poland. He had found friends here who taught him the English language, and took care of him until he was able to earn his living. He obtained work with a contractor, who employed him in driving a team. One day he was sent for a load of sand, which he was to get from a certain sand-pit, and then drive with it across the city to a street in which the contractor was erecting some houses. The man went to the sand-pit, loaded his wagon, and set out for his destination. But on his way, he forgot the name of the street to which he was to go. He drove around all day in a state of bewilderment, and at last a policeman, seeing his dazed condition, sent him to the police station. By that time his mind seemed to be completely unbalanced. He could not remember where he lived, nor the firm of contractors for whom he worked, nor even his own name. The police surgeon administered a quieting medicine, and the man remained at the police station while inquiries were made for his friends, who the next day came and took him home. It is not often that mental disturbance so completely paralyzes the memory, but it is not uncommon to find persons who in spiritual matters seem similarly oblivious as to both their origin and destination. Unhappily, in their case, the cause is not like that of the immigrant, one of mental obscurity, but the consequence of sin that renders them careless and indifferent.

My people have been lost sheep; they have gone from mountain to hill; they have forgotten their resting-place (Jer. 50 : 6).

Vesuvius Threatening

Some alarm has been caused in the vicinity of Mount Vesuvius by the warnings issued by Prof. Palmieri, who is in charge of the observatory established on the volcano. It is now twenty-eight years since there was any serious eruption. At that time the stream of fiery lava that issued from the summit was so hot that the windows of the Observatory cracked and broke. New fissures opened on the sides and base of the mountain from which lava issued. From the great crater stones were thrown up and great volumes of steam rose to an immense height, menacing even the city of Naples. The lava ran in a stream a thousand feet wide to the sea and caused damage to the villages and growing crops estimated at over a million dollars. Ten persons who had waited to finish some urgent business before fleeing to a place of safety, were overwhelmed in the stream of lava and died a horrible death. If the eruption had continued much longer it would have rivalled the fearful convulsion that entombed Pompeii in A. D. 79. Before the eruption of 1872 certain premonitory signs were observed which have now reappeared and have led Prof. Palmieri to issue his warning. He says that again the surface of the central crater is beginning to heave and in the past history of the volcano it has always been noticed that whenever that phenomenon takes place, there will be, after a brief interval, convulsions of greater or less duration preparatory to a grand explosion, after which the volcano remains for years in comparative repose. Prof. Palmieri's warning does not seem to have done more than caused some uneasiness. The people do not appear to be leaving their farms and their vineyards. Perhaps they think as did the ten persons who lost their lives in the 1872 eruption, that they will have plenty of time to escape. That is how many people act when they are warned by ministers of the Gospel to flee the wrath to come.

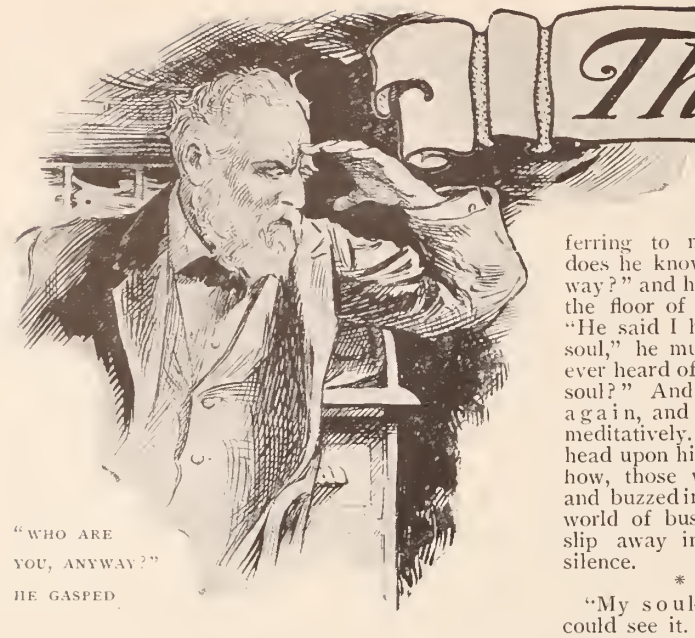
Take heed to yourselves lest . . . . that day come upon you unawares; for as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the earth (Luke 21 : 34).

A Neglected Opportunity

A singular case of loss through negligence has come to light through a suit to recover a legacy. The purchaser of some building-lots on the outskirts of a town in New Jersey directed his lawyer to examine the title. In doing so he discovered a flaw which appeared at first sight to be a mere formality. The land had changed hands more than once in recent years, but forty years ago it had formed part of an estate which had been divided on the death of the owner. His executors had omitted to settle up their accounts and obtain the formal release. Inquiry was made for them but they were dead and their representatives were scattered. There was no other way to make good the title but to obtain a release from the legatees mentioned in the will. Accordingly, a copy of the will was made and a notice was sent to every one to whom a bequest was made in it with a request for a receipt. Among them were the trustees of a church in New England to whom the owner of the property bequeathed a thousand dollars. There was no record on the church books of the legacy having been paid, and none of the trustees remembered receiving it. But as it was clear that the testator intended the church to have the thousand dollars, the trustees decided to sue for it. As the executors were dead they sued the holder of the property. The courts, however, decided against them, holding that the claim for the legacy ought to have been made earlier and that the Statute of Limitations barred the claim after so long an interval. The trustees believe that no notice of the legacy was ever sent to them, for if it had been there would have been no delay in making and pressing the claim. That is probably true, for men do not as a rule allow an opportunity of obtaining money to escape them. Unhappily, there is not the same promptitude and urgency in seeking the spiritual blessings which are placed of God at their disposal and are infinitely more valuable. Like this legacy many of them are lost because those who might have them do not apply for them until it is too late.

Ye have not because ye ask not (James 4 : 2).

The Visible Soul



"WHO ARE YOU, ANYWAY?" HE GASPED

MR. SAMUEL GREENE, the leading lumber merchant in a large Western city, was known as one of the most prosperous men in his section of the State. He had acquired his wealth by hard trading and close bargaining. Few people could get ahead of him; and though it was his frequent remark that every dollar he owned was "honestly made in trade," his customers and his tenants knew him only as a hard man, not unscrupulous, but disposed to exact the last dime. At home or in church (to which he went occasionally) his thoughts were too much occupied with schemes of money-making to afford any spare room for affection or religious feeling. His business acquaintances rather envied him, as one who had conquered the secret of success.

The lumber merchant sat in his little office at the close of an October day. It had been a day full of business and its aggravations. He was thinking of going home, when there suddenly came a rat-tat at the door.

"Come in!" called Mr. Greene, gruffly. "Oh, it's you, Simmons. Well now, what's wanted?"

"Mr. Greene," said the newcomer, a sturdily-built, honest-looking man of middle age, "I've come to see if you won't let me have another bill of lumber—some Michigan pine I need for that contract I have on the east side."

"No, Simmons, you can't have another foot of lumber from my yard, that's flat," said Mr. Greene, harshly. "As soon as you pay up what you owe, you can get more; not till then."

"But, Mr. Greene," protested Simmons, "this is a serious matter to me. Why, I've paid you hundreds and hundreds of dollars, good money, for your lumber; and as soon as this job is through you will be the first to get your money. You don't surely mean to say you refuse?"

"That's just what I do mean," snapped Greene. "But I've no time to talk about it. You can take your choice: pay up your last bill, or go without."

"It simply means ruin, that's what it does," said the man advancing into the room. "Why, good heavens, Mr. Greene, you cannot mean what you say! It would be the meanest——"

"Get out!" thundered the lumber merchant, advancing toward him, his huge bulk now quivering with anger. "Out of here, I say! You shall never get a foot of lumber from me as long as I live."

Simmons retreated a step or two, then, still with hat in hand, he turned towards the excited man. "Mr. Greene," he said in deep tones, "may the Lord forgive me for saying it, but I think you have the meanest soul that ever He permitted to enter into man, and if you could only see it——"

But his talk was suddenly cut short by a threatening movement of Mr. Greene, who pushed him out of the office and slammed the door violently.

Confounded impudence, I call it!" said the lumber merchant on regaining his seat. "Why, hang the fellow, I trusted him and trusted him. I'm fairly sick of his whining talk and poverty-stricken ways. To insult me by referring to my soul. What does he know about it, anyway?" and he rose and paced the floor of the little office. "He said I had the meanest soul," he mused. "But who ever heard of anyone seeing a soul?" And then he sat down again, and rubbed his chin meditatively. He rested his head upon his hands. Somehow, those words burrowed and buzzed in his brain. The world of business seemed to slip away into shadow and silence.

* * *

"My soul—well, I wish I could see it. I am sure that fellow is wrong. Anyhow, he knows nothing about it. I wish——"

"Here I am," piped up a little, thin voice, somewhere on the floor behind him.

"What—what's that?" he asked quickly.

"Here I am," repeated the thin voice.

"Who? Where?"

"Right here behind you."

The lumber merchant turned in astonishment, and looked in the direction indicated. There, in a corner, and in the shadow of the leather-covered lounge, was a little, impish, dwarf-looking figure, like a shriveled Filipino. The merchant shrank back in amazement.

"Who are you, anyway?" he gasped.

"I am your soul," piped the black-looking little imp in the corner.

"My soul!" He shook himself together as if disbelieving his senses. "Utter nonsense! Why, with a touch of this button I can summon a policeman——"

"Still, I'm your soul," said the little black one. "Yours, and nobody else's."

"How did you come into my office?" interrogated the merchant.

"I was permitted to come as you wished," said the black thing, "and I must stay until the time of my permission ends."

"Confound it!" persisted Mr. Greene, "you don't mean to say that you are going to stick right here, in my office."

"Wherever you go, I go," piped the voice. "I am a part of you and you cannot be without me."

"But," stammered the merchant, with an inward shudder, "how am I ever to get along with you sitting around?" He went over fearfully toward the door and slipped the spring lock. "Why, this is ridiculous. Everybody who meets us will remark."

"No eye but yours can see me," was the reply from the corner.

"Well, that's one consolation," said Greene, drawing a long breath. "My soul! Mine! This is the first time anybody ever heard of such a thing."

He touched a bell to summon his foreman.

"Haff," he said, "I'm going home. Everything all right?"

"Yes, sir," replied the foreman.

"Well, then, get me a carriage will you?"

"Certainly, sir."

It was with a strange trepidation that Mr. Greene buttoned up his coat and closed the door of his office that evening. He felt somehow as though he was bidding the old place good-by and might never come back. He noted with satisfaction that the coach-lamps were unlit. Looking down he saw, moving lightly by his side, the dark, little impish figure. He opened the coach door and stepped aside to give the Soul the right of way. Then he entered.

"How shall I ever be able to meet Mary and the girls in this fix?" he said. "It's awful! awful! Something must have happened in my brain," and he turned again toward the little figure whose presence and appearance seemed to put the question of hallucination beyond all doubt.

On reaching his home, he stepped quickly to the door, opened it with his own private key and let himself into the hall unobserved. Up the stairs to his room he went noiselessly. Once safe within, he locked the door and sank down, exhausted, in a large, easy chair.

"He said I had the meanest soul the Lord ever permitted to be in a man—that's what he said. I remember every word distinctly," and he looked around once more at the dwarfish creature who sat on a chair almost opposite. "And you are the soul that came in obedience to some strange summons! Now," said the merchant, "I want to think about this. Let us ask, what is the cause of that dingy color—that elfish blackness?"

"I am what you have made me," said the Soul. "I was not always so dark."

"The meanest soul," repeated Greene, the words lingering in his brain like the refrain of a song. "The meanest soul! Well, if I have blackened my soul, I pray God to help me, for no one else can."

A tap at the door interrupted his thoughts. He turned sharply to the little figure.

"You are sure no one can see you?"

"None but you," was the reply.

He opened the door.

"Sam! Sam!" said the gentle voice of his wife, "What's the matter? We saw you go up, and we haven't heard from you since you came home." She nervously grasped his hands in her own, which were trembling.

"Nothing, Mary," said the lumber merchant hurriedly. "Nothing's the matter, only I wish you would send me up a cup of tea—a cup of good strong tea. I want to take it here in my room. I have something on my mind; nothing to trouble you, Mary, but I must be here alone for a little while."

With something between a gasp and a sob, the wife went down stairs. Presently she returned with the cup of tea.

"Thank you, Mary," he said in a tone so kindly that his wife looked at him in surprise. "Now, dear, you see I am all right. Won't you please get Tom to hitch up and drive around to Simmons, the carpenter, and tell him I want to see him immediately? In fact, tell him to bring Simmons with him." He pulled out his watch, "I must have him here within the next half hour."

Five minutes later, he could hear the sound of the departing coach, showing that the coachman had sped upon his errand. Mr. Greene again touched the bell, and one of his daughters responded.

"Edith, I want to send down to the widow Grogan's. You know she is one of my tenants. Can't one of you girls go down and bring her up? It's only ten minutes' walk, and I must see her this evening."

"Why, papa," said the daughter, "and so late?"

"Oh," said the merchant, "it's only seven o'clock. You go, Edith, and I will make it up to you. You can take the street-car and be down there in a twinkling." And to her astonishment, he kissed her. Such a thing had hardly happened since the girls were babies.

It was well within the half hour when Tom drove up before the door, and Carpenter Simmons mounted the steps. He was shown up to the merchant's room.

"Come in, Simmons; come in!" said Mr. Greene with a show of animation.

"I came, Mr. Greene, but I haven't the slightest idea ——"

"No matter, no matter. Sit down," said the other. "The fact is, Simmons, I behaved like a hog to you this afternoon, and I am deeply sorry for it. I want you to understand that, Simmons. You have been a good customer of mine, and I've never lost a cent by your trade, and to have spoken to you as I did was too mean for anything, and I want to apologize."

"Oh, Mr. Greene," protested the carpenter, "don't say a word."

"But I insist," said Greene stoutly. "If a man acts like a hog, he must apologize; he has no right to act so. You said that I had the meanest soul ——"

"Mr. Greene," cried the carpenter nervously, "I regretted it the moment I said it. I declare I did. It was a cruel thing."

"It was true," said Greene, "every word. I know it. I have the meanest soul, and you told the truth. Sit down."

The visitor sat down in amazement.

"Now, here is an order," continued Greene, writing at a desk that stood in the corner of the room. "Haff will give you whatever lumber you want. Hereafter you can have that privilege. You are an honest man."

"You don't mean it! You don't mean it, Mr. Greene," cried the carpenter, starting up. "Why, it's like picking me out of the gutter. I was ruined if I didn't get that money. You've saved me. You've saved my business."

"Not another word," said Mr. Greene. "Here, Simmons, here's the order. Good night, and whenever you want any more lumber come and see me."

Still muttering his thanks, and greatly astonished at the turn affairs had taken, the carpenter withdrew.

The lumber merchant stood for a minute with a strange smile on his face. As he heard the footsteps die away, his eye fell upon the little figure in its nook, and it seemed to him—although it might only have been imagination—that it had grown a shade whiter.

A little later the widow Grogan was brought in by Edith. The widow, who was accompanied by her little daughter of seven, showed a tear-stained face. She had evidently been anticipating some new misfortune as the result of this summons from her landlord.

"Now," said Edith, reassuringly, "you just step right in, and papa will see you."

"Ah, Mrs. Grogan," said the merchant, "I am glad you've come."

"Oh, Mr. Greene," began the widow in piteous tones, "if it's the rint, I told the agent that I would thry to have it for him next month. I've done the best I could; but its the hard times we've had."

"Has that rascally agent of mine been bothering you, Mrs. Grogan?"

"Indade the man only wanted your rint, sor, an' I told him——"

"Never mind what you told him, Mrs. Grogan. So this is Molly, is it? Little Molly. How old is she?"

"Siven, sor. Speak to the jintleman, Molly, dear."

"Now, Molly," and he produced a silver coin from his vest pocket, "I am going to give this to your mother, and she is going to buy you the biggest red apple you ever saw. Mind you do it, Mrs. Grogan. Now about that rent. How long have you been living in that house of mine?"

"Eleven years, sor."

"Why, it seems to me that you have been a pretty steady tenant."

"I got this notice day before yisterday, sor," and she handed him a notice of dispossession.

The lumber merchant scowled. "And this," he muttered, "is done in my name. All the hardships that are inflicted upon these poor souls, who have paid rent for eleven years, I have to stand sponsor for."

"Now, Mrs. Grogan," he said, "turning to the widow, who was wiping her eyes with a corner of her dress, "I am going to give you a note to the agent, which will fix you all right, so far as the next quarter's rent is concerned, and I'll see you before then. You've had pretty hard lines since Patrick died?"

"Indade, very hard, sor. Many's the meal-hour there's neither bite nor sup in the house."

"Too bad! Too bad! But we must try to help you in some way. I will get my wife to come down and see you, Mrs Grogan, and see if we cannot make it easier for you and little Molly. Eh, Molly!"

The child smiled in his face, but still clung to her mother's sleeve. He fumbled in his vest pocket—it was a strange thing that he was prompted to do, but he did it. Generosity had never been a weakness of the money-maker, but this, he felt, was a special case. It was his doing, all this misery and suffering. He handed a ten-dollar bill to the widow.

"Now, here is something to keep the pot boiling, anyway, and don't you fear

A KING IN A MISSION

ON the banks of the River Thames, far below the smoke and soot of London, stands the modest little structure known as the Scandinavian Seamen's Mission. It is a small building, distinguished from its neighbors solely by its general air of cleanliness and homelikeness. In the rooms beneath its friendly roof, a good work has been carried on for many years for the benefit of the hundreds of Swedish and Norwegian sailors who come down to London with the lumberships. The Mission provides for them a homelike place where they can pass their hours off duty, and where they can secure board and lodging at a nominal charge. It also attends carefully to their spiritual needs.

Last spring, King Oscar of Sweden and Norway, together with the Queen and the Crown Prince, took a house in the country near London and decided to remain there several weeks for the benefit of his health. He lived quietly without pomp or ostentation. He spent his days in going wherever his fancy guided him. He, of course, took a great interest in the Scandinavian colony in London, and soon the work of the Seamen's Mission came to his notice. He visited the little building on the banks of the Thames. The writer was fortunate enough to be present on that Sunday. The king came like any ordinary visitor, with but one attendant and dressed as a private gentleman. He arrived in time for the regular Sabbath morning service, and sat among the congregation of sailors at the back of the room. There was no special service on his account. The Mission workers knew their king would prefer the ordinary programme, which was very simple and attractive. The address seemed especially appropriate to the occasion. It concerned the majesty of that Heavenly King, who is above all earthly sovereigns, and the speaker sought to impress upon the congregation the fact that Christ's sacrifice was all the greater on this account. She described his sufferings upon earth in a manner that did not fail to impress all.

The sailors were evidently greatly moved. There among them sat their earthly king. They knew of his many excellent qualities and his love for his people. There was not a man there who did not love King Oscar for what he has done for them. Many Swedish hymns were sung, the king joining in the choruses. He seemed to enjoy all that took place, and when the service was over, expressed his appreciation in words. He congratulated the sailors upon having such a pleasant home in a foreign land, and assured the mission workers of his hearty interest in their undertaking. He said he knew of no more deserving field of work than that among sailors, and closed by speaking of Christianity as the necessary force in every good work. When he had finished all were permitted to shake his hand and everyone supposed he would then take his departure. But the good king seated himself to have dinner with the seamen. He ate their bread and meat and potatoes, and chatted pleasantly all the while with the men about him. He said he had never enjoyed a dinner more, and promised he would visit the Mission again before leaving England. The sailors laughed and joked as though they were dining with their usual company. No one would have supposed the pleasant old gentleman at the head of the table was the king of Sweden and Norway. As one of the guests expressed it, "He looked for all the world like a retired clergyman."

KING OSCAR, OF SWEDEN, AT THE SAILORS' MISSION

At the close of the meal King Oscar returned to London. A few days later I was successful in securing an introduction to him at Grove House, Roehampton.

"I greatly enjoyed being there that day," he said, "and I hope to go again before I leave for Paris. It does one good to see such Christianity as I found there. Many a man is kept from drink and gambling by having such a place where he can go, and often he comes to realize the blessing of Christianity while surrounded by these good influences."

THE VISIBLE SOUL

but we will call." he said, cordially. "That is all I wanted to see you about, Mrs. Grogan. Good night, little Molly."

Then the pent-up emotion broke out beyond all control. The poor widow was overwhelmed with such kindness, and she fairly broke down.

"May the Lord bless ye, sor! Oh, may He bless you and yours forever! Indade, it's a good man you are, the day, to me an' Molly, an we'll pray for you ivery day of our lives—that we will. It's a kind heart you have, indade it is."

"Hush! Don't say such things," said the lumber dealer huskily, and his own voice trembled. "You can find your way down, and they will see you on the car."

"Oh, indade, we'll walk," she said, smiling, while the tears still dropped, "I feel like flyin'."

He heard their steps going down the stairs, the patter of the child keeping accompaniment to the heavier footfall of the mother. Both were smiling with joy and happiness.

With his own eyes strangely moist with the suspicion of tears, he turned from the window and looked toward the shadowed corner of the room. The soul seemed to smile at him with a gentle expression, which he had not observed before.

The hours that followed were eventful ones for the lumber merchant. Long he sat, and at intervals he conversed with his strange companion. The complete record of his career unrolled itself before him. He saw in a new and unfamiliar light many of the events which he had recorded as triumphs: he recalled a thousand instances where he had been harsh, where he had repressed noble impulses, and sacrificed love and affection in order that he might be unhampered in his struggle for wealth; where he had driven hard bargains and been guilty of what now seemed monstrous injustice, though the world called it shrewd trading. And then, with this reflection, he looked again at his dark and diminutive visitor.

"You forgot that these men were your brothers," said the voice from the corner answering his unspoken thoughts. "You showed them no mercy; you made no allowances; you took the full measure of your 'rights' as you understood them and gave no quarter. Their broken fortunes and blighted hopes you made stepping-stones to your own success. You have trodden all the way upon hearts, even the hearts of your own dear ones. You have given me—your Soul—no opportunity for growth, but have made me, as you see, a thing to be loathed and despised." And it bowed itself in its corner with a gesture of sorrow.

With a zeal that was almost feverish, he set about, as far as man could do, to rectify the wrongs, the injustices, the injuries and the sharp trading of years. It took time and no little grace and moral courage to make amends, and to do such other things as he could, but he persevered. And, strangest of all, he found presently a keen and satisfying pleasure in his new line of action. In business and social affairs, abroad and at home, he grew gracious and liberal. Mary and the girls at home found him companionable and affectionate. His men at the yard became familiar with his smile and kind words.

He did not forget his promise to the widow Grogan, and both she and little Molly profited by the change in affairs, as also did many others.

Before many months had passed, the business community, at first incredulous, had wholly revised its former estimate of the lumber merchant. He was no longer "the meanest man," and the hardest at a bargain. In losing the reputation for such qualities he had, all unconsciously, gained one for qualities much more desirable. He loved to help those who found themselves in "tight places." To the poor of his neighborhood he was a constant benefactor.

The year neared the close. The soul had grown to be a dear comrade, fair and well-proportioned, such as the merchant would have loved the whole world to see. And when the moment of parting came, he gazed upon the being who stood beside him and marveled: for, as it smiled upon him, he knew that it was noble and beautiful, dazzling in brightness and in stature like the angels.

The lumber merchant awoke with a start. He rubbed his eyes, looked at his watch, and then sat thoughtfully for a little space. He had slept altogether less than twenty minutes, but he had lived a year and learned the lesson of a lifetime. A shade of regret passed over his face as he looked into the corner where had appeared the visitor of his dream and found it empty. Then he put on his overcoat, locked the door and went home.

And the dream came true.

Your Nose

That is what you should breathe through—not your mouth.

But there may be times when your catarrh is so bad you can't breathe through it.

Breathing through the mouth is always bad for the lungs, and it is especially so when their delicate tissues have been weakened by the scrofulous condition of the blood on which catarrh depends.

Alfred E. Yingse, Hoernerstown, Pa., suffered from catarrh for years. His head felt bad, there was a ringing in his ears, and he could not breathe through one of his nostrils nor clear his head.

After trying several catarrh specifics from which he derived no benefit, he obtained, according to his own statement, entirely satisfactory results from

"IT'S NOT BIRTH,

Nor Wealth, Nor State, but 'Git Up and Git' That Makes Man Great."

This is the motto on the letter head of a well-known grocery firm in Watertown, N. Y., Fred B. Bush & Co., and is indicative of the character of the men. Mr. Bush himself had quite an experience with food in relation to health, as he was refused insurance three years ago because the examining physician found he had Bright's disease and could only live a short time at the best.

"My own physician suggested that I make a radical change in diet. About that time my attention was called to Grape-Nuts food, and I began with doctor's permission to use this food. Of course I had been forbidden the use of sugar or starchy food, but my doctor knew that Grape-Nuts was composed of the starch of wheat and barley transformed into grape sugar and in this condition is easily digested.

"To make a long story short, Grape-Nuts has been a constant dish at my table for three years. I have taken no medicine during this time and I am now strong and healthy and capable of doing a hard day's work every day."

So much for pure food, properly selected and perfectly cooked by experts at the factory. There is not a single disease in the category of human ills but what can be helped by the use of pure food of this character, and most of the ordinary diseases can be thoroughly overcome.

A CROWD of sad-faced and tired-eyed men may be found every morning in the Bowery Mission, waiting to pour their stories of want and woe, of disappointment and despair, into the ears of the superintendent as soon as he arrives. Some of them may have been at the meeting a few nights before, and the germ of new hope is working within them. Others, blear-eyed and husky-voiced, after a night's or a week's debauch, and in hysterical penitence born of shaken nerves and squandered cash, have come in, in the hope of being able to grasp a steadying hand. Some have just spent their first night in the great city, and are still grimy and travel-stained after their long freight-car ride. There are others who have been in the city, and in the same ward, for thirty years past; they are here because the Mission is the only place in the wide world from whence they are not repulsed.

Listen to some of their stories. The first brought in by the doorkeeper is a young man of twenty-five, who arrived in the city yesterday from Massachusetts. He is still nervous from the effects of dissipation. Twenty-four hours before, he had made his first appearance at the Mission. Then he was bright and clean, and clad in a new suit of clothes, with $44 in his pockets, with which his mother had provided him for the purpose of coming to New York to seek employment. He came direct to the Mission because his mother is a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and she had directed him there. Starting out to look for work, he had fallen into one of the many pitfalls laid for the unwary in the Bowery. He remembered nothing more than entering a dive, and taking his first drink. He had been drugged, and then robbed of his money, watch and clothes, and in a suit of dirty "relievers" he has staggered within the friendly doors of the Mission again, seeking there counsel and help. What can we do but fall upon our knees and ask God for help in getting this poor boy out of the great sinning city, back to his home.

The second who enters is a young man of about the same age as the last. His mother died of a broken heart in Michigan, six months ago. Often he has promised to do better, but has never been able to tear himself away from the gang of vile companions by whom he has become surrounded, and time after time he has fallen. A few days ago he received intelligence that his mother had left him a legacy of $100, and immediately the attentions of the crowd of sharks became more persistent than ever. He came to the Mission superintendent, and asked him to obtain the cash for him by making a draft on the lawyer of his dead mother. Here seemed to be a chance of getting the boy away from his old companions, of saving his money for him, of getting him a new start in life in some other city, amid fresh surroundings. The money was obtained for him, and the superintendent arranged to put him on an evening boat, with a letter of introduction to a Christian clergyman in a distant city, where, let us hope, he may indeed become a new man.

The next is a boy of eighteen or twenty. He has a very sad story to tell. He has been out west for the last three years, in the wilds of Arizona. He quarreled with his father, who lived in Elizabeth, N. J., and ran away from home. Like the prodigal of old, he found the way of transgressors to be hard, and there came into his heart a great yearning to see his father again and seek forgiveness. He beat his way for thousands of miles upon the freight-cars, on one occasion being seriously hurt by being thrown off the cars by an angry conductor. When he arrived at Elizabeth, tired and hungry, it was only to find that the good, kind father had died twelve months before. We try to make him understand that, orphaned though he is, the heart of the great Father still loves him with a fathomless love. Tears stand in the poor lad's eyes as he kneels and stammers out a little prayer of his own.

As the boy leaves us, another face appears at the door, but this time it is a bright, beaming countenance that we see. "Mr. Hallimond, I have called to tell you that I am getting on splendidly since the night you spoke to me in City Hall Park and gave me the price of a bed, and told me that it was just for such men as me that Christ died, and that you wanted me at the Mission. I have not taken another drop of liquor since. God has never been out of my thoughts for a moment, and I want to pay back the money you gave me that night, so that you may help some other as unfortunate as I was."

Thus, as the hours of the day glide past, case after case is dealt with, and we realize how limited our time and means are for gathering in the sheaves in this busy corner of the harvest-field.

J. G. HALLIMOND,
Superintendent Bowery Mission.

Saving the Homeless Boys

A new department of Christian work, involving a great responsibility, has lately been assumed at the Bowery Mission. It is now taking into its care and teaching a young and most neglected element—the homeless boys that are seen nightly crowding about the saloons and dance-halls of the Bowery. One of the mission workers found six boys under eighteen in one of the lowest dives. They frequent these dens because they have no other place to spend their evenings. The Mission tries to make them feel that there is always a welcome for them in its hospitable hall. Mrs. Sarah J. Bird writes us: "As Christmas is the time for home-gathering, many will come to the Mission as the only home they have; and we want to give two dinners on that day, one for the boys who attend regularly on Wednesday night and another for those who are alone and friendless in this big, wicked city. For nine years it has been my privilege to spend my Christmas with our sad, unfortunate men. It is always a time of great spiritual blessing. The kind and generous remembrance of God's children in providing for them softens their hearts, and out of bitter despair come hope and new ambition."

Readers who are willing to help in feeding the hungry at the Bowery Mission on Christmas day will kindly send their gifts to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Christian Herald

(An Acrostic.)

True CHRISTIAN HERALD of our Lord,
High is thy aim, and blest the word,
Ever given thee to sound abroad!

Christ keep and bless thee, evermore!
His love and strength—a boundless store—
Refresh and guide thee with all joy
In ev'ry work thy hands employ.
So many souls are blessed by thee
Throughout the world, on land and sea,
It calls for more than mortal power
As, day by day, and hour by hour,
New duties rise—heaven's richest dower!

High raise thy banner for the truth,
E'en o'er the walls where war and ruth
Rend earth and hell in bloody fray!
As sure as God's own word gives life,
Life springs from death, and peace from strife!
Do then thy work while lasts the day.

Eastford, Ct. (REV.) A. P. BRIGGS.

Shine On

Are you shining for Jesus, my brother?
This dark world needeth your light.
Are you guiding poor souls that are stumbling,
Out of the gloom of the night?

Are you shining, still shining for Jesus?
Shine on, O beloved, shine on;
Guide the wand'ring and weary to Jesus,
Shine on, O beloved, shine on.

Are you shining for Jesus, my brother?
For you his life he once gave;
Are you showing the way to a Saviour,
To him who only can save?

Are you shining for Jesus, my brother,
The light he gave unto you?
Are you telling of him unto others,
The dear old story, still new?

Are you shining for Jesus, my brother?
A city set on a hill;
Ever proving for him a true witness,
Ever knowing and doing his will.

COFFEE COMPLEXIONS

Skin Usually Clears up After Leaving off the Beverage

In this country people are very much addicted to the use of coffee, and to that, perhaps more than anything else, is attributable the dark, muddy complexions.

Mrs. J. L. Stiles, a teacher, was pale, weak, thin in flesh, wakeful, dyspeptic and trembling on the verge of nervous prostration. She discovered that the cause of it all was coffee, and the way she discovered it, was by discontinuing its use altogether, and taking in its place, Postum Food Coffee exclusively.

She got so well and got well so quickly, that she knows exactly what caused the change. Now she advises all her friends to use Postum, and is so enthusiastic about it that she sends printed notices of it in her letters to them, and warns them to be sure and have it made right. The Story of Little 12000

LILY, THE STREET-WAIF LILY, OF MONT-LAWN

BRINGING little children unto the Lord is surely a blessed work. If there is one phase of philanthropic activity upon which God would more fully set the seal of his approval than upon another, it seems to us it would be that of leading little ones unto the Saviour, "that he should put his hands on them." For the past seven years our readers have shared with us the privilege of just such high and holy labor as this. Hungry children have been fed, naked children have been clothed, sick children have been restored to health and strength, loveless children have been loved, at beautiful Mont-Lawn, our "Tenement Children's Paradise." Mont-Lawn is something more than a secular, a humanitarian, a philanthropic work—it is a spiritual work. If we give our little waifs clothes only, the clothes will wear out; if we give them food only, they may hunger again; if we give them human love only, human love may fail them; if we give them Christ, they are rich forever! Many of them come to us, unhappy little pagans, not so much as knowing if there be a Christ. None go away in such ignorance. Many leave us conscious—as it is peculiarly childhood's privilege to be—that Jesus has blessed them. To such as these, life has a new meaning, a new strength and sweetness, which cannot be taken away by the unchildlike cares, sorrows, and privations to which hundreds of these poor waifs are subject.

"Little Twelve Thousand" is a living witness to what Mont-Lawn has done for a great multitude of children. Twelve thousand waifs loved, clothed, fed, sheltered, and taught to know something about Jesus! What an army they would make if all stood in line, singing the victory song that their separate companies have trilled with such fervor in our chapel.

When the battle's over, we shall wear a crown.

Poor little soldiers in life's unequal struggle! They have many a battle to fight with poverty, hardships, and the saloon. It was good last summer to hear them sing till the Rockland Hills sent back the echo:

O, it is wonderful, very, very wonderful,
All is love and grace to me!

We have received many children as ragged as "Little Twelve Thousand," but few more so. How happy she was when her tattered and soiled garments were removed, when she was washed, neatly clad, and a doll placed in her arms, words cannot tell. How eagerly she drank the bowls of rich milk provided! How she enjoyed her clean white cot, and how pretty she looked nestling down in it, her blue eyes shining up at "teachers," eloquent with the love and gratitude her tongue could not utter—for the poor baby's organs of speech are defective. Her mother died a drunkard; her father is not always sober; her sister, eleven years old and not very bright, is housekeeper in the one miserable room which is home for "Little Twelve Thousand," her father, brother and two sisters. She was a late guest at Mont-Lawn, and we kept her until schools opened in the city. The real name of the tiny maid who bore the dignity of this big number because she was the twelve thousandth waif entertained at our Children's Home on the Hudson, is Lily. One of our pictures shows her as she was picked up off the street and brought to the Bible House, a candidate for Mont-Lawn. The other, as she returned to the city, ready for kindergarten. Her little brother and sister, our guests also, were as greatly benefited as Lily.

* * *

Every year, in every State in the Union, God raises up new friends for this work. Now and then, a servant of Christ going to the better land above, remembers Mont-Lawn in a last will or testament, and under their names, be the offering small or large, may be written, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord . . . their works do follow them." With friends in heaven and friends on earth and the blessing of the Lord falling as dew upon it, surely this work for the children of the poor cannot but grow and prosper, sending out its influences into many homes, where, as of old, it may be said, "A little child shall lead them." Pray for the continuance of God's blessing upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home.

No Work for God is Vain

HAST thou grown weary in thy toil?
Does labor seem for naught?
Art thou in brief discouragement,
By Satan's meshes caught?
Gird up thy loins—look toward the stars,
And let thy God sustain—
It is for Him thou laborest—
No work for God is vain.

'Tis like the alabaster box
With love's devotion poured—
A costly thing—but not too much
When it anoints thy Lord.

O, pour it, then, with prayer and tears!
The precious vessel drain!
'Twill sweeten all the dusty years—
O, 'twill not be in vain!

Ye sow in tears—ye reap in joy!
No more to grief succumb!
Seed sown for God, naught can destroy,
And harvest time will come.
Work on beneath thy Father's smile—
Let love, dear love constrain!
'Tis all that makes our lives worth while—
O, 'twill not be in vain!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

"Eben Holden"

AMONG the notable books of the year, there is probably none that has achieved a wider popularity than Eben Holden, a Tale of the North Country, by Irving Bacheller, a young and rising American author. The secret of this success is to be found in the fact that he has taken his story from real life, for Eben Holden is not a work of fiction, in the ordinary sense of the word, but a narrative which deals, with rare fidelity and fine literary skill, with the every-day lives of a simple, rural people—the descendants of those who came from New England many years ago and made homes for themselves in the Adirondack wilderness. As Hawthorne drew his types from New England, Harte from the rough miners and pioneers of the Rockies and the Sierras, and Cooper from the dwellers of the forest and on the prairies, so this later writer has chosen the characters of his story and their surroundings from among a class who made their way amid most difficult surroundings. The book is rich in quaint humor and full of the atmosphere of the piney woods, the clearing and the farm.

His book is the autobiography of an orphan—almost a foundling—whose good genius is a shrewd, fun-loving, wholesouled old uncle. There are many passages over which the reader will love to linger. The old man's perilous flight with the boy through the North Woods in winter; their hospitable welcome by good David Brower and his worthy wife at Paradise Valley, where dwelt sweet young Hope Brower; the happy, youthful days on the farm; the odd rural folks around, and their old-fashioned ways and quaint dialect; the educational struggle; the boy's start in life in the great city; his experience as a soldier in the battles for the Union; his return to New York after the war, and the ultimate happy reunion on the old farm with the dear old folks about him and Hope by his side—all these and a thousand others are pictured in a way that is delightfully entertaining.

We have only space for a single extract—a scene which describes the Christmas gathering at the old farm:

Uncle Eben's Christmas Surprise*

We sat by the fire after the supper dishes were put away, talking of all the Christmas days we could remember. Hope and I thought our last in Faraway best of all, and no wonder, for we had got then the first promise of the great gift that now made us happy. Elizabeth, sitting in her easy chair, told of Christmas in the olden time, when her father had gone to war with the British.

David sat near me, his face in the firelight, the broad brow wrinkled into furrows and framed in locks of iron gray. He was looking thoughtfully at the fire. Uncle Eb came soon, stamping and shaking the snow out of his great fur coat.

"Col' night," he said, warming his hands.

"Jes' thought I'd buy this fer fun," said he, holding it down to the firelight. "I never see the like uv it. Whoa!" he shouted as the cover flew open, releasing a jumping-jack. "Quicker'n a grasshopper! D'ye ever see sech a sassy little critter?"

Then he handed it to Elizabeth.

"Wish ye Merry Crissmus, Dave Brower!" said he.

"Ain't as merry as I might be," said David.

"Know what's the matter with ye," said Uncle Eb. "Searchin' after trouble—thet's what ye're doin'. Findin' lots uv it right there'n the fire. Trouble's goin' t' git mighty scurce 'round here this very self-same night. Ain't goin' t' be nobody lookin' fer it—thet's why. Fer years ye've been takin' care o' somebody 'et 'll take care o' you long's ye live—sartin sure. Folks they said ye was fools when ye took 'em in. Man said I was a fool once. Alwuss hed a purty fair idee of myself sence then. When some folks call ye a fool et's a ruther good sign ye aint. Ye've waited a long time fer yer pay; ain't much longer t' wait now."

There was a little quaver in his voice. We all looked at him in silence. Uncle Eb drew out his wallet with trembling hands, his fine old face lit with a deep emotion. David looked up at him as if he wondered what joke was coming, until he saw his excitement.

"Here's twenty thousan' dollars," said Uncle Eb, "a real, genuwine bank check—jist as good as gold. Here 'tis! A Crissmus present fer you'n Elizabeth. An' may God bless ye both!"

David looked up incredulously. Then he took the bit of paper. A big tear rolled down his cheek.

"Why, Holden! What does this mean?" he asked.

"'At the Lord pays his debts," said Uncle Eb. "Read it."

Hope had lighted the lamp.

David rose and put on his spectacles. One eyebrow had lifted above the level of the other. He held the check to the lamp. Elizabeth stood at his elbow.

"Why, mother!" said he, "Is this from our boy? From Nehemiah? Why, Nehemiah is dead!" he added, looking over his spectacles at Uncle Eb.

"Nehemiah is not dead," said the latter.

"Nehemiah not dead!" he repeated, looking down at the draft.

They turned it in the light, reading over and over again the happy tidings pinned to one corner of it. Then they looked into each other's eyes.

Elizabeth put her arms about David's neck and laid her head upon his shoulder and not one of us dare trust himself to speak for a little. Uncle Eb broke the silence.

"Got another present," he said, "'S a good deal better'n gold er silver—"

A knock at the door interrupted him. He swung it open quickly. A tall, bearded man came in.

"Mr. Trumbull!" Hope exclaimed, rising.

"David and Elizabeth Brower," said Uncle Eb. "The dead has come t' life. I give ye back yer son, Nehemiah."

Then he swung his cap high above his head, shouting in a loud voice, "Merry Crissmus! Merry Crissmus!"

The scene that followed I shall not try to picture. It was so full of happiness that every day of our lives since then has been blessed with it and with a peace that has lightened every sorrow. Of it, I can truly say that it passeth all understanding.

"Look here, folks," said Uncle Eb, "after a while, as he got his flute, my feelin's hev been teched hard. If I don't hev some jollification I'll bust. Bill Brower, limber up yer leather a leetle bit."

RELIGION OF THE WORLD'S RULERS.

KINGS, QUEENS, EMPERORS, AND PRESIDENTS, AND THEIR VARIOUS CREEDS.

THE religion of the head of a state or nation is usually the predominant belief of the nation itself. In the religions of the world's rulers to-day, many different creeds are represented. With rare exceptions, the heads of nations are punctilious in fulfilment of their religious duties, thus setting a good example to their subjects.

Queen Victoria, as devout a Christian as the humblest member of the Church of England, is a great lover of hymns. Her favorites used to be "Nearer My God To Thee," "Jesus Lover of My Soul," and "How Sweet the Name of Jesus Sounds." Of late years, her choice has become confined almost entirely to hymns relating to the future state and breathing the spirit of resignation. At service, she has frequently asked that the choir sing "Wake for the Night is Flying."

Wilhelm, the young and energetic German Emperor, is a sincerely moral and religious man. He is a Protestant, believing in the tenets of Luther. Wilhelm is one of the few monarchs in history who have preached. On his yacht he never takes a minister along, but personally acts as spiritual father of the family aboard. On Sundays at sea he conducts divine service, taking his place behind the altar and preaching a sermon.

The husband of Queen Wilhelmina of Holland will surely be a Protestant, for she is herself the best and most regular worshiper in the Dutch Church. Moreover, the law of her land will not permit her to marry a Catholic. She studied the Bible under a special professor, and many anecdotes are related of the questions by which she sought enlightenment.

King Christian of Denmark, though personally inclined to the Lutheran Church, holds most liberal religious views regarding his people and members of his family. King Oscar II. of Sweden is of the Protestant faith, a practical Christian, and an ardent student of the Bible. Switzerland's President, Col. Edward Muller, is a Protestant and a member of the Church of Bern. He worships simply as a private citizen, walking to and from church every Sunday morning with his family. President Kruger, of the South African Republic—if he can now be called the President—is of course a member of the Dutch Protestant Church. He is fond of lay ministrations.

The Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria is a devout Catholic. Every Sunday morning he hears mass in the palace chapel. He wears civilian dress and remains standing throughout the service, his head bared and bowed. M. Loubet, the most democratic President France has known, is a Catholic, and prefers to worship in a simple way as a private citizen. King Victor Emanuel of Italy is a Roman Catholic. Carlos I., of Portugal, is a Catholic, as indolent and as apathetic in his religious duties as in those of his rulership. Alfonso, the boy King of Spain, is a Catholic. Pope Leo XIII. is his godfather. With his mother, the Queen Regent, he attends mass every Sunday. Leopold, King of the Belgians, is a Catholic.

The Czar of Russia, the only layman of the Orthodox Russian Church who is allowed to step foot into an altar, has his private chapel in both St. Petersburg and Moscow. There is high mass for His Majesty every Sunday. The music is entirely vocal, the singers being invisible, according to the customs of the Church—no instrumental music being allowed. The altar in the Czar's chapel is behind golden gates on which sacred subjects are frescoed. Suddenly the gates burst open and the "Gloria" is sung by the invisible choir. Both the Czar and Czarina are very punctilious about their hours of worship.

King George of Greece, and Queen Olga are both devotees of the Orthodox Greek Church. Their private chapel in Athens is one of the prettiest little churches in Greece. Here they worship every Sunday when in the capital. Nicholas, ruler of Montenegro, also lives according to the teachings of the Orthodox Greek Church. King Carl of Rumania and "Carmen Sylva," his Queen, belong to the same church, as does Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria. King Alexander, of Servia, is of the Orthodox Greek faith, but not at all regular in his church attendance.

The Sultan of Turkey, an extreme Mohammedan, goes to public worship at the big mosque in Constantinople every Friday. He rides in a closed carriage attended by ten thousand soldiers, and all along the line of march the people shout, as he passes: "There is no God but Allah and Mohammed is his prophet." On all other days in the year he worships in private. The Khedive of Egypt and all his family are also of the Mohammedan faith. At the alabaster mosque of Mohamet Ali in Cairo, once a year, the Khedive and all the male members of his household attend public worship. No outsider is permitted to attend. The Shah of Persia is a Mohammedan who observes his religious duties only in a most perfunctory and worldly way. The Sultan of Morocco, a young man only eighteen years old, is of the Mohammedan faith, the religion of his predecessors.

Menelik II., King of Abyssinia, goes to his native church every day in the year. On Sundays he attends Holy Trinity Church; for Christianity was introduced into his country in the fourth century.

The King of Siam is a Buddhist and was for some time a priest, as is the custom with all the rulers of that country. During his priesthood he shaved his head and temporarily gave up the crown to wear a yellow cotton scarf about his waist and spend his days in fasting and prayer.

The Emperor and Empress of Japan are disciples of Shintoism, the faith of their ancestors for centuries back. They are both attentive to their religious duties though their outward life, perhaps unconsciously, carries out many of the teachings of Christianity.

It is said that among monarchs, the Emperor of China is the greatest martyr to religious ceremonials. As the Chief High Priest, he has to offer a sacrifice to a different god almost every week in the year. To each sacrifice is dedicated one or more holidays, and the Emperor is supposed to pass every one of these days in solitude. Another heathen religious rule which the Emperor is bound to observe, is that of offering hundreds of silk balloons each year before the tablets of his long line of predecessors. Altogether, he spends more than one hundred and fifty days a year in religious duties.

President McKinley is in every sense of the word a Christian—regularly attending service at the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church in Washington, or the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canton. When he is not in his pew on Sunday, the pastor knows that something extraordinary has occurred to keep the most distinguished member of his flock at home. Mrs. McKinley, being an invalid, is not able to be a regular attendant at church, so the President has to go alone, or, at best, accompanied by a cabinet minister. He always joins heartily in the singing of hymns, reads the Psalms, and listens intently to the sermon. He particularly enjoys the hour of service, because for this hour he is the private citizen, the simple worshiper.

The Presidents of the South and Central American republics are nearly all Catholics, but only a few of them attend divine service. Among the few is President Diaz of Mexico, a devout religionist and most scrupulous in matters of doing good. He is very benevolent, and assists Mrs. Diaz in maintaining many charities.

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. CONCERT ROLLER ORGAN
Length, 18 in., Width, 15 in., Height, 12 in., Weight, Boxed, 30 lbs.

The Concert Roller Organ has a fuller volume of tone, and far more sustaining power than any two pianos. At the same time it is so fully under control, by means of a swell attachment, that the softest passages can be rendered with exquisite delicacy. For evening entertainments, etc., it is most admirable, and when otherwise musicians would have to be engaged, it will save its cost in one night; and is, upon the whole, the most perfect mechanical instrument in design, operation and effect, that has yet been produced.

The case is strongly made of solid black walnut, and is elegantly finished, forming a handsome parlor ornament.

By means of new and automatic machinery, the manufacturers are enabled produce music rollers in large numbers so that we can offer them to the public at price not exceeding the average cost of music paper; and a roller will give a ver much better performance, besides Outlasting a Thousand Paper Sheets.

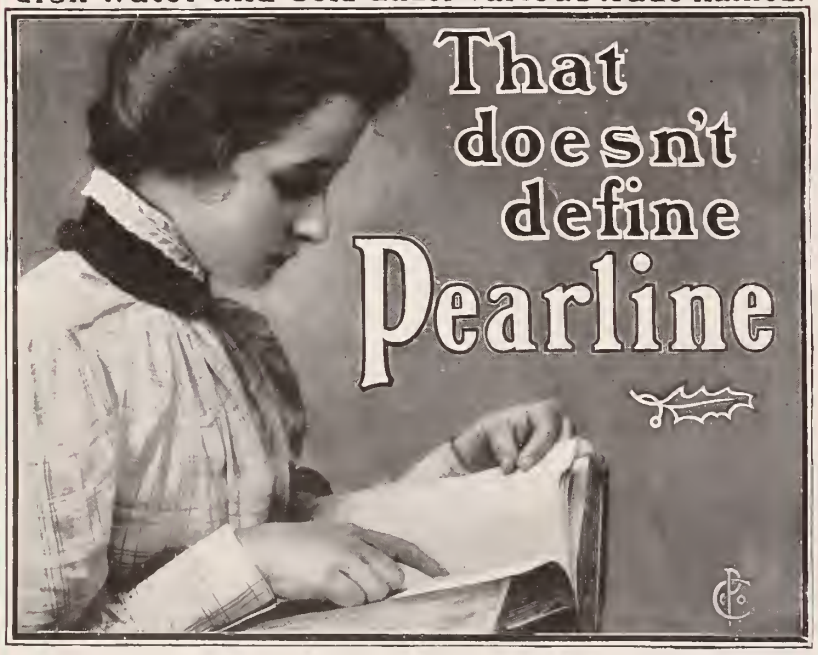
Who made the Definition of Soap Powder in the Standard Dictionary ?

Soap Powder—Powdered Soap used in dish water and sold under various trade names.



"Pearline"

—that's the definition of "SOAP POWDER" in one word. Condensed soap, in powdered form for your convenience—the modern way of using soap.

PEARLINE makes better, richer, more effective suds than any soap. One pound of PEARLINE will do the work of four pounds of soap, and do it better, easier, quicker, in hot or cold or salt water.

A full day's wash can be done in two hours with PEARLINE—no rubbing, hence no wear on garments; brightens colors; whitens white goods, PEARLINE takes the dirt only.

There's a legion of imitators of PEARLINE—some effective, but dangerous, some useless, some plain washing-soda.

Millions use it INSTEAD OF SOAP; others will use it.

"THE ARRIVAL OF THE SHEPHERDS"

THE DAY OF DAYS

REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

THE twenty-fifth of December means more than any other holiday. Our twenty-second of February celebrates the birth of the greatest of all Americans, but Christmas carols and chants and doxologizes the birth of the most illustrious Being the world ever saw or ever will see. Our Fourth of July celebrates the birth of our nation's independence, but Christmas calls to mind the advent of him who will yet set all nations free. The "Labor Day," in September, marshals its processions in honor of those who toil with hand and foot, but Christmas emphasizes the birth of the Carpenter of Nazareth, who came to help all burden-bearers to carry their load and stop all fatigues with eternal rest in heaven. New Year's Day opens the twelve months with congratulation, but Christmas tends to make all the days and years and cycles bright with hope and consolation, and rescue. Crown all the holidays with gladness and commemoration, but twine an additional garland for that day "which celebrates the Nativity."

Give the children an especially good time, for childhood Christmas is only for a few years. Before long some one will tell the children that there is no Santa Claus, and they will cease to hear the clatter of the reindeer hoofs on the roof near the chimney, and much of the glee will be gone. There are no Christmas holidays to be compared with those which chime before thirteen years of age. Further on in life we may better understand the great significance and high religious meaning of the day, but the real fun does not live long enough to reach the teens. Plant the Christmas trees, and waken the music, and distribute the presents, and fill the homestead with merry voices. In that way the youngsters will gather up an exuberance of spirits to be drawn upon when the cares and trials and bereavements of adult life arrive. Merry Christmas to all! And may each Christmas day be happier than its predecessor.

The Bethlehem Cradle

CHRIST might have made his first visit to our world in a cloud, as he will descend on his next visit in a cloud. In what a chariot of illuminated vapor he might have rolled down the sky, escorted by angelic cavalry, with lightning of drawn swords! Elijah had a carriage of fire to take him up; why not Jesus a carriage of fire to fetch him down? Or over the arched bridge of a rainbow the Lord might have descended; or Christ might have had his mortality built up on earth out of the dust of a garden, as was Adam, in full manhood at the start, without the introductory feebleness of infancy. No. No! Childhood was to be honored by that advent. He must have a child's lithe limbs, and a child's dimpled hands, and a child's beaming eye, and a child's flaxen hair, and babyhood was to be honored for all time to come, and a cradle was to mean more than a grave. Mighty God! may the reflection of that one child's face be seen in all infantile faces.

From the celebrated painting by Uhde

THE MASTER BLESSING THE CHRISTMAS FEAST

Enough have all those fathers and mothers on hand if they have a child in the house. A throne, a crown, a sceptre, a kingdom under charge. Be careful how you strike him across the head, jarring the brain. What you say to him will be centennial and millennial, and a hundred years and a thousand years will not stop the echo and reecho. Do not say, "It is only a child." Rather say, it is only an immortal. It is only a masterpiece of Jehovah. It is only a being that shall outlive sun and moon and stars, and ages quadrillennial. God has infinite resources, and he can give presents of great value; but when he wants to give the richest possible gift to a household he looks around all the worlds and all the universe and then gives a child. The greatest present that God ever gave our world he gave about 1900 years ago, and he gave it on a Christmas night, and it was of such value that heaven adjourned for a recess and came down and broke through the clouds to look at it. Yea, in all ages God has honored childhood. He makes almost every picture a failure unless there be a child either playing on the floor, or looking through the window, or seated on the lap, gazing into the face of the mother. It was a child in Naaman's kitchen that told that great Syrian warrior where he might go and get cured of the leprosy, which at his seventh plunge in the Jordan was left at the bottom of the river. It was to the cradle of leaves, in which a child was laid, rocked by the Nile, that God called the attention of history. It was a sick child that evoked Christ's curative sympathies. It was a child that Christ set in the midst of the squabbling disciples, to teach the lesson of humility. We are informed that wolf and leopard and lion shall be yet so domesticated that a little child shall lead them.

A child decided Waterloo, showing the army of Blucher how they could take a short cut through the fields, when, if the old road had been followed, the Russian general would have come up too late to save the destinies of Europe. And the child of to-day will yet decide all the great battles, make all the laws, settle all the destinies, and usher in the world's salvation or destruction. Men, women, nations, all earth and all heaven, behold the child! Is there any velvet so soft as a child's cheek? Is there any sky so blue as a child's eye? Is there any music so sweet as a child's voice? Is there any plume so wavy as a child's hair?

A Reminiscence

ABOUT this time of year we all become meditative, and are disposed to look back more than to look forward. Especially is this so if we sit by a country fire-place, or a city grate where the kind of coal you burn allows the flames to gallop, and shake the shadows up and down the wall.

In my house on Oxford street, Brooklyn, we had a memorable gathering in October, 1876. Many ladies and gentlemen were present, but the most conspicuous—not because of any pretense on his part, but by sheer force of elevated character—was William Cullen Bryant. He did not much like to be helped out of the carriage when he came, nor to be helped into it again when he departed. He was the impersonation of simplicity. He no doubt knew that he was admired of all, but he gave no demonstration of that fact.

The evening had nearly passed when the Mayor of the city made an address of appreciation both of Martin Farquhar Tupper, the English poet, then present, and of our venerable American poet, Bryant and Tupper, before the other guests came, had been seated on the sofa, quoting poetry and reviving reminiscences. After the Mayor, addresses by Messrs. Bryant, Tupper, and Peter Cooper, and the Rev. Drs. I. S. Prime, Dowling, and others. But I had always been desirous of hearing Mr. Bryant read one of his poems. I had attended the Bryant meeting a year or two before in Chickering Hall, New York City—a meeting at which the music was good and the speaking good, but there was a great lack in it of William Culler Bryant himself. His speech of response was only about three minutes, while he spent all the rest of the evening in doing nothing except keeping silence and looking venerable. I thought, Why does not somebody think of asking the glorious old man to come forward and read his "Forest Hymn," or lines to a "Waterfowl," or the "Death of the Flowers"? But no such thing happened. On the evening at my house I resolved that no such omission should be repeated. I sprung my stratagem on him in the most unexpected moment. Mr. Tupper, at our request, had read a selection from his own poems, and read them well. Turning to our American poet, I said: "Mr. Bryant, I have always wanted to hear you read 'Thanatopsis,' and I have no doubt it would be a great joy to all our guests to hear you read it. I have it here in Griswold's compilation. Will you grant us the great favor of reading it?"

Bryant blushed like a bashful Miss when asked to play on the piano. There was evidently a struggle between his modesty and his desire to be obliging. After a moment's pause, he said: "I would rather read anything than my own writings; but if it will be of any pleasure to you I will do as you say." Taking the book, he advanced to the middle of the room, looked up at the chandelier and then looked at the book. "Take my spectacles," said Mr. Tupper. "No, no," said Mr. Bryant, "I do not need spectacles." The type of the book was rather small, but he made no hesitation. There he stood, at eighty-two years of age, about to read without spectacles a poem he had published in the North American Review in 1816, when he was eighteen years of age! He turned round and said: "You will understand that I do not recite this from memory, for I am not familiar with it. I only read it." With calm, slow accent he read on.

It was a scene never to be forgotten. It was Eighteen Hundred and Sixteen reading to Eighteen Hundred and Seventy-six. He did not hold the book away off as octogenarians are wont to do when they read without glasses, but just as a man of thirty would hold a book. His long white beard snowed upon the page. As he came to the last nine lines his voice became feeble, not with physical weakness, but with suppressed emotion. I had read it, and reread it, as everybody else has, until I thought there was no more to get out of the closing lines of "Thanatopsis," but he gave it a new translation that memorable night. Could it be that I had ever heard it before? The white, overhanging eyebrows, the deep-sunken eyes, the great dome of a forehead above a thin body, the realization that it must be the closing hours of a long and beautiful life, and the sound of the strong autumnal winds that swept round the house while he was reading, were a commentary upon the immortal passage, until I write them here under half-delusion that no one has ever seen or heard them before:

So live that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan that moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one that draws the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

We never saw him again. We said "Good night" till under other skies we shall say "Good morning." I could not that night help thinking of the first time I saw Mr. Bryant. It was in the days of my boyhood, at Tripler Hall, at the meeting in commemoration of Fenimore Cooper, who had just died. Washington Irving came forward to call the meeting to order. He was embarrassed as I never before or since saw a speaker embarrassed. He had his hat in one hand and his gloves in the other. His chief perplexity seemed to be how to change his hat and gloves to the other hand. He hemmed and hawed and stuttered, and blushed and bowed and half broke down while presenting Daniel Webster as the chairman of the meeting. Daniel Webster in a speech introduced William Cullen Bryant as the orator of the evening. For more than an hour Mr. Bryant discoursed of his friend, the author of Wing-and-Wing, Red Rover, and the Two Admirals. What a night in Tripler Hall that was! Was there ever such a group on one platform? Washington Irving calling to the chair Daniel Webster to introduce William Cullen Bryant!

But which most affected me I cannot easily tell—Bryant, in 1851, applauded of the multitudes in Tripler Hall, or Bryant in my parlors in 1876. The one was "Noontide!" The other was "Sunset!"

THE · FIVE · GREAT · RELIGIONS · OF · INDIA

EVERY religion has some characteristic or distinguishing feature, which is an element of power. That characteristic is expressed even in the attitude of its follower in his supreme act of religion. In a street in India, it is no uncommon sight to see followers of four different religions each in a different attitude of devotion. Rev. R. A. Hume, of Ahmednagar, thus describes these attitudes:

1.—The hands folded and head bowed reverently before the idol hid in the darkness of the Hindu temple represents the characteristic element of Hinduism, namely: Reverence for the great unknown.

2.—The characteristic attitude of the Mohammedan is his head upon the ground, expressing submission to the Almighty. That is the meaning of the word Islam, which is the correct name of this religion.

3.—The characteristic attitude of the Jain religion is of a worshiper with a pinch of sugar between his fingers, looking around for even the ants to feed them, expressing respect for the very humblest forms of life. The meaning of the word Jain is the living thing, or life.

4.—The characteristic attitude of the Zoroastrian or Parsee is reading his prayer-book in a dead language with his face toward the sun, expressing reverence for the symbol of light and purity.

These are the four principal religions of India, Hinduism, with millions of followers, predominating, the Parsees being in the minority with about 110,000 followers, principally in Bombay.

The fifth religion in that far country, with over three millions of native followers, is Christianity. The characteristic attitude of the Christian is not to bend before the great unknown; not with head in the dust before almighty power; not forgetting man and searching out the insects; not reading in an unknown tongue prayers to the sun, but counting himself as a son of God, he stands with one hand raised to his heavenly Father, with the other hand holding his suffering brother, and says: "Father, with Christ's help, help me to help my brother man."

Brahmanism, a branch of Hinduism, is the religion of the learned class. The Brahmin's attitude of devotion, however, is that of the Hindu of the lowest caste. In his reverence for the great unknown, the Hindu of low caste bows before countless idols set up not only in the temples, but at intervals along the public highway. He bows his head and folds his hands before any of these in passing, according to the particular deity whose protection he needs, or whom he wishes to honor. The Brahmin's religious duties consist daily of five sacraments: the study of the Veda, or book of laws; an offering for the progress of the honor of the gods; the fire of the dead; an offering in honor of the spirits; and an offering in honor of mankind. In all cases, the attitude of devotion is the one described above.

Daily, at the setting of the sun, the 40,000,000 Mohammedans in India prostrate themselves with forehead to the ground in absolute submission to the government of God and resignation to his will.

The Jain reverences all forms of life, every living thing, and hence it is that his characteristic attitude of devotion is that of searching for the humblest form of life, even the ants, that he may feed that living thing and sustain life in it. He must wear a cloth over his mouth to keep insects from flying into it. He must carry a brush to sweep the place on which he is about to sit, lest he crush out some form of life. He must never leave a liquid uncovered, lest an insect should be drowned in it. He must practice the four virtues of liberality, gentleness, piety and penance. He must at certain seasons abstain from salt, flowers, fruits, roots, honey, grapes. It is his duty also, to visit daily a temple where some of the Jain saints are placed, walk around it three times, make an obeisance to the image, and make some such offering as fruit or flowers.

The Parsee of India is faithful to this day to the ancient Persian religion as reformed by Zoroaster. They are also called fire-worshipers, and every evening at sunset they gather along the shores and beaches around Bombay, in the attitude characteristic of their devotion; that is, erect, facing the sun, and reading the laws of Zoroaster. Their traditions teach that the sacred fire which Zoroaster brought from heaven has been kept continually burning. And yet all intelligent Parsees spurn the imputation that they worship either the sun or fire. To them, fire is merely an emblem of divinity, the symbol of which is the sun, with the moon, and the planets, and in default of these the fire in the temples; and the believer is enjoined to face a luminous object during his prayers. Hence also the temples and altars must be forever fed with the "holy fire" brought from heaven, the sullying of the flame of which is punishable with death. Even the priests approach this fire only with a mask over the lower part of the face, lest their breath should defile it, and they never touch it with their hands, but only with holy instruments. They assert that they worship the one true spiritual God above, but revere the sun and fire as the highest manifestation of God. One sees them in Bombay in the street, on the docks, or wherever they may happen to be at the going down of the sun, apparently in adoration. We see them in their carriages stop on the terrace and put themselves in a position of worship, raising their hands toward the sun and bowing with the most pronounced reverence.

The Jains are divided into two factions—one, the "sky-clad," ascetics who wear no clothing at meal time, and only colored garments at all other times; in the other faction are those who wear white garments. The first sect never decorate the images of their saints, while the second faction decorate their images with all sorts of trinkets, such as earrings, necklaces, armlets and tiaras of gold and jewels. Both factions recognize a number of families among themselves in which no intermarriage can take place.

The origin of the Jain religion is immersed in the same obscurity which invests Hinduism. Their literature, however, proves that it came into existence years later than Buddhism. They have no priests of their own, their ministrants, or readers, being Brahmins.

The Hindu temples are pagodas built in the form of a pyramid, ornamented with columns, statues and symbolic figures. The interior is reserved for Brahmins, the head Brahmin sometimes having as many as 3,000 assistants. Their priestly duties consist in offering sacrifices and reading the book of laws called the Veda.

FOLLOWING in MOODY'S FOOTSTEPS

CABLE messages were published in the daily journals recently, as mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on November 28, intimating that Rev. G. Campbell Morgan had accepted an invitation to become the successor of the late D. L. Moody. This statement, as we then said on the authority of Mr. Will R. Moody, was inaccurate. There was, however, some basis for the report. From a letter recently received from Mr. Will R. Moody, supplementing his cablegram, we learn that an invitation was extended to Mr. Morgan to visit some of our large cities in connection with the Northfield extension movement and also to conduct evangelistic work. This invitation Mr. Morgan has accepted and on November 18 he definitely resigned the pastorate of his church at Tollington Park, North London, to come to America. In his letter of resignation Mr. Morgan said: "No other church in the world could have tempted me from a pastorate which is a peculiarly joyful one. This, I trust, was proved by my refusal last year to entertain the advances made to me by the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York. In this Northfield invitation the case is different. I have long felt that God was preparing me for a ministry to the churches rather than to one particular church. Now the door stands open for such work. It has not opened in my own country, where I hoped and thought it would. Influential friends have tried to persuade me that it was opening, but I cannot see it. I do see loving hearts trying to open the door, but it is not open. To wait would be to choose for myself, when I wish that God should choose for me." In an interview subsequently with a press correspondent Mr. Morgan added: "The English people are ready for a revival of religious endeavor along Moody lines, but the psychic moment has not yet arrived. I have only one message to the people of America at this time. I am coming to them to follow in Mr. Moody's footsteps, not to fill his place. No man can do that."

THE GREAT AUDITORIUM AT NORTHFIELD

This announcement will be very gratifying to Mr. Moody's friends, who know how hearty and cordial were the relations between the great evangelist and Mr. Morgan. Mr. Moody used to say that he derived help and stimulus from Mr. Morgan's sermons, and was always glad when he could get him to visit Northfield. As Mr. Morgan says, no one man could be a successor to Mr. Moody. He was so many sided, had so much administrative ability, as well as such marvelous power as a preacher, that it would be vain to seek a man who had both capacities. Men like Mr. Moody are not born every day. So, the happy combination is made of keeping Mr. Will R. Moody at the head of the Northfield institutions with which he was so closely identified during his father's life; while Mr. Morgan, whose services at Northfield and elsewhere were so appreciated by Mr. Moody and the general public, will endeavor in some measure to fill the place on the evangelistic platform and among the Northfield students that the famous revivalist occupied.

Mr. Morgan is still a young man. He was born in the little English town of Tetbury, in the year 1863, his father a Baptist minister and his mother the daughter of a Baptist deacon. He was educated at a college at Cheltenham and prepared himself for the profession of a teacher. He was employed for about three years in a school in Birmingham, but at the end of that time his future career was so clearly indicated that he abandoned the profession for the work of the ministry. Converted early in life, he had frequently delivered Gospel addresses. One who heard him speak at the age of thirteen years was amazed at the force and vigor and rhetorical power he possessed. After leaving Birmingham, in 1886, he went to Hull to conduct a two weeks' revival campaign. Such, however, was the blessing vouchsafed that he stayed in the busy seaport for thirteen months and then left, to the sorrow of the people, only because of the physical exhaustion produced by his labors. During the next few years Mr. Morgan, intending to keep exclusively to evangelistic work, was induced in three instances to accept the temporary pastorate of Congregational churches in the midland counties of England, and in each case the church was invigorated and launched on a new era of prosperity. In 1897, a call reached him from the New Court Congregational Church in North London, a church of high repute, to which some of the most famous clergymen in the denomination had ministered. Mr. Morgan accepted, and his work there has been wonderfully blessed. More than a hundred young people were added to the membership in the first year and there has been no pause in its growth.

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

People who remember Mr. Moody's preaching will understand when they read the following extract from Mr. Morgan's sermon on "Environment," how similar is the style of our English brother to that of the great American evangelist:

"Ministers have people constantly say to them, 'It is very easy for you, a minister of the Gospel, to live this life, but if you were in business you would find it different.' David was in some such state of mind when he wrote: 'Oh, that I had wings like a dove! For then would I fly away and be at rest.' Some think those words very beautiful, but David was never much more out of touch with God than when he wrote that. He meant, 'If I could only get out of these circumstances I would get rest.' But suppose that David had had wings like a dove, how far would he have been able to fly? Man's metaphor always breaks down if he gets out of touch with God. When God wants to put wings on a man he says: 'They shall mount up with wings as eagles.' That is very different. The fact is, David had no business to be longing to get out of the environment in which God had put him. This Psalm is one of the most beautiful commentaries in the Word of God upon this truth: that it is not by being moved out of my environment, but by learning the law of superior environment that I am to live as God wants me to live.

"Take an illustration. Suppose that I have a plot of ground which I begin to cultivate. I free it from weeds and stones, and I plow it and prepare it to receive that for which it is intended. Now, I may put two things into that piece of ground. I put in a pebble from the seashore, round, and smooth, and beautiful. I also put in there an acorn, and cover them both up. Now, the environment of pebble and acorn is the same: the same soil, the same rain, the same air, and the same sunlight will act upon the pebble and acorn. Presently in the spot where I planted the acorn there appears a sprout, pushing back the soil, and fighting its way out to sunlight, until in the process of years, from that acorn there grows the mighty oak. But where is the pebble? Just where it was put. For four hundred years it might remain in the same environment without advancement. What is the difference? In the case of the pebble there was nothing in it upon which environment could act. But in the acorn there was the principle of life, which responded to the influences and enabled it to grow into an oak. That is the difference between an unregenerate man and a regenerate man in the same environment. The unregenerate man is dead in trespasses and though he lives in God he never sees him. In such a man there can be no growth and no mastery of material environment in order to develop according to all the purpose of God. But a regenerate man has within him the principle of divine life, and that discovers God and finds him to be nearer than anything else. That new life of Christ within him is the basis upon which God acts so that there may be development."

No Swaddling Clothes

To be born in a home so poor that there was not even a rag for its covering is the lot that fell to a little New York baby who first saw the light of day in Williamsburg, L. I., a few weeks ago. Dr. Murphy, who answered the urgent call that came to the Eastern District Hospital to attend a sick woman on Kent avenue, found upon his arrival, the mother and the new-born babe on a broken-down bed, in the next room three small children were huddled. The doctor went among the neighbors, collected some old flannels, had them sewed into shape, and put them on the child. As he was leaving, the husband entered. He has been out of employment; and wept as he told the physician of his inability to find work. The search for work day after day and the disappointment were breaking his heart.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL

IN Bethlehem, that house of bread,
This latest Christmas morn,
That all the hungry would be fed,
Is Christ our Saviour born.

No palace hath a room for him,
No servants keep His state;
But in the early dawning dim,
Three kings upon Him wait.

The wise, the loving, and the good;
They bend them at his shrine,
And each hath brought the best he could
To please the Child Divine.

The angels wonder what it means,
But once again they sing;
Each seraph on his bright harp leans,
And wakes a thrilling string.

The shepherds fare across the plain,
A simple folk are they;
And we will join their happy train,
Upon their pilgrim way.

Above us all the Star will shine,
For aye on Christmas morn,
It turns the manger to a shrine
When Christ our Lord is born.

In Bethlehem, that house of bread;
Behold the Babe Divine;
Heart-hunger by His hands, is fed:
He easeth yours and mine.

They Regret Samantha

We are receiving almost daily letters expressing regret at the close of "Aunt Samantha's" delightful story of her tour round the world. These unsolicited tributes to the popularity of Miss Holley's entertaining narrative were not unexpected, however, for she had succeeded in awakening the interest and arousing the sympathies of a very wide circle of readers. Mrs. E. P. Jones, Jacksonville, Ill., writes: "With a great deal of pleasure I have followed 'Samantha' and 'Josiah Allen' 'Around the World.' I have found the journey not only very instructive but so very amusing the fatigue of travel has not been felt. I regret very much to part with Robert Strong and Dorothy, Miss Meechim and Arvilly, each excellent in their way. As for dear Samantha, may she live long and soon find it convenient to 'resoom.'"

A Shut-in's Appreciation

Mrs. E. E. S. L., Newburyport, Mass., writes: I must express my sincere appreciation of your most excellent and delightfully interesting CHRISTIAN HERALD. I am a "shut-in," and its weekly visits bring strength and sunshine to my soul. May many others receive the comfort and inspiration from its perusal that I have.

CROSSING THE FERRY

...A SERMON BY...

REV. T. DEWITT TALMAGE, D.D.

TEXT: II. Samuel 19: 18: And there went over a ferry-boat to carry over the king's household.

WHICH of the crowd is the king? That short man, sun-burnt, and in fatigue dress. It is David, the exiled king. He has defeated his enemies, and is now going home to resume his palace. Good! I always like to see David come out ahead. But between him and his home there is the celebrated river Jordan, which has to be passed. The king is accompanied to the bank of the river by an aristocratic old gentleman of eighty years, Barzillai by name, who owned a fine country-seat at Rogelim. Beside that, David has his family with him. But how shall they get across the river? While they are standing there, I see a ferry-boat coming from the other side, and, as it cuts through the water, I see the faces of David and his household brighten up at the thought of so soon getting home. No sooner has the ferry-boat struck the shore, than David and his family, and his old friend Barzillai, from Rogelim, get on board the boat. Either with splashing oars at the side, or with one oar sculling at the stern of the boat, they leave the eastern bank of the Jordan and start for the western bank.

That western bank is black with crowds of people, who are waving and shouting at the approach of the king and his family. The military are all out. Some of those who have been David's worst enemies, now shout until they are hoarse at his return. No sooner has the boat struck the shore on the western side, than the earth quakes and the heavens ring with cheers of welcome and congratulation. David and his family, and Barzillai from Rogelim, step ashore. King David asks his old friend to go with him and live at the palace; but Barzillai apologizes, and intimates that he is infirm with age, and too deaf to appreciate the music, and has a delicate appetite that would soon be cloyed with luxurious living, and so he begs that David would let him go back to his country-seat. I once heard of the United States say that he had just been to Washington to see his son in the White House, and he told me of the wonderful things that occurred there, and of what Daniel Webster said to him; but he declared, "I was glad to get home. There was too much going on there for me." My father, an aged man, made his last visit at my house in Philadelphia; and after the church service was over, and we went home, some one in the house asked the aged man how he enjoyed the service. "Well," he replied, "I enjoyed the service; but there were too many people there for me. It troubled my head very much." The fact is that old people do not like excitement.

The Father of a President

If King David had cordially invited Barzillai thirty years before to go to the palace, the probability is that Barzillai would have gone, but not now. They kiss each other good-by, a custom among men Oriental, but in vogue yet where two brothers part, or an aged father and a son go away from each other never to meet again. No wonder that their lips met as King David and old Barzillai, at the prow of the ferry-boat, parted forever.

This river Jordan, in all ages and among all languages, has been the symbol of the boundary line between earth and heaven. Yet, when on a former occasion I preached to you about the Jordanic passage, I have no doubt that some of you despondingly said, "The Lord might have divided Jordan for Joshua, but not for poor me." Cheer up! I want to show you that there is a way over Jordan as well as through it. My text says: "And there went over a ferry-boat to carry over the king's household."

All our cities are familiar with the ferry-boat. It goes from San Francisco to Oakland, and from Liverpool to Birkenhead, and twice every secular day of the week multitudes are on the ferry-boats of our great cities, so that you will not need to hunt up a classical dictionary to find out what I mean, while I am speaking to you about the passage of David and his family across the river Jordan.

My subject, in the first place, impresses me with the fact that, when we cross over from this world to the next, the boat will have to come from the other side. The tribe of Judah, we are informed, sent this ferry-boat across to get David and his household. I stand on the eastern side of the river Jordan, and I find no shipping at all; but, while I am standing there, I see a boat ploughing through the river, and as I hear the swirl of the waters, and the boat comes to the eastern side of the Jordan, and David and his family and his old friend step on board that boat, I am mightily impressed with the fact that, when we cross over from this world to the next the boat will have to come from the opposite shore.

Every day I find people trying to extemporize

A Way from Earth to Heaven.

They gather up their good works and some sentimental theories, and they make a raft, shoving it from this shore, and poor, deluded souls get on board that raft, and they go down. The fact is, that scepticism and infidelity never yet helped one man to die. I invite all the ship-carpenters of worldly philosophy to come and build one boat that can safely cross this river. I invite them all to unite their skill, and Bolingbroke shall lift the stanchions, and Tyndall shall shape the bowsprit, and Spinoza shall make the main-topgallant braces, and Renan shall go to tacking and wearing and boxing the ship. All together, in ten thousand years, they will never be able to make a boat that can cross this Jordan. Why was it that Spinoza and Blount and Shaftesbury lost their souls? It was because they tried to cross the stream in a boat of their own construction. What miserable work they made of dying! Diodorus died of mortification, because he could not guess a conundrum which had been proposed to him at a public dinner; Zeuxis, the philosopher, died of mirth, laughing at a caricature of an aged woman—a caricature made by his own hand; while another of their company and of their kind died saying, "Must I leave all these beautiful pictures?" and then asked that he might be bolstered up in the bed in his last moments and be shaved and painted and rouged. Of all the not one died well. Some of them sneaked out of life; some wept themselves away in darkness; some blasphemed and raved and tore their bed-covers to tatters. This is the way worldly philosophy helps a man to die.

Unbelievers of all Ages

A guide at Niagara Falls said to me: "Do you see that rock down in the rapids?" I said, "Yes." "Well," he said, "some years ago a man got into the rapids and floated down until he came to that rock, and he clutched that and held on. We sent five life-boats at different times out to him, and they were all broken to splinters. After a while we got him some food, but he could not eat it. He seemed to have no appetite. He wanted to get ashore; and the poor fellow held on and held on, and, with a shriek louder than the thunder of the cataract, he went over." When a man puts out from the shore of this world on the river of Death in a boat of his own construction, he has worse disaster than that—shipwreck, eternal shipwreck.

Blessed be God, there is a boat coming from the other side! Transportation at last for our souls from the other shore; everything about this Gospel from the other shore; pardon from the other shore; mercy from the other shore; pity from the other shore; ministry of angels from the other shore; power to work miracles

From the Other Shore;

Jesus Christ from the other shore; "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," and from a foreign shore I see the ferry-boat coming, and it rolls with the surges of a Saviour's suffering; but as it strikes the earth the mountains rock, and the dead adjust their apparel so that they may be fit to come out. That boat touches the earth, and glorious Thomas Walsh gets into it, in his expiring moment, saying, "He has come! He has come! My Beloved is mine, and I am his." Good Sarah Wesley got into that boat, and as she shoved off from the shore she cried, "Open the gates! Open the gates!" I bless God that as the boat came from the other shore to take David and his men across, so, when we are about to die, the boat will come from the same direction. God forbid that I should ever trust to anything that starts from this side.

Again, my subject suggests that, when we cross over at the last, the King will be on board the boat. Ship-carpentry in Bible times was in its infancy. The boats were not skilfully made, and I can very easily imagine that the women and the children of the king's household might have been nervous about going on that boat, afraid that the oarsman or the helmsman might give out, and that the boat might be dashed on the rocks, as sometimes boats were dashed in the Jordan; and then I could have imagined the boat starting and rocking, and they crying out, "Oh, we are going to be lost! we are going down!" Not so.

The King was on Board the ferry-boat that day, and those women and children and all the household of the king knew that every care was taken to have the king—the head of the empire—pass in safety.

Now, I want to break up a delusion in your mind, and that is this: When our friends go out from this world, we feel sorry for them because they have to go alone; and parents hold on to the hands of their children who are dying, and hold on to something of the impression that the moment they let go the little one will be in the darkness and in the boat all alone. "Oh," the parent says, "if I could only go with my child, I would be willing to die half a dozen times. I am afraid she will be lost in the woods or in the darkness; I am afraid she will be very much frightened in the boat all alone." I break up the delusion. When a soul goes to heaven it does not go alone: the King is on board the boat. Was Paul alone in the last extremity? Hear the shout of the sacred missionary as he cries out, "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." Was John Wesley alone in the last extremity? No. Hear him say, "Best of all, God is with us." Was Sir William Forbes alone in the last extremity? No. Hear him say to his friends, "Tell all the people who are coming down to the bed of death, from my experience it has no terrors." "Oh," say a great many people, "that does very well for distinguished Christians; but for me, a common man, for me, a common woman, we can't expect that guidance and help." If I should give you a passage of Scripture that would promise to you positively, when you are crossing the river to the next world, the King would be in the boat, would you believe the promise? "Oh, yes," you say, "I would." Here is the promise: "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee." Christ at the sick pillow to take the soul out of the body; Christ to help the soul down the bank into the boat; Christ mid-stream; Christ on the other side to help the soul up the beach. Be comforted about your departed friends. Be comforted about your own demise when the time shall come. Tell it to all the people under the sun that no Christian ever dies alone; the King is in the boat.

Again, my text suggests that leaving this world for heaven is only crossing a ferry. Dr. Shaw estimates the average width of the Jordan to be about thirty yards. What! so narrow? Yes. "There went over a ferry-boat to carry over the king's household." Yes, going to heaven is only a short trip—only a ferry. It may be eighty miles—that is, eighty years—before we get to the wet bank on the other side, but the crossing is short. I will tell you the whole secret. It is not five minutes across. It is an Instantaneous Transportation.

People talk as though, leaving this life, the Christian went plunging and floundering and swimming, to crawl up exhausted on the other shore, and to be pulled out of the pelting surf as by a Ramsgate lifeboat. No such thing. It is only a ferry. It is so narrow that we can hail each other from bank to bank. It is only four arms' lengths across. The arm of earthly farewell put out from this side, the arm of heavenly welcome put out from the other side; while the dying Christian, standing mid-stream, stretches out his two arms, the one to take the farewell of earth, and the other to take the greeting of heaven. That makes four arms' lengths across the river.

Blessed be God, that when we leave this world we are not to have a great and perilous enterprise of getting into heaven. Not a dangerous Franklin expedition to find the Northwest Passage among icebergs. Only a ferry. That accounts for something you have never been able to understand. You never supposed that very nervous and timid Christian people could be so unexcited and placid in the last hour. The fact is, they were clear down on the bank, and they saw there was nothing to be frightened about. Such a short distance—only a ferry. With one ear they heard the funeral psalm in their memory, and with the other ear they heard the song of heavenly salutation. The willows on this side the Jordan and the Lebanon cedars on the other almost interlocked their branches. Only a ferry.

My subject also suggests the fact that, when we cross over at the last, we shall find a solid landing. The ferry-boat, as spoken of in my text, means a place to start from and

A Place to Land.

David and his people did not find the shore of the Jordan any more solid than the western shore where he landed, and yet, to a great many, heaven is not a real place. Are you going to float about in ether forever, swinging about your hands and feet through the air indiscriminately, one moment sweltering in the centre of the sun, and the next moment shivering in the mountains of the moon? That is not my heaven. I believe I shall hear Mr. Toplady sing yet, and Isaac Watts recite hymns, and Mozart play. I have no patience with your transcendental heaven. My heaven is not a fog-bank. My eyes are unto the hills, the everlasting hills. The King's ferry-boat, starting from a wharf on this side, will go to a wharf on the other side.

Again, my subject teaches that, when we cross over at the last, we shall be met at the landing. When David and his family went over in the ferry-boat spoken of in the text, they landed amid a nation that had come out to greet them. As they stepped from the deck of the boat to the shore, there were thousands of people who gathered around them to express a satisfaction that was beyond description. And so you and I will be met at the landing. Our arrival will not be like stepping ashore at Antwerp or Constantinople among a crowd of strangers; it will be among friends, good friends, those who are warm-hearted friends, and

All Their Friends.

We know people whom we have never seen, by hearing somebody talk about them very much; we know them almost as well as if we had seen them. And do you not suppose that our parents and brothers and sisters and children in heaven have been talking about us all these years, and talking to their friends? so that, I suppose, when we cross the river at the last, we shall not only be met by all those Christian friends whom we knew on earth, but by all their friends. They will come down to the landing to meet us. Your departed friends love you now more than they ever did. You will be surprised at the last to find how they know about all the affairs of your life. Why, they are only across the ferry; and the boat is coming this way, and the boat is going that way. I do not know but they have already asked the Lord the day, the hour, the moment, when you are coming across, and that they know now; but I do know that you will be met at the landing. The poet Southey said he thought he should know Bishop Heber in heaven by the portraits he had seen of him in London; and Dr. Randolph said he thought he would know William Cowper, the poet, in heaven from the pictures he had seen of him in England; but we will know our

Departed Kindred

by the portraits hung in the throne-room of our hearts.

On starlight nights you look up—and I suppose it is so with any one who has friends in heaven—on starlight nights you look up, and you cannot help but think of those who have gone; and I suppose they look down, and cannot help but think of us. But they have the advantage of us. We know not just where their world of joy is; they know where we are.

There was romance as well as Christian beauty in the life of Dr. Adoniram Judson, the Baptist missionary, when he concluded to part from his wife, she to come to America to restore her health, he to go back to Burmah to preach the Gospel. They had started from Burmah for the United States together, but, getting near St. Helena, Mrs. Judson was so much better, she said, "Well, now I can get home very easily; you go back to Burmah and preach the Gospel to those poor people. I am almost well; I shall soon be well, and then I will return to you." After she had made that resolution, terrific in its grief, willing to give up her husband for Christ's sake, she sat down in her room, and with trembling hand wrote some eight or ten verses, four of which I will now give you:

We part on this green islet, love:
Thou for the eastern main;
I for the setting sun, love:
Oh, when to meet again!

When we knelt to see our Henry die,
And heard his last faint moan,
Each wiped away the other's tears;
Now each must weep alone.

And who can paint our mutual joy
When, all our wandering o'er,
We both shall clasp our infants three,
At home on Burmah's shore?

But higher shall our raptures glow
On yon celestial plain,
When loved and parted here below
Meet ne'er to part again.

She folded that manuscript; a relapse of her disease came on and she died. Dr. Judson says he put her away, for the resurrection, on the Isle of St. Helena. They had thought to part for a year or two; now they parted forever, so far as this world is concerned. And he says he hastened on board after the funeral with his little children to start for Burmah, for the vessel had already lifted her sails; and he says, "I sat down for some time in my cabin, my little children around me crying, 'Mother, mother!' and I abandoned myself to heart-breaking grief. But one day the thought came across me, as my faith stretched her wing, that we should meet again in heaven, and I was comforted."

Was it, my friends, all a delusion? When he died, did she meet him at the landing? When she died, did the scores of souls whom she had brought to Christ, and who had preceded her to heaven, meet her at the landing? I believe it; I know it. Oh, that when our poor work on earth is done and we cross the river, we shall be met at the landing.

Glorious Consolation

But there is a thought that comes over me like an electric shock. Do I belong to the King's household? Mark you, the text says, "And there went over a ferry-boat to carry over the king's household," and none but the king's household. Then I ask, Do I belong to the household? Do you? If you do not, come to-day and be adopted into that household! "Oh," says some soul here, "I do not know whether the King wants me." He does; he does. Hear the voice from the throne, "I will be a Father to them, and they shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." "Him that cometh unto me." Christ says, "I will in no wise cast out." Come into the King's household. Sit down at the King's table. Come in and take your apparel from the King' wardrobe, even the wedding garment of Christ's righteousness. Come in and inherit the King's wealth. Come in and cross in the King's ferry-boat.

THE EXECUTIVE MANSION, WHERE THE CENTENNIAL RECEPTION WILL BE HELD

A Hundred Years Ago

The condition of Washington a hundred years ago is interestingly described by George G. Evans in his well-known historical work. He writes:

The corner-stone of the President's House was laid October 13, 1792, and that of the Capitol September 18, 1793. The work on these important buildings was carried on as rapidly as the meagre appropriations of Congress would allow. Had it not been for gifts and loans made by Maryland and Virginia, it is doubtful if they would have been ready for occupancy at the appointed time, 1800. However, the White House was so far finished that the President's family could live in it, though Mrs. Adams has left a graphic description of some of its discomforts. Of the Capitol, only the north, or Senate, wing was finished, and that was so badly constructed that it was afterwards torn down. A very good description of Washington, as it appeared in 1800, was written by John Cotton Smith, member of Congress from Connecticut. He said:

The First Presidential Mansion

"Our approach to the city was accompanied with sensations not easily described. One wing of the Capitol only had been erected, which, with the President's house, a mile distant from it, both constructed with white sandstone, were shining objects in dismal contrast with the scene around them. Instead of recognizing the avenues and streets portrayed on the plan of the city, not one was visible, unless we except a road, with two buildiugs on each side of it, called the New Jersey avenue. The Pennsylvania avenue, leading, as laid down on paper, from the Capitol to the Presidential mansion, was nearly the whole distance a deep morass covered with elder bushes, which were cut through to the President's house; and near Georgetown a block of houses had been erected which bore the name of the 'six buildings.' There were also two other blocks consisting of two or three dwelling houses in different directions, and now and then an insulated wooden habitation; the intervening spaces, and, indeed, the surface of the city generally, being covered with scrub-oak bushes on the higher grounds, and on the marshy soil either trees or some sort of shrubbery. There appeared to be but two really comfortable habitations in all respects within the bounds of the city, one of which belonged to Daniel Carroll and the other to Notley Young. The roads in every direction were muddy and unimproved. It was a new settlement."

When the seat of government was transferred from Philadelphia to Washington there were but three thousand inhabitants, and the transition from the populous and comfortable Quaker City was anything but agreeable to the officials. They made no concealment of their discontent, writing letters to the Northern newspapers in which the Capital was spoken of as a "mud-hole almost equal to the great Serbonian bog," "a Capital of miserable huts," "a city of streets without houses," "without one solitary attractive feature."

Washington is now, in many respects, the finest city in America, and one of the handsomest capitals in the world. Its splendid avenues and imposing public buildings are unequaled on this continent. In a political, literary, social and scientific sense it is the capital of the nation, and the centre of all its greatest interests.

CHRISTMAS CHEER AT THE BOWERY MISSION

"THE PLACE WHERE GOD MAKES CROOKED MEN STRAIGHT"

OPPORTUNITIES for the exercise of charity and helpfulness are numerous indeed, and not infrequently do they travel on the very heels of one another. It seems but yesterday when Thanksgiving Day was made the occasion for rejoicing and a blessed means of grace to the great army of homeless, friendless and utterly destitute men and boys who had gathered at the Bowery Mission to partake of the bountiful Thanksgiving feasts provided through the generosity of our sympathetic readers, and now we are already looking ahead and planning for the greatest, best, and most comprehensive Christmas celebration among the poorest of the poor that the metropolis has ever witnessed.

We are to have at the Bowery Mission on Christmas eve a dinner for homeless boys, followed by a prayer and praise service lasting until the chimes of Trinity and St. Paul's usher in the anniversary of our Saviour's birth with the good old tune:

"Joy to the world, the Lord has come,
Let earth receive her King."

Then, at six o'clock on Christmas morning fragrant hot coffee and fresh buns will be served to the army of unfortunates who may have been compelled to walk the streets all night because they "lacked the price of a night's lodging."

At two o'clock in the afternoon, Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the friend of the friendless, will gladden the hearts of a thousand poor East Side tots, to many of whom Christmas brings only trouble and heart-ache because of the more pinching poverty or more unbridled intemperance of their parents on this festive day. But when they get into the Bowery Mission and see Mrs. Bird's kind, motherly face, and the great Christmas tree just loaded down with good things, and join in the carol:

"While shepherds watched their flocks at night, all seated on the ground," there will be no time for them to nurse their grief, and for a few hours it will seem to them as though they were enjoying heaven with all its raptures, its joys and its innumerable delights. How many little hearts will beat with joy on that occasion!

And on Christmas night a substantial and wholesome dinner will be given to every hungry man, woman or child who may apply at the door of the Bowery Mission. These dinners are bountiful and good, consisting of turkey, cranberries, bread and butter and pie. They cost but ten cents each, and we hope to give ten thousand dinners to as many homeless men and boys, all at some time, perhaps, the idols of hearts, who it may be are today praying that kind Christian friends might throw around their loved ones, lost in the great city, such tender and loving influences as may win them back to their parents, their home and their God.

Ten cents will make such a homeless one happy. Ten cents will minister to the comfort of some starving person, and perhaps minister also to the spiritual wants of some starving soul; for not a meal is given without some word of kindly advice, some helpful thought, and a hearty invitation to arise and return unto their Father's house. One dollar pays for ten meals.

It will go a great way towards rendering your own holiday brighter to enjoy the consciousness that down in the slums of New York, ten hungry men or ten hungry boys are enjoying a Christmas meal which without your bounty they would have been compelled to do without.

Never during its twenty-one years' history has the Bowery Mission Gospel lighthouse flashed its rays over darker storms than during the past twelve months. New York—the empire city—the metropolis of the great new world, standing at the gateway of what is destined to be the greatest commonwealth the earth has ever seen; a city beautiful for situation, exalted to heaven with privileges, has become universally known as the scene of abominations scarcely less vile than those of Sodom or of Tyre. No intelligent resident in New York doubts for one moment that the three monsters of iniquity: intemperance, gambling, and impurity, that have so ruthlessly ravaged the community during the past year, have done so with the full connivance and cooperation of those whose first duty it was to slay the beasts.

The "Red-light" district of New York is bounded on the north by Houston street, on the east by Clinton street, on the south by Division street, and on the west by the Bowery. For many years the Bowery Mission has been the only distinctively religious agency at work on this busy thoroughfare, though the Bowery Y. M. C. A., and recently the Peniel Mission, have rendered valuable aid, and in the off-lying streets workers in the various churches, missions and settlements have valiantly fought, against tremendous odds, the fight for purity and order.

Upon the Bowery Mission, however, principally has the responsibility fallen of caring for the hundreds and thousands of young men, who, during the past twelve months, have been lured to the city by the reports of the "wide-open" method of running things.

Work Among Young Men Owing to this cause the character of the Bowery Mission congregation has perceptibly changed. The proportion of young men attending the nightly meetings has decidedly increased. So much so, that, since the beginning of October, one night a week has been specially set apart for them. Whilst, of course, always keeping the spiritual welfare of the boys paramount, this Wednesday evening meeting is conducted on entirely different lines from the ordinary Gospel service. It is rather a happy family gathering. Music, singing, recitations, stereopticon views are largely used, and Mrs. Bird, with her motherly care for the boys, always provides a lunch at the close. Many of the young men thus cared for have formed the habit of attending the other meetings and several have been converted.

Boys' clubs plans have been formed and the rooms are now in course of construction for providing a reading-room, library, manual workshop, recreation room and other accessories necessary for permanent Boys' and Young Mens' clubs where every evening, without disturbing the long-established, and blessedly-owned Gospel service overhead, these younger men may find a home. Doubtless many a hundred of them who now frequent the dives, pool-rooms, and theatres of the Bowery will thus be reached.

Spiritual Work Never were the Bowery Mission meetings more signally owned than now. The congregations are larger than ever and the results obtained in gratifying proportion. Over three thousand men have, during the year, professed conversion. Many, owing to the transient character of the Bowery population, have passed away from us whom we shall probably never see again. Many have, alas! fallen, but scores and hundreds have, thank God, been permanently established in a Christian life, and are enjoying the privileges of upright citizenhood.

Personal Work More than ever has it been found necessary to lay stress on personal effort with the individual. The "after" meeting is always regarded as of the utmost importance, and is a most interesting affair. Personal interviews with seekers often last until late in an evening. The names, addresses, if any, occupations, nationality, etc., are carefully taken and converts are urged to see the Superintendent or the Secretary of the Employment Bureau next day. Every morning a group may be found outside the Superintendent's office, waiting for their turn.

cases; but the following are a few of our typical trophies during the past twelve months.

A. A young man from New York State. A drunkard and tramp. Had turned his aged father into the streets—sold his household effects, spent the money in drink. Tramped from Buffalo to New York; made direct for the Bowery; attracted into the Mission by the singing. Converted last December. Record since, splendid.

B. A well-educated German. Formerly connected with Y. M. C. A. work in California, but had fallen. Became destitute. Came into the Mission last February to escape a rain storm; was converted. Now employed in city. An indefatigable Christian worker.

C. A coachman. Formerly deputy sheriff up state. Had been drinking for many weeks, heavily. Stood up early in meeting and asked for prayers. Half an hour afterwards rushed into the street, followed by Superintendent who brought him back. He was so utterly miserable that he had intended suicide. Cared for that night. Next night converted. Has done well ever since.

D. Telegraph operator. Came to meeting in May with symptoms of delirium tremens upon him. Cared for and ultimately sent to Christian Home for Intemperate men. Doing well now in his profession, and an out-and-out Christian.

E. A man of fifty-five. An ex-officer in the U. S. Army. Had lived a wild, adventurous life: cowboy, buffalo hunter in Kansas when it was a rolling prairie. A sceptic and scoffer at religion. Came into Mission out of curiosity and to while away his time last February. Soundly converted. Record since, splendid.

F. Sailor. Pushed through the door of the Mission last March by some comrades. Stayed to meeting, was impressed, and resolved to be a better man. Shipwrecked off the coast of Australia. Twelve lives lost. His first thoughts in the moment of his peril were of the prayers he had heard in the Bowery Mission. Now in New York. An active worker.

Family Life Throughout the whole of the Bowery Mission activities the family feeling is fostered. Mrs. Bird continues her Sunday morning and Thursday evening luncheons, and the idea is always kept prominent that the men are partaking of the hospitality of a home, rather than accepting the dole of charity. As far as dormitory accommodation and financial means will allow the converts are kept under the roof of the Mission, and fed at its frugal table for a few days or weeks, or until a position is found for them. This short stay in the spiritual atmosphere of the Mission immediately after conversion has been an incalculable boon to many.

* * *

Employment Bureau Quite ninety-five per cent. of the converts are out of work. Many misguided men came to the city in the expectation of finding work on the great underground railroad project and found to their dismay this section of the labor market absolutely glutted. The Bowery Mission has had to care for a great many of them. The Free Employment Bureau is under the charge of Mr. Theodore Jaeger, himself a convert of the mission. The New York Journal has rendered invaluable aid, and hundreds of men, probably fifty or sixty per cent. of the converts, have been placed in temporary or permanent employment.

TALKING WITH SPIRITUAL ENQUIRERS AFTER THE GOSPEL MEETING

During the winter months a group of the Bowery Mission workers have held regular Gospel meetings in the lodging houses with marked success. Of the twenty thousand men who live in Bowery lodging houses many of them regard the Mission as their special place of worship, and are always seen there in force at the Sunday evening service.

Food and Shelter Work This is a most essential feature of the work. Since the disastrous fire in March, 1898, the Mission has not possessed any beds of its own, but never a night passes over but that some unfortunate men must be cared for, men whom, whatever their past delinquencies have been, it would be a cruel sin to allow to walk the streets all night. Then there are the men who give such abundant evidence of a desire to live a Christian life; they must be cared for. During the past year therefore, sleeping accommodation has been provided, either in the Mission or in the lodging houses and hotels close by, for over fifteen thousand men. Equally necessary also is it to save these men from the pangs of hunger, so, during the year eighty-three thousand meals have been served.

During the past year the various individual "anniversaries" that have been held have excited great interest, especially the "first" anniversaries. When a new convert has proved faithful for twelve months amid all the unspeakably fierce temptations of New York City life, the event is celebrated with great enthusiasm. Thank God, there are some of the Bowery Mission converts that are now as far as the teers, and they are to be found all over the world, preachers of the Gospel, teachers of the young, prosperous business men and respected members of society.

No fact has been more indisputably established than that however fettered a man may be by inherited propensities for evil, and by oppressive surroundings, he is never robbed altogether of his freedom of choice. Will is, after all, supreme. One of the men who during the past year celebrated his first anniversary, and is now approaching his second, is one who in early life was looked upon as an incurable drunkard. By the time he was twenty-five every other desire and ambition was dominated by the overpowering craving for drink. Not one stroke of work would he do even when he had the chance. He had no home and for years never slept in a bed. If by any chance he became possessed of five cents it was expended for rum of the most poisonous quality. For years he was a regular attendant at the Mission, as it was one of the few places where he could obtain a comfortable sleep. One night the long slumbering will was quickened into life by the kindly suggestion of one of the workers that he try to be a Christian for one month. He promised, and when the month closed he eagerly started on a second month's trial. He has kept it up for nearly two years.

The Bible class on Friday evenings, under the charge of Mr. W. H. Chandler, the Saturday evening musical service, conducted by Mr. Victor H. Benke, the organist, the Boy's class on Monday evenings under Mr. E. Eagleson, the Sunday afternoon convert's service under Messrs. Thompson, Chambers and Rogers, are amongst some of the present day features of the Bowery Mission work.

Mrs. Bird and the Bowery Waifs

For the last nine years, Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the "Mother of the Bowery Boys," has spent her Christmastide among the waifs and strays of the East Side. It has been her special effort to make Christmas a season of joy and gladness among a class who would otherwise be forgotten. Her work among the homeless East Side boys, many of whom have come to New York from respectable homes in distant states, has already been productive of excellent spiritual results. She conducts this special work in connection with the Bowery Mission, and she is again planning this year, as in previous years, to make the Christmas holiday one of real significance by providing a dinner for the boys who attend regularly on Wednesday night the meetings at the Mission, and also for those who are alone and friendless in the great city, and amid surroundings that are liable to allure them to lives of sin. For those neglected ones Mrs. Bird appeals to the readers of this journal. All who are willing to help her in the effort to gather in the waifs, and to reach their hearts by kindness and hospitality at Christmas, can do so by sending their gifts for that purpose to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

2. What King earned the title of "Defender of the Faith," and how?

Richard II., and Kings Henry III., IV. and VII., of England, and others assumed or obtained this title, or nearly similar ones. In most of these cases it was conferred by some ecclesiastic upon them for defending the Church against those who opposed its doctrines, rules or discipline. It was not hereditary in these cases. John de Torquemeda (1388-1468), and several other noted persons, not kings, also held the title for the same reason. The title, Fidei Defensor, or "Defender of the Faith," was conferred upon King Henry VIII., of England, by Pope Leo X., in acknowledgment for having written a treatise in Latin against Martin Luther, entitled, "The Defense of the Seven Sacraments." This title was conferred by a papal bull, which commanded all Christians to thus address Henry; and it was signed by the pope, four bishop-cardinals, fifteen priest-cardinals and eight deacon-cardinals. After the breach between King Henry and the pope, the pope revoked the title; but it was held by Henry and his successors thereafter, because Parliament in the thirty-fifth year of his reign formally conferred it upon him, and it still remains. CAROLINE SCHNEIDER.

3. What does Paul mean by saying (I. Cor. 11:10) that a woman ought to have power on her head because of the angels?

By the abstract word, exousia—power—Paul plainly designates the hood covering her head. With this view the marginal reading accords: "A covering in sign that she is under the power of her husband." It is even possible that the Greek word was the name of the hood, as the Latin word imperium, of the same meaning, was at one time the name for a woman's headdress. As to "angels," they are doubtless often present at the worship of the Church below. See I. Timothy 5:21: "I charge thee . . . before the elect angels;" and I. Cor. 4:9, we are "a spectacle to angels and to men." Bengel says that "as angels vail their faces before God, so would they require that the female face should vail before man." It was in accordance with Jewish and Roman custom that women's heads be covered in worship. The uncovered female head in Paul's day expressed the moving of woman from her sphere and assimilated her to the disreputable class. Of course, at the present day, the apostle would not consider the hood as possessing any religious significance. Women now can sit or stand before men with heads uncovered, either in social circles or large assemblies with no violation of womanly modesty. AMELIA HOYT.

4. What is the origin of the bayonet?

The word is usually believed to have been derived from Bayonne, in France, where bayonets were first made in 1640, and used in one of the famous sieges of that town in 1665. But they must be much earlier than this, for Colgrave in 1611 speaks of them as "a great knife to hang at the girdle." They are sometimes thought to have been named from Bayona, in Toledo, so famous for the excellent temper of the swords manufactured there. There is also good reason for believing that they were thus called from La Bayonette, one of the lower ridges of the mountains of Arrhune, where it is said a Basque regiment very early in the seventeenth century, on running short of powder, in sheer desperation stuck their knives into their muskets, and charged their Spanish foes with such determination and vigor that they came off victorious. In England they were first used in April, 1672.

5. Ought an employer to regulate the salary of his employees by the market rate of wages or according to the profits of his business?

When an employer engages a set of employees, he should agree to pay them the market rate of wages. If they prove to be mere time-servers, doing barely enough work to hold their positions, "looking out for number one," they are not entitled to any more. If, however, they are conscientious workers, doing their best and looking to the interest of their employer, the profits of the business will be larger than in the former case, and the employees are honestly entitled to a share of them. F. A. BROWN.

6. In what countries (other than our own) have women the right to vote and under what circumstances was that right granted?

The only case in which recognition of woman's claim to the suffrage has been granted, to my knowledge, was in 1869. In that year a bill respecting municipal elections passed the British Parliament. In this bill a clause was inserted granting the right to vote at such elections to women. Similarly, by the English and Scotch education acts of 1870 and 1872, women are permitted to vote at the elections of school boards.

LOUIS A. WALKER.

7. How can the possession of images and statuary in the home be reconciled with the second commandment (Ex. 20:4)?

The second commandment is directed, not against the making of images, but against the worship of them, or the worship of God through them. To be sure, there is one clause of that commandment which, if taken by itself, would forbid even the making of images. It reads thus: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth." But manifestly, that is to be read in connection with what follows: "Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them," etc. There have been some who have separated these two clauses of one sentence, to the great detriment of the sense. The mere making of images was not a crime. The entire commandment is directed against image worship. That the making of images is in itself not merely innocent, but may be educative and suggestive of spiritual things, is shown in the furnishing of the Tabernacle notably the making and placing of the cherubim. We read that under divine direction, Bezaleel "made two cherubim of gold, beaten out of one piece made he them, on the two ends of the mercy-seat" (Exodus 37:7). Thus we see that pictures or images in the home are by no means opposed to the spirit of the second commandment. We have to guard against crude and literal interpretations. The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life.

8. Why was it that a large proportion of the manuscripts or records of the ancient inhabitants of America were destroyed?

These records were in the palaces and temples of Mexico, and consisted of elaborate pictures. They were destroyed by the Spanish under Cortez, at the instigation of the priests, who had a holy horror of any idolatry other than their own, and who also hoped that, by destroying all traces of the Mexican's religious symbols, the natives would be more easily won to Christianity. The Spanish seem to have been too ignorant and bigoted to appreciate the historical value of these writings. F. A. BROWN.

9. Should the office of deacon be a life office, or should a church elect them periodically?

According to the New Testament record, Acts 6:3, R. V., deacons were to be men "of good report, full of the Spirit and wisdom." Doubtless the disciples who first held this office were chosen for life, or at least without time limit. In the absence, however, of specific directions, it would be fair to assume that the Holy Spirit left the official tenure optional, and not mandatory. Accepting this latitude, many churches have found the periodical election highly advantageous. Some of the same reasons which might be adduced against a life tenure of the pastorate are equally pertinent to the diaconate. A periodical choice of deacons would afford a church opportunity from time to time to adjust itself to new conditions and utilize the incoming of new and more suitable material. It would enable it to avoid friction and unpleasantness, when for any reason it became desirable or necessary to make a change. Except in case of scandal, such change could be wisely deferred until the periodical election. Practically, the periodical election is tantamount to a life tenure. When the incumbent is efficient and faithful he is usually chosen to succeed himself, until infirmity or old age compels his retirement; and not infrequently the church appoints the honored official deacon emeritus. The writer is familiar with such instances.

CHARLES H. HARRISON.

10. How did the fish become a symbol of Christianity in the early church?

The fish pictorially, as well as the letter "P," indicating the word Piscis, the Latin for fish, early became symbolical of Christ and of Christianity, because the letters of which this word was composed in the Greek, namely, ΙΧΘΥΣ, are the initial letters of the clause "Jesus Christ, God's Son, the Saviour." The letter, word or picture, was therefore at first a sort of secret symbol of the Christians' faith, and was probably adopted at the time of the persecutions under the Emperor Nero. It continued so to be for years after, for by its means the Christian could learn who his brethren and converts might be at a time when it would be extremely hazardous to communicate with them. This was accomplished by means of little amulets of stone cut in the shape of a tiny fish and worn suspended from the neck by a cord. These were presented to the neophytes on the occasion of their baptism, as an emblem of their holy faith, and also serving the purpose mentioned. Many peculiar markings used have been preserved in the catacombs, or tombs of the dead. The fish or its symbol was the most common. The following case is but one of many showing the ingenuity of the early Christians. Within a circle representing eternity, we find P, the fish, or the transverse line of the cross, and because Christ also said he was "the first and the last, the beginning and the end," the Alpha and Omega were also inserted in the circle, which was interpreted as follows: "Jesus Christ, God's Son, the Saviour, died on the cross, yet lives throughout eternity, for he is the first and the last, the beginning and the end."

AN EARNEST APPEAL

To Pastors, Superintendents, Missionary Societies, and the Lord's People Generally

DEAR FRIENDS: Through the generous contributions of Christian America and your own personal cooperation for the relief of the famine sufferers in India, many thousands of lives were saved, and you would undoubtedly like to feel that they were saved to some purpose.

It is generally understood that 600,000 famine orphans survived, most of whom are now absolutely helpless. 22,000 of these are in the hands of our American missionaries. They must either be supported or starve, and their fate rests largely with the good people of America, who sent the missionaries to India, to live and teach as Christ would live and teach. Following the example of their Divine Master, these missionaries "suffered the children to come unto them," and gathered the little ones into their homes, their schools and their orphanages, until every inch of available space was taken and every dollar of money expended. And now they are looking this way for help.

In response to their pathetic, heart-touching appeals, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is inviting every Church, Young People's Society, Sunday School and Missionary Society, of whatever denomination, to undertake the support of One Single Orphan at an expense of only Five Cents a Day, or Fifteen Dollars a Year. In every instance, preference for denomination and sex will be faithfully respected; hence, the child selected will be cared for and trained in an orphanage of the denomination preferred.

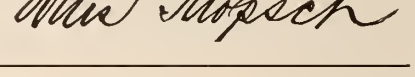
No Christmas present conceivable is equal to that of life itself, and the Church, Sunday School, Society or Individual adopting one of these helpless orphans presents food, clothing, care, education, influence for good and life itself to such child of adoption. Five cents a day is a trifle to many of God's children in this favored land of ours, but in India, on this occasion, it represents a human life; it means a soul saved from death and trained for Christian usefulness.

Do not fail to put your Church, your Sunday School, and yourself personally on record as among those who enter the new century privileged to share in the precious work of snatching, as it were, from death 22,000 famine orphans. God will surely own and bless every effort put forth in this connection, and thus the blessing of the Father of the fatherless will rest upon every Church or Individual responsible for the adoption of one of these, the least, tiniest, and most helpless of his loved ones.

A complete list of Churches and Societies adopting orphans will be published in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD according to denominations. It is sincerely hoped that a commendable emulation between the different denominations will spring up in this beneficent missionary work, and that within the next three weeks the hearts of our missionaries in India will be gladdened by the welcome news that their faith was well-founded, and that all their orphans have been adopted by the Christian Churches of America. No opportunity like this to effectively aid the cause of Christ in a foreign land has ever before been presented to Christendom and we trust that your Church will be among the first to embrace it.

If your Church or Sunday School should not feel disposed to act in this matter, cannot you form a circle of five or ten who will jointly adopt one orphan, and thus help along the great work which God is opening up to His Church in India?

When adopting a child, kindly address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD India Orphan Work, Bible House, New York. Give the name, denomination and address of your Church, Sunday School or Society, and state whether you prefer to adopt a boy or a girl, and whether you have any denominational preference. Very cordially yours,



A Union of Churches

NONE who witnessed the historic scene in the Scottish capital at the union of two of the great churches of the country will ever forget it. Five years ago the agitation for union began, but only within the past few weeks has it been realized. One of the parties to the union was the United Presbyterian Church. This had its origin in 1732, when Erskine seceded from the Established Church of Scotland, and organized a new church. In 1761, there was another secession from the national church under Gillespie, who organized the Relief Church. These two churches, holding the same doctrines, existed side by side until 1847, when they amalgamated with the title of the United Presbyterian Church. Four years before this event, came the great secession from the national church under Chalmers. At that time nearly one half the clergymen of that church resigned their benefices, quitted their beloved manses and went forth without any provision for their maintenance. The question at issue was whether the nobles and other patrons of livings had the right to appoint a minister to a parish regardless of the wishes of the people. Chalmers contended that the vote of the people should be decisive as to any appointment, and though on all other questions the Presbyterians of Scotland were practically agreed, this difference was so radical that ministers in all parts of Scotland left their churches and the great Free Church of Scotland was organized. People all over the world, sympathizing with Chalmers in the stand he took, contributed money for the support of the ministers who had made so great a sacrifice for principle, and a sustentation fund was raised to maintain a minister of the Free Church in every parish in Scotland where the people might be too poor to pay him themselves. Since 1843 the Free Church has developed enormously and has done magnificent work. But there has been of late a feeling growing in Scotland that there was no need of a separate organization for the Free Church and the United Presbyterians and that strength might be gained by uniting. That union has now been consummated, the two churches henceforth to have one organization under the name of the United Free Church of Scotland. The moderator of the United Presbyterians and the moderator of the Free Church met and shook hands in the presence of assembled thousands, and Dr. Rainy was inducted to the chair as the moderator of the united churches. Thus in one sphere of Christ's Church has his prayer been fulfilled:

That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me and I in thee, that they also may be one in us (John 17:21).

A Strange Imposture

A grocer at Hoboken, N. J., has just discovered that he and his wife have been duped by a clever girl. He is an Austrian, and has been twelve years in this country. He had been very fond of his brother's eleven-year-old daughter while he lived in Vienna, and when, a few months ago, he received a letter saying that his little friend was coming here to pay him a visit with the intention of remaining permanently in this country, he was overjoyed. He met the vessel by which she was to travel when it reached the pier, and gave a cordial reception to the beautiful, well-dressed lady who greeted him as her uncle. He took her to his home, and treated her as his daughter. Entertainments were given in her honor, she was supplied with new dresses and abundant pocket-money. She stipulated that her uncle should not inform his brother of her arrival as she had run away from home, and did not want her family to know where she was. She might have remained in his home indefinitely, but one day recently a friend arrived from Austria who had seen the grocer's niece in Vienna just before leaving, and brought a message from her. Then the girl was accused of being an impostor, and she broke down and confessed. During a visit to Vienna she had become acquainted with the niece, who had told her about her uncle in America, and she conceived the idea of personating her. She had learned from her friend sufficient of the family history to be able to dupe the uncle, but discovery came at last. So it will come to some who have sufficient theoretical knowledge of religion to impose on the church when they are not really the children of God.

Knowest thou not this of old that the triumph of the wicked is short and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment? (Job 20:5).

A Belated Bridegroom

There was a disappointed wedding-party in an outlying district of Brooklyn, N. Y., a few days ago. The wedding had been fixed for two o'clock in the afternoon, and the bride was at the church on time. As she was very popular in her neighborhood there was an assemblage of nearly five hundred persons to witness the marriage ceremony. A brass band had been engaged for the occasion, and it also was on hand. The bridegroom, however, did not appear, and the company grew impatient. Hour after hour passed, and in spite of the performances of the band, the time seemed long to the waiting bride and guests. At five o'clock, after waiting three hours, all hope of the coming of the bridegroom was abandoned, and the party dispersed. An hour later a mud-bespattered hack drove up to the house of the bride's father, and the bridegroom alighted. The hack-driver had misunderstood the direction, and had taken his fare to a street of the same name in Jersey City, N. J. When the mistake was discovered the hack was about fifteen miles from its proper destination. All possible speed was made in rectifying the mistake, but there had been delays on the river and in finding the church in Brooklyn where the ceremony was to take place. Happily for the bride's peace of mind, it was not too late then for the marriage, and it was performed. It is strange that the bridegroom did not see that he was being taken in the wrong direction. One would have expected him to be familiar with the right road. It was well that he arrived safely at last. So much cannot be said of some who in early life pledged themselves to union with Christ, but have suffered themselves to be led astray:

If, after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning (II. Peter 2:20).

SCENE AT THE AMALGAMATION OF THE TWO SCOTTISH CHURCHES

The Father of Cheap Postage

If Rowland Hill had lived to see this day, even he would have been astonished at the fulfilment of his predictions. Through many years he labored to convince his countrymen and the statesmen of his day that by reducing the cost of postage not only would the public be benefited, but the revenue would be increased. By dogged persistency he at length succeeded, and the merchant who formerly had to pay eight cents postage on every letter, was able to send one to any part of the country for two cents. There were many sinister predictions that the government would be a heavy loser by the change, but Rowland Hill was firm in his conviction that the volume of correspondence would so increase that the Post Office would yield a larger revenue at the lower rate than the higher. So completely did the result justify him that London is now engaged in pulling down the enormous building it erected for the accommodation of Postal business, in order to build a much larger one that has now become a necessity. Rowland Hill was born in 1795, the son of a schoolmaster. He early in life began his agitation, but not until 1840 did he succeed in persuading the government to adopt his project. His confidence in his plan, in spite of the opposition of conservative leaders, has been so abundantly vindicated on both sides the Atlantic that his career may be quoted as an illustration of Christ's words:

Wisdom is justified of her children (Matt. 11:19).

An Old Boundary Dispute

A dispute between the States of Alabama and Florida which has been in progress for seventy years has now been authoritatively settled. When Florida was acquired in 1821 there was no regular survey of the new territory, but ten years later a map was prepared. The citizens of Alabama claimed that an error was then made which was prejudicial to that State which adjoins Florida on the west and northwest. Two years ago Congress made an appropriation for the settlement of all such disputes and recently the commissioners have examined the ground and rendered a decision practically conceding the contention of Alabama. The boundary line has now been moved about a mile farther south on the Chatahoochee River, thus giving Alabama two hundred thousand acres of excellent timber land formerly included in the State of Florida. The commissioners have been busy on such work ever since their appointment and there are still a number of disputes awaiting their decision. Boundaries consisting of a river are easily marked, but where the line runs according to a parallel of latitude through a sparsely-settled region there is generally a doubt about its exact location. Thus persons living near the boundary line may find when it is rectified and authoritatively defined that they are living in a different state from the one that they supposed. There is reason to fear that a similar surprise may be in store for some persons who think they are in the kingdom of God. They live so near the world that in the day of final reckoning they will be counted as belonging to it.

Then shall ye begin to say: We have eaten and drunk in thy presence and thou hast taught in our streets. But he shall say, I tell you I know you not; depart from me (Luke 13:26).

BRIEF NOTES

The beautiful picture entitled "Roll Jordan, Roll," which appeared in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was given by permission of the Taber Prang Art Company, 10 East Fifteenth street, New York city, the publishers.

A new departure in Sunday School work has been made by the Arlington Street Unitarian Church, Boston, which now employs salaried teachers in its Sunday School.

Miss Helen Gould had need be many times as rich as she is to comply with the applications made to her for money. In one week recently her mail contained 1,303 letters, the aggregate requests in which were for $1,548,502.

Roberts College, Constantinople, has just issued its thirty-seventh annual report. It shows that there are 297 students in the college and there are many more applications for admission which cannot be granted for lack of room. Three new professors are added to the college faculty this year.

A press dispatch to the New York journals states that Rev. H. L. Burleson, formerly assistant rector of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, N. Y., whose father was a missionary to the Oneida Indians, has received a remarkable tribute of appreciation. Under the wills of two full-blooded Oneidas he is made a legatee to property valued at $20,000.

A bureau has been organized in Brooklyn, N. Y., to bring into communication pastorless churches with ministers who have no charge. Dr. David Gregg, Presbyterian; Dr. C. L. Wells, Reformed Dutch; and Dr. C. W. P. Rhoades, Baptist, are serving with other well-known ministers on the Advisory Committee. The Secretary is Rev. J. N. Taft, 30 Woodruff avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

A very gratifying report is that of the Second Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh, Pa. Forty new members were welcomed at the last communion service. This makes nearly seven hundred admitted since the Rev. S. Edward Young became pastor, less than three years ago. Though this is a down-town church and its site is worth a large sum of money, the members have determined not to move, as the church is sorely needed in its present location and is doing a most valuable work.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL XMAS LESSON

MADONNA AND CHILD

BRINGING TO THE KING OUR GIFT AND GIFTS...

Christmas Story and Parable of the Pounds

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

International Sunday School Lessons for Dec. 23: Matt. 2: 1-11; Luke 19: 11-27.

GOLDEN TEXTS, II. Cor. 9: 15: "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." Rom. 14: 12: "Every man shall give account of himself to God."

SWADDLING CLOTHES

THE International Lesson Committee have given us two lessons to choose between. We choose both, for they together teach us to bring our "gifts," in both senses of the word, to the King. And the "pounds" also suggest the beautiful Christmas custom that turns our thought to giving rather than receiving, of having every one bring a "pound" of something precious if you can afford it, wrapped so that only God can tell it is more valuable than the pound of potatoes brought by one of the poor,

The Promise of His Coming

Where is he that is born King? Many children have been waiting for Christmas to come for what seems to them a very long time. Father had said it would come, and would be a glad, glad day, and at last it is just at hand. How much longer the world waited for the first Christmas, which the Heavenly Father had promised thousands of years before. God gave the first man and woman a beautiful garden for their home; but they disobeyed his loving warnings and were driven out by an angel with a sword of flame. Then God promised that by and by One should come who would lead their sons and daughters back to the joys they had lost by sin. They believed and were comforted. Long years after God told an old man to look from his tent door to the stars—who was that?—and promised that his children's children should come to be as many, and one of them should be a star of light and blessing to all the homes of the world. Joseph's old father—who was he?—as his sons gathered about his death-bed, told them that the promised Deliverer, whom he called Shiloh, that is, Peace, would surely come. Years later the greatest of human prophets—who was he?—pictured Jesus and his life by the Tabernacle—white robes to tell of his purity, gold to picture his kingliness, the bloody altar to point to the cross where he should die for us. After awhile came another prophet who wrote much of the story of Jesus seven hundred years before he came, beginning with the words, "Unto us a child is born, the Prince of Peace." Not long after this the Jews went as captives to Persia, where wise men studied the stars from lofty towers, and the Jewish captives told them of the Deliverer who would be called "the bright and morning Star," and whose coming would no doubt be heralded by some new star. And so when at last the Star of Bethlehem blazed out, these magi knew it was the open door through which the world's King had come out of the sky. And so they harnessed their camels, and loaded them with food and gifts, and for forty days or longer traveled through the desert dangers, in perils of wild beasts and still more savage men. The Bible does not tell us how many or who these wise men were, but other books say there were three and that they were not only wise men but kings. No doubt many attendants came with them on other camels, making a great caravan. What a stir they made as they halted in the gate of Jerusalem and said to the Jewish traders and Roman officers sitting there, as they leaned down from their dusty camels, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" The question excited the Jews, for they were expecting a Messiah-King, and it excited the Roman officers, for a new King of the Jews meant the dethronement of the bad king then in the palace close at hand—who was he? This Herod was troubled most of all and asked the wise men anxiously all about the new star they had seen. Then he asked the Jewish doctors where their Messiah-King was to come from. They found in Micah that it was Bethlehem. And so Herod said, out of his wicked heart, already plotting to kill the new king, "Go and search diligently for the young child; and when ye have found him bring me word that I may come and worship him also." They started for Bethlehem, delighted to find that the star, which had been hidden while they were inquiring in Jerusalem, perhaps by a cloud, going before them like a pillar of fire to bring them to the Child of promise. He was no longer in the manger, but in a "house," and there they presented gold, frankincense and myrrh, bowing before the Child who was to rule the world. They did not return to Herod, but warned the mother of Jesus, and so he was taken out of Herod's reach by a night start for Egypt. But Herod, finding the wise men did not come back, and thinking Jesus was hidden in Bethlehem, or close at hand, ordered his soldiers to kill all the infants of Bethlehem and the country roundabout up to two years of age that the new Child King might not escape—not the last effort bad and foolish rulers have made to defeat the plans of God.

THE ADORATION OF THE MAGI

In this story and the parable of the pounds, that opens out the larger meanings of Christmas, we are taught to

(1) Receive Christ as God's gift.

(2) Bring some gift to Christ.

(3) Devote our gifts to whatever service he appoints.

Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift. There are many wonderful stories ies of royal gifts. On coronation days, kings in some countries throw coins among the crowds; pardons are given to prisoners; whole cattle are roasted for barbecues in the streets, and the water fountains throw up wine instead of water. But Christmas recalls the greatest of royal gifts, when the King of the Universe so loved this world that he gave his own Son to die for its sins, and to live and speak for its redemption. To every one Jesus is given as Saviour and King. Herod represents those in every age that refuse the gift and fight against God, the giver, to their own confusion. The wise men represent those in every age who welcome the gift, accepting pardon through Jesus the Saviour, and protection and direction through Jesus, the King.

O holy child of Bethlehem,
Descend to us, we pray:
Cast out the sin, and enter in—
Be born in us to-day.
We hear the Christmas angels
The great, glad tidings tell.
O come to us, abide with us
Our Lord Emanuel.

—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

How much more than the magi saw or dreamed has God's Christmas gift grown to be in nineteen Christian centuries! Would you measure it, imagine everything Christ has given to the world blotted out. Let every picture of Christ, and of martyrs and heroes of the cross fade out on our walls. Let every oratorio that echoes his great words disappear. Let every church and cathedral, aye, every Christian hospital and asylum, and school fall in a night—this alone would make in every city of Christendom a change that would suggest a world epidemic of hurricane and fire. But we have by no means shown all we should lose. Not alone would Christmas disappear, and the weekly rest day, the Lord's day, but all that is sweetest in mother, home, and heaven. "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift."

An invisible God seemed too unreal. Man longed for a face, and God showed himself in the face of Jesus Christ. In the words of Robert Browning:

A face like my face that receives thee: a man like to me
Thou shalt love and be loved by forever; a hand like this hand
Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee. See the Christ stand.

"Unspeakable," indeed, this gift! Christ is a part of the ocean of God let into the land, where weary souls may plunge for cleansing and health. "Whosoever will let him take the water of life freely."

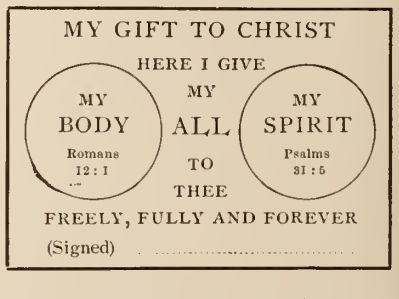
Our Gift to Christ

What and how can we give to him, whom having not seen we love? To our invisible but real King we can make an invisible but real gift.



And we can give visible, tangible gifts to a visible and tangible Christ, embodied in his needy ones, about whom he said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto me." Little Jemmy was kicked down-stairs by his drunken father. He had one wild moment of grief and pain and then he became unconscious. When he awoke he was in a bright, airy room with rows of little beds on each side. A beautiful woman was bending over him, tenderly bathing his head. At first Jim thought he had died and that this was heaven; but as his senses came back to him he remembered how his father had kicked him down-stairs, and he knew that this must be a hospital.

"Father don't love me, and nobody else does," he thought drearily; "and I won't have any Christmas at all. I don't suppose Jesus wants me to come to his birthday, and when this lady knows all about it she'll just stop washing my face, too. Oh, I hope she won't call me 'drunkard,'" and he watched her anxiously with his great sorrowful eyes.

She nodded brightly at him when she saw him looking at her, and said: "Now give me those dirty little paws." Then she washed them very quickly and when she was through she stooped and kissed the palm of one of the thin little hands.

Jim closed his fist tight and his eyes shone with joy. How happy he was all that night as he lay in the big quiet ward. To be sure there was a queer, dull pain in his head and a steady ache somewhere down his back, but that was nothing; for it was the birthday of our blessed Lord, and somebody had petted him and given him a present, which he held in his little fist.

When the night nurse passed and noticed the tightly-closed hand, she asked, "What have you got in there?" But Jim only smiled, and said nothing.

Then came a beautiful morning when ever so many little heads bobbed up from their cots and shrill little voices cried out: "Merry Christmas!"

Though some of the faces were worn with pain and sleeplessness, they all wore bright smiles that day, and they nodded to Jim.

By and by, along came a doctor with an armful of dolls, soldiers, and all sorts of toys, and behind him was Jim's "lady," her sweet face beaming with joy.

"Merry Christmas!" said the doctor, and he put down on the bed a most extraordinary donkey, that wagged his head in a very solemn manner.

"For me?" asked Jim, timidly stretching out his left hand to stroke it.

"Ask him what he's got in the other hand," whispered the night nurse; "he won't tell me."

"What have you got there, old man?" asked the doctor.

A radiant smile broke over the little pinched face.

"A kiss!" he said. "Her gave it to me. It's my Christmas present."

Oh, make ready for the King,
And prepare your offering!
For His coming, swiftly dawning,
Breaks around us like the morning;
And our eyes may catch the grace
Of the glory of his face,
Bringing light unto the world.
—MARY A. LATHBURY.

Devoting Our Gifts to the King's Business

The parable of the pounds no less than the story of the magi, is about the King, and it teaches that all of the "talents," or "gifts," or abilities, or opportunities God bestows on us are not really given, but entrusted to us to be used for him in doing good. Stewardship is God's doctrine of property in a word, and it is slowly becoming man's theory also, at least, as to men of wealth, who are expected to devote much of it to the public good.

The venerable Emperor William I. of Germany, addressing school-children, asked, "To what kingdom does this stone belong?" "To the mineral kingdom," was the reply. "And to what kingdom this flower?" "To the vegetable kingdom." "And to what kingdom do I belong?" The children, wiser than their books, instinctively refused to classify their Emperor with animals. After a brief silence, a child said reverently, "To God's Kingdom, Sire," a fact of which our political leaders also need to be reminded. To this kingdom we all belong, and whatever you have of strength, of time, of ability, of money, of opportunity—these are the five "talents" or "pounds," the King has entrusted to you to use and so increase, and thus become worthy of yet greater responsibilities.

Here is the farewell address, in part, of one of God's five-talent men, Sir J. William Dawson, of Montreal, the great scientist, who wrote at seventy-eight years of age, shortly before his death:

"At the close of life you may have to say as I now say, after a life largely spent in scientific and educational work. If I have any good cause for regret, it is that I have been able to do so little directly for Christ; if I have any cause for joy, it is that he has done so much for me, and that, with all my infirmities, he has enabled me to do even a little for his glory, and for the good of others, though in looking back it seems all too little. In the words of Miss Havegal's beautiful hymn:

'Thou, Lord, hast brought to me,
Down from thy throne above,
Salvation full and free,
Thy pardon and thy love!
Great gifts thou broughtest me,
What have I brought to thee?'"

Helen Hunt, who wrote two mighty books in behalf of the Indians, A Century of Dishonor and Ramona, deeply regretted as she drew near the end, that the first half of her literary life had been devoted to mere prettiness in literature. She sang:

I have wasted half my day,
And left my work but just begun.

The one-talent, one-pound man is the most important of all because this kind is by far the most numerous. Ten times as many men have one talent as have five, but if the one-talent men do not bury their talent but double it by use, the result will be twice as great as that of faithfulness in the five-talent people. Off against the man who buried his pound we set the little boy who put his shoulder to the wheel when two men were vainly trying to get a load out of a rut. "I can push a pound," he said, and that was all that was needed to help the men out of the difficulty.

Dr. Schauffler, explaining why some Sabbath School teachers fail, says that many a teacher with only "four-boy power" is failing because she has eight boys in her class. I have no doubt many a Christian has at least "one-boy power" that is doing neither teaching nor personal work for Christ.

Not they who say or do the most is God most pleased to see,
But they who faithful in the least have always tried to be.

Gen. Phil. Sheridan, in presenting the diplomas at West Point in 1887, said, in regard to his own military successes:

"Gentlemen, I'll tell you how it all came about. It was all due to two things. When I went out from under the shadow of these trees, as you are doing to-day, I resolved that I would make myself the best second lieutenant in the army. Whatever I took up, even if it were the simplest of duties, I tried to do it better than it had ever been done before by others. No matter if you are hidden in an obscure post, never content yourself with doing your second best, however unimportant the occasion. In the second place, I always looked out for the common soldier. Make the men in the ranks feel that you are devoting days of care and thought to their comfort and safety. Trust your reputation to the private, let him speak for you, and in the battle and on the march he will never let your military fame suffer by his cowardice or negligence. Keep these two things in view, and with your West Point training, success is assured to you."

The deeper meanings of the parable, showing how faithful service leads to rulership, a share in Christ's kingship is brought out in the following words of Louisa M. Alcott:

I do not ask for any crown
But that which all may win;
Nor try to conquer any world
Except the one within.
Be thou my guide until I find
Led by a tender hand,
The happy kingdom in myself,
And dare to take command.

BISHOP POTTER DENOUNCES VICE IN NEW YORK

IN the course of an address delivered at a Litany Service for business men and women, in Old St. Paul's Chapel, New York City, on Friday, Nov. 23, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter denounced in forcible and eloquent language the awful immoralities of the metropolis. After referring to Christ's lamentation over Jerusalem, the Bishop said, in substance:

What Christ looked down upon that morning is what you and I would look down upon if we went to any great height and looked down upon New York to-day. He saw great structures; he saw an organized civilization, for its time of a very high quality. He saw men and women going about their business in the streets. He saw the Roman soldiery on the street corners, the guardians of a so-called peace which hid a rottenness appalling. He saw the chief priests and authorities extending their laborious greeting with these and others, and he saw beneath all that what one could not see with the eyes of flesh, the homes of men, the secret shames and infamies of men, the cruelties of power, the brutalities of organized injustice, the monstrous passions and hatred of men expressing themselves as powerfully then as in any pagan era in all the world. Christ wept when he looked down upon its splendor and its shame, not because of its splendor, but because of that moral apathy, that appalling spiritual insensibility, that deadness of the soul which is the doom and damnation equally of a nation or a man.

A simple woman, I have been told, lately went into a shop here in New York and had her eyes caught by a familiar legend in the place, framed and on sale, "God Bless Our Home." "Yes," she said, in humble piety, "I should like that. I should like to put it up in my little home and to have my husband and my children see it," and then, her mind following the thread of the family life, it shot away over the path whither her husband had gone in the morning to his task downtown, and turning to the shopman, she said: "I wonder if you have other texts and legends like this? I wonder if you could let me have one—I think, John, perhaps, would like to have one—that has on it the words, "God Bless Our Office." The shopman looked at her for a moment, and without a ray of sarcasm in his voice, said: "Madam, isn't that rather a large order?"

Think of it for a moment. Think of the active business and commercial life of a great city as existing in the mind of that young man under such conditions that it was impossible for him to conceive that anybody should want to put up in any office in the world the prayer, "God Bless Our Office." God forbid that you should imagine from that, that I believe that a life of business, and a life of service, and a life of faith, and the tasks of the great industrial world, whatever they are, are so far apart from God and the consciousness of his thought and responsibility to his throne that the combining of the two in the mind of any intelligent man is inconceivable.

RT. REV. BISHOP POTTER, OF NEW YORK

What you and I want in this great, busy, wicked, self-seeking, modern material life of ours is to get back to the primal consciousness and realize that the first cry for any man or woman in the face of the dangers that threaten our world to-day is not that we would be richer, nor that we may be better organized, not that we may have a finer scorn for evil or evildoers, but first of all the cry of blind Bartimeus by the wayside, "Lord, that my eyes may be opened, blind as I am."

Somewhere or other for every man and woman to whom I am speaking at this moment there is a place in the great alignment of service. You must find that place; you must recognize your relation to it, and then in the strength of God you must put your shoulder to the wheel, and in that service I would like, if I may, to suggest as supremely important at this precise moment three particular expressions of it, the first of which finds its expression in organized service. We shall not redeem New York by emotions; we shall not redeem it by denunciation; we shall not redeem it by pessimistic temper that wraps its garments around it and turns back to bondage. There are burning with zeal and enthusiasm and a high purpose of sacrifice in this great city to-day great multitudes of men and women; they are of different religions. They must forget that. They are of different nationalities. They must forget that. They are of different political associations. Most of all, they must forget that, and if, having reached that point, we could find three or five men whom all of us trusted and believed in—there are hundreds of them—and say to these three or five men, "Now, then, tell us what you want us to do, where you want us to stand, what relation you want our party, our church, our organization to bear to the betterment of New York. We will trust your judgment, we will follow your lead," and the work is done.

Next to that in this service of the enlightened soul we want vigilance. Again I say, the city which you and I love, and in whose service we are or ought to be, will not be redeemed by emotion. If in New York to-morrow there could be organized a Vigilance Committe, such as was in San Francisco, of 25,000 men sworn to service for three years, and pledged by night and day, when their business and their opportunities gave them the freedom for it, to see things for themselves, then our souls would not have been smitten with the sorrow of that little victim of five years who was picked up on the street the other day in broad daylight and ravished by some brute. Would such things be possible in a decent and God-fearing community? In this warfare, if it is to be a triumphant warfare, we must enlist for life. Get yourselves, then, on your knees; pray God that he will open your eyes, pray to him for all the power of his Son, and let kindle in you the flame of a divine indignation and keep it burning with the enduring power of a divine and unflinching sacrifice.

A Mother's Cry Heard

ONE of the most remarkable instances of a mother's prayers being answered after long delay appears in the recently published biography of Brownlow North. Towards the close of his forty-fifth year, while he was still serving sin "with both hands earnestly," the call of God came to him in his own house at Dallas, with an urgency that could not be resisted, and the great change took place which revolutionized his whole life. With circumstantial minuteness he thus described it to the students of Edinburgh University some years afterward: "It pleased God in the month of November, 1854, one night when I was sitting playing at cards, to make me concerned about my soul. The instrument used was a sensation of sudden illness, which led me to think I was going to die. I said to my son, 'I am a dead man; take me up-stairs.' As soon as this was done, I threw myself down on the bed. My first thought then was, now what will my forty-four years of following the devices of my own heart profit me? In a few minutes I shall be dead, and what good will all these things do me for which I have sold my soul? At that moment I felt constrained to pray, but it was only the prayer of the coward, a cry for mercy. I was not sorry for what I had done, but I was afraid of the punishment of my sin. And yet still there was something trying to prevent me putting myself on my knees to call for mercy, and that was the presence of the maid-servant in the room lighting my fire. Though I did not believe at that time that I had ten minutes to live, and knew that there was no possible hope for me but in the mercy of God, and that if I did not seek that mercy I could not expect it, yet such was the nature of my heart, that I could not decide whether I should wait till that woman left the room, or fall on my knees and cry for mercy in her presence. By the grace of God I did put myself on my knees before that girl, and I believe it was the turning point with me. By God's grace I was not prevented. I did pray, and I am this day what I am, which at least is not what I was."

Answered Prayers

MY God is any hour so sweet,
From blush of morn to evening star,
As that which calls me to thy feet—
The hour of prayer?

Blest is that tranquil hour of noon,
And blest that hour of solemn eve,
When on the wings of prayer upborne
The world I leave.

Reader, Norfolk, Va., writes:

As I was praying the Lord gave me what I asked.

M. E. R., Iowa, writes:

I have just passed through the very darkest ordeal of my life—missent letters—agony of mind for eight weeks, not knowing where an only child and a dearly loved one was. I leaned on my prayer-hearing and prayer-answering Father. To-day a letter came and my burden was lifted.

Mrs. A. M. S., Neb., writes:

We were in great trouble and distress, and I earnestly prayed God to help us and make the way plain out of our difficulties. The prayer was answered.

Y. W., Ohio, writes:

I had always believed that it was wrong to pray for anything but spiritual help, that we should not take our daily little trials to our Father; but the Answered Prayer column set me thinking. Was it quite true that God cares for the little things which affect us, should we seek his help in everything? I have been taking the little things to God in prayer, and I have been helped. We must not forget in praying to say, "Thy will be done."

S. S. Teacher, Mexico, N. Y., writes:

I prayed God to help me overcome an unfortunate habit. He has not only helped me to overcome the habit but is leading me to help others to master the same infirmity. Bless his holy name.

Beside the Christmas Fire

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Bit of Christmas Green

FOR the rich there are flowers in bloom all the year round, and indeed for many who have no wealth, there are windows full of blooming plants, and in sunny kitchens and little parlor conservatories, roses and geraniums lavishly give color and fragrance. It is a matter of faculty and of watching and tending and of continual care, this having flowers in winter. But we may every one of us have a bit of Christmas green to fasten on our coats, to adorn our tables, to add to the jollity of the season. The week before Christmas, as one goes about in the crowded streets of the town, everybody is burdened with aromatic branches, with spicy wreaths, with gleaming garlands of fir, pine, cedar and holly, and with bunches of the mistletoe. The markets, no longer prosaic, are dressed in green, and the shops, larger or smaller, are bewildering in their variety.

Eskimo Children in New York

It will be news to many of us that an Eskimo lad is living in New York and actually attending a public school in the region of the Bronx. The child's name is Mene, and he is in the fourth grade of the grammar school, does well in his studies, and is enthusiastic over football. This little fellow is one of the two survivors of a group of six Eskimo brought by Lieutenant Peary from a point six hundred miles within the Arctic Circle. He was adopted by Mr. William Wallace, Superintendent of the American Museum of Natural History. He is a sturdy, merry boy, who uses excellent English, but is not given to gush, and regards interviewers with the indifference natural to one who has had a good deal of experience with them. Mene excels in arithmetic. Zakshriner, a little girl of nine, is two years Mene's junior. She prattles, sings and dances, when asked to do so, but shows by her modest reluctance that she dislikes being shown as a curiosity. Her native place was southern Alaska, and she is cared for by Miss Meagher, an artist.

Good Manners and Good Temper

These twins look very much alike, and sometimes can hardly be distinguished, so very similar are they in appearance, voice and bearing. Good manners may exist without good temper, but good temper very seldom manifests any but good manners.

In a recent novel the heroine is told to be a Christian first and a gentlewoman next, and it is explained to her that a gentlewoman is never inconsiderate, never hurts the feelings of any one, and is never occupied with herself to the exclusion of others and their affairs.

A great deal of wounded feeling might be avoided in our daily intercourse if we all practiced good manners. Certainly it is within our power to keep from ever displaying bad temper, and the endeavor to look, speak, and generally act as if good tempered will go far toward bringing about the desired amiability of feeling.

Dreams

According to the scientific student, what is called the subjective mind is always awake, even when the body is profoundly asleep. If this theory is correct, we are in a world of thought and motion even when most soundly slumbering. The dreams we remember occur to us when we are just dropping asleep or just waking up. Little importance should be attached to dreams. They are compounded of fragmentary associations of the day time, and are often caused by indigestion, or by some accident of too much or too little clothing on the bed. A familiar and most disagreeable phase of dreams brings us to festive occasions improperly clothed, as at a party where every one is in gala dress, in a working gown or in a night robe. Of old, God revealed himself to his people in the visions of the night, but in these modern days of a white light of knowledge everywhere, we have emerged from dreamland and he speaks to us in his own Word.

Little Mary's Helping Hand

Little Mary had given her heart to Christ. She wanted very much to show that she loved him, but there seemed nothing that she could do.

"You might thread grandmother's needles," said mother. "Her eyes are so dim that she cannot do it for herself, and I know she would like to find a half dozen needles threaded and ready for use every day on her cushion."

"But would that be serving Jesus?" asked Mary.

"Yes, it would be a helping hand held out to one of his very dear ones. Jesus would regard that as done to himself."

Mary was only eight, and grandmother was eighty, but both were Christ's little ones.

Visiting as a Fine Art

The person who can be an agreeable guest, whose visits are always welcome, who is regarded as a friend by the whole family, has mastered visiting as a fine art. In the first place, she arrives when she is expected. If she is to be met, she steps off the boat or the train at the hour announced on the time-table. She stays the length of time arranged for and no longer. We have adopted the excellent English plan of inviting friends for a definite period, say for a week, or a month, or from Friday until Monday, or from Saturday until Wednesday. This definiteness has conveniences, and is preferable to the old way, which left host and guest in doubt as to the continuance of the visit.

The guest who is welcome at times effaces herself. Every family has certain periods in the day when it may like to be alone. If a tactless guest stays the whole time with the family, if she follow her hostess from room to room, if she have no resources of her own, she becomes very tiresome.

The successful guest is attentive to the old people in the house and nice to the children. If there are servants she does not take their work out of their hands; if there are none, she gives unobtrusive help wherever she can. Above all, she is not tardy; she is punctual at meals; she is also pleased with whatever is done for her.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—MRS. MALAPROP. Observe what your hostess does if you are in doubt as to table usages.

—MABEL MURRAY. Break the shell of your egg and eat from the egg itself with a small spoon.

—VIOLA. A bashful young man may need encouragement; but I don't like to see a girl make pronounced advances.

—LEOLA. How foolish to expect a man to keep his temper when arguing on politics. Heated discussions do not always mean anger or feud, however.

—DEACONESS. In visiting the poor, do not condescend. Approach them in a friendly and respectful manner. The poorest people resent intrusive calls.

The Christmas Stockings

HANG up the Christmas stockings,
Leave not a dear one out;
And wake on Christmas morning
With ringing song and shout.
For in the silent midnight
Shall Santa Claus appear,
And crown with gifts and gladness
The love-time of the year.

Hang up the baby's stocking;
The cunning little elf
Is still too very tiny
To do it for herself.
And hang the mother's stocking
Oh, very plain in sight;
Some one must think for mother,
Or she'll forget it quite.

Hang father's sturdy stocking
Right there between the boys';
And give him books and papers,
As he gives the children toys.
Let Santa Claus be careful
About the politics;
For father has a conscience
That to the right side sticks.

Hang up the old folks' stockings,
Hang up the little girl's;
Dear grandma with her silver hair,
Sweet Flossy with her curls,
Will both be very happy
When dawns in roseate cheer,
The Merry Christmas morning,
The love-time of the year.

ETHEL BRIDGES.

A CHRISTMAS EVE CAROL IN THE OLD HOME

IF ye would hear the angels sing,
"Peace on earth and mercy mild"
Think of Him who was once a child,
On Christmas-day in the morning.

Rise, and open wide the door;
Christians, rise! the world is wide,
And many there be that stand outside,
Yet Christmas comes in the morning.

Rise, and light your Christmas fire;
Christians, rise! the world is old,
And time is weary and worn and cold,
Yet Christmas comes in the morning.

DORA GREENWELL.

Christmas as a Tax

From the standpoint of the grown-up the distance from one Christmas to another is very short. As we grow older the years fairly fly past us, and the twelve months seem a little space in the circuit of our lives. To the children the bit of the road they travel from Christmas to Christmas is very long, and they are never troubled nor dismayed as, alas! their elders often are, when the happy time comes back.

Theoretically, we all welcome the holiday season with open arms, but practically on some of us, through our own folly, it entails a burdening tax, so that instead of being thoroughly joyful, we are worn out and worried in the effort to remember all our kindred and acquaintances with appropriate gifts. Simplicity in this direction would be wise, and for those who must thoughtfully consider ways and means, there should be a limiting of presents to what can be easily and honestly afforded. Do not leave the children out, and do not defraud them of their legitimate pleasure by bestowing upon them merely useful things, such as clothing, shoes, suspenders, and hats. These they know would be furnished them somehow, and the essence of Christmas is not in them. Toys, books, sweets, little superfluities for the day, are to be preferred for Christmas gifts; for the girl always her doll, and for the boy his drum, or his sled, or his jack-knife. Give each child if you can do no more, one token of love which will be a treasure, and save in some other quarter. To older people and to outside friends, be content, if your means are limited, to send a letter, or a card, or a bit of holly. Christmas cheer lies in the sentiment, not in the costliness of Christmas remembrances.

A Flower Apiece

I have heard that a certain church in New York City has a pretty custom, after morning service, of taking the flowers from the pulpit and presenting each woman with one as she leaves, so long as there are flowers to go round. In many churches the flowers are sent to the sick when their use on Sunday is over, and this seems a good way in which to dispose of them, for flowers carry a real gladness to the invalid.

HOW SHE FOUND CHRIST

The Story of the Conversion of MARGARET SUSANNA FRY

The Distinguished Temperance Editor and Worker

SUSANNA FRY, as her friends know her, has had a varied career of usefulness. For fourteen years she filled the Chair of belles lettres in the Illinois Wesleyan University at Bloomington, and for two years she had the Chair of English Literature in the University of Minnesota, and was one of the judges in the Liberal Arts Department at the World's Fair, at Chicago. Her great friendship for Frances Willard brought her into close touch with the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and in 1894 she was elected President of that organization in Minnesota. From 1895 to 1898 she was engaged in editorial work. Since then she has been the Corresponding Secretary of that great army of women who have set their hearts to the noble purpose of tying their bands of "ribbon white" around the world.

MARGARET SUSANNA FRY

Susanna Fry was born in a good Scotch-Irish Christian home in the little town of Burlington, Ohio. When a very young child, she says she "tried to get converted," and prayed seven times, like the prophet, and looked for the supernatural; but she neither saw nor felt anything unusual. Her father was of Covenanter stock, while her mother was very demonstrative, and not unfrequently praised God aloud in her closet, where she went daily for prayer.

It was a community in which the common note of religious life was set to the key of a demonstrative character. Shouting was common, and powerful religious excitement was expected in religious meetings. It was not uncommon to hear such testimonies as these: "I was so powerfully wrought upon by the Holy Spirit that I was compelled to go to the mourner's bench," or, "I was carried forward to the altar without knowing what I did." Still another would say, "I could no more resist the Spirit than I could fly." Susanna Fry coveted such experiences. Indeed, she thought that was the proper way, and perhaps the only way, in which to find the Lord. She was perfectly willing to yield, even if she were stricken down and carried bodily to the altar, or thrown into a trance. This error of teaching was very unfortunate for the young girl, and shut her out of the enjoyment of the communion with Christ for many years. She waited twenty odd years for an overpowering demonstration—something supernatural in an outward way, which would override her will. It never came.

In 1866, the Rev. James D. Fry, a young preacher who had been appointed as the junior pastor on the Burlington Circuit, preached in Miss Fry's home church for the first time, and he brought a message which startled her soul out of its lethargy. This young man, fresh from college, but with an earnest evangelistic zeal, brought just that note of religious truth which the young woman in her condition needed to hear. She had been thinking about religion as something without, and beyond herself—something which was to come and take possession of her, without any reference to her own attitude. She had thought that her proper place was to wait until this divine spirit made conquest of her heart, and, in spite of herself, captured her will, and made conquest of her life. And so the years were passing away, and she had come to womanhood, and was not as near to the Lord as when a child. Young Fry brought a new note of duty. He declared that conversion was active and not passive. The entire tenor of his sermons was to the effect that, knowing the right, it was our duty to do it; that religion did not consist in feeling, but in yielding to the claims of duty, and doing the will of God.

Susanna heard this message as though it were a new Gospel, and so it was to her. As she listened, she saw that she had been waiting for something that would never come—that God, and Christ, and the Holy Spirit had done all that was needed for her salvation, until she began to act on her own account. The next step must come from herself. She was impressed that her will was free, and that God would never break it down, but that she must exercise it for herself. The way was clear now, and her heart and conscience were thoroughly aroused. And, with earnestness and decision of character, she surrendered herself to Christ, and made a public confession of Jesus.

The young preacher who won her to Christ, later won her heart for himself, and during all the years since 1868 they have walked the way of life together, comrades in the blessed work of winning souls to the service of their Divine Lord.

Missions in China

FROM Dr. Griffith John, the veteran missionary of Hankow, China, comes a letter which places the Chinese situation in a new light. While grieving sorely over the massacre of the missionaries, he points out a very significant fact. This is that the hostility of the Chinese is not to the missionary as such, nor to Christianity but to things foreign. This is one ray of encouragement in the dark prospect and leads us to hope that mission work in that distracted land may yet be renewed. He says:

"Let no one suppose that these missionaries have suffered because they are missionaries. They have suffered because they are foreigners. Had the gentlemen been members of the Pekin Syndicate their sufferings would have been worse. In the Tsehchou Prefecture one of the missionaries was taken for a member of the Syndicate on account of a certain resemblance in size and features between the two men. The mob laid hold of him and would have murdered him then and there had he not been able to convince them that he was another person. It is the height of folly to look at the present movement as anti-missionary. It is anti-missionary as it is anti-everything that is foreign. The man who looks upon the missionary as the cause of the present trouble is simply blinded by ignorance or prejudice, or both. The movement is first and last an anti-foreign movement, and has for its aim the casting out of every foreigner and all his belongings. This is a point of great importance, a point that we cannot afford to lose sight of for a moment at this time.

"Hundreds of missionaries have passed, through Hankow on their way from the interior to the coast, and I am glad to be able to say that, with the exception of the Shansi and Honan missionaries, they have nothing but good to say of the officials and people in their treatment of them at the time of leaving their various stations, and whilst traveling through their respective provinces."

JUDGE NOT

IT is so easy to judge, my friend,
To mark the course to run,
And say what to do
If I had been you
The way that I sure would have done.

It is so easy to think, my friend,
That in the daily strife
No others have wrought
With such care and thought
As we in the battle of life.

It is so easy to say, my friend,
The cross another wears
Is sure to be light
If carried aright
The burden another one bears.

It is so easy to pray, dear friend,
Lord help me now to see
That I must judge not
For each earthly lot
Is planned and directed by thee.

That means a great deal more than pain in the stomach, else it might be easily remedied.
It means that that organ lacks vigor and tone and is too weak properly to perform its functions.
It means, too, that much that is eaten is wasted and the system generally undernourished.

CANNIBALS IN AFRICA*

IN the dead of the night a Kaffir chief paid us a visit alone, and sat down very quietly and mournfully at our fire. Livingstone and I woke up and greeted him, and then he dreamily recounted the history of his life, his wars, escapes, successes and conquests, and the far-distant wandering in his raids. By the fire's glow and flicker among the reeds, with that tall, dark, earnest speaker and his keenly-attentive listeners, it has always appeared to me one of the most weird scenes I ever saw. With subdued manner and voice, Sebitoane went on through the livelong night till near the dawn, in low tones, only occasionally interrupted by an inquiry from Livingstone. He described the way in which he had circumvented a strong impi of Matabili on the raid, and raised his voice for a minute or two as he recounted how, hearing of their approach, he had sent men to meet the dreaded warriors of Umsilegas, feigning themselves traitors in order to lure them to destruction by promising to guide them to the bulk of the cows and oxen, which, they said, in fear of their coming, had been placed in fancied security on one of the large islands of the Chobe; how the Zulus fell into the trap and allowed themselves to be ferried over in three or four canoes hidden there for the purpose; and how, when the last trip had been made, the boatmen, pulling out into mid-stream, told them they could remain where they were till they were fetched, and in the meantime might search for the cattle; how, after leaving them till they were worn and weak with hunger, for there was nothing to eat on the island, he passed over, killed the chiefs, and absorbed the soldiers into his own ranks, providing them with wives, a luxury they were not entitled to under Zulu military law until their spears had been well reddened in fight.

Then he waved his hand westward and opened out a story of men over whom he had gained an easy victory, "away, away, very far from the bitter waters," and to whom, when they asked for food wishing to bind them with fetters of kindness, he sent a fat ox, and, "would you believe it, they returned it, saying they didn't eat ox." "Then what do you eat?" I asked, "we like beef better than anything." "We eat men," said they. I had never heard of this before; but they were very pressing, so at last I sent them two slaves of the Macobas, the river people, who, as you know, are very dark in color, but they brought them back, saying they did not like black men, but preferred the redder variety, and as that meant sending my own fighting men, I told them they might go without altogether."

This was the only intimation we ever had that cannibalism existed in our part of Africa."

*From William Cotton Oswell, Hunter and Explorer, by his eldest son, W. Edward Oswell. This story of the life of the companion of Livingstone on two of his expeditions in Africa, contains correspondence and copious extracts hitherto unpublished from Livingstone's private journal, which was placed at the author's disposal by Mrs. Livingstone-Bruce, daughter of the great missionary. The friendship between Oswell and Livingstone lasted till the death of the latter in 1873. The book is amply and beautifully illustrated, and contains several portraits and maps. Pp. 556, two volumes, gilt top, rough edges, cloth. Price, $6. Published by Doubleday, Page & Co., New York.

A Puritan Meetin' House†

DIRECTLY opposite the singers' gallery was the pulpit, and this was advisable, for from time immemorial choirs have shown an irreverent uneasiness that needs to be under or opposite the parson's eye. There was no gallery on the pulpit side. The meeting-house must have no such interfering attraction to take off the attention from that great, imposing object, the pulpit. If in churches that follow a ritual, the altar is the prominent object, in an old Puritan meeting-house there was a piece of ritualism just as pronounced, and this was the pulpit. Even angels would not have ventured to tread there, unless authorized by the minister. Up to the tall, dignified, imposing pulpit, respectfully climbed a flight of steps, while above this oracle was a ponderous sounding-board. Before the pulpit, at its base, was the "deacons' seat."

As one stood in the singers' gallery and looked down into the meeting-house, he saw three aisles stretching across the floor and aiming at the pulpit wall, though not arriving there. The "main aisle" was the one in the centre, and on either side were square, old-fashioned pews that suggested large families. There were two side aisles that went between pews of the same fashion. Two slender aisles, though, divided the mass of pews between the main and side aisles, these humbler avenues carrying the name of "cat aisles." We are not told the reason for the giving of this name.

Of course the meeting-house was for the whole town. The town chose the minister, who was always of the old "standing order" in New England, the Congregational. His salary was paid out of the town treasury. He was a town, as well as a church, official. And the people as a rule came to hear him. It was heresy to go or want to go anywhere else than to "the meeting-house," supposing there was a disposition to go to the services of the Church of England in Boston. "Meetin'-goin" in every town was a prevalent custom. People "went to meetin'," even as they ate, drank and slept. If they could not answer affirmatively the question whether they had "ben to meetin'," at one period of the town's history, certainly they might expect to see the selectmen coming after them. These town fathers were also supposed at one time to see that the children were religiously trained, and if not sufficiently catechised, then the selectmen must catechise the children.

†From Fifer Boy of the Boston Siege, by Edward A. Rand. A delightful story founded on the stirring Revolutionary events in and around Boston. The Puritan atmosphere pervades the pages, showing the great part religion played in the life of the young girl of that period. Pp. 326, illustrated, cloth cover, price $1.25. A. J. Bradley & Co., Boston, publishers.

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Life of Christ. A Poem. By Rev. Samuel Wesley, Vicar of Epworth. Revised by Thomas Coke, LL.D. Edited by Edward T. Roe, LL.B. With a sketch of the author by Rev. Frank Crane. This is one of the most remarkable books of the century. The epic, pronounced by high contemporary criticism, "the greatest of heroic poems," was written by the father of John Wesley, and published near the close of the seventeenth century under royal patronage in two magnificent quarto volumes which none but persons of wealth could purchase. When the royal editions, of which there were several, were exhausted, the poem dropped out of print until one hundred years after its first appearance, when Bishop Coke brought out his revised edition, which was sold through restrictive channels. Two years ago Dr. Roe discovered one of the latter editions in a second-hand bookstore, saw the literary value of the work, and, as a consequence, the present beautiful and interesting volume is before the public. Pp. 516, illustrated. Union Book Co., Chicago.

With Both Armies in South Africa, by Richard Harding Davis. A collection of the author's letters as correspondent, attached first to the British and then to the Boer forces during the recent war in the Transvaal. Includes chapters in the siege and relief of Ladysmith, President Kruger, the English prisoners, last days of Pretoria, with Buller's column, the battle of Sand River, etc. Mr. Davis also tells a good story of George W. Steevens, relates how horses were made into soup, describes Kruger's home, gives character sketches of President Steyn, General Botha, Earl of Ava, and Lord Roberts. Pp. 237, copiously illustrated from photographs. Cloth cover, stamped with British and Boer flags in color. Price, $1.50. Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers.

THE CHURCH CHOIR ZOBO BAND OF PATERSON, N. J. Photo from Life.

This band was organized by the church choir and Organist, Mr. W. F. Miller, as a means of raising money for Church and Missionary purposes. It was a success from the start, and has even participated in Easter Sunday service. The band is very proficient, and is now taking outside engagements. They find it a pleasant, profitable variation from routine work. Many Church Choirs have these Zobo Bands, and find them of great value. As a means of earning money for church purposes, a "Zobo Concert" invariably draws full houses. Zobo Bands can play any piece of music in all parts by ear or by note as preferred.

READ WHAT PASTORS AND ORGANISTS SAY ABOUT OUR INSTRUMENTS

G. B. Richardson, Business Manager of the "Young Peoples' Weekly," Elgin, Ill., writes: "The Zobo Instruments I purchased of you were first used at an entertainment given at my home to the 200 employees of the Young People's Weekly. Although the Quartette had opportunity for but one rehearsal the effort met unbounded enthusiasm and was voted a great success. We are now considering the organization of a full orchestra for next winter's entertainment, and I write this to ask you to forward me a select list of 12 to 15 instruments." Wm. J. Siemers, leader of the Beacon Light Zobo Band, Baltimore, Md., writes: "I send you to-day copy of a Baltimore paper, giving a very complimentary notice of the "Zobo" Concert given last night by the Beacon Light Zobo Band, composed of members of the choir of the Scott Street United Brethren Church. The concert was a great success, both artistically and financially, and at the close we received an offer at good pay for another engagement. Every church should have a Zobo Band. It is the pleasantest and easiest way of raising money that I ever tried or heard of, because any one that can hum a tune can play on a Zobo." Miss Hattie E. Konnty, of Springfield, S. Dak., organist, choir leader, says: "Zobo Instruments received, and are all right, and we want more of them." Rev. James C. Mitchell, of North Easton, N. J., says: "I have just received the Zobo Cornet and I am delighted with it; will organize a band." Wm. F. Miller, organist and director of church choir of Park Ave. Baptist Church of Paterson, N. J., says: "I find the Zobo Brass Band Instruments to be first-class, and just what we needed, as we have a very small organ. We have a fourteen piece Zobo Band, and intend to enlarge it. We have had one Zobo Concert, and would say it was a complete success." Mae Blance Winfield, instructor of music at Gallaway Female College, of Searcy, Ark., says: "I am much pleased with the Zobo Band Instruments." Had we space we could quote you thousands of such letters from renowned persons who have had our goods, but we believe we have quoted enough to satisfy any reasonable person that we are perfectly reliable and that our goods are as represented.

CAN BE PLAYED BY ANY ONE WHO CAN HUM A TUNE—NO LEARNING

We do away with that long tedious labor of practice. It is the most extraordinary musical instrument ever produced. An instrument capable of almost every modulation, its music may be softened to the cooing of a dove or the thrilling song of the nightingale. The Cornet is an elegant accompaniment to Organ, Piano or any string instrument, and affords unlimited pleasure to the individual; suited for all in and outdoor entertainment. These instruments open up new possibilities to the Vocalists, and develop the vocal cords.

WITH A FULL BAND A GRAND PIPE ORGAN EFFECT CAN BE OBTAINED Those that have no pipe organ, the Zobo supplies the want at a minimum cost. Every church without a paid choir should organize a Zobo Church Choir Band. Sing into the mouthpiece—Zobo does the rest.

$1.00 SPECIAL OFFER To introduce the musical marvel of the age and to give you a chance to test our instruments and prove all our claims, we will send the Zobo Cornet, solid brass, highly polished and lacquered, 11 inches long, 5 1-2 inch bell, with full instructions how to play, and illustrated catalogue, prepaid, for $1.00. We make this offer, believing that all interested will eventually organize a Zobo Band. This is a grand offer, and you should not miss it. We warrant each instrument just as represented or money refunded. Send money by registered letter, postoffice money order, or a bank draft payable to our order.

CREEDS.... ON COMMON GROUND

MEN representing about a dozen different creeds assembled in New York on November 20th to discuss the fundamental principles of religion which they hold in common, the conference continuing until the evening of November 22d. Three sessions were held each day, those in the morning and afternoon in the hall of the United Charities Building, and the evening session in the Church of the Holy Communion.

It was a significant spectacle for the reflective mind. Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Unitarians and Jews, assembled on the same platform and that to discuss not politics, but religion, the very subject on which it was supposed there could be no approach to agreement. It was, however, worthy of notice that in all the sessions there was the utmost courtesy and friendly feeling, inasmuch as there was mutual forbearance. The speakers appeared to recognize that the object of every religion was to make men better citizens in every relation of life, and while some found their help in one creed, others found it in others, but all were laboring to reach the same goal. To the devout Christian, however, the discussion must have been unsatisfactory. So thoroughly have we realized the truth of Christ's saying, "No man cometh to the Father but by me," that there was a feeling of sadness at hearing men, obviously sincere in their desire for holiness and purity of life, deliberately dispensing with the mightiest assistance to that aspiration ever placed at the disposal of man. Yet it was necessary in any discussion in which Jews and Unitarians took part to eliminate all reference to Christ.

The subjects discussed were: "Religion the Life of God in the Soul of Man;" "The Possibilities of Common Worship;" "Political Ideals of the Bible;" "Demands on a Nation Conscious of a Moral Mission;" "The Dangerous Classes in a Republic;" "Religion Vital to Democracy;" and "The Unused Power of the Churches in Politics."

The speakers dwelt on the advance this century had witnessed in the moral standards, the enlargement of practical philanthropy and the removal of religious prejudices. "We all believe," said one speaker, "that there is a half-way station on the journey of life where men can change cars from the down grade to the up grade." Another speaker, referring to the dangerous classes, defined them not as the criminals or the poor, but as the classes who had the pauper and the criminal spirit, among whom he placed those who were idle and extravagant, willing to live on the earnings of others and contributing little or nothing to the work of the world. "Such men," said he, "are parasites on the body politic." There were many references to the present crusade against vice in New York City. Several speakers called attention to the fact that in such a crusade the churches might all do effective work in uniting to promote righteousness, to raise the fallen, and to exalt the ideals of the people.

One practical outcome of the Conference is the compilation of a ritual which might be used in a union service of all creeds. It was prepared by Dr. Heber Newton, Episcopalian; Dr. Thomas R. Slicer, Unitarian; and Dr. Gottheil, Jewish Rabbi. It consists of readings from the Bible, followed by prayers and collects and closes with a number of hymns which might be sung by Jews as well as by Christians. It is not designed for use by any denomination, but might be employed, if some impending calamity, or national crisis, or some common cause brought together religious men of every creed for united supplication to God.

Among the most prominent speakers at the Conference were Rev. W. C. Gannett, of Rochester, N. Y.; Dr. Heber Newton, of New York; Dr. Washington Gladden, of Columbus, O.; Prof. Henry S. Nash, of Harvard; Dr. B. P. Raymond, of Wesleyan University; Dr. George A. Gates, of Iowa College; President J. G. Schurman of Cornell; and Controller Coler, of New York.

India's Message of Thanks

MISSIONARIES IN CONFERENCE SEND GRATEFUL ACKNOWLEDGMENTS TO OUR READERS

MANY letters have been received from individual missionaries in India expressing their appreciation of the services rendered to them by the contributors to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund, who enabled them to relieve the appalling suffering around them. By the latest mail comes a formal vote of thanks passed by the Famine Relief Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church which administered the portion allotted to it by the Inter-Denominational Committee. It is signed on behalf of the Committee by Bishop F. W. Warne, Dr. J. W. Robinson and Revs. J. E. Scott, G. W. Park and Robert Ward. They say: "We are requested to convey to you the gratitude, not only of the Committee, but also of a great multitude of famine-stricken people who have been rescued through the use of the liberal funds which you have sent. May the Lord continue to honor and bless you in the great and good work you have been permitted to do, and we would convey to you and through you to the multitude of generous donors and patrons who have helped in this great work, or who may continue to help in the future, the heartfelt thanks of the multitude of recipients of this generous bounty.

"Out of this awful calamity have come some blessings. Such unstinted generosity on the part of Christians is having its effect; hundreds of villages are now open to the Gospel, where the people gladly hear the word; hundreds of workers are being trained for needy fields and many of our native assistants have learned lessons of faith and unselfishness that they could never have learned otherwise.

"But much yet remains to be done. Thousands of orphans and famine waifs are left on our hands, for whom we are now responsible, and who will have to be supported for at least five years to come. But we are sure the Providence which rescued these children from death and placed them in our keeping, will also provide for their support and teaching until they are able to maintain themselves. We are thankful that you have so generously and largely planned to meet the future need of these waifs. They will grow up to bless both you and their individual patrons."

Dr. Justin E. Abbott, of the Congregational Missionary Society, confirms this statement and presents an urgent plea for help. He says:

"Wrecks of humanity are still common enough in villages and towns, doomed to die from digestive organs hopelessly impaired. It is, however, children that now call for the most sympathy. Where adults may find work, there children are still starving, because they find none to care for them. With returning prosperity parents and friends are hunting up their own, but the friendless find no one to give them food. Hence the number of children in a starving and dying condition is still large in some of the worst famine districts.

"There is also only too good ground for believing that as soon as the relief works are entirely closed and the famine poorhouses emptied, and the occupants sent back to their villages, the brunt of the suffering will come on the children. Those with friends will be cared for, those who have none will find little sympathy in these days of cruel impoverishment. What the total number of famine orphans may be has not been carefully estimated. The Hindu is naturally kind to his dependent relatives, and with returning prosperity the greater number of famine orphans will doubtless find a welcome in their old homes; but 25,000 at least, so far as present statistics are available, are a permanent famine legacy to the missionaries who have been rescuing dying children from their sad fate. These rescued boys and girls will find no claimants, and missionaries must act as their fathers and mothers, feed them, clothe them, and instruct them in such industries as will yield them an honorable support.

"But where is the money to come from to feed so many? American missionaries turned to America to help save the starving when the famine was sore in the land. They have no other place to turn to now but to those very friends of India who helped once before. The cost of caring for a child is $15 a year. To care for these 25,000 children is thus not a very great financial problem for lands of wealth and practical sympathy. America's millionaires have a rare chance to assume the support and training of whole orphanages of a hundred or five hundred children, and the man or woman of humbler means, the churches, the Sunday Schools, and Christian Endeavor Societies have each but to take the burden of a child or two, and the problem is solved. The missionaries who directly saved their lives will give them their time and thought and care, and this united effort will bring great good to India out of a great sorrow.

"Kind-hearted givers in America have had their sympathies touched by the ghastly photographs of famine children, but the living boy and girl who is on the border-land between life and death, with sunken eyes, fleshless arms and legs, shrunken abdomen, moaning for food, is a sight painful beyond expression. On the other hand, one can hardly conceive of a place more blessed, or nobly worthy of help, than the rooms and grounds where the happy boys and girls, saved by careful, loving nursing, forget past sorrows and laugh and play and grow plump and round with wholesome food. He must be a miser indeed who looking into their faces does not become a generous philanthropist."

As our readers are aware, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is assisting in the promotion of help for these children. Any Church, Sunday School or Young People's Society or individual Christian may undertake the support of a child of either sex and may designate the denomination in which the child shall be reared. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will notify the missionary so indicated, who in turn will inform the donor of the name and age of the child and will at stated intervals report the progress of the child. The cost of thus adopting a child is fifteen dollars a year, and to save the cost of correspondence the money may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which will acknowledge it in its columns and remit it to the missionaries in charge. May Christ, who loved children, abundantly bless and reward every one who thus undertakes the maintenance of a child!

Saved on the Brink

MRS. FALKE, the matron of the Good Samaritan Home for Girls, Newark, N. J., relates this remarkable incident of the power of saving grace:

Several weeks ago a young girl rang our bell and asked to see me. As soon as I looked at her my heart said, "This is some mother's daughter." This was her story: "I was tired of my sinful life and I bought ten cents' worth of carbolic acid and mixed it with water. In going to my room I saw THE CHRISTIAN HERALD lying on a table. I picked it up, and putting the glass with the acid on the dressing-stand, I said, as I opened the paper, 'Well, this is the last time I will ever look at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.' Almost the first thing I read was that somebody cared for such girls as me. Then I got down on my knees and promised God if he would forgive me and open the way for me to go to the Home of the Good Samaritan, I would serve him the rest of my life. Now, I have come to you. Is there any hope for me?" I praise God that right there we could tell her of One who said, "He that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." The girl remained with us and I believe is thoroughly changed in heart—a wonderful instance of God's saving grace to one who was about to perish by her own hand. She was literally plucked as a brand from the burning.

THE HEALTH HABIT

Just as Easy to Form as Any Other.

We do not deliberately form our pet habits, but they are unconsciously acquired and grow as we grow, and by the time we learn they are hurting us, we find them too strong to be easily broken.

Then, why not form a good habit, a habit which will counteract the many bad ones, in other words coutract the unfashionable habit of being always well.

The best health habit to get into is to have and keep a vigorous stomach; if you have a healthy digestion you can drink your beloved coffee, smoke your favorite brand of tobacco, with little or no harm; the mischief begins when these things are forced upon the faithful stomach, without any assistance.

Form the habit of taking after meals some harmless but efficient digestive which will relieve the stomach of so much extra work.

Nature furnishes us with such digestives and when they are combined in such a pleasant preparation as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, they give the overworked stomach just the necessary assistance to secure perfect digestion without any of the harmful effects of cathartics and similar drugs.

The habit of taking Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after meals is as necessary to the weak stomach as food itself, and indeed to get the benefit from food eaten, nothing better and certainly nothing safer can be used.

Many families consider Stuart's Tablets as essential in the house as knives and forks.

They consist entirely of natural digestive principle without the effect or characteristics of drugs; they have no cathartic action, but simply go to work on the food eaten and digest it.

Take into account your bad habits and the expense they entail and then invest fifty cents in a box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets and see if your digestion for the next month is not vastly improved.

Ask the clerk in any drug store the name of the most successful and popular stomach remedy and he will say Stuart's.

Rheumatism

Dr. W. H. Vail, of St. Louis, Mo., says:

"Tartarlithine removes or mitigates rheumatic pains promptly and permanently.

"It does not irritate the stomach nor produce any heart disturbance.

"It is thoroughly safe and reliable.

"It causes an increased discharge of uric acid from the first dose.

"It has a pleasant taste."

"FLAG DAY"

And How it was Observed in Our Island Possessions

THE annual celebration of "Flag Day" was observed not only in the United States, but in our island possessions as well. While the Stars and Stripes floated from every school and from countless public buildings in the States from Maine to California, they were also cheerily in evidence in the Philippines, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. This extension of the observance of the day as an occasion for popular demonstration of patriotism and tribute to Old Glory, is due to the efforts of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution.

On the 23d of April last this society passed a resolution to present silk flags to the school children of Manila, Hawaii and Porto Rico, to stimulate among the people there an interest in the flag and the celebration of "Flag Day" simultaneously with similar ceremonies at home. Accordingly, flags were purchased and sent to the representatives of the Sons of the Revolution for distribution in the islands named: 1,000 to Manila, 150 to Hawaii, and 350 flags and 500 flag-cards, the latter to be worn on the coat like a boutoniere, in honor of the Red, White and Blue. The express and transportation companies carried the flags to their respective destinations, free of charge.

In a letter dated Honolulu, June 14th, from Secretary W. O. Atwater, of the Hawaiian Society of the S. A. R., he said: "I regret that both letter and flags did not reach us in time for distribution on the 14th instant. They will, however, be in time for the Fourth of July, and already some of them have been distributed among the school children, as suggested by you. Permit me to thank you, in the name of our Society, for the kind forethought in sending them. That they are fully appreciated and the children well pleased, goes without saying."

Col. Charles R. Greenleaf, of the Manila branch of the Society, wrote that the flags were received, and that they were turned over for distribution to the Superintendent of Public Schools of Manila on the Fourth of July.

Lieutenant-Colonel Russell B. Harrison, the Secretary of the Porto Rico Society, also reported that the flags sent were greatly appreciated, and that San Juan made "Flag Day" a gala occasion. The cooperation of the people of our new possessions has caused the Flag Committee to anticipate a more complete observance of "Flag Day" in 1901. To that end the best efforts of the Society will cooperate with the "American Flag Association," composed of all the members of all the patriotic societies in the country, in fostering public sentiment in favor of raising the flag of our country on a certain day, and saving it from desecration through its use in any way for advertising purposes.

Wu Ting Fang on the Missionaries

IN an interview published in the current issue of The World's Work, Wu Ting Fang, the Chinese Minister in Washington, interestingly discusses the troubles in China. He has this to say regarding the missionaries:

"I would not say a word against the missionaries. They have gone, you know, into the interior, far from treaty ports, where the people are unaccustomed to foreigners, and some of them have attacked the cherished traditions and beliefs of the people without sufficient regard for their feelings, perhaps. How would you like that, now? But the medical missionaries have done much good. They have gone among ignorant people and cured their ills; some of them have translated useful books into the Chinese language. I give them the highest credit; and if I might say a word to those who send out missionaries, I would say, 'Send medical missionaries. They will help us to build up China.'"

A Gift to Mother

H. C. S., Foote's Bay, Ontario, Can., writes:

The Teacher's Bible was beyond my anticipation. The Red Letter Testament is fine. We gave it to mother, as the type suited her sight well.

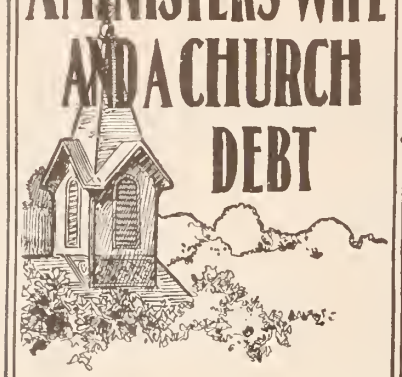
A MINISTER'S WIFE AND A CHURCH DEBT



A minister's wife in Buffalo writes:

"Our church was encumbered with a mortgage. The Ladies' Home Journal and The Saturday Evening Post seemed to offer a chance to accomplish something for the work, and I took the matter to the Ladies' Aid Society. I proposed that each member should enter her subscription, and try to secure other names. My plan was received enthusiastically. In addition to our own members we obtained subscriptions from many not connected with the church. Everywhere we went we talked Journal and church mortgage. Soon we had subscriptions enough to reduce the mortgage considerably, and with very little work."

What this one woman did, thousands can do for their church or for themselves. Write to

Miss Gould's Mail

THE troubles of the generous rich are not always fully appreciated. Miss Helen Gould's mail is a burden to her and the despair of her secretary. She once tried to answer them each and all by special letter but had to give up the plan as utterly impracticable. After the Spanish War, when the avalanche of letlers became simply overwhelming, she had a circular prepared, stating the number and character of requests made of her in a single week and giving the amounts she was asked to contribute; and this circular her secretary enclosed to correspondents whose requests Miss Gould felt compelled to deny. The circular shows that in one week she received 1,303 letters, asking all told, for over $1,500,000 in money. All sorts of things were called for; girls wanted trousseaux; somebody wanted to build a monument to a parent; eleven people wanted pianos; a church organ, a passage to Europe, a set of teeth, watches, scholarships, sewing machines, bicycles, invalid's chair, team of horses, old clothes, etc., were in the catalogue. There were ninety-one requests for loans; ninety-one to raise mortgages; forty-three to aid churches; thirty-four to help various charitable institutions; twenty-seven to aid educational enterprises; twenty-six for donations to libraries; twelve to buy inventions; thirteen for medical and hospital benefits; eighteen requests were that she should have embroidery or lace-work sold; a ring, a brooch, a Sevres vase were offered in exchange for money. Money to bring out music, books, etc.. was asked for. There were fifty-three requests for positions; thirty-two for interviews; eight for autographs. Since she began to send out this circular, the volume of her mail has decreased, for the statement is convincing evidence that the great-hearted mistress of Lyndhurst cannot possibly do all that is asked of her, however willing she may be.

Our Warship Visits Turkey

THE order for the battleship Kentucky to touch at Smyrna, Turkey, is of peculiar significance in view of the fact that since the controversy with the Turkish government over the Armenian claim became acute, American warships proceeding to and from the Philippines have by specific directions carefully avoided Turkish ports. The Kentucky left New York October 19, bound with all possible dispatch for Manila, and Smyrna was not her original itinerary. The order for her to pay a call of several days at Smyrna was wired to Naples to be delivered to Capt. C. M. Chester on his arrival there. The vessel is the most powerful of the navy, and a more impressive conveyor of our compliments to Turkey could not have been selected. It is to be hoped the moral effect upon Abdul Hamid will be wholesome. He has made several promises to pay the $90,000 due for the destruction of American property during the Armenian troubles, but always declined to set a date. On three separate occasions he has said to Oscar Straus, American Minister at Constantinople, that Turkey would meet her obligations in this matter. Afterwards, when told that Mr. Straus had made a statement to this effect, Abdul Hamid, with characteristic versatility, declared that Mr. Straus was mistaken if he had construed his expression of willingness to pay into admission of Turkey's responsibility for the destruction of American property in Armenia. Later, however, he acknowledged such liability to Lloyd C. Griscom, Charge d'Affaires in Mr. Straus' absence; since when, Mr. Griscom has made a practice of calling regularly every Saturday at the sublime Porte and presenting our claim.

Communion Wine

Mr. J. E. D., a reader in Hempstead, N. Y., writes:

DEAR EDITOR:—I have to-day read Dr. Talmage's article on the "Blood of the Grape," and I most heartily agree with him. Some twenty years ago the question was brought to the attention of the session of our church, and we then abolished the use of wine at the communion. No more will we be the means of our brother or sister stumbling. Sincerely do I hope every church will prayerfully decide to abolish wine and use the simple juice of the grape. God forbid that in the last great day any one should point the finger and say, "You caused me to fall."

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges: they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefitted by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

A CRY FROM THE OZARKS

WE commend this letter from a correspondent in the mountain district of Missouri, where he is laboring among a class who have very few religious privileges.

Dear Christian Herald Readers:

The writer is proud to be one of your great number, and proud of the grand work at home and abroad that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing. Several times since becoming one of its readers, the writer has thought, "Well, the paper has reached its limit this time and can never equal that great achievement;" but there seems no limit to its field and its work. How much suffering has been relieved by its grand work, and how much happiness awakened by its inspiring, cheerful pages, the world can never know. As an humble missionary for the American Sunday School Union, the writer would shout for joy if he could go among his people with an armful of CHRISTIAN HERALDS every week. The results of his work would be doubled and the people would much sooner become religious and self-supporting. He has found two thousand people in one section of the Ozarks without Sunday Schools, and with scarcely any religious reading or teaching of any kind. A copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was found in that section, like a ray of sunlight amid darkness.

It seems sometimes that too little missionary money is spent at home. It is doubtful if the same amount of money, spent anywhere else in the world, would bring greater results than if spent here, in the heart of our great nation.

The towns are all right and well provided for, but the people among the hills are poor, have few enjoyments, seldom see a stranger or a religious paper, and yet stand ready to welcome the Gospel. Any kind of good reading matter will be thankfully received by the writer. He will pray for one hundred CHRISTIAN HERALDS a week for the coming year and believes that through the generosity of readers, who will send their copies after they have read them, he will get his wish. Who will help God to answer his prayers?

J. W. MCKEAN,
Lebanon, Mo. S. S. Missionary.

Chinese Justice

ACCORDING to Chinese ideas, the sentences imposed by imperial edicts on "Ministers of state for having participated in and protected the Boxers and bandits in their recent movement," are, it is said, very severe. According to Occidental sense of justice, and in the opinion of the representatives of the Powers at Pekin, the Chinese government trifles with a grave situation in banishing Tuan to his own home, ordering for Chwang life imprisonment, which may not amount to much more; keeping Tsai Lien within closed doors, where he may reflect on his misdeeds; degrading Prince Yi, Secondary Prince Tsai Ying, and Ying Nien, who, like Tsai Lien, led or directed attacks on legations and Boxer operations, and in visiting Duke Lan with degradation and transference. A decidedly Oriental touch is given to the schedule of punishments when Chao Chi Chiao, President of Board of War, and commander of Boxer butcheries, is deprived of rank, but retained in office, while Kang Yi, who is dead, is pronounced the most vicious of all exalted personages involved! Upon Yu Hsien, former Governor of Shensi, falls the one penalty of consequence, deportation to the frontier, hard labor for life, and proviso that he shall never be pardoned. Yu personally assisted in the massacre of missionaries and other Christians. So, it may be claimed, did Tuan and Chwang, who, during the siege at Pekin, issued this order, and had it posted:

Whereas, the missionary chapels in Pekin have been burned, and the foreigners have no longer a place where they can hide, they have necessarily absconded from sight; therefore, this proclamation is issued to inform scholars, soldiers, the brave Boxers and commoners that if foreigners are caught hiding they will certainly suffer death by decapitation. If brought to us alive a reward of 50 taels will be paid for a man, 40 taels for a woman and 30 taels for a child. They must be alive when turned over to us, and when this is verified the reward will be immediately paid. Let all fear and none disregard this special proclamation.

New York's Tenements

New York's Tenement House Commission has just issued an exhaustive report. It contains a survey of all the legislation of former years dealing with the construction of such houses, the enactments requiring fire-escapes, the size of light and air-shafts, etc. Reformers in other States would do well to secure a copy of this useful compendium, which may suggest regulations that will improve the social conditions elsewhere.

THE GLORY OF CHRIST*

A Manifestation and Expression of the Personality of God . . . .

MANY readers have been puzzled by the method of introducing the fourth Gospel. What is the Word that is thus personified and deified? There is neither explanation nor apology for the use of the word, but an apparent assumption that readers would be familiar with the idea. Readers of that time, especially those who had studied the Alexandrian philosophy, were familiar with the idea. It is not so easily understood now. We get a clue to its meaning in the fourth chapter of the same Gospel, in which Christ is represented as declaring to the woman of Samaria that "God is a spirit." Trying to realize the meaning of that statement we perceive the difficulty of knowing him. As a spirit he must be invisible to mortal eyes and it is therefore difficult to conceive of him. We cannot tell what a pure spirit is. We understand the spirit in human form. We know well enough that it is not the mere flesh and bodily form of our friend that we love. Those are only his flesh and body, not our friend himself. If he were insane or dead, the body and flesh would not content us; we would feel that our friend was lost to us. It is his spirit, his personality, his character, that immaterial something in the flesh that we love.

Still, the presence of the body is necessary to our conception of our friend. It is through the body that he reveals himself to us. Especially by his words do we learn what he really is. Even in darkness, as he talks with us, we are in communion with him. So, the idea of words, as an expression or revelation of a man, came into vogue. It is this that is meant here. The old prophets had introduced their messages with, "The word of the Lord came unto me saying." These messages conveyed at long intervals and not always with authority, were the only means the people had of knowing God. Now there was to be a clearer revelation. This "Word of the Lord" which had reached them through seers and poets and prophets was to come to them in human form. "The Word was made flesh." The embodiment was new, but the Word embodied had been from the beginning. God had revealed himself in the creating of the worlds, in the imparting of life and light. His Word had been manifested in providence and in government, but the world had failed to grasp or comprehend it. It is not surprising that it failed, for the human cannot comprehend the Infinite. God would see now if men could comprehend in the same way that they understood one another—through the medium of the flesh.

But even so, as this Gospel will indicate, the Word was unrecognized and there is therefore need to show, by the introductory sentences, the true nature of that wonderful Being whose ministry is to follow. "We beheld his glory." It was necessary that some should do so, otherwise the revelation would have failed. If men had been set to imagine what a revelation of God would be like, they might have imagined some angelic, seraphic being with visible halo about him. But in that form his sphere of help must have been small. It would have differed little from the revelations that had gone before. Now, however, men were to see a human life transfigured and glorified. A man with a body like other men, subject to like conditions, entering a humble home, harassed and despised beyond the common lot, and ending in a violent and painful death; the world was to see what the Divine Word could be in such circumstances. This was real help. It showed what our natures might become, with divinity added. To make the incarnation all the more effective, the divine nature was retained that it might be imparted. Life and light, the two great needs of humanity, were in his gift. No mere man could live such a life as he lived. True, but what limits can be put to a nature to which he has given power to become "Sons of God!"

Racine Baths

Turkish, Vapor and Medical

A Racine folding bath cabinet means a Turkish bath room at home. It is a strong, double-walled room rubber-coated inside and outside and fitted with a door. Loosen two braces and tip it, and it folds like a screen into a 6-inch space.

Light the heater, close the door, and in three minutes the bath is ready. The heat is maintained at 150 degrees. For a vapor bath, pour a pint of water into the vaporizer. For a medical bath, put the proper drugs into the water. We furnish thirty-five prescriptions. The baths cost but three cents each. A face steamer, with breathing tube, goes on top.

The bath opens five million pores, cleansing the skin, purifying the blood, curing rheumatism, nervousness, sleeplessness and all blood diseases. Stops a cold in a minute. Keeps mind and body up to the highest vigor.

PATENTED.—We control, by patents, the four essential features in bath cabinets, without which no cabinet can be satisfactory.

SOLD ON APPROVAL.—We sell on approval, guaranteeing that the Racine is by far the best of all bath cabinets. Return at our expense, if not entirely satisfactory, and get your money back. Prices $5 up, freight or express prepaid; heater, vaporizer and face-steaming attachment included. Not sold in stores nor by agents. All discounts go to the user. Write to-day for catalogue.

THE LAUNDRY IN THE BETHESDA MISSION, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

RAISING · THE · FALLEN

HOW THE BETHESDA MISSION IN BROOKLYN IS RESCUING VICTIMS OF DEPRAVITY

At one of the meetings of the recent Conference of religions in New York, Dr. Crapsey, of Rochester, referred to the present crusade against vice in the city. "You are trying," he said, "to suppress vice with the policeman's club, and you will never do it. The only way to effectually deal with it is to convert it, and that is possible." Opening a bag he had with him, he produced a beautiful flower. "Where," he asked, "did this come from?" Producing a glass filled with soil, he reminded his hearers that that was the primal source of floral life. "And where did this soil come from? I gathered it from the gutter." It was from such vile conditions that the Magdalene and Augustine had come. The grace of God is not limited or restricted to good material; it transforms the material, and this is the only way that reform can really be effected. It is our duty to keep temptation out of the way of the young. We have the right to demand that vice shall not shamelessly flaunt itself in the face of decent people, and so far, reform and police interference are necessary; but the radical cure must come as Christianity has done all its work—by individual conversions. The man and the woman are not reformed when they are compelled by law to behave, but when their hearts are so changed that they voluntarily seek after righteousness.

A convincing proof of the soundness of this principle is furnished by the records of the Bethesda Mission in Brooklyn. The success of that Mission in dealing with the victims of vice is due to the fact that the workers are profoundly convinced that there is no sure basis for a change of life but a change of heart. Many women have gone there who had sunk so low that all who knew them had lost hope of their reclamation, yet through the grace of God they are now living pure lives. There has been no ostentation about the work, but one by one, women lost to hope and to God have been brought back to the path of virtue and through the power of Christ continue to this day.

The value of such work to city life cannot be estimated. Nor is it the city alone that benefits. Girls are drawn to the city from country districts by the glamor of excitement and gaiety. They hope to get employment, but failing, fall victims to the tempter. Then the old folks at home look longingly for the letters that never come and the daughter whom they loved is lost to them. Many such have the devoted workers at the Bethesda Mission found and rescued. Many a country home, through God's blessing on their efforts, has resounded with the glad cry that she who was dead is alive again.

Christians do not realize the value of such an institution, otherwise they would contribute more liberally to develop and extend its work. Workers are needed to go into the haunts of vice to offer help to the helpless; appliances are needed to furnish those who have no homes with the means of earning an honest livelihood; money is needed to provide the means of sending to their distant homes girls who have reformed, besides the ordinary unavoidable expenses of rent and food. At this time, when the law is being enforced against these women with unusual vigor, there is a rare opportunity for Christian work. Some of them are in their despair contemplating suicide, and a Christian invitation at this opportune moment might save lives, as well as souls. It is a pity that such an institution so sorely needed should not have the means of reaching thousands of these victims of sin, and telling them of him who came to call sinners to repentance. It is a glorious work, richly rewarded, and we may be quite sure very acceptable to our Lord. All who desire to share in it should send a contribution to its funds, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will gladly receive and acknowledge in its columns.

HOW CAN YOU DOUBT ITS MERIT when such prominent people as Rev. C. M. Keith, Editor "Holiness Advocate;" Congressman John J. Lentz; U. S. Senator, Hon. Chauncey M. Depew; C. H. Fargo, V-Pres't American Express Co.; Chas. Stoddard, of "Munsey's Magazine;" S. J. Raymond, U. S. Treas. Dep't, Washington; Alice B. Stockham, M.D., Chicago; and 1,000,000 others use and recommend it?

THOUSANDS OF PROMINENT PEOPLE PRAISE IT

John W. Pritchard, editor Christian Nation, New York City, writes: This Cabinet bath is refreshing and invigorating to a degree surprising, and is, in fact, "Tired Nature's Sweet Restorer."

W. L. Brown, bicycle dealer, Oxford, Ohio, says: My father was down in bed for months with rheumatism; this Cabinet did him more good than $50 worth of medicines.

Horatio Page, manager New York Weekly Witness and Sabbath Reading, writes: I most heartily endorse your Quaker Cabinet. It relieved a bad case of rheumatism with which I had been afflicted for years. It paid for itself in a week. Should be in every home.

Simon Tompkins, a retired capitalist of Columbus, Ohio, 1031 East Broad Street, says: I am satisfied it saved my life. I was down with a dangerous case of pneumonia, and its use promptly relieved me.

Wm. J. C. Dulaney, No. 8 East Baltimore Street, Baltimore, Md., publisher Methodist Protestant, writes: For lagrippe, rheumatism, kidney troubles, dropsy, skin diseases and had colds I believe the Quaker to be the best thing yet discovered. I use it weekly. Know many others who do and have yet to hear of one who does not praise its virtues. I write this because it has always met my expectations.

O. C. Smith, clerk board of health, Mount Healthy, Ohio, says: Since using this Cabinet my catarrh, asthma and other troubles, with which I have been afflicted for 20 years, have never returned. Worth $1,000 to me. I have sold 120 Cabinets, and many of my customers have cured lagrippe, measles, croup, kidney troubles, eczema, blood and skin diseases, diabetes; in fact, almost every ailment, and all are delighted with the Cabinet. My wife finds it excellent and invaluable for our children.

E. R. Blaine, manager Christian Standard, Cincinnati, says: I have seen nearly all the bath cabinets on the market and believe the Quaker to be superior to every other. No home is complete without it.

Rev. Fred. D. Hamilton, of Buffalo, says: This Cabinet did my wife more good in five weeks than three years of doctoring and a fortune spent at Hot Springs and health resorts. Relieved her of weakness, nervousness, as well as kidney troubles and dropsy, with which she had long suffered. It is a God-sent blessing to humanity.

Rev. H. C. Roernaes, Everett, Kansas, says: It is a blessing. Filled me with new life and vigor. Every family should have it.

Rev. J. C. Richardson, North Fifth Street, Roxbury, Mass., was greatly benefited, recommends its use, as also does Prof. R. E. P. Kline, of Ottawa University, who says: I find it a great benefit. D. C. Huys, St. Joseph, Mo., says: Physicians gave me up to die; was persuaded to try this Cabinet and it relieved me. Cannot praise it enough. Rev. Baker Smith, D.D., Fairmount, N. J., says: Your Cabinet rids the body of aches and pains, and as "cleanliness is next to godliness" it merits high recommendation. Prof. Aden, Ft. Thomas, Ky., says: No man with $5.00 in his pocket can afford to be without this grand invention. He owes it to his family and children.

HOMELESS ON CHRISTMAS EVE

In the beautiful home, the children
  Are happy around their tree;
But where, O Father in Heaven,
  Is a haven for baby and me?

Cold is the winter tempest,
  And the world is white with snow;
Christ, whom a mother cradled,
  Show me the way to go.

The child on my breast is sleeping,
  And somehow my heart is warm;
I am sure that the Child of Mary
  Will shield our heads in the storm.

4. If a husband discovers after marriage that his wife was guilty of wrong-doing before her marriage, though she has been blameless since, is he justified in seeking a divorce?
5. Is a tradesman justified in making a servant a present to induce her to obtain for him the custom of her employers?

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

Questions of the Week

1. Is a lawyer justified in defending a man whom he believes to be guilty?

Most assuredly. A lawyer is an officer of the court, and has no more right than has the judge or jury to refuse the accused a full and fair trial simply because he believes him guilty. His belief may be founded on very incomplete evidence, the weight of which a fair trial would disprove. Even if the accused be, in fact, guilty, there may still be extenuating circumstances which would mitigate the penalty, and which can only be brought out by a trained lawyer. Furthermore, when a repulsive crime has been committed, judge and jury may share the anger of the general public, and may inflict an excessive or unlawful punishment. Human liberty is only possible in a community where every man is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty, and where this presumption is maintained by capable lawyers. This by no means justifies the lawyer in resorting to dishonest means to clear his client. C. A. FOWLER.

2. What metaphor is employed to characterize false doctrine and wicked persons?

The metaphor of leaven. It is used to characterize false doctrine (Matt. 16:6), where Jesus cautions his disciples to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and the Sadducees. They indeed supposed the leaven of bread to be meant; but in the twelfth verse we have his own interpretation of the symbol as referring to false doctrine, which acts in minds as leaven in meal, assimilating all to its own nature. That of the Sadducees in particular was liable to infect the minds of the disciples with scepticism. Leaven is also used to characterize wicked persons, first in I. Cor. 5:7: "Purge out therefore the old leaven," meaning the "wicked person," verse 13, who was to be "put away" from the Corinthian church. AMELIA HOYT.

Correct answers have been received also from G. E. Krauth, Frederick C. Frese, Nettie Zimmer and Hubert Sarvis.

3. Who were called the "Bible moths?"

It was a nickname, originally applied to a society formed at Oxford, in 1729, by the two Wesleys and a few of their fellow students for purposes of mutual and moral improvement. Owing to their sincere desire to study God's Word and to know and to do his will, they were called "Bible moths" and "Bible bigots" by their worldly fellow students. Subsequently, when they were joined by Whitefield and the little society had grown into the large and flourishing denomination, they were called Methodists, also in derision, because they possessed the same characteristics, a zeal for good works and for Bible study. CHARLOTTE HORTON NEARING.

4. How was it that Paul did not know the high priest as he said (Acts 23: 5), though he must have had frequent occasion to see him before his conversion?

Several explanations of Paul's remark have been proposed by commentators: (1) Paul had been absent so long from Jerusalem (between twenty and thirty years), except for occasional short visits, and the high priest had been so frequently changed, that Paul spoke the literal truth. (2) Paul's dim eyesight prevented his recognizing who had spoken. (3) He spoke ironically, meaning that one who could give so harsh and cruel a command, "Smite him on the mouth" (verse 2), could surely not be the high priest, anointed of God! (4) "Ananias was not the high priest. He usurped the office. When Paul, therefore, 'Wist not that he was the high priest,' he declares a historical fact; for though his partisans and flatterers called him so, they could not invest him with the office." (Michaelis.) Yet the best and simplest interpretation seems to be that Paul, recognizing that he was wrong in so speaking, simply and truthfully confesses his error—he "wist not," that is, he had momentarily forgotten in the white heat of his anger that he spoke to the high priest. For (1), (3), (4) are merely suppositions, without special weight, while (2) is refuted by verse 3. G. E. KRAUTH.

5. What is the best method of dealing with people who are very easily offended at the slightest provocation—even unintentional—who are always on the lookout for trouble, and whose feelings are so sensitive and so easily hurt that it is almost impossible to get along with them?

One thing is supremely necessary to get along peaceably with such people—tact. Study them till you know them; then fit your conduct to their dispositions. If they are insulted, leave them alone for a while. Cyclones are not stationary, and storms of passion move on as do storms of wind, flood and lightning. When they are hurt, and even furious, do not fan or feed the devouring fire, but let it die for lack of fuel. Such people, when they cool down, will repent; for sensitive people are as much ashamed of their behavior, as they were angry at the behavior of others. After their fit, give them the same smile, handshake and cheery word, and in time they will return such kindness. R. T. EDWARDS.

6. Is a clergymen justified in omitting from the marriage ceremony the words pledging the wife to obey her husband?

Not unless he substitutes some other word of similar meaning which exacts a qualified pledge. Both in the Old Testament and the New, the wife is enjoined to obey her husband. (See Gen. 3:16; Eph. 5:22-24; I. Peter 3:5, 6). The wife is not bound to obey her husband when doing so involves disobeying God. It is not to be a blind mechanical obedience. Therefore the minister would be justified in qualifying the promise. But it should be clearly understood that the husband is to be the head of the household and his will must be supreme. If it were not so, and the wife happened to be a childish, frivolous woman, she might ruin him by extravagance. If he is a wise man he will give her his reasons and try to convince her that he is right, but if he fails, he should have the power, derived from the pledge she gave at her marriage, of saying, "This must or must not be done." This, I am persuaded, is the Scriptural view of marriage. A. C. SMITH.

He is certainly justified in omitting the word "obey," which is a relic of a barbaric, polygamous age, when woman was regarded as man's chattel and slave, over whom he exercised the absolute power of life and death, whom he kept in ignorance and seclusion, and to whom he even denied (if such were possible) the possession of a soul. Under all the old human laws and the old "civilizations," so called, the husband was lord and master, and, while holding the wife to the strictest fidelity, he was under no such restraints, and could take as many wives as he pleased and discard them when he pleased. The inequality was essentially brutal and barbaric. After the exile, the Jews began to hold a higher opinion of marriage, and certain rights were granted to the wife, the husband pledging himself to "work for her, honor her, maintain her and provide for her." He must "love her as himself, and honor her more than himself," under the rabbinical laws. If his own rank were higher, she rose with him; but if inferior to her, he remained so. The earliest book in the Bible points to complete equality of husband and wife (see Genesis 2:23-24). Christianity teaches that marriage is not a one-sided pact, but an equal and inseparable union, in which both are on the same plane as partners, socially, morally and legally, and without a thought or suggestion of the servile subjection of the woman to the man. Christianity has invoked the whole world to honor and dignify pure wifehood, and the tendency of our enlightened age is to accept woman as her Creator intended she should be accepted and as Christ himself reminded his disciples (Matt. 19:3-6) that such was the Divine purpose. The whole doctrine of woman's servitude is a man-made doctrine. She was never divinely commanded to "obey," in the sense of inequality or inferiority, but was called into being by the same omniscient power as an equal companion and helpmeet to man, of whose ruder nature her own is the refined and ideal counterpart. MARIA AYLMER.

7. Has a person a legal or a moral right to take the photo of another person by "snapshot" or otherwise, without the latter's consent?

It has been held by a court of high standing that there is a distinction between public and private characters, and that the moment one adopts a calling which invites publicity—as in the case of a public official, an artist or actor—he cannot complain if a fair portraiture of himself is taken, and even publicly displayed. But in all other cases the display of a portrait of any person is an invasion of the right of privacy, and may be enjoined or punished. I think no case has yet applied these principles to the taking of a snapshot or other picture without permission; but I have no doubt that the wrong is only less in degree. Otherwise the portraits of women and other persons who shrink from publicity might come into most undesirable hands. C. A. FOWLER.

8. Should the keeper of a drug store or hotel refuse to supply articles that are not necessaries on Sundays?

People get hungry and are liable to get sick on Sunday the same as on other days of the week, therefore the druggist and hotel-keeper must sell medicines and food on Sunday; but soda water, ice cream, etc., which are not necessaries, and cigars, which may be purchased on Saturday, should not be sold on Sunday. The right to sell a necessity does not carry with it the right to sell a luxury. F. A. BROWN.

9. Is a daughter, who lives at home with her parents, in moderate circumstances, and whose reasonable wants are supplied, justified in asking regular wages?

No, if her parents need her assistance, she should be willing to assist them without any compensation, except the clothing, food and other trifles with which her parents will supply her. If her parents are well-to-do and do not need the help of their daughter about the home, and, if she, for some reason wishes to support herself by labor, it would be perfectly right for her to receive wages from her parents, providing they had rather pay her than to have her work away from home. EDNA STEVENS.

No, for she will be given, in one way or another, her full share of the family income. She shares in all the luxuries and pleasures of the family, entertains her company, enjoys far greater liberties and privileges than a hired girl would have in the same home, is cared for in sickness, and should the income exceed the outgo, she will in time receive her share of that savings. She can often make some extra money for herself by needle-work, canvassing, raising poultry, etc. If she does not appreciate her home, let her try working for wages in some one else's home, and she will soon learn the difference between the two positions. F. A. BROWN.

10. In choosing a new minister for a church, should the fact that certain members contribute the greater part of the minister's salary be considered when they prefer one candidate and the poorer members another?

No; mere wealth, or position, or large contributions ought not to have any special influence in choosing a minister. To be sure, wealth has an insidious—it may be an unconscious—influence on most; but it ought not to have any specific or recognized influence in the election of a minister. This principle is recognized in theory at least, in that the rich man, like his poor neighbor, has but one vote. Of course when wealth is allied with character, it does seem to count; but the deference ought not to be paid to the wealth, but to the character with which it is associated. If there is to be any discrimination, as between the rich and the poor, in choosing a minister, it ought to be rather in favor of the poor, both because there are more of them to be ministered to, and because they need more sympathy and helpfulness. JOSEPH HAMILTON.

THE RICHEST YOUNG MAN IN AMERICA DEVOTES HIMSELF TO THE STUDY OF GOD'S WORD

IT was a dull November Sunday morning in New York, damp, gray and dismal. At 9:30 A.M.—an hour when most young people of wealth are still indoors and abed—a young man hurried down the steps of No. 4 West Fifty-fourth street and, with the light confident step of health and a purpose in life, turned down Fifth avenue. This was John D. Rockefeller, Jr., on his way to the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, where, perhaps, the largest young men's Bible class in the city meets every Sunday morning, under his leadership.

It began to rain. Like drops of ice-water the rain smote the young pedestrian, and he buttoned his frock-coat closely about him. Under that coat was a green flowered waistcoat, and beneath the waistcoat was a heart overflowing with love for humanity. His clothes were those of the New York man of fashion, the club-man, the handiwork of a good tailor, well-fitting, and worn with unconscious grace.

The Fifth Avenue Baptist Church is tucked in between private mansions in Forty-sixth street; no ostentation without, all simplicity within. At 9:40, Mr. Rockefeller entered the church and mounted the stairs to the gallery, where some fifty young men were gathered, awaiting him. He shook hands with the president of the class, who stood there greeting all comers, regular attendants and strangers alike, for a general invitation is extended to young men, and especially to strangers in the city, to join Mr. Rockefeller's class. It has a total enrolled membership of 125. The writer, unknown to any of the members, was greeted as a friend.

Mr. Rockefeller took his seat by the side of a small table, at the foot of the aisle, and at 9:45 A.M., the preliminary song service of fifteen minutes began with the hymn, "Tell Me the Old, Old Story," led by a trained male voice.

"I don't believe God cares whether we attend church or not," said Mr. Rockefeller in opening the meeting, "so long as we live the right kind of life. We ask no questions here—Are you a church-member? Where do you come from? What is your business? When we stand before the great throne none of these questions will be asked. Such things are of no account. The man who simply goes to church on Sunday and says: 'There, I've done my duty for the week,' falls short of the qualifications of a Christian as God defines them. The great and only question is, 'What kind of a daily life are you living?'"

At ten o'clock nearly every seat in the gallery was occupied, and the assemblage included men of various callings, trades and professions—clerks, railroad men, artisans, most of them wearing the ready-made clothing of wage-earners, their faces expressive of earnestness and minds turned toward the right. Among them were several gray-haired men. After a short prayer by the leader of the song service, the Superintendent of the Sunday School came in to ask for a dozen volunteers to take classes at the Chinese Mission supported by this church at 17 Doyer street. Mr. Rockefeller indorsed the Superintendent's plea, saying: "I worked for a year or two in the Chinese Mission, and from personal experience, I assure you that no people so greatly appreciate the attention of Christians as the Chinese in this city, which is probably true of all the sons of the Celestial Empire in this country. It is true that sometimes young women take classes in the Mission with a view to marrying a well-to-do Chinaman, but we have weeded out all such teachers, as well as young men who were not competent to teach the Word. Now the Mission needs a number of trained workers. If we merely meet here once a week, if we fail to put our study of the Bible to practical use, we accomplish almost nothing. I hope a dozen of you young men will volunteer to-day to carry to the denizens of the Chinese quarter that which you have learned here. Glance your eye over the congregation at the service to-day in this church, and you will see a number of Chinese, bright, intelligent young men, all members of the church as the result of our labors at the Mission."

MR. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR., CONDUCTING HIS BIBLE CLASS IN THE FIFTH AVE. BAPTIST CHURCH
Sketched from life by a CHRISTIAN HERALD artist

Not even the worldliest man, the sceptic, could doubt the sincerity of the young leader. As he spoke, he himself crushed the barrier of riches, and stood among the members of the class as a brother among brothers. His voice was clear and well modulated. His vocabulary bespoke one not long out of college, but his delivery had all the eloquence of earnestness. In his manner there was the modesty and gentleness of the educated gentleman and the true Christian. Tall, very slight of form, with a pale, clean shaven face, blond hair, and the general appearance of refinement, he easily commanded the attention of the class. His fingers are long, suggestive of artistic tastes, but they are blunt and broad at tips, the sure sign of a worker in the practical field of business. He wears glasses, but behind them are small alert gray eyes, with drooping lids, indicative of a man of figures, and of the shrewdness that necessarily accompanies a commercial temperament.

The leader announced the lesson for the day, number forty-two in the course, the class having undertaken consecutive study of the Book, forty-two Sundays ago, when Mr. Rockefeller took the leadership. The subject was Josiah, the last reformer in Judah, from II. Kings, twenty-second chapter. The leader analyzed the subject, beginning with the character of Josiah's reign, and continuing with the repair of the temple, the finding of the Book of Law, and the great reformation effected by reading the Book to the people. Then followed a general discussion of the topic.

"Why is it," asked Mr. Rockefeller, "that the reformations of Josiah's reign, and indeed many great reformations since, were not lasting?"

"Because a reformation, to be enduring, must be a reformation in conscience," said a young man who sat near the leader.

"Because most reformations we read about carried things to extremes—like Puritanism, for instance," said another member.

"Because the reformations were too sudden—expected too much too soon; because people need time to be educated up to a new way of thinking and living," said a third man.

"I think you have all three hit the nail on the head," said Mr. Rockefeller. "To bring about a reformation people need time for natural growth, to throw off the old and take on the new. Unless a man is reformed in his conscience he is not a new man. Mere outward change is reform only in appearance."

The speaker then cited the difference between worship according to prescribed form and simple worship devoid of formality. "Some people can worship best in church, amid formal surroundings; others find they get closer to God in the fields and woods. But, as I said before, it doesn't matter where a man worships, so long as he has the spirit of Jesus Christ within him. I believe that the reformation of the world depends not at all upon grand churches, and ceremony and form, but upon individual effort, man to man, brother to brother. When a church surrounds worship with too much ritual, the object of religion is defeated; just as a man who, thinking to keep his body warm, puts on too many clothes, stops the circulation of the blood, and finds his health in a short time impaired."

Mr. Rockefeller concluded with the golden text: "Obey my voice . . . so shall ye be my people, and I will be your God." "To find the light of God," he said, "we must think high, keep our thoughts aloft. Let our thoughts drop to the sordid, the material, the merely worldly, and we forget God. I remember, while recently traveling in Norway, the land of the midnight sun, I had not seen the sun set for six nights. Then our ship put southward, and one night as we entered harbor I thought, 'To-night the sun will sink from our sight.' But atop of a mountain I saw light, and I said, 'If we climb up there, we shall still see the sun.' We started up the mountain, and when we reached the top, we found there was a loftier peak beyond. One companion remained behind, and two of us climbed to the top of the second mountain, when again we found we had not reached the sun, as there was still a loftier peak. My friend left me, and I climbed alone to the top of this third peak, and there, at midnight, I found the sun. Thus in life, if we think aloft, there we will find the light of God."

The meeting closed in time for church service at eleven, Mr. Rockefeller standing by the door and shaking hands with the young men as they passed out. He had a pleasant word for all, addressing each by name and asking each to come again. Then he went to his pew in the body of the church and knelt a moment in silent prayer.

The Christian Herald in the Philippines.

From Palo, Leyte, P. I., comes the following letter:

I take the liberty of thanking you for copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I assure you they are appreciated very much, not only by myself, but by any of the boys lucky enough to get them. The Gospel can, at the present writing, be only preached to the soldiers, as it is not safe to go into the country. Almost ninety per cent. of the natives are Catholic. But it is now only a matter of a few months when peace will be restored and no doubt many will be brought in to the fold. I will be thankful for any good reading matter you send, not only on my part, but that of the boys.

International Comparison

...A NEW SERMON BY...

REV. T. DEWITT TALMAGE, D.D.

TEXTS: { REV. 21: 13: On the South three gates; PSALM 147: 20: He hath not dealt so with any nation

AMONG the greatest needs of our country is more gratitude to God for the unparalleled prosperity bestowed upon us. One of my texts calls us to international comparison. What nation on all the planet has of late had such enlargement of commercial opportunity as is now opening before this nation? Cuba and Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands brought into close contact with us, and through steamship subsidy and Nicaragua Canal, which will surely be afforded by Congress, all the republics of South America will be brought into most active trade with the United States. "On the South three gates." While our next door neighbors, the southern republics and neighboring colonies, imported from European countries three thousand miles away, six hundred and seventy-five million dollars' worth of goods in a year, only one hundred and twenty-six million dollars' worth went from the United States—one hundred and twenty-six million out of six hundred and seventy-five million dollars, only one-fifth of the trade ours, European nations taking the four fingers and leaving us the poor thumb. Now all this is to be changed. There is nothing but a comparative ferry between the islands which have recently come under our protection, and only a ferry between us and Bolivia, Peru, Paraguay, Uraguay, Venezuela, Salvador, Nicaragua, Colombia, Costa Rica, Equador, Brazil, while there are raging seas and long voyage between them and Europe. By the mandate of the United States, all that will be changed through of transportation. The Hispano-American congress just closed at Madrid will fail in its attempt to divert all the trade of South America from us to Europe. What encouraging symptoms that our trade with Cuba and Porto Rico has been quadrupled! But that is only a prophecy. "On the South three gates," yea! a hundred gates.

New Facilities

In anticipation of what is sure to come, I nail on the front door of this nation an advertisement:

WANTED: One hundred thousand men to build railroads through South America and the islands of the sea under our protection.

WANTED: A thousand telegraph operators.

WANTED: One hundred million dollars' worth of dry goods from the great cities of the United States.

WANTED: All the clocks you can make at New Haven, and all the brains you can spare from Boston, and all the bells you can mould at Troy, and all the McCormick reapers you can fashion at Chicago, and all the hams you can turn out at Cincinnati, and all the railroad iron you can send from Pittsburg, and all the statesmen that you can spare from Washington.

WANTED: Right away, wanted by new and swifter steamers, wanted by railtrain, lawyers to plead our causes.

WANTED: Doctors to cure our sick.

WANTED: Ministers to evangelize our population.

WANTED: Professors to establish our universities.

"On the South, three gates," yea! a thousand gates. South America and all the islands of the sea approximate are rightfully our commercial domain, and the Congress of the United States will see to it that we get what belongs to us.

And then tides of travel will be somewhat diverted from Europe to our islands at the South and to the land of the Aztecs. Much of the 125 million dollars yearly expended by Americans in Europe will be expended in southern exploration, in looking at some of the ruins of the forty-seven cities which Stephens found only a little way apart, and in walking through the great doorways and over the miracles of mosaic, and along by the monumental glories of another civilization, and ancient America will with cold lips of stone, kiss the warm lips of modern America, and to have seen the Andes and Popocatepetl, will be deemed as important as to have seen the Alpine and Balkan ranges. And there will be fewer people spoiled by foreign travel, and in our midst less of the poor and nauseating imitation of the French shrug and the intentional hesitancy of a brainless foreign swell. The fact is that many are made vain by European travel, and though sensible when they embarked, they return with a collar and a cravat, and a shoe and a coat, and a pronunciation and a contempt for American institutions, and the bend of the elbow that makes one believe in evolution backward from man to ape. Of the many thousands who now cross the sea annually, thousands will on pleasure and business visit southern lands, and so tourists, and merchants, and scientists, and capitalists will all help in this

National Development

There are "On the South three gates." And what other nation has such openings for commercial enlargement as ours?

Again, in this international comparison notice the happy condition of our country as compared with most countries. Russia under the shadow of the dreadful illness of her great and good Emperor, who now, more than any man in all the world, represents "peace on earth, good will to men," and whose Empress, near the most solemn hour that ever comes to a woman's soul, is anxious for him to whom she has given hand and heart, not for political reasons, but through old-fashioned love such as blesses our humbler dwellings. India under the agonies of a famine which, though somewhat lifted, has filled hundreds of thousands of graves and thrown millions into orphanage. Austria only waiting for her genial Francis Joseph to die, so as to let Hungary rise in rebellion and make the palace of Vienna quake with insurrection. Spain in Carlist revolution, and pauperized as seldom any nation has been pauperized. Italy under the horrors of her King's assassination. China shuddering with a fear of dismemberment, her capital in possession of foreign nations. After a review of the condition in other lands, can you find a more appropriate utterance in regard to our country than the exclamation of the text, "He hath not dealt so with any nation!"

Compare the autumnal report of harvests in America this year and the harvests abroad. Last summer I crossed the Continent of Europe twice, and I saw no such harvests as are spoken of in this statement. Hear it! all you men and women who want everybody to have enough to eat and wear. I have to tell you that the corn crop of our country this year is one of the four

Largest Crops on Record

2,105 million bushels. The cotton crop, though smaller than at sometimes, will on that account bring bigger prices, and so cotton planters of the South are prosperous. The wheat fields have provided bread enough and to spare. The potato crop one of the five largest crops on record—211 million bushels. Twenty-two million two hundred thousand swine slain, and yet so many hogs left!

But now I give you the comparative exports and imports, which tell the story of national prosperity as nothing else can. Excess of exports over imports, $544,400,000. Now, let all pessimists hide themselves in the dens and caves of the earth, while all grateful souls fill the churches with doxology. Notice, also, that while other countries are at their wits' ends as to their finances, this nation has money to lend. "Germany, we are glad to see you in Wall street. If you must borrow money, we have it all ready. How much will you have? Russia, we also welcome you into

Our Money Markets

Give us collateral. Meanwhile, Denmark, will you please accept our offer of $3,000,000 for the island of St. Thomas." My hearers, there is no nation on earth with such healthy condition of finances. We wickedly waste an awful amount of money in this country, but some one has said it is easier to manage a surplus than a deficit.

Beside all this, not a disturbance from St. Lawrence River to Key West, or from Highlands of New Jersey to Golden Horn of the Pacific. Sectional controversies ended. The North and the South brought into complete accord by the Spanish war, which put the Lees and the Grants on the same side, Vermonters and Georgians in the same brigade. And since our Civil War we are all mixed up. Southern men have married Northern wives, and Northern men have married Southern wives, and your children are half Mississippian and half New Englander; and to make another division between the North and the South possible, you would have to do with your child as Solomon proposed with the child brought before him for judgment—divide it with the sword, giving half to the North and half to the South. No; there is nothing so hard to split as a cradle. In other lands there is compulsory marriage of royal families, some bright princess compelled to marry some disagreeable foreign dignitary in order to keep the balance of political power in Europe, the illy-matched pair fighting out on a small scale that which would have been an international contest, sometimes the husband having the balance of power and sometimes the wife.

Plenty of Room

Beside this, we have in our country plenty of room, while the trans-Atlantic nations are crowded—crowded cities, crowded governments, crowded learned institutions; the population crowded, packed in between the Pyrenees and the Alps, packed in between the English Channel and the Adriatic. Yes, on our continent plenty of room. Eight million square miles in North America, and all but one-seventh capable of rich cultivation, implying what fertility and commerce. Four basins pouring their waters into the Atlantic, Pacific, Arctic, and Gulf of Mexico. When I hear a man expressing the fear that this country is going to be crowded, I know right away he has not been to Texas. France has about 59,000,000 of people, but Texas is larger than France. Germany about 67,000,000 of people, but Texas is larger than Germany.

Again, in this international comparison there is not a land whose wages and salaries are so large for the great mass of the people. In India four cents a day and find yourself is good wages. In Ireland, in some parts, eight cents a day for wages. In England, $1 a day, good wages, vast populations not getting as much as that. In other lands, 50 cents a day and 25 cents a day, clear on down to starvation and squalor. Look at the great populations coming out of the factories of other lands, and accompany them to their homes, and see what privations the hard-working classes on the other side of the sea suffer. The laboring classes in America are ten per cent. better off than those in any other country under the sun—twenty per cent., forty per cent., fifty per cent. The toilers of hand and foot have better homes, and better furnished. "How much wages do you get?" is a question I have asked in Calcutta, in St. Petersburg, in Berlin, in Stockholm, in London, in Paris, in Auckland, New Zealand, in Sydney, Australia, in Samoa, in the Sandwich Islands; so I am not talking an abstraction. The stonemasons and carpenters and plumbers and mechanics and artisans of all kinds in America have finer residences than the majority of professional men in Europe. You enter the laborer's house on our side of the sea, and you find upholstery and pictures and instruments of music. His children are educated at the best schools. His life is insured, so that in case of sudden demise his family shall not be homeless. Let all American workmen know that, while their wages may not be as high as they would like to have them, America is the paradise of industry.

Political Conditions

Again, there is no land on earth where the political condition is so satisfactory as in ours. Every two years in the State, and every four years in the nation we clean house. After a vehement expression of the people at the ballot-box in the autumnal election they all seem satisfied, and if they are not satisfied, at any rate they smile. An Englishman asked me in an English railtrain this question: "How do you people stand it in America with a revolution every four years? Would it not be better, like us, to have a Queen for a lifetime, and everything settled?" But England changes government just as certainly as we do. At some adverse vote in Parliament, out goes one party and in comes another. Administrations change there, but not as advantageously as with us, for there they may change almost any day, while with us a party in power continues in power at least four years.

Again, the monopolistic oppression is less in America than anywhere else. The air is full of protest because great houses, great companies, great individuals are building such over-towering fortunes. Stephen Girard and John Jacob Astor, stared at in their time for their august fortunes, would not now be pointed at in the streets of Washington or Philadelphia or New York as anything remarkable. These vast fortunes for some imply pinchedness, of want for others. A growing protuberance on a man's head implies illness of the whole body. These estates of disproportionate size weaken all the body-politic. But the evil is nothing with us compared with the abroad. Just look at the ecclesiastical establishments on the other side the sea. Look at those great cathedrals, built at fabulous expense and supported by ecclesiastical machinery, and sometimes in an audience room that would hold a thousand people twenty or thirty people gather for worship. The Pope's income is $8,000,000 a year. Cathedrals of statuary and braided arch and walls covered with masterpieces of Rubens and Raphael and Michael Angelo. Against all the walls dash seas of poverty and crime and filth and abomination.

The majority of the people of the United States are on their way to fortunes. They will either be rich themselves, or their children will be rich. If I should put to some men the question, "Would you have a fortune and let your children struggle all through their lives in the same kind of struggle that you have had to make?" scores of men would say, "I am willing to fight this battle all the way through, but give my children a chance. I do not care so much about myself. It is only for ten or twenty years anyhow. Give my children a chance." If there is anything that stirs my admiration, it is a man, without any education himself, sending his sons to college, and, without any opportunity for luxury himself, resolved that though he shall have it hard all the days of his life, his children shall have a good start. And I tell you that though some of our people may have great commercial struggles, there is going to be a great opening for their sons and daughters as they come on to take their places in the world.

Climatic Variety

Continuing this international comparison, I have to say to you that we have a better climate than is to be found in any other nation. We do not suffer from anything like the Scotch mists, or the English fogs, or the Russian ice-blast, or the typhus of Southern Europe, or the Asiatic cholera. Epidemics in America are exceptional, very exceptional. Plenty of wood and coal to make a roaring fire midwinter. Easy access to sea beach, or mountain-top when the ardors of summer come down. Michigan wheat for the bread. Long Island corn for the meal. Carolina rice for the queen of puddings. Louisiana sugar to sweeten our beverages. Georgia cotton to keep us warm. In our land all products and all climates. Are your nerves weak? Go North. Is your throat delicate? Go South. Do you feel crowded, and want more room? Go West. I declare it: This is the best country in all the world to live in. How do I know it? I have 650,000 new reasons for saying it; 650,000 people in one year came from the other side of the Atlantic to live in America, and they came because it is the very best country to live in.

While making this international comparison let us look forward to the time which will surely come when all nations will have as great advantages as our own. As surely as the Bible is true, the whole earth is to be gardenized and set free. Even the climates will change and the heats be cooled, and the frigidity warmed.

A National Calamity

Many years ago in this city I gazed upon a scene which for calamity and grandeur one seldom sees equalled. I mean the burning of the Smithsonian Institution. It was the pride of our country. In it art had gathered rarest specimens from all lands and countries. It was one of those buildings which seize you with enchantment as you enter, and all the rest of your life holds you with a charm. I happened to see the first glow of the fires which on that cold day looked out from the windows of the costly pile. I saw the angry elements rear and rave. The shout of affrightened workmen and the assault of fire-engines only seemed to madden the rage of the monsters that rose up to devour all that came within reach of their chain. Up along the walls and through the doors were pushed hands that snatched down all they could reach and hurled it into the abyss of flame beneath. The windows of the tower would light up for a minute with a wild glare and then darken. With crackle and roar and crash the floors tumbled. The roofs began here and there to blossom in wreaths and vines of flame. Up and down the pillars ran serpents of fire. Out from the windows great arms and fingers of flame were extended, as though destroyed spirits were begging for deliverance. The tower put on a coronet of flame and staggered and fell, the sparks flying, the firemen escaping, the terror accumulating. Books, maps, rare correspondence, autographs of kings, costly diagrams burned to cinder or scattered for many a rood upon the wild wind, to be picked up by the excited multitude. Oh, it seemed like some great funeral pile in which the wealth and glory of our land had leaped to burn with its consuming treasures. The heavens were blackened with whirlwinds of smoke, through which shot the long red shafts of calamity. Destruction waved its fiery banner from the remaining towers, and in the thunder of falling beams and in the roaring surge of billowing fire I heard the spirits of ruin and desolation and woe clapping their hands, and shouting, "Aha! aha!"

Things that Endure

I turned and looked upon the white dome of yonder Capitol, which rose through the frosty air as imposing as though all the white marble of the earth had come to resurrection and stood before us, reminding one of the Great White Throne of heaven. There it stood, unmoved by the terrors which that day had been kindled before it. No tremor in its majestic columns. Column and capital and dome built to endure until the world itself shatters in the convulsions of the last earthquake. Oh, what a contrast between the smoking ruin on the one hand and that gorgeous dream of architecture on the other! Well, the day speeds on when the grandest achievement of man will be consumed and the world will blaze. Down will go galleries of art and thrones of royalty, and the hurricane of God's power will scatter even the ashes of consumed greatness and glory. Not one tower left; not one city unconsumed; not one scene of grandeur to relieve the desolation. Forests dismasted. Seas licked up. Continents sunk. Hemispheres annihilated. Oh, the roar and thundering crash of that last conflagration! But from that ruin of a blazing earth we shall look up to see the temple of liberty and justice rising through the ages, white, and pure, and grand, unscarred and unshaken. Founded on the eternal rock, and swelling into domes of infinitude and glory, in which the hallelujahs of heaven have their reverberation. No flame of human hate shall blacken its walls. No thunder of infernal wrath shall rock its foundations. By the upheld torches of burning worlds we shall read it on column and architrave and throne of eternal dominion, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but truth and liberty and justice shall never pass away."

The Salvation Army's New Industrial Home for Women

CLASH of cymbals, sound of cornet, and gay fluttering of red, white and blue banners and streamers, marked the opening of the Salvation Army's new Industrial Home for Women. This institution, at 127 W. Thirteenth st., has direct communication with the building on Fourteenth st., known as the Salvation Army Headquarters in New York. The opening ceremonial, held in Memorial Hall in the Headquarters, while the bazaar in the interests of the Prairie Homes for Children was in progress, was, by reason of the time and occasion, a peculiarly bright and picturesque function. The hall was gay with pretty booths, garlanded in red and white; at dainty tables tidy lassies, in red and blue uniforms, were ready to wait on hungry guests; while about the room wee soldiers, wearing the army red and blue, roamed at will. Mrs. Russell Sage, Miss Helen Gould, and a large number of prominent and influential people gave countenance to the occasion by presence, note, or check; for it is felt that the opening of this Industrial Home is a movement in the right direction. On the afternoon preceding, a large audience of earnest, cultivated people had gathered at the beautiful and hospitable home of Mrs. Billings, on Madison avenue, and listened with profound interest to an address by Consul Booth-Tucker, in which the rescue work of the army, which has led up to this Industrial Home, was eloquently described.

The Industrial Home is a home for fallen, or rather, for reclaimed women. It is to be operated in connection with the rescue home on Fifteenth street; and only those women who have proved themselves able to stand, are to be admitted. Work is to be provided—book-binding, dressmaking, plain sewing, laundry work; and any and every industry in which an honest living can be made, will be placed as far as possible in reach of those who have demonstrated sincere return to reform.

"We expect to establish similar homes to this all over the country in connection with our other rescue homes," said Consul Booth-Tucker, as she conducted THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representative through the big, cozy dwelling on Thirteenth street. "Our accommodations here at present are for fifty to sixty girls; at the home on Fifteenth street for thirty—but we never have less than forty; beds have to be made on the floor. We have altogether nineteen American rescue homes through which 1,100 girls pass annually. Of this great body of women whom we have sheltered more than 80 per cent. are leading lives of purity and usefulness. Adjutant Welsh is in charge here. You must hear her tell how this room received its name." The dormitory in which the Consul paused gleamed with snowy beds; pretty Bible texts and pictures were on the wall; everything here, as elsewhere in the building, was exquisitely clean, simple and homelike; on the door, in big, bright lettering, were the words "Not in Vain."

WORKROOM OF THE SALVATION ARMY'S NEW YORK INDUSTRIAL HOME

"These were Sadie's last words," said the motherly adjutant. "Sadie was one of our brightest and best converts, but her health was broken and she did not live long. From St. Luke's Hospital, where we had placed her, this telegram came one night: 'Adjutant, hasten. Sadie.' I reached her bed in time to hear her say: 'Adjutant, you can depend upon one of your girls to meet you in heaven. Tell the Army so. Your labor has not been in vain.' We thought it would encourage us to see those words on this door. The next night this telegram came from another hospital: 'Come quickly, R. wants you. She is dying.' Over the bed of this poor child of sin I bent to hear her whisper: 'I am ready to meet my God.' This dormitory," continued the Adjutant, as we entered a doorway on which shone the words, "For His Sake," "was furnished by some young ladies in Brooklyn, who worked and made the money, and this—" it was a cheery, bright sitting-room, with "Out of Love" on the door, "is the gift of our Out of Love League, which is made up of girls who have graduated from our rescue homes into wage-earning positions. Every girl who contributed to this room is in domestic service. The 'Grace' room, is the gift of Miss Grace Dodge."

At Mrs. Billings', Consul Booth had related this incident: "At the hospital gate a mother of fifteen stood with a little bundle in her arms that, slight as it was, was too heavy for her feeble strength. In the big city she had none to turn to for help, and she did not know how to turn to God. She tried to get employment, walking all day over the city. Telling me afterward, she said: 'It seemed wherever I rang, they just took one look at the baby and slammed the door in my face.' A wretched woman of the street said: 'Throw the baby in the river.' She had no thought of doing that—but she drifted to the river, and said to herself: 'If I jump in, it will be all over with baby and me so quick.' Just then, she heard voices singing: 'Jesus loves the broken-hearted.' A Salvation Army band was coming. 'I'll wait till they pass,' thought the girl, 'then I'll do it.' They didn't pass; they stopped to hold their regular open-air meeting by the water. They saw the shrinking girl-mother and her burden, and they brought her home with them. She is now restored to father and mother, and is a Christian."

AT THE SIGN OF THE BLUE TIGER

BY MARY C. FRANCIS

CHAPTER I.

A NUMBER of the good people of Belle Centre came out of the church where the prayer-meeting had just ended, and parted on their several homeward ways. In the vestibule lingered still a few of the elder men. "Yes, it's all as you say, Brother Fielding, but you know as well as I do that the liquor element has ruled this town so long that it would take nothing short of a revolution to change the order of things. In our State, with prohibition possible under our laws, we should long ago have done away with both the drinking and gambling that are disgracing our town. But the leaders will not take it up and there you are—there is simply no one else to do it."

"I'm not so sure of that, brother," said a clear woman's voice behind them. The men turned, and saw Mrs. Travers, the wife of one of the leading men of the town. "You say there is no one else to take this matter up, but we have the right of the ballot here in Kansas, and perhaps the day may soon come when we will take up the fight and see what we can do."

"Well, you'll have my God-speed, sister, when you do," was the hearty response. "Anything so that we can get rid of this blight on us."

Half seriously, half jestingly, the conversation was continued for a few minutes, and then Mrs. Travers started for her home alone. As she walked through the crisp starlight a deep pain, the pain of many years, tugged furiously at her heart, and made even her brave spirit feel sick. At a corner that led down one of the main streets she paused, half in indecision. Should she walk by the Blue Tiger on her way home, as she had so often done before? Those who passed her on these midnight vigils kept reverent silence; never was vigil more pathetic, for it was that of a mother over a son. Joe Travers, her eldest born, was the proprietor of the Blue Tiger, the leading saloon in the town.

"MRS. TRAVERS OFFERED A CUP OF COFFEE TO HER SON"

She hesitated now for an instant, then with a firm step turned down the street and approached the saloon. From within came the ribald sounds that marked the evening's revelry. Opposite the door a stream of light shot with distinctness out on the sidewalk, and a child, a girl of about twelve, hurried out sobbing, followed by a rough voice saying, "Go home now; and don't dare come here again."

As she started her trembling little feet into a faltering run, she stumbled against Mrs. Travers. She caught her in her arms.

"There, dear, don't cry. I will go home with you and tell you some nice stories."

"O, Mrs. Travers," sobbed the child, "why isn't everybody good and kind like you! My papa used to be so nice to me, and he is yet when he's sober, but he will drink. Mrs. Travers——"

"Well, dear?"

"Mrs. Travers, if—if I was Joe Travers and you was my mother—you won't be angry, will you? I wouldn't sell any liquor. O, don't cry. Don't cry! My mama's dead, you know, and you've seemed almost like a mama to me for a long time. Please don't cry."

"No; I won't cry any more. You must try to make the best of it, and even if your papa drinks you must not hate him. He is like—like my Joe—he is always good when he is sober. Men who drink have a disease, an awful disease that is moral, and they do not know what they are doing."

An hour later, Jessie Calvin lay asleep, a peaceful smile playing about her mouth. Mrs. Travers went home, but ere she reached it she had resolved that the women of Belle Centre must go into the fight and forever remove the saloons.

Never in its history had Belle Centre known such a campaign. Long before it ended, its fame had spread throughout the state, and even beyond its confines, and its unique features were praised, lampooned, discussed, ridiculed and admired in every newspaper, far and wide. But amid the storm of argument pro and con, one thing remained indisputable, and that was that the departure, though it might be scoffed at, could not be ignored.

Led by Mrs. Travers, the women's ticket in the field was a strong one; she herself had been overwhelmingly named for mayor, and she was supported by a judicious choice from among the best and most influential women of the town for council and city clerk. Mothers, wives, sisters and sweethearts turned every energy toward attaining their end, and plied not only the politicians' arguments but every feminine cajolement known to the daughters of Eve. This keynote had been struck early in the campaign by Mrs. Travers: "We cannot force them; we must win them," she said. "Remember that not one harsh word must be spoken by us. We must conquer by moral power, by logic and argument where we can and by softer persuasions in cases where they are applicable. And further, every man in this town must be approached and carefully dealt with according to his special need; not one must be neglected, nor must he be given up until the last hour. Above all, this must be a campaign of education, especially for the younger element; and, finally, sisters, we must expect ridicule, cartooning; we must expect to be laughed at, to be scoffed, and have the finger of scorn pointed at us, and we must make up our minds to take all these things as a matter of course."

Within a few weeks the support they had succeeded in getting pledged to them from Republicans and Democrats made it evident that it would be folly to have three tickets in the field. Meanwhile, the liquor element, led by Joe Travers, was becoming more and more solidified, and it was announced that he would be the candidate for mayor in behalf of the saloons. The situation this developed of mother and son opposing one another in a political contest capped the climax of the excitement that now raged. By universal consent of the Republican leaders it was conceded that mere party lines could have no place in such a struggle, and that the issue of the election should be left solely between the "wets" and the "drys."

The methods pursued by the women considerably annoyed their antagonists. Old and confirmed "sots" who had ornamented barrel tops in front of corner groceries for years, or who had been regarded as permanent bric-a-brac on the edge of the sidewalk outside of the livery stable, were threatened with nervous prostration by being suddenly addressed as "Mr.", followed up by alluring arguments calculated to induce the belief in him that he was robbing society of a valuable ornament in his present career, and intimating that his vote at the coming election would probably change the entire current of history of Belle Centre.

But this was but one side of the women's work. They distributed temperance literature, bright, catchy and up-to-date, sound in principle and devoid of ranting denunciations; they opened two cheap coffee rooms and one free one, where, night and day, clean, wholesome women relieved each other in attendance, and along with the steaming beverage, strong fragrant and rich, they dispensed bright smiles and kind words, inquired after sick wives and children, and then went quietly and provided shoeless and tattered children with clothes, sent them to school, gave the poor, discouraged mothers work, and cheerily said to everyone: "This is just to show you what we will do if you give us a chance. This is an object-lesson of our platform; elect us, and we will give you an administration like this."

Hotter and hotter grew the contest as the day of election drew nearer.

Epithets had multiplied as the campaign progressed, and the women's ticket was variously alluded to as "The Mamma Ticket," "The Broomstick Brigade," "The Soda-Water Bottles," "The Apron-Strings," and other complimentary names, all of which the women accepted without a show of resentment.

CHAPTER II.

The evening of the day before the election had arrived. Joe Travers was alone in the small, dark room in the rear of his saloon, where he took his meals, when, without so much as a tap, the door was quietly pushed open, and, to his astonishment, his mother entered.

He rose to his feet, half confused, and pushed a chair toward her. She sat down without removing her eyes from him, and then, leaning across the bare table, guiltless of any grace of adornment, she said, looking him straight in the eyes: "Joe, you have been away from home for twenty years.

"In all these years I have not made even the smallest request of you. O Joe, do you remember the last time I asked you to do anything for me at home? You had come in from school, and as you threw your books down on the table I asked you to bring in some kindling-wood for the supper fire, and you pushed your hat back from your warm, flushed face, and said: 'Why, yes, Mamsey, I'll get you supper wood and a horse and buggy, and the sun, moon and stars yet.'

"I can see you still as you stood on the back porch with the setting sun flickering through the lattice of the morning-glories on your head and face, and then you went out whistling into the wood-house, and you whistled as you chopped the wood. Joe! Joe! Do you remember? And then, an hour later, the quarrel with your father—and then all these years—and now——"

Her anguished voice quivered into silence; her proud head bowed, and through the trembling stockade of her fingers Joe Travers saw the great tears fall unchecked. All the brute force of his nature slunk away, and only a shamed, agitated sense filled him with ineffectual confusion. She raised her head and spoke again, a faint flush showing through the still smooth ivory of her skin: "I have never told you, Joe, but the last of that wood is still in the big box with the cover—I have never used it. Oh, how many times since then, as I moved about getting supper, have I thought I heard you whistling in the wood-shed, and every time I have looked at that wood in the box I have said to myself, 'He will come home some day.'"

Joe Travers felt a strange tightening in his chest. His breath did not seem to get much further than his throat.

"Well, it's no good talking about all this now. I guess it's too late to change things very much at this stage of the game. I can't very well bring in kindling-wood for you any more." He laughed awkwardly. "But you said awhile ago that there was something you wanted me to do. If it's anything in reason——"

"Joe, I want you to promise me not to vote to-morrow."

He guffawed loudly.

"Oh, that's just like a woman. Now, look here, you can't expect me to make a fool of myself. Why, you might as well ask me to vote for you."

"Well, why not?"

"Why not! Why not! Oh, you women in politics. Oh, this is rich. Say, if you were in anything else I swan I'd like to see you win. Want me to throw my vote away, eh! Well, not this time. It'll be a cold day when I make myself the laughing stock of the boys. S'pose I'd ask you not to vote, or to vote for me. How'd you like that?"

"Joe, my son, I will vote against you. I will work against you. I firmly believe that you are to be defeated, and if you are I shall be the first to take the legal steps that will close both your saloon and every other in town. But I am not only the candidate for mayor, I am your mother as well, and as your mother I have asked this favor of you. There is not a man in town to whom we are not making personal appeals. To whom should I appeal if not to my son? This is the first time I have asked anything of you in twenty years. Will you do it?"

The strange, unnatural silence was finally broken.

"No; I can't do it." He was grim, dogged.

"Joe!"

Joe Travers uttered the profane words that were ever on his lips.

"I've told you all I have to say, and I tell you, too, that neither you nor all the women of this town put together can ever close the saloons."

"My son, it will be neither I nor the women of this town who will close the saloons, but the power of God working out the salvation of men; and I pray without ceasing that when that day comes it may not be too late for your soul. Beware, my boy, lest you sin away your day of grace."

Her figure seemed to dilate. She might have been a prophetess. Then she went out, closing the door softly behind her.

Properly speaking, Belle Centre did not go to bed that night. The population was astir until long after midnight, each party straining every nerve in the final effort to gather in the last stragglers.

When morning dawned it was a perfect April day.

This time there was at least one surprise in store for the "wets." Never before had anyone of the opposition party been first on the ground, but to their discomfiture when Chuck Brady, Hank Jones and his chosen retainers arrived at the polls they found Mrs. Travers already there, attended by her retinue supporting her on the "dry" ticket, pretty young Mrs. Cunningham, with her husband hovering near with unmistakable pride in his eye; Mrs. Evelyn Wilson, the rich widow of the town, and Miss Elizabeth Hilton.

To the gracious "good morning" extended by these hostesses there were but sullen responses, and when Mrs. Wilson came toward Hank and offered him a cup of coffee he muttered thickly in his throat: "No, I've got something else," and pulling out a black bottle he tipped it to his lips, and then passed it to his fellows, saying: "Here's to success, boys."

"Thank you very much for wishing us success," said Mrs. Wilson sweetly. "I will join you in this," whereupon she drank the coffee.

"Darned if I ever saw such nerve," said Hank, relating the incident an hour later.

After the advent of the first comers, the square filled up rapidly. Not fifteen minutes after Hank and Chuck appeared to take charge, Joe Travers arrived. It was his intention to vote early and have it over before his mother was out. He was taken aback, but advanced as if unconscious of her presence.

She turned toward him with a smile.

"Good morning, Joe. Isn't it a beautiful day! Have a cup of coffee. I made it myself, and here is cream."

He took it clumsily, and in silence made a show of drinking it. Ere he had finished his pretense, there was the sound of loud and angry voices. The first challenge of the day had been given to a fair voter, who now stood with flashing eyes, defying the minion of the law who had presumed to question her right. There was a quick rallying of the feminine element, met by a gradual backdown of the "wets," and when the flurry was over the vote had been deposited, and for the time being no one noticed that Joe Travers, the candidate for mayor of the liquor party, left the polls without voting.

When late in the afternoon no one had spoken to him about his missing vote, Joe Travers felt an unacknowledged sense of relief. It would soon be over now; and then some time he could see his mother and tell her that he had done what she had asked him to.

He was not such a bad son after all, he told himself. And having argued thus he sent out fresh "rounders" to gather up those who might be hesitating.

It was now five o'clock.

The Blue Tiger had done a rushing business all day, and over its slippery bar the thirst of many a politician of note in Belle Centre had been quenched, not wisely, but too often.

The sky had clouded, after the manner of April, and a light rain was falling. A desultory crowd was huddled in the Blue Tiger, where the proprietor himself was on guard, receiving ever and anon messages from some of his henchmen. Chuck Brady entered now, and striking the rain from his hat against the bar he said: "Well, Joe, we've got 'em now, sure. The Apron-Strings made a sort of stampede with the fellows in the brick-yard, but Hank got after 'em and converted 'em all over in great shape."

"This rain'll drown out the 'drys,'" chuckled one on the outskirts of the charmed circle. "They'll run to cover now rather than get their feathers draggled."

"I'm not so sure about them running," was the response. "After they got an old-timer like Uncle Billy West to vote for the mammas I gave up. Nothing could surprise me now."

"You think that we're beaten?"

"I mean to say that the votes aren't counted yet, and until they are we don't know where we're at."

"We'll count 'em all right, won't we Joe?"

A HOME FOR KOREAN WAIFS

The Beautiful Work Undertaken by Christian Ladies in Seoul

ABOUT two years ago there was started in Seoul, Korea, a Christian Home for the destitute children of this heathen land. Miss Jean Perry of Australia, having come out for this purpose, the Home was placed under the care of a council who were to have the direction of the Home. This council consisted of the missionaries in Korea and had as its members H. G. Underwood, D. D., chairman, Dr. Eva H. Field, secretary, Mrs. Fulton Gifford, treasurer, Dr. O. R. Avison, medical adviser, Dr. R. A. Hardie, Rev. S. F. Moore, Rev. F. S. Miller and others. The institution has no denominational basis, and is entirely dependent upon voluntary contributions, having no board at home on which to rely for support. There has been talk of a council being organized in London, England, for the collection of funds; but up to the present time no such council has been formed.

Miss Perry came to Korea, entirely depending upon such sums as might be sent, and trusting entirely upon the Lord, started this organization. Miss Pash, B. A. [Girton College, Oxford], has assisted in the running of the institution. Children have been taken in as Providence sent them, and as the inmates of the Home have increased in numbers, so funds have also increased. At the present time there are twelve little waifs to whom a home is being given and who are being trained up for the Lord's work.

THE HOME OF THE KOREAN WAIFS AT SEOUL

For some time, these children were housed in a little Korean house in the centre of the city, but lately the use of the F. W. Underwood Shelter has been given to the Home, and here, about a mile outside the walls of the city, the school is now accommodated. It has at the present time all that Miss Perry, alone, can attend to. One of the great needs is an assistant for Miss Perry, as well as funds for the support of the little ones. $45 supports a child for a year. The number of little ones that need to be cared for is far greater in a heathen land, where the golden rule is unknown, than in a Christian land. Thus far, the Lord has blessed the undertaking in that he has provided funds, and as the institution has increased the funds have also increased to carry it on.

In a letter just received, Miss Perry writes:

"The six blind boys have arrived and our eighteen have just sat down to their supper. There are now fifteen boys, six of them quite blind and all from the streets. Several, nay, most of them, have lived in sacks on the streets and known no other home. Yougie's case is a typical one. He was picked up by Mrs. Moore last winter and sent to me with some of Mrs. Moore's clothes on. He could scarcely speak except in a begging whine, and it was months before a spontaneous smile came to his face. He is twelve years old, and had been driven about by bigger beggars and half starved, till he seemed to have nearly lost his senses. Now he is among the brightest at answering Scripture questions. He can read and write and his voice rises high and clear now in the hymn singing, especially in "When he cometh to make up his jewels."

Mr. Sankey in Scotland

Mr. Ira D. Sankey is being welcomed back to Scotland by crowded and enthusiastic audiences. Edinburgh and Glasgow have vied with each other in that respect, as they do in so many others, but the capital of the west having the larger hall is able to take the premier position as to the size of its audiences. The St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, which seats 4,500 people comfortably, was packed on Sunday night. There must have been over 5,000 persons present, of whom two-thirds were ladies, and, in addition, there was a crowded overflow meeting in Berkeley street U. P. Church Hall. Mr. Sankey's practice is to connect his songs with threads of dialogue, mostly anecdotal, and there is no dulness in any of the services. Mr. Sankey has a happy knack of getting his audience "at work." By appeals addressed to those in the gallery and the body of the hall alternately, he produced a fine artistic effect, but the acme of skill in that direction was put forth on Sunday evening in the St. Andrew's Hall, when he asked the audience in "the very backmost gallery of all" to sing the refrain, "By and by," in response to the choir. The effect was charming.

A feature to be remembered was the introduction of a Persian missionary studying in Glasgow, who sang the famous "Ninety and Nine" in native lingo. His manner was rather gauche, and he asked his audience to join in the chorus, and the audience thereupon laughed heartily, which is not a common occurrence for a Scottish Sabbath audience. It, however, appeared that Shamasha Abishalom Sargad intended to lead the chorus in the language familiar to all. Mr. Sankey obliged the audience by selecting some of the old favorites from his repertoire, and in conclusion he told the story of his impromptu singing of the "Ninety and Nine," and sang it in a manner which few will forget."

Women's Council and Manila

The National Council of Women, which held a recent convention at Minneapolis, adopted a resolution asking the Government to investigate reports as to immorality in Manila, the resolution being offered by the Social Purity Section. The entrance of large bodies of soldiery into any place is always followed by reports of evil in some form. Where the troops are pagan, these evils take the most brutal shapes—as witness the recent wanton butcheries of foreigners by Chinese. So it is not just to blame Christianity, as some short-sighted ones do, for ills following in the wake of soldiers of Christian countries. These ills are less because of Christianity. That they exist at all is due almost wholly to the liquor traffic. If our soldiers did not suffer from the demoralization of strong drink, their conduct would need little investigation. What our alcoholic exports to the Philippines are cannot be definitely stated; but to Cuba, during 1899, the United States sent $1,446,079 worth of liquors against Spain's $31,036 in 1897.

The Battle Opens

WE hail with delight Bishop Potter's movement against vice in New York. But large meetings with fine speeches can only start the work. Nothing but close and continued grapple of the evil will conquer. The obstacles in the way are the greater, because of the fact that some of the wealthiest men support the abominations concerning which all good people are now aroused.

Call the roll of dissipation in the haunts of iniquity any night, and if the inmates will answer, you will find there stock-brokers from Wall street, large importers from Broadway, iron merchants, leather merchants, cotton merchants, hardware merchants, wholesale grocers, representatives from all the commercial and wealthy classes.

I prefer that kind of heathenism which wallows in filth and disgusts the beholder, rather than that heathenism which covers up its walking putrefaction with camel's-hair shawl and point lace, and rides in turnouts worth $3,000, liveried driver ahead and rosetted flunky behind. We have been talking so much about the gospel for the masses; now let us talk a little about the gospel for the lepers of society, for the millionaire sots, for the portable lazarettos of upper-tendom. It is the iniquity that comes down from the higher circles of society that supports the haunts of crime, and it is gradually turning our cities into Sodoms and Gomorrahs, waiting for the fire and brimstone tempest of the Lord God who whelmed the cities of the plain. We want about five hundred Anthony Comstocks to go forth and explore and expose the abominations of high life. For eight or ten years there stood within sight of the most fashionable New York drive a Moloch temple, a brown-stone hell on earth, which neither the Mayor, nor the judges, nor the police dared touch, when Anthony Comstock, a Christian man of less than average physical stature, and with cheek scarred by the knife of a desperado whom he had arrested, walked into that palace of the damned on Fifth avenue, and in the name of God put an end to it, the priestess presiding at the orgies retreating by suicide into the lost world, her bleeding corpse found in her own bath-tub. May the eternal God have mercy on our cities. Gilded sin comes down from these high places into the upper circles of iniquity, and then on gradually down, until in five years it makes the whole pilgrimage, from the marble pillar on the brilliant avenue clear down to the cellars of Water street.

Cruel Telegraphy

AT least four times we have had cabled to this country the death of the Emperor of Russia, while at the present writing he still lives and we hope will continue to live. This week it was wired through all our country that a railtrain in Virginia had gone down with a bridge destroyed by freshet. There were about a hundred passengers and railroad employees on board the train, and probably all had perished. We found out afterward there had been no accident. The money markets in Europe were responsible for the false tidings about the Czar. The reported railroad calamity was probably the work of a newspaper that wanted to sell an unusual number of copies. What if hearts were wrung with anxiety about their friends? What if the nations were shadowed by the announcement of the death of a great ruler? No matter, if a few dollars were gained by the owner of a newspaper, or the stock speculators could disturb Lombard street, or the Bourse, or Wall street for their own advantage. That is what I call cruel telegraphy. Papers pride themselves on what journalists commonly call "a scoop," by which they mean information published exclusively in one paper. We all read and mourned over John Sherman's death two years before his departure. In the last conversation I had with Mr. Sherman he referred to that erroneous report, and said that he did not much wonder at it because he had been so very ill. Announcement of calamity or death in some of the daily papers is not received as accurate until it is confirmed by some reliable publication. Anxiety to get "a scoop" is responsible for much of the false news of the day, and has again and again resulted in wrecked fortunes and broken hearts.

The Other Side

WHILE there has been a great deal of industry displayed in various quarters in the attempt to make the missionaries in China responsible for the work of the "Boxers," and some good people have felt that the work of evangelizing the Chinese had better be stopped, it is cheering to read the speech made in Philadelphia by my friend Wu Ting-Fang, the Chinese Minister at Washington, in which he says: "It has been commonly supposed that missionaries are the sole cause of anti-foreign feeling in China. This charge is unfair. Missionaries have done a great deal of good in China. They have translated useful works into the Chinese language, published scientific and educational journals, and established schools in the country. Medical missionaries especially have been remarkably successful in their philanthropic work." This testimony given by an eminent disciple of Confucius comes at the right time. The fact is that China is going to be gospelized and saved either with our help or without it. Lucknow and Cawnpore horrors, in which English and American missionaries were massacred, did not stop the work of evangelism in India, and the butcheries in China will not hinder the redemption of the "Flowery Kingdom." The history of gospel progress in any country has had many chapters of martyrdom. The apostles were all martyrs, and the greatest martyr of all time was the Lord Jesus. Because the world in the most excruciating mode put our Saviour to death did the world's redemption collapse?

ONE DAY IN SEVEN

Sweet day! so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and sky.

OUR social happiness embraces a very large part of our existence. It diverges in so many ways, it occupies so many of our hours, and influences our character in such various and important manners, that its consideration is of peculiar interest. At its foundation lies that humanly wonderful number, seven—that number which our spirits know and love, and which our bodies show forth, both without and within us. This seventh day is the consecration of all our days, and the social life which abrogates it signs its own dissolution. Yet, there has been lately such momentous symptoms of a lessening reverence for this seventh day, that it is the first of all duties to show forth to ourselves its claim to a continuance of that honor with which the thought of man in all ages has sanctified it.

In the first place the periodicity of seven is deeply natural to us in all our movements. Once in seven days we must unbend the bow of vitality if it is to keep its spring. This is specially needful in this restless era, where stimulus and exaction have it all their own way. We do not live out all our days, nor reach that full development which is the result of slow, patient growth. We are lively, but not long-lived. We are one-sided, chronically weary; and for this fever of life, the true cordial is the one day in seven—the rest of the Sabbath. It would be easy to call science to prove this, but there is no necessity; the great truth is as old as time; and in our day science has perceived it to be good, and preached sermon after sermon on its advisability.

If, then, brain and nerve, bone and muscle require this periodical rest, surely the best way to give it to them is worthy of our consideration. First, we must be worthy of the Sabbath; we must have earned it by being faithful to the primeval pledge of honest labor for six days. The sensualist, the do-nothing, the idle busy-body, whose souls abhor the beauty of industry, how can they know the rest of the Sabbath? Second, we must in order to enjoy our own rest, have the comfortable conviction that we have been no party to overtasking our clerks, or mulcting our servants of ever so small a portion of their day of rest and freedom. We must see to it that every man, woman and child we can help or release, has his fifty-two days of rest every year. Third, we must remember that no one keeps the Sabbath who spends it in an excess of any kind, even in excess of Sabbath services, sacred study, or untimely vigils. This is not the Sabbath of the Old Testament; and no one ever pretended to find it in the New. Fourth, we must let all week-day sentiments, propensities and faculties sleep, and awaken those that have been only too latent during the six day's toil. Change of thought, feeling and occupation are the true rest. Let the world go for a day, and enjoy the pause, the company of wife and children, the depth and serenity of public church service, the Bible at the home table, the hymn at the fireside, the evening peace, the sweet serenity, the early hour of sleep that ought to close the day of rest—these things are half the battle on the side of the individual's health and welfare, and also half the battle on the side of God and the right.

Alas! we have come to a time when it seems impossible for public excitement to stop—when pleasure will not be halted, when greed will not withhold from gain, when public and private tyranny will have unresting slaves; when, in short, the senses grudge the soul this one day in seven. Even professing Christians advocate the opening of museums and libraries. We are told that the people should be taught to visit the ocean and the parks, and look up through Nature to Nature's God. If the worship of the beautiful was the worship of holiness, and if æsthetics were the same as pure religion, these things might take the place of the "holy convocation" and of "the multitude going up to the house of God to keep holy day." But it is one thing to civilize, and it is another thing to Christianize. Will hearts be changed by an infusion of artistic taste? No. "Other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid which is Christ Jesus."

The wish to keep the Sabbath in a popular way by sacred concerts and lectures about sacred places is intrinsically immoral, for it lowers the interest to be taken in our eternal hopes to the interest to be taken in an illustrated lecture on Palestine, or the pleasure of joining in a chorus, or criticising a semi-sacred solo. If religion comes into our life, it must be the first and prominent thing, and not be used simply to flavor secular fancies by giving them now and then a religious twist. And if more than this is attempted, the audience feel as if they had been decoyed to listen to doctrines they have no interest in. This is placing religious instruction on an immoral basis to begin with. To reconstruct religious things secularly or secular things religiously, is utterly unreal, and felt to be so, for the distinction between the two is a positive and permanent one. No soul burdened with sin ever yet got relief from a Sunday concert, or an illustrated lecture about the Holy Land. It should be remembered that religion is not a thing of pleasure, until it becomes personal and habitual. When Christian nations change the Sabbath ever so little into the wild Sun's Day of pagan nations, it will, indeed, be a sad thing. Poetry, sculpture and oratory did not save Greece and Rome, for nations, as well as individuals, absolutely need the wonderful recuperating influence of the day in seven or they perish.

Our Sabbath sprang not from the Jewish Sabbath, but from the idea of the early Christians setting the clock of time to the great epochs of the life of Christ. Friday, represented the death in which all Christians die daily, and the Sun's Day, that resurrection in which all Christians rise to higher life. Both Sabbath and Sun's Day are to us laden with memories and hopes we cannot part with. Sabbath tells us of that "rest that remaineth," and Sunday of the arising of "The Sun of Righteousness with healing in his wings." The whole Christian dispensation and life is a Sabbatical rest, of which the seventh day is the anticipation and the type.

The seventh day! This mystical beautiful division on which rests our physical and spiritual well-being, is typified in all we see and do and show forth. We may well time our work by it, for all nature is a system of sevens, and anatomy, physiology, optics, astronomy, music, are all familiar with this singularly human number. The moon goes on her ways and does all her stints of work to the music of seven, and the moonshine itself is a web of seven-twined thread. The sea, and the dead that are in it, are rocked in their cradle to the same tune of seven. If we put a pencil of light through a prism, it will at once tell us its secret and show itself seven-twined and beautiful. Ever since Jehovah set his bow in the heavens, the Children of Light have been singing "We are Seven." Music, that speech of cherubim and seraphim, sings its science in an ecstacy of sevens. Can we then express our Sabbath better than in the sevensomeness of light and music?

No wonder the Seventh Day has moved the world to its solemn thought! No wonder God blessed it, and sanctified it, and set it apart! Shall we defile and make it common, and turn its rest and sweetness into the six day's tumult and fever of being? God forbid! From the unrest of traffic, and the fever of worldly pleasure, may this one day in seven be spared us!

All week we can hear the hammer
In the busy workman's hand;
And the shriek and whistle of steam,
And the whirr of the leathern band.
The vender's resonant calling,
The rush of the hurrying train;
But the soul finds "rest" in the thought—
The Sabbath is coming again.

It hushes the noisest streets,
It says to the weary "rest."
Instead of life's slaves, it makes us
For twenty-four hours life's guest.
We throw by the tool and the pen,
The weights, and the measuring-rod,
And out of the workshop we go
Into the house of our God.

We drink in the rest and the peace,
We throw off the soil and the care,
Our soul rises up in the song,
And gathers its strength in the prayer.
Six days we must labor and care,
Oh, spare us this one day in seven!
That we may grow calm in its rest,
And strong in its promise of heaven.

Christian Progress in Japan

The Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip has been introduced in Japan. The first chapter was organized by Rev. Eugene S. Booth, of Yokohama. He believes that it will prove exceedingly useful as an antidote to the temptations arising from the example of dissolute foreigners. Pastors abroad or at home desirous of organizing chapters, can obtain all information from Rev. C. E. Wyckoff, Irvington, N. J.

To Punish China

APPEALS have been made to our Government by the Chinese to use its influence in moderating the demands of the European powers. It is gratifying to learn that our Government has consented to do so. The terms of settlement thus far proposed involved not only the payment of a large money indemnity, said to be three hundred and fifty million dollars, but the beheading of Prince Tuan and certain other Chinese nobles of the highest rank. Mr. Conger, our Minister at Pekin, is reported to have approved these terms, and to have informed Secretary of State Hay that any punishment less severe would be of no use in compelling China to respect the lives of foreigners in future. Under peremptory orders from Washington, Mr. Conger withheld his signature from the demands, and it is now understood that he is counseling more moderate requirements. This is an eminently Christian course, and shows magnanimity worthy of a Christian nation. It is doubtful whether the government of China could maintain itself if it attempted to pay so vast a sum, and if it sacrificed statesmen so powerful as those whose heads have been demanded by the foreign powers. It must be admitted that China deserves severe punishment. In a letter sent to this journal by Rev. W. S. Johnston, an American missionary formerly laboring in the Province of Shansi, the statement is made that at least 107 missionaries are known to have been slaughtered, and about the same number are missing, with no hope of their safety. Providentially, he and his wife and five children were away from their station when the outbreak occurred, otherwise they would surely have perished. The Chinese destroyed the whole of the mission property, and as Mr. Johnston brought nothing away with him, he has lost his furniture, clothing and books. The loss of the latter he feels acutely, and writes that if any of our readers would send him at his present address, Taku, North China, a volume or two suitable for a missionary's reading, he would be sincerely grateful. His heart is wrung by the reports of the martyrdom of his converts. As lately as Dec. 3, news came from Shansi of a recent massacre, in which the Governor Yu Hsien, murdered a Catholic bishop and five priests with his own hands. He then seized a number of Chinese Sisters of Charity, and gave them their choice between renouncing Christianity and death. They and 200 pupils were killed with great barbarity. There is, unhappily, no doubt that the Chinese officials have been guilty of horrible crimes. That fact, however, does not justify merciless retaliation on the part of nations professing to be followers of Him who enjoined all who believed on him to love their enemies, and who, when he was cruelly and unjustly treated, uttered that pathetic and magnanimous prayer:

A CAPTURED NATIVE SITTING WITH THE CHINESE FLAG UNDER HIS FEET

Father, forgive them; they know not what they do (Luke 23:34).

A House Eaten by Ants

The extraordinary discovery has been made by the owner of a house in Baltimore, Md., that during her absence from home a colony of white ants have attacked her dwelling and almost destroyed it. She has been away about three years, but intending to return, sent a servant to put the house in order. As he was going through the rooms he noticed a peculiar weakness in the flooring, and when he entered the library the boards gave way beneath his feet. The great walnut beams have been honeycombed as thoroughly as if they had been attacked by an army of carpenters with gimlets. The floor of the library has been damaged to such an extent that it will have to be entirely removed and the same is true of the floor of the servants' dining room. The joists of the first floor have been attacked by the insects so vigorously that had not their conditition been discovered at this time they would soon have been in danger of collapsing. Even the library shelves have not escaped the pest and it is thought a number of the valuable books are seriously damaged. The extent of the mischief shows that the pests must have been at work for some time, and the pieces of honeycombed wood which are being taken out of the structure bear abundant evidence of the industry of the ant during its residence in the house. Thousands and thousands of the creatures have been engaged in the work. It is a pity that the mischief was not discovered earlier, but while the house was not occupied, the ants could work on undetected. It is so with human character. When Christ does not reign in the heart, temptation undermines principle and the character is in danger of collapse:

When a strong man armed keepeth his palace his goods are in peace (Luke 11:21).

Killed by a Dead Man

A remarkable tragedy is described by a Boer soldier, who witnessed the incident and helped in the burial of the victim. The Boers were examining the top of a hill which a British force had evacuated after a desperate struggle. The dead were lying in all directions as they had fallen, Boer and Britisher touching each other in the long silence which came upon their vigorous life. One figure attracted special notice. It was that of a British sergeant whose death must have been instantaneous. He had been shot through the brain. He was in a sitting posture and his rifle was still in his hands, the barrel resting on a rock in front of him. He had evidently been about to fire when the messenger of death struck him, for his open sightless eyes were directed over the sights on the barrel and his stiffened finger was still on the trigger. A Boer soldier, with a muttered ejaculation of hatred seized the rifle by the barrel and attempted to jerk it out of the dead sergeant's hands. As he did so, he brought the muzzle within an inch of his own breast and the death grip of the sergeant's finger did the rest. The cartridge he had been about to fire when he was stricken down, was fired by that sudden jerk of the weapon in his dead hands, and the Boer fell across the dead body as dead as the man whose weapon he was taking away. Generally death puts an end to the purpose a man cherishes in life, but in this instance the purpose was accomplished more effectually than it might have been if the man had lived. And the strange thing about it was that the victim precipitated his own destruction. Left alone, the dead man could have done no harm, but the mischief he could not do was done by another's foolish vindictiveness.

Wrath killeth the foolish man and envy slayeth the silly one (Job 5:2).

In Prison Thirty-three Years

Among the passengers on a train from Sing Sing to New York, on Nov. 24, was a man who was drawing for the first time in thirty-three years the breath of freedom. In October, 1867, at the age of twenty-nine, he entered the prison, sentenced to imprisonment for life; now at the age of sixty-two, by the clemency of Gov. Roosevelt, he emerges a free man. He was sent up for killing a man in a barroom brawl, and there is the common explanation that he was a peaceable citizen usually, but on the day of the murder he had been drinking. He has been a well-behaved prisoner, having during the whole period of his incarceration not a single complaint against him. He was quite bewildered when he reached New York, having had no idea of the changes that had taken place during his absence. He had known the city well in his young days, but when he was sentenced there were few houses above Central Park, there was only one elevated road in the city, and the surface cars were drawn by horses. The small houses and stores with which he was familiar have given place to high office buildings. He was so nervous at the idea of once again mixing in the busy throng that he begged one of the keepers to return with him and take care of him. During the whole period of his imprisonment he has been seeking a pardon. Every new governor received a petition from him, but all had refused until Gov. Roosevelt took compassion on him. He was quite overcome when the warden went to his cell and told him that he was a free man. They thought he would have fainted, but he speedily recovered and lost no time in putting on citizen's clothes and quitting the prison. Unhappily those who are in the bondage of sin do not always take that course when they are told that Christ has purchased their release.

After ye have known God how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage (Gal. 4:9).

SOUTH GATE OF HEAVEN IN SHANSI, THE SCENE OF MASSACRE OF FOREIGNERS

A New Responsibility

The Court of Appeals of New York State has just rendered a decision which has an important bearing on the relations of employers and employees. The case before the Court was an action for damages brought by a workman who had been injured by the fall of a scaffold on which he was working. The employer argued that he was not responsible, inasmuch as he had supplied proper material for the scaffold and it had been constructed by his workmen. The cause of its fall was its being badly put together by them. The Court, however, rejected the plea. The justices held that the making of the scaffold was not a detail of the work, the responsibility for which is imposed upon the servant, but the scaffold is regarded as a place furnished by the master upon which the servant is to work, and the master is forbidden to permit that place to be unsafe, unsuitable or improper, but is bound so to construct it as to give proper protection to the life and limb of the person who is engaged upon it. The existing law thus makes it the personal duty of the master to exercise reasonable care to see that the scaffold which he provides is safe for his workmen and suitable for the purpose to which it is to be applied. It is probable that this decision will save some lives. If the employer is responsible for the safety of the scafford he will take care to have it properly constructed. It would be well, too, if he concerned himself about the moral and spiritual safety of his employees, for if they go astray through his example or neglect God will hold him responsible.

Ye masters do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening knowing that your master also is in heaven neither is there respect of persons with him. (Eph. 6:9).

BRIEF NOTES

A new law has been passed in Germany, making the Salvation Army one of the religious organizations entitled to recognition and protection by public officials.

A fund is being raised in England, under the patronage of the Bishop of Chester, for acquiring saloon property. The saloons once acquired are to be conducted on rigorous lines for the discouragement of drunkenness. The profits will be applied to the purchase of other saloons.

The death of Dr. Godet, one of the most eminent Biblical scholars in Christendom, occurred recently. He was eighty-eight years of age. He was private tutor to the late Emperor Frederick of Germany and to the close of that monarch's life exercised a beneficent influence over him. His published works on the New Testament have been translated into many languages.

Evangelist Edmund F. Goff, who has been commissioned by the General Conference Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church to hold meetings in connection with the Forward Movement, has been laboring at Mercer, Pa. The meetings have issued in a union service, and Mr. Goff proceeded to Lockhaven, Pa., for a week's work in that town.

The work of federation is progressing in several States. Fourteen evangelical churches of the Bergen section of Jersey City Heights recently united with the Federation of Churches. Delegates will be named, and a house-to-house visitation will be made to induce non-church-goers to attend church and send their children to Sunday School.

The announcement is made that the Sultan of Turkey will settle the claims of the American Board Missionaries. It is to be done indirectly by paying the Messrs. Cramps, of Philadelphia, $115,000 more for a cruiser than the firm's price. This sum, on receipt of the Sultan's check, Messrs. Cramps will hand to the Government in payment of the American Board's claims.

The Methodist Episcopal Church heads the list of the world's Methodists with 2,886,389 members, and the Methodist Episcopal South comes second with 1,482,665. In Great Britain, the two highest are the Wesleyan Methodist with 480,652 members, and the Primitive Methodists with 196,408 members. The grand totals of Methodism are as follows: Ministers, 44,569; lay preachers, 133,434; church members, 7,382,146; Sunday Schools, 79,192; officers and teachers, 790,850; scholars, 6,271,748; churches, 80,031.

QUARTERLY REVIEW • By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DECEMBER 30

GOLDEN TEXT, Psalm 65: 11: "Thou crownest the year with thy goodness."

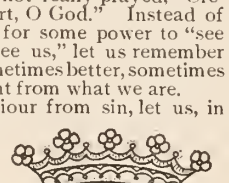
A YEAR with Christ in lessons—has it been that in life? Only so can God's goodness, which has crowned the year, become "my" goodness. It is a strange anomaly that people who do not use the stronger forms of profanity, so often adopt, as a mild substitute, "My goodness!" as if it was something to exclaim about—something to swear by. Beside the goodness of God, as shown in the closing year, and the goodness of Christ, as shown in the lessons of the quarter and of the year and in the history of the closing century and of the nineteen Christian centuries, our own natural goodness fades into selfishness, which every aspiring heart desires to have displaced by Christlike goodness. "Thy goodness!"—that is something worth exclaiming about, as we recall the year and the life of Christ.

In classes for boys and girls at Chautauquas we have used a "crown-book," which can be made by laying twelve white sheets of paper together, with a gilt sheet on the outside at top and bottom, and cutting them all in the shape of a crown, and then fastening them together. On each sheet write the illustrations of God's goodness, and of human goodness derived from him, seen in a month of the year or a lesson of the quarter, or give a half sheet to each, making the review of goodness by months a prelude to the review of goodness in the Christ lessons. For older persons in a "Bible Class" or teacher's meeting or normal class, such a crown-book might well have nineteen leaves, and be used to note, in a series of studies, the spread of Christ's kingdom in the nineteen Christian centuries, which crown Christ Lord of time as well as eternity and Lord of the world. Let each of us "crown him Lord of all" our lives—of its business, its politics and its pleasures.

I. GOODNESS, TRUE AND FALSE, is set in contrast in the first lesson of the quarter. Every journey of Jesus is described in the saying, "He went about doing good." Coming into a Pharisee's house as a guest, he encounters a man sick with dropsy, and healed him. That was Jesus' way of keeping the Sabbath; not by doing nothing, but by doing good. He healed diseases of mind and soul as well as those of the body, frankly rebuking the selfishness and pride he saw in the Pharisees, and bidding them to take large doses of philanthropy to cure it. "When thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind."

Right beside that radiant goodness the Bible sets, like the contrasts that artists so often make, the sham goodness of the Pharisees, whose religion consisted of rules and ritual, mixed with a pride that sought the highest seats, and a selfishness that invited only such guests as could return the favor, save as they invited Christ to watch and test him. The trouble with the Pharisees, though they were members of the church, and very regular attendants at all its services, was that their hearts were not right in the sight of God. They had not been converted. They chanted the Psalms, but had not really prayed, "Create in me a clean heart, O God." Instead of praying, with Burns, for some power to "see ourselves as others see us," let us remember that others see us, sometimes better, sometimes worse, always different from what we are.

Saved by the Saviour from sin, let us, in Christlike goodness, go about doing good, helping the sick, warning the misguided, championing the unfortunate.



II. GOODNESS TO THE POOR AND NEEDY is pictured in the great Supper, at which "they are the guests of God." These holiday times are full of feasts and wishes of joy. "A Merry Christmas!" "A Happy New Year!" are heard on every side. This lesson gives Christ's own picture of the whole Christian life as one of joy, a feast of fat things. And the joy is not the joy of selfishness, but the joy of doing good, of brightening the sad lives of the unfortunate and even of the sinful, by gathering them as welcome guests at God's bountiful table. It is a strange story that many, in the parable, instead of coming to the feast, sent excuses, sham excuses, for refusing a king's invitation to a sumptuous banquet. It is stranger far that such an invitation from the King of kings to dwell in his house forever meets excuses instead of acceptance from so many. Are you at the feast?

III. GOODNESS TO THE LOST—Christlike goodness in that respect, that is what we are to learn from the woman, symbol of the church seeking the lost soul in the light of the Spirit, as she is pictured beside the Shepherd, who represents Christ engaged in the very same search. Let our invitation of Christ include seeking and saving that which was lost, the strayed lambs that the Shepherd loves, the precious souls that bear God's image, though now fallen in the dust.

IV. GOODNESS TO THE PENITENT is tenderly pictured in the parable of the Prodigal Son—not alone God's feeling toward them, but what ours should be. The prodigal's brother shows how not to do it. Dr. Klopsch, in his Bible class, puts large emphasis on the prodigal that did not come back. Let no one think that one can well afford to take the risk of a trip to the "far country," expecting it will be easy to repent and return after seeing the shady side of life. A great majority of the prodigals never come back. There are hundreds of homes where anxious fathers, mothers, wives listen daily for a footfall that never comes. From the swine to suicide of body, or soul, or both, that is the usual concluding chapter of dissipation, rather than repentance and return.

What folly to flee from love! As well may a train jump the track to bring pleasure to the passengers as a soul leave the path that love has marked out to find greater joy.

V. GOODNESS LEARNING FROM SELFISHNESS is the meaning of the strange story of the unjust steward. "The children of light" should be as shrewd, as tactful, as ingenious, as earnest in using right means to attain noble ends, as "the children of this world" and "the children of the devil" are in using means, right and wrong, to attain selfish ends.

It is a reproach that selfish men are so much more alert to win dollars and votes than Christians are to win souls.

VI. GOODNESS IN SETTING HEAVEN AND HELL BEFORE MEN, that they may choose aright—that we see in the story of Dives and Lazarus. When King Saul was plotting to destroy David, noble Jonathan warned his friend David, by a prearranged signal of arrows, which would have seemed like the attacks of an enemy to a stranger, but David knew they were the warnings of a friend. So every passage in the Bible about hell is an arrow of loving warning from the King's Son, who would thus enable us to escape the plots of Satan.

VII. GOODNESS TO THE SICK is pictured in the parable of the ten lepers; not alone the goodness Jesus showed to the sick, but the goodness we should show to them. And let us not forget that God is good in sending sickness as well as in removing it. Pain is God's watchman; sickness, his sentinel.

"Who is the angel that cometh?"

"Pain."

"Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

The writer counts no five months of his life more blessed than those of his most serious sickness, when he pondered the social problems of life while looking in the face of death, out of which pondering came his fullest discussion of these moral diseases of the world. Gen. O. O. Howard, the one-armed general, is wont to say that he planted an arm to raise schools for the colored people. God is "the giver of every good and perfect gift," and of no other kind, not even when he gives night and storm and pain. True faith will enable us, like Isaiah, to put our afflictions in the list of God's "loving kindnesses," but the story of the lepers reminds us that not more than one in ten will even thank God for health and prosperity, and they the lowliest of the ten for the most part. "Were there not ten cleansed? But where are the nine?" They were Jews. "There are not returned to give glory to God save this stranger," a Samaritan—a "good Samaritan" in the rare goodness of true gratitude.

Let us develop like patience by a faith which is more than imagination that enables us to see the Christ at our side in sickness.

This the response, if I my grief should plead,
"Your heavenly Father knoweth ye have need."
Therefore, O God, I cast my care on Thee:
Take Thou my burden now, and I am free.
MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

VIII. GOODNESS TRIUMPHING OVER APPETITE—another St. George and the Dragon victory—is the picture which is presented in the quarterly temperance lesson. The drink habit is indeed a dragon, but the power of Christ is greater, and so victory waits on alliance with Christ, whether the battle be in our own lives or in the world at large. Just at the portals of the twentieth century, when Dr. J. S. Dennis says that intemperance is increasing in the heathen world at large, and when the British Parliament Committee have just reported that the consumption of liquors is increasing in the civilized world also, all should unite in the "new crusade," now well begun, to protect native races the world over against the traffics in intoxicants and opium. Perhaps as keeping slavery out of the territories led to its abolition everywhere, we shall protect all races in protecting the child races.

IX. GOODNESS THAT DID NOT FEAR THE TEST—Such was the goodness of the rich young ruler, who thought himself faultless, and was in reality so clean that he won the special love of Jesus. But when his goodness was fully tested there was revealed a hidden love of money that was stronger than his wish to be good and do good; stronger than the call of Christ. Alas, how often this story repeats itself to-day. Here is a man who seems to be good, but he has not yet been severely tested. He goes into politics, and at the critical moment surrenders his Christian principles to his desire for reelection or promotion. He goes into a business where he is tempted to break the Sabbath, and after a struggle he yields, choosing profit rather than righteousness.

To thoughtful men, the mangled bodies crushed by trolleys are lesser tragedies than the souls that turn away disobedient and sorrowful when brought to the supreme test, the choice betweeu money and Christ. What a soul-searching story was that which Bishop Potter recently told to New York business men of the good woman who had bought the motto, "God Bless Our Home," and asked the young clerk who had sold it, in all sincerity, if he could not supply another motto for her husband's place of business?

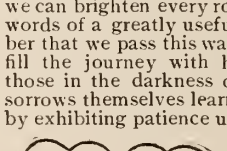
GOD BLESS OUR OFFICE

The shopman looked at her for a moment and without a ray of sarcasm in his voice, said: "Madam, isn't that rather a large order?"

Think of it for a moment. Think of the active business and commercial life of a great city, conceived of in the mind of that young man as being under such conditions that it was absolutely impossible for him to conceive that anybody should want to put up the motto, "God Bless Our Office."

Let us rejoice that many young men have not turned away sorrowful when asked to sacrifice the prospect of wealth and ease in order to devote themselves to doing good.

X. WAYSIDE GOODNESS is pictured in the story of Bartimeus. Not by opening blind eyes, perhaps, save as science enables skilled physicians sometimes to do it, but by pouring light into dark lives in kindly word and deed, we can brighten every road we travel. In the words of a greatly useful man, let us remember that we pass this way of life but once, and fill the journey with helpfulness. And let those in the darkness of blindness or other sorrows themselves learn to minister to others by exhibiting patience under their trial.



XI. RARE GOODNESS DEVELOPED OUT OF GREAT WICKEDNESS, that is what Zaccheus' story illustrates. He who had been the chief of the cheating publicans, at a look and word from Christ repented with a fourfold restitution and a devotion not of one-tenth, but of one-half of his wealth to God. We do not hear that he gave up his business, Better if he went back to show how it could be honestly conducted and filled with prayer.

XII. GOODNESS IN GIVING is the message of the Christmas lesson. In Jesus we receive God's unspeakable gift, and are moved to give to others, not presents alone, but sympathy and helpfulness. What a gift to us all is Jesus, not only as a Saviour and King, bringing pardon and protection, but also Jesus as teacher and example, giving us direction how to live, in childhood and manhood alike.

"HE WENT ABOUT DOING GOOD"

Beside the Christmas Fire

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

MOTHER'S DARLINGS ..

.. ON CHRISTMAS EVE

Don't you hear the sleigh-bells ringing,
Don't you hear the little feet
Of the reindeer flying swiftly
Through the stormy snow and sleet?
Santa Claus likes wintry weather;
At the Pole they do not care
How the white goose sends her feathers
Flying thickly everywhere.

MOTHER'S darlings have hung up their stockings, and they ought to be safe in bed where mother tucked them up at eight o'clock. Usually the sandman scatters the sleep powder over the bright eyes as soon as they kiss mother for good-night, but Santa Claus is too much for them, and on Christmas eve the darlings are wide awake and watching for their friend from the North Pole, long after the accustomed hour of the start to Slumbertown. Never mind. Ethel and Edith, tiptoeing in again for another look at the stockings by the fire, and listening for the fairy sleigh-bells. It is not worth while for you to wait: the dear old fellow is very mysterious, and he does not wish to be seen. Go away to bed and he'll come pelting down the chimney as sure as ever he knows you are asleep.

Yes, I hear the sweet bells jingling,
Silver sleigh-bells sweet and shrill;
Santa Claus is hasting swiftly
Over valley, plain and hill.

Hurry, little sister, surely
He will bring us what we wrote
In a letter that we sent him
By the fastest Arctic boat.

A great many children do send letters to Santa Claus, and the funny thing is that he never gets them mixed up and never forgets a single item of their lists. That shows what a wizard he is, the brave old saint!

List, the merry bells are ringing!
Hark the music overhead;
Angel choirs to-night are singing!
Darlings, hasten back to bed.

Everywhere the world is happy
In the Christ-child's loving care.
There is gladness in his presence
And his grace is everywhere.

A Special Benediction

Surely the prolonged warm weather of this wonderful autumn, which made the days one long procession of delight and enjoyment, must be acknowledged as a special benediction from heaven. The thousands upon thousands of people not necessarily very poor, but of limited incomes, who dread a rise in coal as a drain on their resources, have had reason to be thankful in that the season, for burning fires all over the house has been shortened, sunshine has been poured upon us in unstinted measure, and we have been the healthier for it, since nothing is more depleting to vigor than confinement over the fire in closely shut houses.

Curious Dolls

In the Peabody Museum at Harvard there is a very curious collection of dolls. It is interesting for two reasons: one that it was made by a very good and philanthropic woman, the late Mary Hemenway, and the other that the quaint and droll little figures carved out of cottonwood, are really the gods of the Moki tribe of Indians of New Mexico. Grotesque and funny as these puppets are, they show the striving of the untaught mind to express its crude idea of deity, and in this these idols show a certain kinship with the gods of wood and stone worshiped by heathen peoples all over the world.

The little Moki maidens are allowed to play with their gods, which are often bestowed upon them as prizes after one of the dances, which with those tribes are a religious rite.

Washing Dishes

"If I had to wash dishes three times a day I'd use wooden platters and burn them up."

"Why, Dolly! I'm ashamed of you," said Dolly's mother.

"It's such a grind, you never get done with them. Breakfast, dinner and supper. And it takes such a lot to go round."

"Make the work beautiful, dearest, by thinking of the family, and the happy times they have over their meals, and by washing dishes as they never were washed before, so well, so clean, so perfectly. If you make it lady's work, Dolly, you will not mind it at all."

Her Old Self

She was a woman white-haired, thin, uncomely, and with few traces of beauty, for her life had been full of hardship, disappointment and privation. She was looking over an old trunk in the attic, and down in one corner, under some old clothes, was an old-fashioned picture, called an ambrotype. It was in a little velvet-lined case, clasped. She opened it. There was a young girl, sweet, plump, with lovely modeling of cheek and chin, with a great coil of brown hair, a beauty in her first bloom.

"Grandmother, who is she?" said the girl who was helping sort the attic.

"That was myself at eighteen," was the answer.

"Oh, no wonder everyone fell in love with you," exclaimed the girl, and then, added with quick tact, "They do that still, you have always been so dear and loved everybody so, dear grandmother."

A Nice Sense of Honor

Perhaps nowhere is a sense of honor more evident than in the delicacy which discriminates when we talk about our friends, against telling what they do not wish to have repeated. If by some accident any one learns something about another, which discretion would indicate as a fact which should not be bruited from the house-tops, honor counsels absolute silence on the subject. Herein is a test of good breeding.

Keeping Secrets

The people who can refrain from telling again under pledge of secrecy, the extraordinary secret which has been whispered to them, are few and far between. They are worth their weight in gold when found, but, alas! one has to go many a mile to find them. The better plan is to have no secrets.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—S. Y. T. Why scold? It does no good. Be philosophical. From Solomon's day to the present, scolding women have been unpopular.

—Effie Deans. I know of no certain cure for superfluous hair.

—Theresa. It is enough to send the man the picture. When he acknowledges it, his letter may be answered.

—Bereaved Friend. Do not wear a crape veil over your face. It is very bad for the eyes. Even widows avoid veiling the face at present.

—Sissy. He does not love you, my dear, and probably the young man loves nobody and is just amusing himself with you and your friends.

—Marjorie. The eldest daughter in the family puts Miss Brown on her visiting card. The sisters are Miss Susan, Miss Adeline and Miss Sarah Brown.

—Matron. If you dislike the man who is so attentive to your daughter, yet respect his character, use a little tact. She may be the better judge. Invite other gentlemen to the house, and do not too openly oppose her.

—Wife. In great matters, if the two cannot agree, the husband's voice may settle a case, but I never heard of an American husband who exacted of his wife the implicit obedience of a child. Their home life would not have any fun. Your feeling is perfectly absurd and does injustice to your John.

"DON'T YOU HEAR THE SLEIGH-BELLS RINGING?"

Around Kriss Kringle

WHO are the young people in these days? I sometimes fancy that nobody is young any more, except the quaint old bodies in white shawls and silver hair who know how to be children with the babies, and the bluff old gentlemen with gold-headed canes and courtly manners, who are children still for all their dignity. The blase ones are the young women and the young men, who solemnly tell you that there is nothing new, who suspect the motives under the apparently ingenuous actions, and whose experience of the world thus far leads men to take gloomy views of everything. It was a girl in her sweet twenties who said to me the other day that she found Christmas a bore, and that it held for her no charms. For her, on whose head the dear day would heap blessings, and in whose lap it would lay great store of presents, useful, rich and beautiful, things she needed, things she wished for, and things she did not want. Poor child! From the height of my superior years I looked on her with a deep and tender pity. Yet I trust even she will grow into her heritage and be younger bye and bye.

I find my own cheek flushing and my heart beating faster as I count the days until Kriss Kringle's return. Christmas to my thinking never wears out; it is forever new, forever cheery, forever full of music and light, "Still celestial music floats o'er all the weary world" when in the throbbing midnight once again the angels sing. And yet there is a reverse side to the shield.

We have done our best to make Christmas a mercenary festival, and it is largely we who are to blame, if the children and the young people care more on the Lord's birthday for what they are to receive than for what they are to bestow. We older ones, with our appreciation of the day and its privileges have too often thoughtlessly dragged it down to the level of a common day, when the sentiment it wakens is forgotten in that which is sordid and material. Look at the misfit Christmas gifts which go flying about under Kriss Kringle's very shadow, gifts which are purchased simply from a sense of obligation and without the raison d'etre of the personal touch. It may be broadly stated, that whenever and wherever Christmas gifts are bought and given without the friendliness of intention and the carefulness of selection which first of all demands that they shall make the recipient happier than he or she could be without them, they have become debased. In the vocabulary of the period they are degenerate.

But because there are abuses you and I need not cease from our delight in all that Christmas brings. Still may we hang up our stockings, still go prowling about the shops with eager wistfulness, looking up the most enchanting surprises for the ones we love best, and still may our hearts overflow with gladness, because there are so many who display their regard for us.

Out of a prison in New York State, a man emerged the other day, a man who had spent thirty-three years within those grim and baleful walls, under a life sentence imposed for a murder committed in a brawl. He may or may not have been the murderer, but a jury thought he was, and a judge condemned him. Into that prison he went a young man, out of it he stepped into the world again, old, bent, and gray, and by the clemency of the governor, took up what fragments of life were left to him, a free man. I do not know whether he found anybody belonging to him alive, whether he was able to get honest work; I do not know anything of him except what the newspaper told, but he keeps coming into my mind as I think of Christmas. A free Christmas, after thirty-three years behind bars. God grant that for him and for all others like him, for all prisoners and prisoners' friends, there may be a little joy on Christmas day.

A Model Social and Religious Settlement

HAPPY CHILDREN IN THE SETTLEMENT KINDERGARTEN

A NEW development in the Union Settlement work, which has been carried on for several years past in New York's upper East Side, furnishes a striking proof of the popularity and efficiency of the particular form of religious socialism expressed in the settlement idea. In 1895, Mr. William E. McCord and one associate went to live in a tenement on East Ninety-sixth street; in two months they took a parlor floor and basement; another worker joined them; two boys' clubs were organized, a little library for children and a Penny Provident Bank were started; next, a men's club came into existence; and so the work grew until it now occupies five houses, 235-43 on East One Hundred and Fourth street; a gymnasium on East One Hundred and First street; and a playground, covering eleven lots, which were kindly lent to the Settlement by Mrs. Cornelia B. Rogers, of Bridgeport. The five houses and the land upon which they stand were purchased for the Settlement's uses a year ago by Mr. Morris K. Jesup, and extensive interior alterations have been made under the direction of Mr. McCord, so that the new quarters now provide attractive rooms for fifteen residents, men and women; a large dining-room and parlor, kindergarten and assembly rooms, rooms for library, girls' and boys' clubs, cooking classes, workingmen's club, etc. As a result of the enlargement, a number of new features are being inaugurated. Besides the People's Singing Class, a branch of Frank Damrosch's great Choral Union, a singing class for children, will be started on its merry way with Miss Frances Bartlett as leader. Mother's Meetings, Helping and Sunshine Mandolin and Forum Clubs and Workingmen's Clubs are well attended. The Union Athletic Club, organized with seventeen members, now numbers three hundred. Monday night receptions, when residents of the Settlement are at home to the men and women of the neighborhood, are much enjoyed. Men from their hard day's work, women from their wash-tubs, come in and have a happy social time; whole families arrive: good music is provided; perhaps a good story is read; maybe a merry game is played.

"We interest a good many workingmen here," said Mr. McCord to the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. "They like to gather in the rooms here. We are in the habit of having dinners, at which the men of the neighborhood and prominent outside men, like Mr. Ogden, discuss topics of the day; strikes, effect of machinery on labor, and similar subjects have been brought up." Regular religious services are held every Sunday, and the Settlement has a thriving Sunday School. "We have not left the religious element out of our work," continued Mr. McCord. "We do not find that we have antagonized our Hebrew and Catholic friends by this course. The upper East Side has few Protestant churches, and we felt it our duty to provide services for Protestants in this locality." The benefits of the Settlement are entirely undenominational. The work was instituted, however, by the Alumni Club of Union Theological Seminary, Mr. McCord, a member of this club, acting from the first in conjunction with that body; and the home of the Settlement belongs to the Seminary, to which it was given by Mr. Jesup. One of the reasons of its creation was the establishment of a station, where students of the Seminary could acquire experience in social work. Of the one hundred and forty outside helpers, the larger number are drawn from the Seminary; Columbia College and the social circles of the city are also contributors. Rev. Charles Cuthbert Hall is President of the Directing Council; Cleveland H. Dodge is Vice-President; Chauncey H. Goodrich, Secretary, and Robert C. Ogden, Treasurer.

The reports from many cities on both sides the Atlantic show that among all the devices for improving the condition of the poor, none has been so successful as the organization to which the name of "Settlement" has been given. The Settlements vary in their management in different localities, but in all cases the principle of contact is the one on which reliance is placed. The work usually begins by hiring a commodious house situated in some densely populated neighborhood. A number of well-educated Christian persons agree to go and live in it for certain periods, in relays that some of them are always in residence. In permanent charge there is a head worker, who generally receives a salary. Once established, the workers try to make acquaintances with their neighbors. They are hospitable and give a cordial welcome to visitors. No attempt to preach or lecture them is made, but they are encouraged to regard the newcomers as friends. The Settlement workers soon find out the needs of their new neighbors. Sometimes the first step is a musical evening once or twice a week, when the men will come to the Settlement instead of going to the saloon, and the tired women have an evening's enjoyment. Sometimes the walls of the Settlement are covered with beautiful pictures lent by friends of the workers, and the exhibition is opened free of charge. Gradually clubs are organized among the young people for various objects, and all have a free meeting-place in the Settlement. Mothers' meetings are also popular, and there is generally a club or two for the men. It is seldom that much, if any money, is given away in such institutions. In an emergency or any serious trouble, help is often rendered, but charity, as the word is generally understood, is not cultivated. The object sought is rather by friendly interest or by example to induce habits of economy and clean, wholesome living, and by providing innocent amusement to wean the people from evil places. It has arisen from the desire the wiser Christians of our day have developed to follow in the footsteps of the Master, who showed his love for the human race by coming and living among the people he sought to save.

Another valuable feature of the Settlement system consists in the fact that residents become acquainted, as they could in no other way with the conditions and needs of districts in which they live; and being persons of large intelligence and culture, are able to wield influence in municipal affairs and to work reforms which the community itself has not known how to secure; or perhaps, has not considered of sufficient gravity to demand remedy—so inured do we become to an evil that is ever present with us. Thus, bad sanitary conditions, possibly unrecognized by the neighborhood itself, though productive of much sickness and suffering, attract the Settlement's attention; proper representation is made to rightful authorities and correction ensues. The evil demanding removal may be one which menaces the morals of the community.

Settlements are always attractive places to visit. Tourists, passing through the large cities here and abroad, will miss seeing one of the most interesting phases of city life, if they should fail to visit such places as the Hull House, the Commons, the Union, University, College and Gospel Settlements. In these places "the rich and poor meet together; the Lord is the Maker of them all."

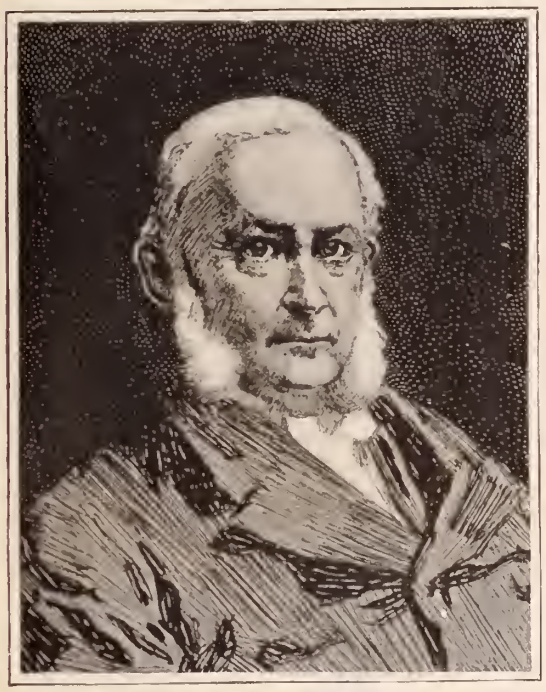
The Dead Veteran

Death of Dr. Edward W. Gilman, Nearly Thirty Years Secretary of the American Bible Society . . .

MANY a heart has been filled with sorrow by the announcement made on December 4 that Dr. Gilman, the senior secretary of the American Bible Society, was dead. He had labored so long and so faithfully for the cause that he loved; he had been so helpful and so courteous to all who sought his assistance; he had been so useful to churches and missionary societies through a long period of service, that he had won a host of friends, who now mourn his departure. So quiet and unostentatious was he in his work that few understood how extensive it was. Now that he is gone, we realize with sadness how large a place he filled and how effective his labors were. A man of excellent judgment, his advice was often sought in matters of grave moment outside his own sphere, and it was always given with care and wise consideration. In his work he was one of the most conscientious of men, with a passion for accuracy and exact statement, in which the smallest fact was carefully verified and presented in appropriate words. He was an ideal secretary, painstaking in all his efforts and devoted to his duty. Coming in contact with ministers of all denominations, his dignified courtesy impressed every visitor, who, whatever might be his creed, was received as a brother in Christ.



THE LATE DR. EDWARD W. GILMAN

Dr. Gilman had nearly reached the Psalmist's estimate of the span of human life. He was seventy-eight years of age, and had been twenty-nine years in the Bible Society's service. His father, Mr. W. C. Gilman, came to New York from Norwich, Conn., when his distinguished son was only a boy. He was connected with Dr. Cheever's church and afterwards with the Tabernacle, now at Broadway and Thirty-fourth street. He sent his son to Yale College, where he graduated with high honors in 1843. It was no slight tribute to his scholarship that he was invited to serve as a tutor in the university while he was pursuing his theological studies in the seminary. After his graduation he accepted the pastorate of a Congregational Church at Lockport, N. Y. Subsequently he became pastor of a church at Cambridgeport, Mass., and still later of a church at Stonington, Conn. In all these churches his tact and energy in the performance of all his duties won the respect and admiration of his people, and the churches prospered under his care. In the spring of 1871, the directors of the American Bible Society, seeking a secretary whose personality would combine many rare qualities, were advised to offer the office to him. He cheerfully accepted, and in May of that year began his work. From that time forward his life was a very busy one. In conducting the correspondence with a host of agents at home and abroad, in superintending the translation and distribution of Bibles in many dialects, and in the preparation of reports of the Society's work, he had exhausting duties to perform, but they were all done with the efficiency, exactitude and punctuality which were a part of his nature. Of late years he had borne in addition a burden of sorrow. His beloved wife, a daughter of the Senior Professor Silliman, of Yale, and whose sweet tenderness and love had made his home a delight, was called hence, and there were other domestic bereavements that weighed heavily upon him; but he turned with characteristic piety to the consolations of religion, and was comforted. With the thoughtfulness for others which is found in every Christian of the highest type, he set himself to give to others who were mourning the loss of loved ones, the consolations which had supported him. He wrote a series of five booklets, which were published by Thomas Whittaker, Bible House, New York, at ten cents each, which are among the most helpful of all works for the bereaved believer. Their titles are: Before Easter, From Easter to Ascension Day, Living, Though Once Dead, and A Doubting Disciple. Many a broken-hearted Christian reading them has learned to kiss the rod, and to look up through his tears to the All-loving Father, who "does not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." They speak the sweet docility and unwavering faith that were so prominent in the man whose death we now mourn.

ROBT. P. WILDER DR. W. W. WHITE

Leading Officers of the Theological Seminary College Y. M. C. A.

Y. M. C. A. College Work

THE young men who are studying for professions are among the most neglected and the most fiercely tempted on this continent. The probabilities are that many of them will never be won for Christ, unless it be during their student days. To reach these young men, the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. about five years ago established a student department, which has resulted in the organization of nearly six hundred Young Men's Christian Associations in colleges in the United States and Canada, including forty-eight negro schools and colleges, and five Indian schools. The immediate object is to organize and develop strong associations in all North American institutions of learning in which there are young men. A further object is to reach all universities, theological seminaries and colleges, law colleges and schools, medical colleges and schools, colleges of surgery, dental schools, schools of pharmacy, veterinary schools, institutes of technology and various classes of engineering colleges, agricultural colleges, military and naval academies, normal colleges and schools, and preparatory schools and academies.

Among the most valuable agencies in promoting the development of the associations are conferences and conventions. First among these student gatherings are the four summer conferences held at Northfield, Mass.; Lake Geneva, New York; Asheville, North Carolina, and Pacific Grove, California, each attended by hundreds of students from over three hundred universities and colleges. At these conferences, which continue in session ten days, young men are trained for the leadership of the Bible classes, missionary study classes, volunteer bands, and other departments of the associations. Of almost equal importance are the various presidential conferences held each year in several sections of the continent. In these conferences during the past year the presidents of over two hundred associations received thorough instruction in the duties and responsibilities of their peculiarly important office. There are now nearly one hundred more associations in the movement than there were four years ago. Among the institutions in which associations have been formed recently are the Harvard Medical College, Columbian University, Bowdoin College, the Michigan State Normal School, Wake Forest College, Howard College, the Universities of Nevada, Montana, Arizona and Oklahoma, and the colleges in the Hawaiian Islands.

Conversions in colleges, as a result of Y. M. C. A. work, have been more numerous during the past four years than during any similar period. Not a year has passed in which there have not been real spiritual awakenings in different parts of the student field. These are not confined to denominational colleges, for some of the most remarkable spiritual movements have taken place in the State universities.

In the Bible study department of the College Y. M. C. A. great progress has also been made. Four years ago there were over 8,000 young men in association Bible classes. During the past year not less than 12,000 continued in such classes two months or more. Taking the world as a whole, the Christian movement among students has advanced during the last four years by leaps and bounds. There has been no period like it in the history of the world. It has witnessed the extension of the Volunteer Movement from North America and Great Britain to other Protestant lands, and also its introduction among the students of the Orient. Above all, this period has been signalized by the origin, formation, and firm establishment of the World's Student Christian Federation, which unites all the Christian student movements of the world, and thus includes over 1,200 student associations, with a membership of over 55,000 students and professors.

Among the officers of the College Y. M. C. A. are Cleveland H. Dodge, Chairman, and Secretaries Dr. W. W. White, Robert P. Wilder, and John R. Mott.

Singing to the Prisoners

CHAPLAIN J. P. Munro, of the Tombs Prison Gospel Mission, has this year made a special effort to bring some of the holiday cheer and gladness to the inmates of the city prison. On Thanksgiving he arranged a special song service in their behalf, and after the usual holiday dinner, the prisoners for a while forgot their sorrows in listening to the singing of Miss Hildebrand, "the Gospel Nightingale." It was touching to see the prisoners, old and young, crowding forward to the barred doors of their cells, and joining in the chorus of the grand old hymns.

Rev. Dr. L. A. Banks the Author

The remarkably interesting article in our Million Edition, entitled "How They Found Christ," and relating the stories of the conversion of Bishop McCabe, Rev. Francis E. Clark, and Dr. James Gray, should have been credited to the pen of the Rev. Louis Albert Banks, who has for several years been one of the best-known contributors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

King's Evil

That is Scrofula.

No disease is older.

No disease is really responsible for a larger mortality.

Consumption is commonly its outgrowth.

There is no excuse ever for neglecting it, it makes its presence known by so many signs, among which are glandular tumors, cutaneous eruptions, inflamed eyelids, sore ears, rickets catarrh, wasting and general debility.

John Brearley, Potter Hill, R. I., had a "large scrofulous bunch" in his neck; the little son of Mrs. Minnie Spear, Parishville, N. Y., had a "large scrofulous sore"; the little grandson of A. E. Withers, Longview, Ark., "had scrofula very bad."

According to voluntary testimonials, they were effectively treated by which has proved itself to be the best of all medicines for scrofula in old or young.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The First American Frigate*

HE (Paul Jones) was in New York the 21st of April, 1775, when the news of the battle of Lexington reached there. He heard early in May that two French frigates had put in at Hampton Roads. He at once loaded his sloop with delicacies of the season and ran down to the Roads, where he found the two frigates under command of Commodore de Kersaint, senior officer, with "the Sailor Prince of France," Louis Philippe Joseph, Duke de Chartres, second in command.

This was the beginning of an acquaintance which was soon to prove of vast value not only to Paul Jones personally, but to the cause of the infant nation at large. When Jones reached the deck of the frigate La Terpsichore, the young duke greeted him cordially, and then Jones informed him that his sloop alongside was laden with fresh provisions from his own and neighboring plantations, which he begged His Royal Highness to accept. He made no secret that his object was to obtain information as to the plan, design and construction of hull, arrangement of battery, spars, rig, and other technical particulars, for the guidance of the Marine Department of the new American Government, which he assured them would be formed within two months.

Kersaint was naturally conservative, as he was the senior French officer on the coast and had just heard the news from Lexington, which made the situation delicate for neutrals. But the young Duke de Chartres took an enthusiastic fancy to Jones and allowed him to obtain the most complete data of the new frigate, even to copies of deck plans and sail plan, which he caused his carpenter to make. Jones was the guest of the Frenchmen two or three days and invited them to visit his plantation. But the outbreak at Lexington had made it impolitic for them to accept entertainment ashore from persons known to be hostile to King George, and they sailed away. It is worthy of remark that the American frigate Alliance, built a year later, was constructed almost precisely on the dimensions and general lines of the new French frigate La Terpsichore, and mounted exactly the same battery.

The Business Woman.

MANY young women belittle their employment by going to it in the spirit of martyrs who pity themselves, or by bringing to it merely the mercenary motive. Self-pity is the badge of weakness, and work done for money alone is never noble work. The amount earned may indeed measure the worker's talent, and it is a legitimate object to toil well and worthily for honorable hire, but one must not be sordid; one must dignify the work for its own sake; one must care for the enterprise, and the business house, and the work she is doing; one must do every day the very best she can, not because pay day will reward her, but because she is a child of God, and it is a part of her bounden duty to serve the present age.

The young woman who is a stenographer must be painstaking and accurate. Her spelling, her punctuation, her typewriting must be clean and free from blunders. She may never rise very high, but where she is she must be as perfect a thing as the rose on the stem, as steady as a star in the sky. If she undertake domestic work—I wish more young women would do so—she must enter a house to be its comfort and help in a real and earnest relation to the family. In any place where she works for a weekly salary, or where she works by the piece, she must know how to do what she undertakes and to do it invariably well. The business woman must take pride in the fact that she belongs to a host of most honorable women, and wherever she stands around her there must be a serene atmosphere of contentment, and about her the cheerful aspect of a happy and useful being, who knows herself of consequence in her place.

A prerequisite to success in business life is a uniformly high rate of health, and the young woman who best cares for her physical well-being will in the end surpass her who is pallid, flat-chested, and easily tired. To breathe deeply, to exercise regularly, to sleep soundly, and to eat nutritious food, avoiding sweets and eschewing pickles and condiments, are among the business woman's cardinal necessities. Her dress must be neat and simple. Tidy and comely she may properly be, never noticeably dressed, nor overloaded with frills and furbelows, nor decked with much gayety of color.

I am sometimes asked whether our young girls in business are not subjected to a variety of temptations and whether they are not peculiarly unprotected. My answer is that a young girl who is preoccupied with her work, is so impersonal in its exercise that the large majority of men with whom she associates do not think of her in her feminine character at all, they take her on her merits as a fellow-worker. As for herself, she is a girl working for her own living; she is a daughter or a sister, helping the dear ones at home; she has better things on hand than the silly gratification of being admired and complimented. When her day's work is finished, the girl who has been absorbed in task work should slip out of harness and enjoy leisure if she can, and if she have other cares to press on her mind and heart, she should conscientiously enter upon change of occupation. Having done her very best all day, let her consider that page ended. Above all things, let her not worry over any possible shortcoming, or dread any possible happening of another day.

A WINNING BOY.

Earns His Medals by the Use of Good Food.

A Vicksburg, Miss., boy, J. B. Smith, corner Grove and Third streets, says: "I have been studying very hard to try and beat my room in examination. I have been eating oatmeal and cream for breakfast all my life. Lately when the hard study began I did not feel well enough to go to school, and there was an examination ahead of me and an exhibition, too.

"I was determined to go through this examination, but felt so sick all the time that I didn't know how to accomplish it. Well, mother saw the Grape-Nuts food advertised, so she bought some and gave it to me for breakfast every morning, and you just ought to see what this food did for me.

"I began to get well at once and grow hearty and fat, in spite of my hard work. Above all that I did beat my room at examination, making a general average that was the highest mark in the room. I am also able to take part at the military drill to-morrow night at the exhibition and will try for the gold medal for general excellence. If you think there is any question about this you can write to Bro. Garbrial, our principal, and he will tell you that it is true."

It is of the greatest importance that parents feed their growing children, during study, on the most nourishing food possible to obtain, and there is no question on this score regarding Grape-Nuts, for the food is compounded of the elements selected from the grains which go to quickly make and rebuild the brain and nerve centers. Any parent can prove this statement by feeding the children on Grape-Nuts. Obtained from any first-class grocer.

HOW HE FOUND CHRIST

The Story of the Conversion of FRANK W. WARNE...

The new Methodist Missionary Bishop of India

WHEN Frank Warne was about fourteen years of age he was given some special work one evening by his father. It happened that just then some boys came by to play, and instead of doing what he was told, Frank went off to play with them. A little later he met his father, who inquired, "Have you done what I told you?" The boy answered, "Yes." The father knew that he had told an untruth, but said nothing. The boy felt rather badly about it, but nevertheless soon fell asleep, on going to bed, and slept soundly.

BISHOP FRANK W. WARNE

Next forenoon his mother said to him, "Your father slept none all last night." Frank knew that his father was well, and said, "Why didn't he sleep?" His mother said, "He spent the whole night praying for you."

That last sentence was like a bell ringing in Frank Warne's ears, and like an arrow in his heart. He was convicted of sin, and knew no rest until he knew it in the consciousness of pardoned sin. Bishop Warne has always attributed his decision to become a Christian to that night when his father, who was a godly man, kept vigil all night, praying for his boy who had proved untrue. Bishop Warne says to me, "I can never be sufficiently grateful to him for that night of prayer." Surely there is in that sentence from a distinguished and noble public man a good suggestion for many anxious Christian parents.

After young Warne had decided to become a Christian he had great difficulties in understanding how to find salvation. The word "believe" was a mystery to him. How to believe he did not know. He was in darkness for years, and through several series of revival services, he regularly presented himself as a seeker, but all to no purpose. He became desperate, and almost hopeless. No one properly showed him God's promises, and explained how to trust in them. In his desperation and despair, and when he was on the point of going back to the world—though he knew that was only to be lost—he was one morning sitting on top of a straw stack arranging to feed the stock on the farm, and he was meditating what he should do.

Suddenly, there seemed to float in the air before him the words of John 3: 16. And there came to his heart a new hope, as he read, and reread it slowly—"For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." He read it in sections—"God so loved the world." "God," seemed to have a new meaning—"So loved the world—" Frank said to himself, "I am part of it;" and then he read it, "God so loved me." He repeated that several times—then said, "How much is there in the 'so?'"—and answered himself, "That he, gave his only son." His heart said "that is wonderful love," and he read on, "That whosoever believeth in him," and he paused at "whosoever" and recalled the story of Richard Baxter which he had read somewhere, who said: "I would rather have 'whosoever' in John 3: 16, than my own name, for if my name were there, I would at once think it referred to some other Richard Baxter; but I know that 'whosoever' refers to this Richard Baxter." Frank also concluded that his name was in the "whosoever." He had by this time settled it that God so loved him that he had given his son for him, but at once he came upon trouble, for the next words were, "Believeth on him." Then the question of how to believe came up again, as it had a thousand times before. He asked himself, "How do I believe my mother?" And, suddenly, there came like a flash upon him the great truth. That faith was not a struggle, an effort, such as he had been uselessly trying to put forth, but a mental rest. He read again: "That whosoever believeth in him should not perish; but have everlasting life." He at once saw his mistake. It was that he was believing in "him," for he could not think of a statement in the Bible about "him" that he did not believe; but he saw that he was believing in him, and applying the promise to himself, as though it were reversed and read: "Whosoever believeth in him shall not have everlasting life;" that is, he believed in him, but doubted that he would have everlasting life, and believed that he would perish. I am sure that Frank Warne is not the only youth who has gone through a struggle like that.

From that hour on the straw stack, he had a clear idea of what "believing" meant, and he said, "Lord, I will believe (John 3: 16, just as it is written), and I will believe that I shall not perish, but that I shall have everlasting life." He seemed to be satisfied, but when he thought "I do not feel any differently," he was in doubt again. "Faith" and "feeling" had kept him in darkness. He reread the promise, and saw there was not a word about "feeling" in it. He said, "Lord, the giving of feeling is thy part of this work and not mine; I will trust that promise, if I never have feeling. And if I am lost I will say, 'I trusted it and it failed me.'" When he had thus ceased to look for feeling, and had his trust fixed on a definite promise, his heart at once rested, and joy and peace in believing were given him. And, said Bishop Warne, meditating on the matter just before starting to Manila last summer, on his way back to his diocese in India, "I have never doubted that then and there I received 'eternal life' in and through Jesus Christ."

I Thank Thee, Lord

In all thy goodness, O dear Lord,
I give thee thanks and praise
For health and strength, for friends and home,
For joys that fill the days,

For all my body's varied powers,
For faculties of mind,
For means to lend a helping hand
For others' needs I find;

For all the holy joys that wait
Within thy house of prayer,
For hallowed Sabbath's sweet return—
Foretaste of heaven to share;

For peace amid earth's changing scenes,
Comfort in sorrow's hour,
Assured of victory over death
By thy own love and power;

For glorious hope beyond the grave
Of life immortal given,
In peace and joy with friends beloved—
Our Father's home in heaven!

Sad at Parting With Samantha

Dear Editor:—It makes me sad to think of parting with the delightful society of "Josiah Allen's Wife." I have read much in my day, of romance, history, poetry, philosophy, religion, governments, revolution, reformation, the tragedy and comedy of human life, serious, pathetic, humorous, ludicrous, but I never read of more of all these woven into a harmonious, delightful story than that of "Around the World with Josiah Allen's Wife." As for the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, there is but one Dr. Talmage, with that tremendous grasp of thought, which takes in so much of the experiences, desires, needs, and aspirations of the soul, and then with polished speech directs to the Christ as the source of all supplies for the wants of man, I sometimes think, when reading his sermons, and as "Aunt Samantha" says, with not a "dry eye in my head, not one"—that he must know my life history—and is talking to me. God bless the able and large-hearted proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the HERALD itself.

A JAPANESE . . . MISSION BURNED

It was at Noshiro, and was Established by Christian Herald Readers Years Ago

SOME six years ago I visited a large town in Akita Prefecture, one of the largest and most prosperous northwestern provinces of Japan, and was providentially helped in securing a place for an Evangelistic service. The old theatre was crowded. Fully 2,000 or more attentive hearers were present at the meeting. At its close, I asked if any wished for a copy of the Scriptures or a few tracts, whereupon it seemed as though the whole multitude rose to their feet and rushed to the platform, crying—"dozo Kudasai"—("Give me some, please.") But I only had a half dozen copies and what were these among so many? I was so sorry not to have the loaves to feed the multitude, and so requested the names and addresses of those who received none, promising to come to Noshiro soon again with a boxful of Bibles, etc.

Upon returning to my home in Hirosaki I wrote to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a short account of that service, which you were kind enough to publish in your valuable paper, with the result that upward of $350 were sent me by many of your kind readers all over America and Canada. And so the box was in due time taken to Noshiro. Calls were made on the people in their homes, their names written on the flyleaf of the Bible, which we were so pleased to present in the name of the dear old CHRISTIAN HERALD. Not only was this done, but we had enough money left to buy a piece of land in the central part of the city, near one of the three large Buddhist temples, which tower right up in the midst of the place. Upon this lot we erected a small dwelling for an Evangelist and also a hall for services. The whole property did not cost much, but it was nicely suited for the work. At first it was difficult to get a suitable man for the place, and so the effort did not meet with the success we had hoped for. Latterly, however, one of our oldest, most experienced and devoted Evangelists has taken up the work in Noshiro and some blessed results have been secured. Mr. Kawamura, a political leader, has been wonderfully converted and has gone to Akita City to establish a home for ex-convicts, following Mr. Hara's example, with whom many of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are well acquainted. A leading Shinto priest is also an earnest enquirer, and the Custom House manager is a candidate for baptism. A large number has been converted, a Sunday School established, regular services are maintained and in every way a successful work has been in progress.

But alas! a short time ago the following letter was received from the Evangelist, which I will here transcribe in his own English phraseology:

"Reverend Sir:—Yesterday, at the close of our morning worship of God, when I had baptized three adults in Christ, a big conflagration took place. Seven hundred houses were burnt, four persons killed, ten wounded, besides other sad calamities. Our home and God's house were taken by fire shortly after the alarm, for the fire occurred windward a short distance from us. The weather was hot as well as windy, and all things were ready for the blazes. I should have lost all my few earthly things had it not been for the timely help of Mr. Kana, the traveling agent of our Scripture Union, who says that I baptized him fifteen years ago in Nayasaki, which event I cannot recall. Now I thank God that all my family escaped this fiery trial, although most all my books and clothing has ascended in the chariot of Elijah. We are now seeking refuge in the public school building, with 300 families. Please pray for Noshiro, that her sin and idolatry may be purged as by fire. Can you not rebuild our fallen Zion? I do not wish to surrender this Peking of Satan's stronghold. Please do not call me elsewhere. Let me stay here, and suffer and work for my dear Saviour. The members will all help a little to rebuild, but now their own homes are gone and they are too poor. Do you think better days must not come for Noshiro? I pray God to open her eyes widely as Christ did the blind Samarian woman at father Jacob's well. Pray for me. T. KIKUCHI."

I have felt, all along, that this Noshiro work belonged to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in a very providential way, and feel that it is now my duty to write this account of our affliction for your paper, so that the friends may know the circumstances of the case. Since receiving the above letter I have visited Noshiro, called the members and enquirers together, discussed the situation fully, prayed earnestly about it and decided to build if the means were forthcoming. The friends in Noshiro will do all they can, but what do our friends in America and Canada say? JNO. W. WADMAN.

Hakodati, Japan.

We commend the Rev. Mr. Wadman's letter to our readers. He is conducting a most excellent Christian work in Japan and deserves their most cordial sympathy.

Orphan Friends in Many Lands

From the most distant parts of the globe letters come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclosing contributions for the support of India famine orphans. Sympathy for the little homeless and friendless waifs is world-wide. From many such letters we have selected a few from friends in lands far apart, and these are printed below:

Dear Sirs:—I have the pleasure of forwarding to you two pledges (fifteen dollars each) for the support of an orphan boy and girl in India. The boy will be paid for by the C. E. Society of the Church of the Divine Redentor (Spanish) and the girl by the American Society of the Union Evangelical congregation, both of this city. We prefer children in the Congregational Mission.

MARY F. LONG.

Guadalajara, Mexico, Apartado 13.

Dear Christian Herald:—We have sent $15 by to-day's mail to you, to be used for the support of one famine orphan (girl). We ask that she be brought up under either Congregationalist, Presbyterian, Baptist or Methodist influences, and trained for active service in the missionary field. We hope to be able to continue her support as long as is necessary, and will send money from year to year for it. F. H. BILLINGS.

Munich, Bavaria.

The Christian Herald, New York:—My two little boys, Burnham and Stanley Dell, wish to provide for one India famine orphan for one year, and enclose you a check for $3.75 for first quarter. They also wish to subscribe for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year. We are living for the winter at San Remo, Italy. W. A. DELL.

Villa Luigia Ponente, San Remo, Italy.

Christian Herald, New York City:—We are sending in this one-half year's support for an orphan; wish we could send in all at once, and will probably send balance before the half-year is gone. We prefer a girl of some eight or twelve years, one of eight much preferred. We shall be glad to hear directly from the child as early as possible and will then consider name, etc. May God richly bless you in all your work, is our prayer.

ROBERT A. AND DAISY D. S. MILLAR.

San Luis Potosi, S. L. P., Mexico.

Dear Sir:—My reasons for sending so far are that I spent a large part of my ministry in America and that I have not seen any object of the same kind recommended in this country.

CHILDREN SHOWED IT.

Effect of Their Warm Drink in the Morning

"A year ago I was a wreck from coffee drinking and was on the point of giving up my position in the school room because of my excessive nervousness.

"I was telling a friend about it and she said, 'we drink nothing at meal time but Postum Food Coffee, and it is such a comfort to have something we can enjoy drinking with the children.'

"I was astonished that she would allow the children to drink any kind of coffee, but she said Postum was the most healthful drink in the world for children as well as for older ones, and that the condition of both the children and adults showed that to be a fact.

"Just a little thought convinced me that one should not take a stimulant such as coffee, but really should have the best food to nourish the brain and nerves, and that nourishment was found in Postum.

"My first trial was a failure. The cook boiled it four or five minutes and it tasted so flat I was in despair but determined to give it one more trial. This time we followed the directions and boiled it fifteen minutes after the boiling began. It was a decided success and I was completely won by its rich, delicious flavor. In a short time I noticed a decided improvement in my condition and kept growing better and better month after month, until now I am perfectly healthy, and do my work in the schoolroom with ease and pleasure. I would not return to the nerve-destroying regular coffee for any money."—F. Scott, Warrensburg, Mo.

A GOSPEL AUTOMOBILE

CAPT. J. D. TAYLOR, the "Sailor Evangelist," of Chicago, who has been traveling about the country, over various railroad lines, in a chapel car, is now building a Gospel automobile to take the place of the car.

"If more work," he writes, "were done among the men in our factories, railroad shops and mines, among the men that will not go to church, there would be less strikes, more contented men and happier homes and more trusty men than we have now.

CAPT. J. D. TAYLOR
The "Sailor Evangelist"

The Chapel Car can go only where rails are laid, but an automobile can go anywhere. I purpose to preach the Gospel to the men from the wagon, and sell them Bibles and give them such literature as will be a benefit to them. I hope to build a number of wagons, each of which will cost about $3,000. Evangelists and competent men will be put in charge of each wagon to carry the Gospel to those who will not go to our fashionable churches. This work will be undenominational, for the benefit of all. We shall carry the Gospel to hamlet, town and city, railroad shops, factories and fields.

"The outfit will consist of a wagon run by a powerful gasoline engine, so that we can run from twenty to forty miles an hour, according to the roads. The box will be eight by ten feet; there will be a door in the rear, and on the right side as you go in there will be a folding bed, and on the left a set of drawers to carry Bibles and tracts. Back of the seat will stand the organ and a platform for the preacher. The body of the wagon will be painted white, with Scripture mottoes and the name of the car in gold. There will also be a tank running the full length, on top, for the gasoline, so that it will be absolutely safe, and around the top an iron railing to hold the tent. This tent will be sixty by one hundred and twenty feet with jointed pipe iron poles, so that they can be carried on top of the wagon. Thus the wagon can run into a town, pitch the tent, run out on the street corners, sing a song, give a few minutes' talk and invite the people to the tent. The tent will be made so that the wagon can be run into it at the back, thus enabling us to use the wagon to preach from."

CAPT. TAYLOR'S GOSPEL ON WHEELS

Mrs. Bird's Christmas Tree

Last year, the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD provided a wonderful Christmas tree in one Bowery home. It was twenty-two feet high, and through their generosity a thousand little waifs received useful presents and toys, with which it was laden. Never was anything done for the children of the New York East-Side which created such a sensation. For hours before the appointed time, the streets were thronged with little half-clad children, with shawls over their heads and with anxious faces, watching to see the Mission door open. Some had never seen a Christmas tree before; some even had never heard before of Christ. Do you wonder now that the cold days have come, which bring frozen fingers, that they run after us on the street to know "when the Christmas tree is coming," and as they run after us, it gives us courage to run after you, dear friends, to plead again their cause. Under the glory of your Christmas tree, it is easy to tell these little suffering ones that Christ loves them, and that it is he who has put it into the hearts of his friends to send all these good things to them, on our Christmas day. Please send gifts of money for our Christmas tree to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. SARAH J. BIRD.

Two Wedding Anniversaries

In these days when, through the mills of the divorce courts and other sad happenings, so many cases of wretchedness and wrong in married life are brought to public attention, it is reassuring to reflect that the marriage which is the exception and not the rule is the marriage to attain notoriety, and that quiet, happy unions rarely find their way into the papers. Sometimes, however, through some unusual circumstance, public regard is attracted to some peaceful home, which stands out as a bright and beautiful reminder that marriage is not a failure, but an institution blessed of God.

On the same day, December 1, there were celebrated, in different States, two remarkable anniversaries. In Goshen, N. Y., Mr. David Post, aged ninety-one, and Mary Ann, his wife, aged eighty-six, were congratulated on their seventieth anniversary of their wedding-day. Five generations, numbering seventeen people, gathered about them at this joyous time and wished them many another year of loving companionship in the old-fashioned farmhouse, to which David Post, the "deestrict" school-teacher, had brought his pretty wife (who had been one of his pupils) many years ago. In Altoona, Pa., Leonard Saller and Anna, his wife, with children and grandchildren around them, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding-day. At eight o'clock that evening the aged husband, father and grandfather was called by the Angel of Death. The long-wedded pair had prayed that they might "live and die together." After her husband had gone to his last rest, his widow went to her room and knelt. Dr. Miller, the family physician, came in and asked for her. "Do not disturb her," they said; "she is at prayer." "I am a great believer in prayer," said the doctor. "Let me go to her." He returned, saying: "It is as I thought. She has gone to her husband." The good wife was dead.

Is He the Oldest Minister?

Rev. Jerome C. Berryman, of the St. Louis Annual Conference M.E. Church, South, is living, able to preach, has regularly attended conference, but is now blind. He is ninety-one years old, and has been in the ministry seventy-two years. He was a member of that general conference held in New York in 1844, whereby the M. E. Church was divided. He was also a member of the General Conference in Louisville, Ky., where the M. E. Church, South, was established. In a personal letter to a friend, Father Berryman writes from Caledonia, Md., under date Sept. 26:

"My personal experience, my dear brother, is that the more we practice self-denial and commune with God in our closets, the happier and more useful are our lives. My present prospects for getting home, which will be only when I get to Heaven, are as bright as ever and as full of comfort. The name of Jesus as my Redeemer is the most precious of all names, and I close by saying:

Happy if with my latest breath
I may but grasp His name,
Preach him to all and cry in death,
Behold, behold the Lamb!

Father Berryman lives in the little village of Caledonia, next door to the Methodist church, and it is a benediction both to preacher and to audience to have the inspiring old warrior of the cross at every morning service.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be pleased to hear from other readers, who may know of some still older pastor in actual service.

THE HEALTH HABIT

Just as Easy to Form as Any Other.

We do not deliberately form our pet habits, but they are unconsciously acquired and grow as we grow, and by the time we learn they are hurting us, we find them too strong to be easily broken.

Then, why not form a good habit, a habit which will counteract the many bad ones, in other words coutract the unfashionable habit of being always well.

The best health habit to get into is to have and keep a vigorous stomach; if you have a healthy digestion you can drink your beloved coffee, smoke your favorite brand of tobacco, with little or no harm; the mischief begins when these things are forced upon the faithful stomach, without any assistance.

Form the habit of taking after meals some harmless but efficient digestive which will relieve the stomach of so much extra work.

Nature furnishes us with such digestives and when they are combined in such a pleasant preparation as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, they give the overworked stomach just the necessary assistance to secure perfect digestion without any of the harmful effects of cathartics and similar drugs.

The habit of taking Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after meals is as necessary to the weak stomach as food itself, and indeed to get the benefit from food eaten, nothing better and certainly nothing safer can be used.

Many families consider Stuart's Tablets as essential in the house as knives and forks.

They consist entirely of natural digestive principle without the effect or characteristics of drugs; they have no cathartic action, but simply go to work on the food eaten and digest it.

Take into account your bad habits and the expense they entail and then invest fifty cents in a box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets and see if your digestion for the next month is not vastly improved.

Ask the clerk in any drug store the name of the most successful and popular stomach remedy and he will say Stuart's.

THE OLD AND THE NEW*

The Essentials of Christianity Not Observance Nor Outward Morality, but a Change of Heart and Spirit

SUCH a warning as Christ gave in his parable of the patch on the old garment and of the new wine in old bottles was very necessary at that time. Even the disciples themselves, conceived of Christianity as an adaptation of Jewish forms and principles. They did not accept the warning, and, as a consequence, there came the embittered dispute about eating meat which had been sacrificed to idols, about the necessity of circumcision and other matters of Jewish law and practice. Eventually, the young church learned that the old wine must not be put in old bottles. They understood more readily than we do the force of the simile. The bottles of that day were made of the skins of animals from which the bodies were withdrawn. The neck served as the mouth of the bottle and the feet were tied up. If new wine were put in the bottles weakened by use, it would burst the skin when it expanded by fermentation. So with the new patch, or rather the patch of unshrunk material, would shrink when it was wetted, and would tear away the old and weaker material, thus making a new hole. Christ was teaching them that his religion was not a mere mending of the defects in the Jewish religion. Applied in that way, it would do more harm than good, for the man so using it would lose the old religion and would not get a new one. The combination would not work.

The need for such teaching is still with us. Nothing is more common than to find an appeal on behalf of Christ, met with a proposal to fix up the existing life on moral standards. The man admits that his life is bad, but he will reform here and change it there. He will quit drinking and swearing and lying, will go to church regularly and behave himself. All this is very good and should be encouraged, but he must not suppose that having done this he has become a Christian. It is probable he will soon discover this for himself. Christianity is not a reformation of outward conduct though it includes that; it is not a matter of church-going though the Christian is sure to go to church; it is a change of heart and disposition. The man who begins from the outside leads a most miserable life. He has to keep his passions and desires in subjection and maintain a rigorous self-command. The inward clamoring of his passions for the usual indulgence, ruins his peace. It keeps him in perpetual turmoil, and the restraint becomes so irksome, and the task of repression so difficult, and the failures so numerous, that he gives up the struggle in sheer weariness. The rent is made worse, and frequently he returns to his self indulgence with increased vigor and becomes a worse man than he was before. The only sure method of reform is the new heart. The source and centre of the evil must be cleansed. Then when the man has learned to love righteousness and hate sin the outward life becomes right as a natural development.

The parable applies, too, to the inconsistent Christian. It is not possible to hold to the world with one hand and to Christ with the other. Christianity does not set well on a worldly life. Christ must be supreme in the heart, or he will not reign there at all. Men are frequently met who rely on an old experience of religion, on having been baptized, on going to communion, and keeping up payments to the church. Every outward ceremony that is suggested is grasped eagerly. Some men will fast regularly, or will scrupulously give the tenth of their income to the Lord—anything and everything but the one essential, without which all the rest is worthless. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. There is no sacrifice, no ceremony, no sacrament that avails one jot in salvation. Not a word is to be said against them in their place; but they must not be regarded as substitutes for the new birth. The only truly consistent life is the one in which the man serves Christ altogether, making him the guide and director of his life, or the one in which he serves the devil wholly. The attempt to make a bargain with God by which certain open and glaring sins are abandoned, certain forms and ceremonies observed, in return for which a ticket of admission into heaven is to be obtained—is a miserable failure. God must be worshiped in spirit and in truth. The path and love he accepts must come from the heart and be true and genuine; otherwise it is worthless. To yield entirely to Christ, to be ready to follow him withersoever he may lead, to be like-minded with him, having the same love of God and of humanity, to seek earnestly to be assimilated to him in thought, word and deed, so that his will is not only law, but our intense desire—that is, to be a Christian.

The Charity that Reaches Lowest

THERE are asylums and schools for blind children, institutions for the epileptic, the deaf and dumb. But is there any place for invalid and crippled and deformed and paralyzed children—especially the children of the slums? There is one place in the country that opens wide its doors for this poorest and lowest and weakest class. It is a great, roomy, new, brick building, with sun porches shut in by windows, and seven acres of sheltering pine woods—the Watts de Peyster Home for Invalid Children, in Dutchess County, New York, among the hills north of New York City. Deaconesses, those Protestant Sisters of Mercy, are in full charge. The house will shelter seventy children at a time, and the applications for admission would fill it to overflowing. The pitiful condition of the children knocking at the doors would melt a heart of stone. Heaven, with all its glory, cannot be a greater surprise to us than this home with its joy and delight is to many of these suffering little ones.

One of the children taken into the home last summer was so nearly crazed with the brutal treatment she had received at home that when any one approached her suddenly, even on the kindest errand, she would scream and cry out, "Oh, don't whip me. I didn't mean to do it." The physician said, "She needs no medicine." She is, however, getting well under loving care, and in the wonderful climate of the hills. Another girl of twelve, though almost a helpless invalid, was gradually but certainly being pushed toward the worst of fates by her own mother, when she was rescued and brought to the Home. She is safe and happy now and is getting well. "We shall keep these children just as long as we can," says the deaconess in charge. She "can" keep them just as long as she has for them the simplest support—the plainest food and coal to keep the great house warm. The home has no endowment or support, save only the voluntary contributions of friends. It is in need, and any aid will be appreciated. Any reader interested in this work should address Miss S. L. Smith, Verbank, Dutchess county, N. Y.

Calendars for Everybody

HIGHLY ornamental as well as useful, are many of the illustrated calendars issued for 1901. From Raphael Tuck & Sons, of New York, London and Paris, we have received a collection of most delicate and artistic calendars for the ensuing year. These dainty productions are ornaments fit for the walls of any boudoir, drawing-room, nursery, college dormitory, or private office. Here is an "Alma Mater" calendar of six sheets, poster size, two months on a sheet, each sheet dedicated, in color and verse, to one of the six foremost American colleges. Then there is a most artistic creation devoted to "the Grecian Graces," with appropriate verses by Shelley, Moore, Mrs. Hemans, and Buchanan. Another, "the Longfellow calendar," contains a portrait of the poet in relief, with extracts from his poems, each illustrated with a sketch in color.

Perhaps the handsomest of all of Tuck's calendars is the one in which each month is typified by the flowers of the seasons. This splendid production, a miniatnre art gallery in itself, is further beautified by scenes and selections from Shakespeare. It consists of six sheets, each 17x10 inches, caught together with a silken cord. Besides the above array, there is a Love calendar called "Guardian Angels," for the maiden fair, and one for children, entitled "Days of Delight." All these year cards are in the brightest, cheeriest colors, toned and finished with a degree of refinement, evidencing the publishers' foremost regard for the artistic. Besides the calendars, there is a new illustrated edition of Grimm's Fairy Tales, while Father Tuck's Annual contains over one hundred pages of new year stories, poems and pictures for the little ones. There are also friendship, engagement and week-day books, with verses from the great poets, and no end of handsome Christmas and New Year cards, all in color, and all suitable as tokens of remembrance at holiday time.

Character in Eyes and Hair

A MOST INTERESTING STUDY, WHICH MAY BE APPLIED IN EVERY-DAY LIFE AND EXPERIENCE

EITHER the eyes or the hair can be relied upon as a reasonably accurate index to character. In a person's eye his temperament, his mood, or amount of intelligence may be read, while the hair reveals the degree of birth and breeding, and is a barometer of a person's health and mental condition.

In judging character by the eyes, the color, the brightness or dullness, and the shape must be considered. The colors most common to the eyes—brown, gray, blue, hazel, and black, or what is called black—are seldom found in all the purity of the individual color. Regarding the black eye, like the Spaniard's, it is distance only that makes it appear to be purely black, for the reason that the deep yellow brown color is in such strong contrast to the white of the eye that the pupil always appears black. There are also eyes of so bright a hazel as to seem almost yellow, and there are eyes that bear but the often-reiterated remark concerning "green-eyed jealousy," for they are, to all appearances, positively green. They are sometimes beautiful when shaded with long and dark eyelashes, but they are not indicative of a good disposition, and belong particularly to a person of jealous temperament.

Ardor in Black Eyes

Intensity of feeling is to be found in the man or woman who possesses black eyes. Aaron Burr had such eyes. The brown eye, when not of the yellowish tint, but pure russet brown, shows an affectionate disposition, and the darker the brown—that is, the more they verge on to that deepest of brown color in eyes we are in the habit of calling black—the more ardent, while it is agreed that the affection of persons with black eyes is most lasting of all.

The clear, light blue eyes, of Americans, with a calm steadfastness in their glance, are indicative of a cheerful disposition, of a serene temper, and of a constant nature. The pleasant, light blue eye with the honest glance, must not be confounded with another sort of eye of a pale blue, almost steel-colored hue, which has a continually shifting sort of motion both of the eyelids and the pupils. Such eyes are indicative of a doubtful and selfish nature.

Very dark blue eyes with something of the tint of the violet show great power of affection and purity of mind, but it is remarked of these that the possessor of such eyes is seldom a person of much intellectuality. It is the universal opinion that blue eyes are more significant of tenderness, and of a certain yielding of purpose, than either the brown, black, or gray eyes.

Gray eyes with a greenish tint are indicative of much intellectuality. They are especially indicative of impulsive, impressionable temperaments—a mixture of the sanguine and bilious—which produce the poetic and artistic natures. The gray eye is an almost universal characteristic of men and women of great intellect. Shakespeare had deep gray eyes, which were remarkable for their near approach to blue. Up to the death of the poet the original color remained. Lord Byron had the gray eye of the poet. Coleridge also had gray eyes, but, like Shakespeare and Byron, the gray was at times, and under mental excitement particularly, tinted with another color.

Eyes of Hope and Despair

A person with a bright eye has naturally a large power of possible development. The bright-eyed one may be stupid, but it is because of lack of development and not of any dearth of natural powers. The hopeless eye is the large, placid ox-like orb.

When the eye is straight, finely arched, clear, transparent and modest, there will be found a frank, hopeful disposition, one easily approached, sensitive and responsive. Persons with narrow, half-closed eyes are more reserved, watchful of danger and cautious. There is a self-restraint in their expressions, and a dispositon to conceal facts and disguise their sentiments.

What Shape Means

Oblique eyes, like those of the Chinese and Japanese, are keen-witted, tactful, quick, artful, and alert.

The drooping of the upper lids is a sign of strong desire to accumulate property of all sorts. Persons with this eye will not only work hard to acquire money, but also knowledge, position, power and friends. They are often talented and are usually fond of games of chance.

The eyebrows, also, are full of meaning. A clear, thick, overshadowing eyebrow, free from bushiness, is always the certain sign of good, sound, manly, mature understanding, though the owner of it is seldom very original or bold, aspiring or adventurous in disposition. Horizontal eyebrows, rich and clearly defined, always denote understanding, combined with coldness of heart and great capacity for framing plans. Wild eyebrows are never found over the eyes of a mild person, while eyebrows waving above the eyes, short and thick, signify capacious memory, flexible, ingenuous and mild good nature. Arched eyebrows show the person to be proud, bold, high-spirited and vainglorious. Eyebrows with short, light hair generally denote a timid, credulous disposition, and such a person is apt to undertake more than he can perform. Black and thinly covered eyebrows signify that the individual will do nothing without much consideration.

Locks Can be Read

To read character in the hair, texture as well as color must be observed. The finer the hair the gentler the birth or the higher grade the family stock. People with the hair as fine as silk are of very refined tastes, of artistic temperament, but inclined to be moody and changeable. They are apt to be happy one day and depressed the next, but cheerful spirits predominate. They are easily influenced by those they like. They usually reach success in art, music, or literature—Emerson and Longfellow, for instance—and are fine managers, because they generally possess energy and adaptability. A person of common extraction seldom has very fine hair. The locks of such a person may be a crown of glory in quantity and color, but never in quality. Curly hair means that the owner has inherent grace and poetic ease of the body. The closer the ends of the hair cling together the more intellectuality does the owner possess. Jonathan Edwards and Audubon had such hair.

People with fine black hair are high-strung, while those with coarse black hair, if they are smart, are nearly always mean. Men or women with dark hair are more tempestuous than those with light hair. The dark eyes and complexions that go with the different shades of dark brown and black hair denote strong feelings. Black hair that is coarse and lustreless, in nine cases out of ten hides a treacherous and jealous nature.

Blonde and Red Hair

The lighter the hair, the more sensitive and touchy the owner, except in rare cases, where the person enjoys perfect health. Brown hair indicates common sense, good judgment and reason. Men with fine, light hair are, as a rule, smart and assertive. Men with fine brown hair are quick, thoughtful and less apt to be selfish than their very light or very dark haired brothers. Women with pale blonde hair, of the colorless, ashy kind, are impulsive, and changeable; those with dark brown hair the reverse.

People with very light and fine red hair generally succeed in anything they attempt. They are invariably well mannered, and know how to charm, but can be quarrelsome, selfish and irritable at times. Those with rich, dark-red hair are more amiable in every way.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions Will be Answered

Jan. 23

1. Can a man be a sincere Christian and belong to a trust or monopoly?
2. Can the argument, that a Christian is a citizen of heaven, and therefore ought not to mingle in the politics of this world to any extent, be supported from the Bible?
3. Is the phrase "a broken heart," wholly figurative?
4. Can a modern church succeed without music?
5. How should a person proceed who having no church affiliation desires to engage in humanitarian work?

Questions of the Week

1. What are the statistics that prove that the world is growing better morally, or worse?

It would be difficult to find statistics that would prove either the one or the other. Even criminal statistics, which would be more pertinent than any other, cannot be regarded as proving that the world's moral condition is improving or deteriorating. The fact, for example, that there are a larger number of persons in prison in one year compared with those ten years previously, might serve to show either that there was more crime or that there was greater activity in detecting and punishing crime. I would prefer to take a broader view to ascertain whether the world is getting better or worse. It is in great movements and in the disposition of the people that I would look for indications. It appears to me that the charitable movements of the time, the effort to alleviate suffering, is such an indication. The number of hospitals, asylums, homes that have been erected during the past century, surely indicate that there is more compassion, more sympathy and brotherhood than ever before. More thought and effort are being spent in alleviating misery, as witness the societies, such as the Red Cross, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the Humane Society and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, etc. The special efforts to mitigate the suffering from calamities is another indication of a better time. In the Johnstown flood, in the earthquake at Charleston, and the great famines in Russia and India, there were manifestations of charity such as the world never witnessed before. Public opinion also furnishes an indication. The world's conscience is quicker than of yore. It demands cleanliness of life in public men, and it is prompt to condemn on abstract principles of right and wrong the wrong-doing of a man or a nation. Yes, the world is getting better morally, but I doubt whether the fact could be proved by statistics. ROBERT WYNN.

2. Name some metaphors used in the Bible for national decadence?

A perpetual sleep (Jer. 51: 57); a fallen tree (Ezek. 31: 12, 13); a dead dragon (Ezek. 29: 3, 5); dry bones (Ezek. 37: 2-11); broken branches (Jer. 11: 16); a speckled bird (Jer. 12: 9); a marred girdle (Jer. 13: 10); a trodden-down vineyard (Jer. 12: 10,11); a lost sheep (Jer. 50: 6); a marred potter's vessel (Jer. 18: 1-12); dross (Ezek. 22: 18, 19); scum (Ezek. 24: 6); evil figs (Jer. 24: 3-8); a widow (Lam. 1: 1); gold become dim (Lam. 4: 1); wall with untempered mortar (Ezek. 13: 10-15); a hot oven (Hos. 7: 4-7); morning clouds and early dew (Hos. 6: 4); a silly dove (Hos. 7: 11); a deceitful bow (Hos. 7: 16); an empty vine (Ezek. 10: 1; 19: 10-13).

3. Why should old people who are in good health sit idly by merely because they are old, and not do anything for the Lord, while all around them are sin and wickedness?

The mental and physical strength being well preserved, there is no reason whatever, either scriptural or human. We are plainly told that "He that will not work neither shall he eat." And though in some instances they may be justified in resting in a measure from manual labor, yet how much good work may be accomplished by the aged man or woman for the Master. By the counsel and benefits of their experience during the voyage of life—teaching lessons of warning to younger mariners of the quicksands of temptations, and shoals of doubt to be avoided—and by influence of their patient pious example. We have no record of any idle time being spent by our Lord, and when he announces that "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am ye may be also," surely none but ingrates would be willing to sit idly by and dream the precious hours of life away whilst the Divine purchaser of our unworthy redemption is thus busily engaged.

A HARVEST HOME FESTIVAL AT VAN, ARMENIA

In a letter from Dr. G. C. Raynolds, of the American Mission at Van, Armenia, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a most interesting picture is enclosed, which we reproduce on this page. It shows a harvest-home festival at Zuvastan, a small village near Van. Of this pretty observance, Mrs. Elizabeth B. Ussher, of the American Mission, writes: "Then each boy carried a sickle or a bundle of grain, while some wore hats they had braided from straw, and still others sported more fantastic wreaths of wheat heads. At lunch time we were ushered into a pavilion under the trees, spread with cushions and separated from the rest of the orchard by festoons of fruit and flowers and grain. After lunch, the boys indulged in one of their favorite amusements, a frolic to the accompaniment of a shrill fife and drum."

4. Do Christ's words (Matt. 9: 15) about men fasting "when the bridegroom is taken from them" refer to our days and imply the duty of fasting?

Fasting indicated grief, unsatisfied desire, longing after a happier state. According to Zechariah 8: 19, when the Messiah came the Jewish fasts should be changed into "cheerful feasts." So, says Christ, shall this be true while I am with you; but when I withdraw my visible presence it will cause mourning among my disciples; for a time they will experience such grief as causes men to fast. There is no command in the words "they will fast," but simply the announcement of a future event. The Roman Catholic Church errs in making this her authority for meritorious fasts. "When the true Christian observes a fast, he is influenced by some sorrow of the heart, not by a mere mechanical rule."
G. E. KRAUTH.

5 What are the originals of "Mrs. Grundy" and "Mother Goose"?

"Mrs. Grundy" is a person frequently referred to in the comedy, "Speed the Plough," by Thomas Morton, 1798. Dame Ashfield, a farmer's wife in the play, is constantly solicitous as to "what Mrs. Grundy will say" in any and every possible event. The interrogation soon acquired a proverbial currency, and "Mrs. Grundy" came to mean "the world." "Mother Goose" was a real personage, belonging to a wealthy Boston family. Her eldest daughter, Elizabeth Goose, was married in 1715, by Cotton Mather, to a printer named Thomas Fleet. When their first child was born, "Mother Goose," the grandmother, spent her whole time in the nursery, pouring forth songs and ditties—some new, some old. The singing of the old lady greatly annoyed the whole street and especially quiet-loving Thomas Fleet. But, being a shrewd man, he conceived the idea of gathering together "Mother Goose's" melodies and others like them, and publishing them for the entertainment of the world.

6. When a party or organization that has encouraged corruption in a city undertakes the work of reform, ought Christians to help them or act independently?

Independently, by all means. When a party has been notoriously corrupt, promises of amendment, given probably under stress and in the fear of popular indignation, should not be believed or accepted. Public plunderers are not so converted, and their professions of future virtue strongly recall the old couplet about the devil wishing to become a monk when he was sick, but returning to his old diabolical ways the moment he recovered. There is not a well-authenticated instance on record of a corrupt party's absolute reformation. The real test of the sincerity of the reform professions of a bad organization would be its willingness to step down and give place to men of unblemished record, who have the public confidence. If a thief is converted, he immediately feels that he must make restitution. Similarly, if a corrupt party becomes reformed, being unable to give guarantees for its future integrity, let it show the genuineness of the change by relinquishing its hold and dropping into the background.
CHARLES E. DENSMORE.

7. Was Christmas ever a Fast Day?

Christmas has never been regarded as an actual Fast Day. Ever since 125 A. D. it has become a universal festival. Puritanism of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries rejected it as irreligious, and it has been regarded by some as being observed by them as a fast day, but it is not authoritatively confirmed. L. W. BROOKE.

8. When a husband or wife is converted after marriage, and the other partner persecutes and harasses the Christian, and makes continued association a misery, is the Christian justified in obtaining a separation or divorce?

A separation or divorce should be the last resort, after prayer and persuasion and patient endurance have been exhausted. A true Christian will so live that "they of the contrary part" will be ashamed, seeing their good works. The opposition of the other partner may never lead to serious results, it may only be a source of annoyance, and perhaps pain, which Christian grace will help one to endure, and if it can be endured, it should be But there may be cases in which a continuance together is productive of great evil. The conduct of the non-Christian may be such as to influence the children of the household to great and permanent evil. For their sakes a separation might be advisable if it secures their being placed under the exclusive care of the Christian.
L. T. RIGHTSELL.

9. Why does a fibre, when wet, lengthen, while a rope, when wet, contracts?

Fibre and organic substances generally increase in bulk and length by absorbing moisture. But, curiously enough, when several fibres are twisted together, the increase in bulk tends to force the fibres apart and untwist them and in this way cause the cord or rope which they form to shorten. So it comes about that a rope, like a clothesline, in getting wet expands laterally, partially untwists and shortens; while in dry weather the fibres contract, the twist tightens, and the rope lengthens. Since a single fibre or a hair expands both in width and length by absorbing moisture, the changes in length can be used to measure the amount of dampness of the air and is thus used in hygrometers of the Saussure type. The power exerted by these processes is not equal to that of chemical action, but it is very considerable and sometimes produces surprising results.
F. L. SAWYER.

10. What is the best course for a pastor to take when a few of his people become dissatisfied with his services? Should he ask them to withdraw, or should he resign?

If the few are dissatisfied without good reason the pastor ought not to resign. To pander to the whims, or prejudices, or dislikes of a few in a congregation is to court unrest for both pastor and people. If there is anything wrong in the pastor's doctrine or life calculated seriously to hinder his influence and success, let the matter be investigated, and if the evil cannot be cured, let him withdraw. But all ministers cannot be paragons of ability and excellence. If they are earnest and faithful they ought to be sustained and encouraged. The trouble usually comes from one or two men in the congregation who think they should rule everybody, the minister included. In such a case the people ought to stand by the minister, and let the troublers know they had better find a more congenial church home. JOSEPH HAMILTON.

The Career of Two Noble Christian Women

LEFT PALACES TO HELP HUMANITY

Princess Christian and the Duchess of Sutherland

AMONG the many organizations devised for helping people in need of assistance in Great Britain, are some that have been founded and developed chiefly through the interest taken in them by ladies prominent in aristocratic circles. In our democratic country it is not easy to fully realize how much prestige may be given in monarchical lands to any project by royal or patrician patronage. In former times Great Britain had not many opportunities of testing this fact, for the ladies of the royal family and of the peerage devoted their time chiefly to court gaieties; but under the benign rule of Queen Victoria a great change has occurred. The kindly interest the Queen has taken in the welfare of her people has had a potent influence in her own family and among the ladies of the court. Many of the fashionable ladies have followed the royal example, and have not only devised plans for alleviating the miseries of the poor and the unfortunate, but have given personal attention to details.

Prominent among these ladies was the Queen's cousin, the late Duchess of Teck, a daughter of King George the Third's youngest son. In the agricultural districts of the country an incalculable amount of good has been done through the "village homes" she established for the benefit of the women and girls of the rural population. The Queen's third daughter, Princess Helena, has taken up much of the work the Duchess of Teck began. She was already known as an active and zealous worker when the South African war broke out, and turned her philanthropic energy into a special channel. She made the welfare of the soldier in health and in sickness her earnest study. Her womanly tenderness was especially concerned by the fact that her own son was serving as an officer in the army. A young man of exceptional promise, he shared the dangers and fatigues of the campaign, and to the intense sorrow and distress of his mother and a host of friends, he was stricken down with fever, and died in the regimental hospital at Pretoria.

WOMEN CROFTERS SPINNING FOR THE DUCHESS OF SUTHERLAND'S ASSOCIATION

In the British army the name of the Princess Christian has become a very popular one, and many a soldier has emphasized the characteristics of her beautiful character by transposing her title and calling her the Christian Princess. One of her projects was the erection of homes for disabled soldiers, which are used not only as residences for the permanently disabled, but as rest homes for the convalescent. More than one thousand soldiers have already been taken care of in these homes. Closely allied to this work is that of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Help Society, organized by the Princess. Its object is to furnish the soldier or sailor who retires on a pension with a friend to whom he can turn for help and advice. Such pensioners are often the prey of designing persons when they leave the army or navy, being unused to civilian life. By getting a list of the members of the society the pensioner learns the name and address of some good man who will look after his interests free of charge and give him help and advice. The Princess is president of this society, and her influence has been potent in securing agents for it in all the chief towns and villages.

Another work in which Princess Christian has taken great interest and has personally supervised, is the construction of a hospital train, which bears her name. The train is a hospital on wheels, consisting of six cars, two of which are for the accommodation of the surgeons and nurses, and four as hospital wards. They are marvels of convenience, containing cupboards of ingenious construction for instruments and hospital appliances. They are fitted on the outside with pulleys and ropes, by which the attendants can raise a stretcher with a wounded man on it from the ground and deposit him on a bed or the operating table without jarring or jolting the suffering man. The Princess studied the various problems connected with this train, and herself suggested some of the devices.

The Princess, however, has not confined her attention to soldiers and sailors. For about thirteen years past she has been the chief of a society for furnishing free nursing to the poor. She began with only one nurse, but the value of such service was so signally proved that more were employed, and now an institution has been incorporated as a Home for Trained Nurses. In a recent report, it is shown that in one year recently the free nurses paid 9,760 visits to poor homes.

A kindred spirit to that of the Princess is found in Millicent, the young Duchess of Sutherland. A romantic story is told of her accession to the title. Her present husband when Marquis of Stafford visited the home of the Erskines and stayed to dinner. As the party was seated it was found that they were thirteen in number; so, to avoid any uneasiness of the guests in view of the old superstition, Miss Millicent Erskine, then sixteen years of age and not in society, was sent for from the children's quarters upstairs to join the dinner party and make the number fourteen. The heir to the Sutherland title and estates fell in love with her at first sight, and subsequently married her. She has proved in the best way worthy of her exalted position. Her interest in the poor of Scotland has been manifested in many ways. One of the best known is that of supplying the women with the materials and apparatus for weaving the famous Scotch tweed and providing methods of putting the finished article on the market. In this and other ways this philanthropic young lady has done good service to the needy families of Scotland.

MATCHLESS LOVE

...A NEW SERMON BY...

REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

TEXT, 1. John 4: 16: "God is love"

PERILOUS undertaking would it be to attempt a comparison between the attributes of God. They are not like a mountain range, with here and there a higher peak; nor like the ocean, with here and there a profounder depth. We cannot measure infinities. We would not dare to say whether his omnipotence, or omniscience, or omnipresence, or immutability, or wisdom, or justice, or love is the greater attribute. But the one mentioned in my text makes deeper impression upon us than any other. It was evidently a very old man who wrote the chapter from which I take the text. John was not in his dotage, as Prof. Eichhhorn asserted; but you can tell by the repetitions in the epistle and the rambling style, and that he called grown people "little children," that the author was probably an octogenarian. Yet Paul in mid-life, mastering an audience of Athenian critics on Mars' Hill, said nothing stronger or more important than did the venerable John when he wrote the three words of my text, "God is love."

Indeed, the older one gets the more he appreciates this attribute. The harshness and the combativeness and the severity have gone out of the old man, and he is more lenient, and, aware of his own faults, is more disposed to make excuses for the faults of others, and he frequently ejaculates: "Poor human nature!" The young minister preached three sermons on the justice of God and one on the love of God; but when he got old he preached three sermons on the love of God and one on the justice of God.

Far back in the eternities there came a time when God would express one emotion of his nature which was yet unexpressed. He had made more worlds than were seen by the ancients from the top of the Egyptian Pyramid, which was used as an observatory, and more worlds than modern astronomy has catalogued or descried through telescopic lens. All that showed the Lord's almightiness, but it gave no demonstration of his love. He might make fifty Saturns and a hundred Jupiters and not demonstrate an instant of love. That was and the secret of the universe. It was a suppressed emotion of the great God. But there would come a time when this passion of infinite love would be declared and illustrated. God would veil it no longer. After the clock of many centuries had run down, and worlds had been born and demolished, on a comparatively obscure star a race of human beings would be born, and who, though so bountifully provided for that they ought to have behaved themselves well, went into insurrection and conspiracy and revolt and war—finite against infinite, weak arm against thunderbolt, man against God.

If high intelligences looked down and saw what was going on, they must have prophesied extermination—complete extermination—of these offenders of Jehovah. But no! Who is that coming out of the throne-room of heaven? Who is that coming out of the palaces of the Eternal? It is the Son of the Emperor of the universe. Down the stairs of the high heavens he comes till he reaches the cold air of a December night in Palestine, and amid the bleatings of sheep, and the lowing of cattle, and the moaning of camels, and the banter of the herdsmen, takes his first sleep on earth, and for thirty-three years invites the wandering race to return to God and happiness and heaven. They were the longest thirty-three years ever known in heaven. Among many high intelligences, what impatience to get him back! The Infinite Father looked down and saw his Son slapped, and spit on, and supperless, and homeless, and then, amidst horrors that made the noonday heavens turn black in the face, his body and soul parted. And all for what? Why allow the Crown Prince to come on such an errand and endure such sorrow and die such a death? It was to invite the human race to put down its antipathies and resistance. It was because "God is love."

Now there is nothing beautiful in a shipwreck. We go down to look at the battered and split hulk of an old ship on Long Island or New Jersey coast. It excites our interest. We wonder when and how it came ashore, and whether it was the recklessness of a pilot or a storm before which nothing could bear up. Human nature wrecked may interest the inhabitants of other worlds as a curiosity, but there is nothing lovely in that which has foundered on the Rocks of Sin and Sorrow.

Yet it was in that condition of moral breakup that heaven moved to the rescue. It was loveliness hovering over deformity. It was the lifeboat putting out into the surf that attempted its demolition. It was harmony pitying discord. It was a living God putting his arms around a recreant world.

The schoolmen deride the idea that God has emotion. They think it would be a divine weakness to be stirred by any earthly spectacle. The God of the learned Bruch and Schleiermacher is an infinite intelligence, without feeling, a cold and cheerless divinity. But the God we worship is one of sympathy and compassion and helpfulness and affection. "God is love."

In all the Bible there is no more consolatory statement. The very best people have in their lives occurrences inexplicable. They are bereft or persecuted or impoverished or invalided. They have only one child, and that dies, while the next-door neighbor has seven children and they are all spared. The unfortunates buy at a time when the market is rising, and the day after the market falls. At a time when they need to feel the best for the discharge of some duty, they are seized with physical collapse. Trying to do a good and honest and useful thing, they are misrepresented and belied as if they had practised a villainy. There are people who all their lives have suffered injustices. Others of less talent, with less consecration, go on and up, while they go on and down. There are in many lives riddles that have never been solved, mysteries that have never been explained, heartbreaks that have never been healed. Go to that man or that woman with philosophic explanation, and your attempt at comfort will be a failure and you will make matters worse instead of making them better. But let the oceanic tide of the text roll in that soul and all its worriments and losses and disasters will be submerged with blessing, and the sufferer will say: "I cannot understand the reason for my troubles, but I will some day understand. And they do not come by accident. God allows them to come, and 'God is love.'"

Saved by the Attribute.

But for this divine feeling I think our world would long ago have been demolished. Just think of the organized wickedness of the nations! See the abominations continental! Behold the false religions that hoist Mohammed and Buddha and Confucius! Look at the Koran and the Shastra and the Zend-Avcsta, that would crowd out of the world the Holy Scriptures! Look at War, digging its trenches for the dead across the hemispheres! See the great cities, with their holocaust of destroyed manhood and womanhood! What blasphemies assail the heavens! What butcheries sicken the centuries! What processions of crime and atrocity and woe encircle the globe! If Justice had spoken it would have said: "The world deserves annihilation, and let annihilation come." If Immutability had spoken it would have said; "I have always been opposed to wickedness, and always will be opposed to it. The world is to me an affront infinite, and away with it." If Omniscience had spoken it would have said: "I have watched that planet with minute and all-comprehensive inspection, and I cannot have the offense longer continued." If Truth had spoken it would have said: "I declare that they who offend the law must go down under the law." But Divine Love took a different view of the world's obduracy and pollution. It said: "I pity all those woes of the earth. I cannot stand here and see no assuagement of those sufferings. I will go down and reform the world. I will medicate its wounds. I will calm its frenzy. I will wash off its pollution. I will become incarnated. I will take on my shoulders and upon my brow, and into my heart the consequences of that world's misbehavior. I start now, and between my arrival at Bethlehem and my ascent from Olivet I will weep their tears and suffer their griefs and

Die their Death.

Farewell, my throne, my crown, my sceptre, my angelic environment, my heaven, till I have finished the work and come back!" God was never conquered but once, and that was when he was conquered by his own love. "God is love."

In this day, when the creeds of churches are being revised, let more emphasis be put upon the thought of my text. Let it appear at the beginning of every creed and at the close. The ancients used to tell of a great military chieftain who, about to go to battle, was clad in armor, helmet on head and sword at side, and who put out his arms to give farewell embrace to his child, and the child, affrighted at his appearance, ran shrieking away. Then the father put off the armor that caused the alarm, and the child saw who he was and ran into his arms and snuggled against his heart. Creeds must not have too much iron in their make-up, terrorizing rather than attracting. They must not hide the smiling face and the warm heart of our Father, God. Let nothing imply that there is a sheriff at every door ready to make arrest, but over us all and around us all a mercy that wants to save, and save now.

If one paragraph of the creed seems to take you, like a child, out of the arms of a father, let the next paragraph put you in the arms of a mother. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." O, what a mother we have in God! And my text is when we are ill, or when we are maltreated, or when we are weary, or when we are trying to do better, or when we are bereft, or when we ourselves lie down to the last sleep. We feel the warm cheek of the mother against our cheek, and there sounds in it the hush of many mothers: "God is love."

This was the reason the Bible was written. The world needs no inspired page to tell it that God will chastise sin, for that is proved in the life of many an offender. You can look through the wicket of any prison, and see the fact which the world understood thousands of years before Solomon wrote it, "The way of the transgressor is hard." The world needed no Bible to tell it that God is omnipotent, for any one who has seen Mont Blanc or Niagara or the Atlantic Ocean in a cyclone, knows that. The world needed no Bible to tell it of God's wisdom, for everything, from a spider's web to the uphol-stery of a summer's sunset, from the globe of a dewdrop to the rounding of a world, declares that. But there was one secret about God that was wrapped up in a scroll of parchment, and it stayed there until apostolic hand unrolled that scroll and let out upon the world the startling fact, which it could never have surmised, never guessed, never expected, that he loved our human race so ardently that he will pardon sin and subdue the offender with a divine kiss, and turn foaming malefactors into worshipers before the throne. Oh, I am so glad that and that it can never be veiled! Tell it to the sinning, suffering, dying race; tell it in song and sermon, on canvas and in marble, on arch and pillar; tell it all around the earth—"God is love."

Notice that the wisest men of the nations for thousands of years did not, amid their idolatries, make something to represent this feeling, this emotion. They had a Jove, representing might; Neptune, the god of the sea; Minerva, the goddess of wisdom; Venus, the goddess of base appetite; Ceres, the goddess of corn; and an Odin, and an Osiris, and a Titan, and a Juggernaut, and whole pantheons of gods and goddesses; but no shrine, no carved image, no sculptured form has suggested a god of pure love. That was beyond human brain. It took a God to think that, a God to project that, a God let down from heaven to achieve that.

Fear is the dominant thought in all false religions. For that the devotees cut themselves with lances, and swing on iron hooks, and fall under wheels, and hold up the right arm so long that they cannot take it down. Fear, brutish fear! But love is the queen in our religion. For that we build temples. For that we kneel at our altars. For that we contribute our alms. For that martyrs suffered at Brussels Market Place, and at Lucknow, and Cawnpore, and Peking. That will yet bejewel the round earth, and put it an emerald on the great, warm, throbbing heart of God.

Fatal Ignorance

The world has had many specimens of slandered men and women, their motives slandered, their habits slandered—slandered until they got out of the world, and then perhaps honored by elaborate eulogium, and tall shaft of granite, all four sides chiseled with the story of how good and great they were. But no one under the heavens or over the heavens has ever been so much slandered as God. Bad men have fought against him, and have thought they heard his voice in the crash of a thunder-storm, but have not seen him in the sunshine of the spring morning. They have blamed him for wrongs which they had done themselves. The sight of a church building excites their disgust. They like the madrigal of a saloon better than the doxology of a temple. They do not want to live with him in heaven, but would prefer on leaving this world to go into some realm where God has abdicated the throne, and from which he is exiled forever. The reason is, they do not know him. They do not realize the fact that God is the best friend this world ever had or ever will have, and that he would do more for their happiness than any one in the wide universe; that he would help them in the wear and tear and tussle of this life; that he would hush their sorrows; that he would help cure the evil habits with which they sometimes struggle; that he would at their request not only forgive but forget the wrong things in their life. Yes, forget! And that is the only thing that God ever does forget—pardoned trangression. The best memory in the universe is God's memory, and he remembers all that has transpired in all time and in all eternity save one kind of occurrence. That passes completely out of his memory. He declares, "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more."

Do you want more proof that "God is love?" Yea, disinterested love. No compensation for its bestowal. No reward for its sacrifices. But I call that back. The world did pay him. It paid him on Calvary, paid him with brambles on the brow, and four spikes, and one spear for the side near the heart; paid him in execration; paid him with straw pillow in a barn and a cross on a hill; paid him with a third of a century of maltreatment and hardship, save one year—yea, is paying him yet in rejection of his mission of mercy. Having dethroned other kings, the world would like to dethrone the King of kings. But he knew what he was coming to when he left the portals of pearl and the land where the sun never goes down. Yes, he knew the world, how cold it is, and knew pain, how sharp it is, and the night, how dark it is, and expiation, how excruciating it is. Out of vast eternity he looked forward and saw Pilate's criminal court-room, and the rocky bluff with three crosses, and the lacerated body in mortuary surroundings, and heard the thunders toll at the funeral of heaven's favorite, and understood that the palaces of eternity would hear the sorrow of a bereft God.

What do the Bible and the Church liturgies mean when they say "He descended into hell?" They mean that his soul left his sacred body for a while and went down into the prison of moral night, and swung back its great door, and lifted the chain of captivity, and felt the awful lash that would have come down on the world's back, and wept the tears of an eternal sacrifice, and took the bolt of divine indignation against sin into himself, and, having vanquished death and hell, came out and came up, having achieved an eternal rescue, if we will accept it. Read it slowly, read it solemnly, read it with tears: "He descended into hell." He knew what kind of pay he would get for exchanging celestial splendor for Bethlehem caravansary, and he dared all and came, the most illustrious example in all the ages of disinterested love.

Yea, it was most expensive love. There is much human love that costs nothing, nothing of fatigue, nothing of humiliation. But the most expensive movement that the heavens ever made was this expedition salvatory. It cost the life of a King. It put the throne of God in bereavement. It set the universe aghast. It made omnipotence weep and bleed and shudder. It taxed the resources of the richest of all empires. It meant angelic forces detailed to fight forces demoniac. It put three worlds into sharp collision—one world to save, another to resist, and another to destroy. It charged on the spears, and rang with the battle-axes of human and diabolic hate. Had the expedition of love been defeated the throne of God would have fallen, and Satan would have mounted into supremacy, and sin would have forever triumphed, and mercy would have been forever dead. The tears and blood of the martyr of the heavens were only a part of the infinite expense to which the Godhead went when it proposed to save the world.

Now, the only fair thing for human hearts to do is to echo back that sovereign love. You and I have stood in mountainous regions where, uttering one distinct word, the echoes would come back with a resonance startling and captivating, and from all our hearts there should sound unto the heavens responses glorious and long-continued. Let the world change its style of payment for heavenly love. No more payment by blows on the cheek and scourging on the back, and hooting of mobs, but payment in ardors of soul, in true surrender of heart and love to the God that made us, and the Christ who ransomed us and the Eternal Spirit who by regenerating power makes us all over again.

Alexander the Great, with his host, was marching on Jerusalem to capture and plunder it. The inhabitants came out, clothed in white, led on by the high priest, wearing a mitre and glittering breast-plate, on which was emblazoned the name of God, and Alexander, seeing that word, bowed and halted his army, and the city was saved. And if we had the love of God written in all our hearts and on all our lives and on all our banners, at the sight of it the hosts of temptation would fall back, and we would go on from victory unto victory, until we stand in Zion and before God.

Leander swam across the Hellespont guided by the light which Hero the fair held from one of her tower windows, and what Hellesponts of earthly struggle can we not breast as long as we can see the torch of divine love held out from the tower windows of the King! Let love of God to us and our love to God clasp hands this minute. O, ye dissatisfied and distressed souls, who roam the world over looking for happiness and finding none, why not try this love of God as a solace and inspiration and eternal satisfaction? When a king was crossing a desert in caravan no water was to be found, and man and beast were perishing from thirst. Along the way were strewn the bones of caravans that had preceded. There were harts or reindeer in the king's procession, and some one knew their keen scent for water and cried out: "Let loose the harts or reindeer." It was done, and no sooner were these creatures loosened than they went scurrying in all directions looking for water, and soon found it, and the king and his caravan were saved; and the king wrote on some tablets the words: "As the hart panteth after the waterbrooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God."

Some have compared the love of God to the ocean, but the comparison fails, for the ocean has a shore, and God's love is boundless. But if you insist on comparing the love of God to the ocean, put on that ocean four swift sailing craft, and let one sail to the North, and one to the South, and one to the East, and one to the West, and let them sail on a thousand years, and after that let them all return and some one hail the fleet and ask them if they have found the shore of God's love, and their four voices would respond "No shore! No shore to the ocean of God's mercy!"

HOW A POOR NORTH CAROLINA MOUNTAINEER LEARNED TO READ IT BY THE LIGHT OF HIS CABIN FIRE

A MOUNTAINEER

A MISSIONARY worker of the American Sunday School Union traveling in Western North Carolina, in a recent letter relates this characteristic incident:

One frosty, bright October morning I started from home to visit a locality some twenty-eight miles distant, up in the mountains. About noon I stopped for a dinner of corn pone and buttermilk at a little log cabin by the wayside. Then I again shouldered my load and started, the trail growing steeper and the mountain more rugged as I ascended. I stopped for the night at a little mud-daubed hut beside a beautiful mountain stream.

Soon after supper I asked to be shown to bed, and my host, after lighting a piece of pine knot at the open fireplace, led the way to a ladder in the corner of the one lower room the house contained. Motioning to me to ascend, he followed me with the torch until, standing on one of the rungs of the ladder, his head and shoulders protruded above the floor of the loft where I was to sleep. Here he stopped, and holding the torch above the attic floor, pointed with his other hand to a bed in the farthest corner, saying that I was to "roost thar." Making my way carefully across the rickety floor, between piles of vegetables and grain below, and dodging strings of dried pumpkin, and apples, and onions tied together by their tops to the rafters overhead, I reached the bed, and my host, after inquiring if I had sufficient "kiver" (cover on the bed), descended the ladder, taking his torch with him, and letting down the trap door at the top of the ladder as he went down, left me in darkness.

I could not sleep. Toward morning it began to rain, first gently, then harder, accompanied with wind which drove it through the clapboard roof, and the drip, drip of the water on the naked floor added greatly to my discomfort. I rose early and descended the ladder to the room below, where the wife of my host was busily cooking breakfast at the open fire. I started immediately after breakfast and during a driving rain storm. The greater part of the way there was but a dim trail through almost unbroken forests. I was somewhat startled, therefore, as I was scrambling up this dim path, miles from any human habitation, to be accosted by a man emerging from a dense thicket into the trail. He was dressed in ragged homespun, and wore a broad-brimmed slouch hat and heavy brogan shoes. He carried a heavy stick and a large grain sack. The clay on his clothes and hands showed that his occupation was that of a medicine root-digger. He said he was a native born and bred in the mountains, and had never attended school a day in his life. He grew up a wicked boy and young man, without religious or other instruction, and did not know "ary letter in th' books" when he married. Soon after his marriage, however, through the influence of his wife and the preaching of a godly minister, he was led to forsake his sins and accept Christ as his Saviour. He determined to learn to read then, so he could study God's Word for himself; and with no help but that furnished by his wife, who he said, "could read a right smart," accomplished his purpose; a Testament being the only text-book available.

A TYPICAL MOUNTAIN CABIN IN WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA

"We wuz pore them times, an' had to wuk powerful hard. Mee an' th' ole womern wuz clarin' uv a piece of woods up on the mounting fer backer 'nd cohn. We wuz both powerful tired when night'd cum, but I wuz sot on larnin' t' read, 'nd she said she'd hope me (help me) all 't she could.

"So when night'd come she'd go hum t' our cabin 'nd git us a snack t' eat, while I'd git me a armful uv rich pine 'nd pine-knots 'at I'd tote home t' burn in th' fire-place, fur light.

"Arter eatin' we'd git down afore th' fire 'ith our Testyment 'nd th'ow on a pine-knot fer light. She'd larn me th' letters, 'nd atter awhile when I'd got them good, t' spell. Hit wuz mighty slow larnin' that away, but we stuck to it 'nd atter awhile I begun t' read sum. Still I stuck to it. The old womern wuz so tired 't night 'at she'd git sleepy 'nd haf to go t' bed; but I'd stick to it till th' pine wuz all burnt up. Sumtimes I'd come acrost a sticker (hard word) 'nd haf to wake up th' ole womern t' hope me sum. Atter awhile I got so 't I c'd read a right smart 'n th' Testyment, but never c'd git no sense out'n no uther print."

His knowledge of God's word showed that he not only could "read a right smart in the Testyment" but that he also had done so, and got sense out of it.

We held a little prayer-meeting away out on the mountain-side, in the rain, and I gave him a Bible to take the place of the Testament that he said was worn out. Bidding him farewell, I started on up the trail, slipping and stumbling as before; but I did not heed the rain and mud now. I climbed up the mountain-side singing:

There's sunshine in my soul to-day, more glorious and bright
Than dwells in any earthly sky, for Jesus is my light.

A "SHACK," NOW A SUNDAY SCHOOL

THE VALUE AND POWER OF SENTIMENT

JESUS ANOINTED AT BETHANY : : :

International Sunday School Lesson for January 6th: Matthew 26: 6-16.

"SHE HATH WROUGHT A GOOD WORK ON ME"

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT: Mark 14: 8: "She hath done what she could."

IT is apropos to the dominant thought of our lesson to consider for a few moments the mighty tide of Christian sentiment that pours in upon every thoughtful mind in contemplating the completion of nineteen Christian centuries and our entrance upon a new century.

Napoleon in Egypt aroused his army to utmost courage and tireless effort by saying, as he pointed to the pyramids, "Forty centuries are looking down upon you." A few sordid soldiers, that cared only for pay and plunder, may have sneered at their leader's "sentimental" appeal, but it stirred every one who had in him one lingering spark of the divine fire of sentiment, the mightiest thing in God's world. All such must hear also at this crossing of the centuries the great voices of time and eternity.

Six Months About the Cross We are only two-thirds through the life of Christ in this eighteen-months' course of studies about him, and yet we are within a week of the cross. This is vastly significant, that one-third of the life of Christ is about his death and the events associated with it before and after. This practical age calls upon the pulpit and the Sunday School to talk more of his beautiful life and less "sentimentally" of his death. There are some churches where they do not sing often, if at all,

There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins,
And sinners plunged beneath that flood
Lose all their guilty stains.

The two scarlets, of sin and redemption, do not dye that hymn with any deeper red than that of both Testaments. "Christ and him crucified," Christ as Sovereign and Sacrifice, that is the text of which the whole Bible preaches, bringing to sinful, helpless men the gospel or good news of pardon through Jesus the Saviour, and protection and direction through Christ the King. Christ is prophet, priest and king. Let us not champion any one of these offices as if it were all, always harping on "the words of Jesus," as if he were only a prophet; or always of his death, as if he were only a priest; or talking only of the Christianizing of society, as if he were only a king. Let us behold and proclaim him as prophet, priest and king.

What has drawn the world's love to Christ more than wonderful words and works, or even his kingly march through all centuries and countries, is the outpoured spikenard of his broken heart when he was "lifted up" to die for all the sinful souls of men.

Lessons from Bethany Now when Jesus was in Bethany. How Jesus glorifies whatever he touches! Bethany would have never been heard of outside of little Palestine had not one of its families welcomed Jesus to their home. Nor would any outside have ever heard of Bethlehem or Nazareth had he not passed through their streets; nor of the fishermen apostles, whose names are on stately buildings in great cities all over the world, had they not walked with him. The instinctive desire for glory that stirs in all save brutish men can most surely be gratified by welcoming Christ to our hearts and walking with him. All such shall "shine as the stars forever and ever," with his reflected light, in the other world if not in both. The history of Bethany, if we review what had preceded this lesson and add a crowning event that followed, suggests a multitude of lessons, such as:

1. The blessings of a Christian home. One home was started with this motto:

Our home, what shall it be?
Like lovely Bethany,
A place where Christ doth come;
The wife, like Mary, sitting at the Saviour's feet
"He whom thou lovest Lord," the husband's title sweet—
Such be our home.

2. Bethany also suggests that Christ can use a variety of workers, practical Martha as well as sentimental Mary. Better still to combine their contrasted characteristics.

"Wisdom and sight are well,
But trust is best—"
This "better part" choose as your portion,
And your soul shall rest
Calm as the well-beloved upon the Saviour's breast.

Do noble things, not dream them all day long
And thus make life, death, and the vast forever,
One grand, sweet song.

3. Bethany is also a teacher of the resurrection in the story of the raising of Lazarus, for which the feast of this lesson may have been a thanksgiving.

4. In that same story we have a living prophecy of heavenly reunion. A family whom death had sundered is reunited temporarily on earth as if to picture the eternal reunions of heaven.

5. And the ascension of Jesus, later, from Bethany, reminds us that death is to every Christian an ascension.

6. But the lesson of Bethany on which we wish to put chief emphasis, is a lesson for life rather than death, namely, the preciousness and power of Christian sentiment, as shown in Christ's treatment of the precious spikenard, as contrasted, not alone with the covetousness of Judas, but also with the so-called "practical" spirit of other apostles present who counted such prodigality of love a "waste." (Read Mark 14: 3-9 and John 11: 55-57; 12: 11, to get points of the story not given by Matthew.)

Bountiful Giving of the Beautiful An alabaster cruse of exceeding precious ointment poured upon his head. The time is the eve of "Palm Sunday" though only Jesus knew what would be on the morrow, and he knew not only of the hosannas but also of the cry that would so soon follow: "Crucify him." They were in the house of Simon, the leper, who was possibly the husband of Martha, but in either case ostracized from home by his deadly disease. "Martha served" a supper, at which Jesus reclined, oriental fashion, on a lounge, with his head toward the table, his feet at the other end of the lounge. Mary—not Mary Magdalene, but Mary of Bethany—in an outburst of love for Christ, took a flask of spikenard, whose cost was equal to the wages of a workingman for a year, and poured it on his head and feet, and wiped the latter with her hair, and "the house was filled with the odor of the ointment." It was the custom to anoint kings and priests as symbolic prayers that the Holy Spirit might come in joy and power upon their hearts. Distinguished teachers also were sometimes so anointed at feasts. Mary was proclaiming that Jesus was to her Prophet, Priest and King. This act of Mary is not an act by itself, but belongs to the history of sentiment, which is a mighty factor in the life of God and man. If God counted everything "waste" save work, he would not have poured out with such lavish hand the beauty with which he has adorned flowers and birds and fish, and the fragrance which is itself a feast to cultivated senses, and the music of nature overflowing from millions of throats among the peerless feathered songsters whose chief mission is to sing. Those who with open hand and heart and voice give to God and to humanity beautiful churches and other forms of art, have poured precious ointment anew upon the feet of Christ.

Sentiment not a "waste" To what purpose is this waste? Not Judas alone, who was moved by covetousness, but the apostles generally made this criticism. I have no doubt Martha expressed the same sentiment, just as on a former occasion she thought Mary was wasting her time sitting at Jesus' feet to hear his words, when she might have been setting the table, that he and they might be fed the sooner. Mary and Martha! we meet them almost as often as we meet sisters. Mothers should from the cradle seek to develop Martha on the side of sentiment, lest her life become a drudgery to things seen, while equally careful to add the practical to the sentimental in the development of Mary. On the beach stand two children of the Mary and Martha temperaments. As the breakers dash on the beach, poetic Mary exclaims: "How bravely they come in till they break out crying!" But too prosy Martha turns up her nose and says: "Soap!" Two young ladies, chums by attraction of contrasted temperaments, are standing in a railway station as one of the greatest of engines comes rolling in with an express train. Sentimental Mary exclaims: "Don't a railway train impress you?" "It would," replies too practical Martha, "if I was on the track." Because mothers and teachers do not sufficiently seek to develop sentiment in too prosy children and youth, we find the story of Bethany's feast daily repeated, in the case of those who cannot appreciate the preciousness and power of sentiment. An alabaster cruse of precious ointment God has poured out in Niagara's strength and beauty, but there were persons so defective on the side of sentiment they saw nothing of interest in the falls till the electricians harnessed them to their dynamos. In a beautiful church, whose beauty is outpoured worship in giving, they only calculate how many paupers might have been fed with the money that it cost.

She hath wrought a good work. Thus Jesus rebukes those who depreciate the bountiful and beautiful in worship. "What good does it do?" the critics say. What good does anything do that does not go below and beyond material benefit and work good in the very souls of man? Daniel Webster, in one of his speeches, refers with deserved scorn to those who were then wont to say of our flag and government: "What is all this worth?" And Edward Everett, in his oration on Bunker Hill, pours like contempt on those who ask of the monument there erected: "What is the good of it?" One of the saddest signs of the times is that programmes of what Congress was expected to do at the crossing of the centuries, given recently by Senators and Congressmen, contain no hint of any moral legislation, which alone corresponds to Gladstone's definition of the purpose of law: "To make it as hard as possible to do wrong and as easy as possible to do right."

As to the critics, who would have the money that is given to worship used instead for charity, it is to be noted that it is those whose noble sentiments are kept flowing like a river by bountiful gifts to worship, that do most of the giving to the poor, and those who give most to foreign missions are the very ones who give most for home missions.

Flowers for the Living She did it for my burial. Joseph, of Arimathea, timidly neglected the Christ in whom he believed when he was alive, but gave him a new tomb, no doubt covered with flowers, when he was dead—Nicodemus, another secret disciple among the Sanhedrim judges, assisting at the burial. How much better the cruse of Mary of Bethany, who showed her love to the persecuted Christ while he was alive! So to-day many a flower on the coffin is a belated atonement for bitter words spoken, kind words and flowers withheld when the ears could have heard them and the fragrance of appreciation would have brightened life.

Some people, judging from their reluctance to give a word of encouragement to their minister, seem to think it is better for him to die of depression than to run the risk of being inflated by a compliment.

Editors, even more than pastors, are likely to wait for their flowers and spikenard till they are dead, which recalls a beautiful story told of Miss Julia A. Ames, when associate editor of The Union Signal. Her office was quite near to that of Miss Alice Guernsey, editor of The Young Crusader. One day last summer she went to the office of Miss Guernsey, and standing by her desk said: "Alice, we all lead lives so busy here that I have thought we often fail to speak the good we think, and I just came in to-day to say I love you." There are little alabaster boxes of precious ointment, of loving and appreciative words, that would make the world sweeter and brighter, if only the seal of silence were broken and the precious ointment poured forth.

Nilie was four years old. He had been my favorite playfellow all summer. But one day he sat by my side for a long time, unusually thoughtful. At last he turned, and said: "Do you love me?"

"Why, Nilie," said I, "of course I love you. What made you think I did not?"

He answered: "Well, I didn't know; I never heard you say much about it."

Rev. Dr. Henry Clay Trumbull writes: "No person was ever harmed, nor could be, by being assured of the love, the confidence, or the high regard of another, or of others generally. It is self-confidence, not a consciousness of having the confidence of others, that endangers a man's right estimate of his powers and of his position. Flattering or praising a man for his supposed good qualities or attainments may, indeed, promote his over-estimate of himself; but assuring him that he is loved or trusted or honored by another, is simply laying on him a new sense of responsibility and obligation, and giving him another call to prove worthy of the good opinion which is now accorded him."

ANCIENT ALABASTER CRUSES

A MODERN ELIZABETH FRY

The Career of Frances Joseph, a Colored Woman, who has Devoted her Life to Prison Evangelization...Working in Twenty-two States

AS beautiful Elizabeth Fry, the angel of Newgate and many another prison, and next to Howard greatest of prison reformers, labored among criminals of her time, Frances Joseph, a woman of the negro race, is laboring among prisoners, black and white, in Southern jails. That Elizabeth Fry, wealthy and of the highest social position, should impress people of station and authority, overcome prejudice and win sympathy and cooperation, is small matter for marvel; but that the daughter of a lowly negro minister, a seamstress making her living by her needle, should succeed in doing what Mrs. Joseph has accomplished, may be cause for considerable wonder.

Mrs. Joseph is the first American woman to choose as her life mission work among negro prisoners. Her labors, begun for her own people, were quickly extended to white unfortunates. "I have letters from many white mothers thanking me for kindness to their children. Young men from everywhere come to New Orleans—particularly at Mardi Gras times; they get into trouble; I find them in jail; write to their people and help them all I can." Her regular visits and ministration includes the prison-yards of both races.

MRS. FRANCES JOSEPH
(As she appeared in Spurgeon's Tabernacle)

Known in Two Continents

She has indeed accomplished great good, and commands the respectful consideration of her community, the commendation of the Mayor and other officials of New Orleans; the confidence of the Governor of her State and the warm regard of the Prison Reform Association of Louisiana. In a recent trip abroad, whither she went as delegate to the International W. C. T. U. Convention, she was heard at Edinburgh, the Lord Lieutenant of Scotland being one of her auditors; later at Belfast, Ireland; next in Spurgeon's Tabernacle, London, and then at Paris, by audiences as attentive as those which have recently been her listeners in New York. As Mrs. Fry's hearers were confined to one continent it may be said that Mrs. Joseph, in point of territory covered by personal addresses, has somewhat the advantage of her great English prototype. In her own country she has visited twenty-two prisons in as many different States. Many of the reforms which Mrs. Fry sought for are now an integral part of prison discipline everywhere; others—as for instance, classification of prisoners according to age and degree of offense—Mrs. Joseph in common with philanthropists the world over is struggling to effect. During a call at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, Mrs. Joseph, explaining how she was drawn into her work for prisoners, said:

"It has been nearly ten years since I began prison work. I felt called to it as ministers are called to the Gospel. The first impulse came one Saturday in passing the depot of the Mississippi Valley Railroad, where the train stood, all ready and coupled to start. Nearby an aged woman was sobbing bitterly. 'Can I help you?' I asked. 'No, my child,' she answered, 'my only son is in that gang going to the State Prison.' I looked as she pointed, and saw twenty-four colored people boarding the train. I learned that nineteen out of the twenty-four were sent up for larceny. Think of this batch going up every thirty or forty days!

Her "Call to Prison"

"That night, as I knelt and begged God to comfort the aged mother whose son was locked behind prison walls, a voice seemed whispering to me, 'You must go to prisons and ask prisoners to pray that God will help them to resist temptation, and tell them never to do anything that will bring them back after they get out of their present trouble.'" She was frightened at the thought; it followed her up; she asked the Mayor's permission to visit the jails, and went in spite of the protests of her friends, who disapproved her course. On her first visit she went alone; none would accompany her. That day she shook hands with three murderers, talked and prayed with them. Two weeks later, she stood by one as the death sentence was read; and in another two weeks, went with him to the gallows, turning away just before he was launched into eternity, but not before he had thanked her for leading him to Christ. Through her efforts 2,000 men have pledged themselves to better lives; one of her converts is a minister of God. "When people are friendless and in prison, they will listen," she says; "they have time to think. In nearly every church in New Orleans I see some face that I have met in prison, some one with whom I have pleaded; some one whose pledge I have taken." Securing judicial clemency in certain cases, enlisting counsel in others, effecting reconciliations between parents and wayward children, providing clothing for prisoners who had none, have all come within the line of her many-sided labors. She has bought material, taken it to jail, cut it into garments, and then stood over idle women, and men, too, and taught them how to sew. Thus, the fashioning of raiment served a triple purpose in keeping prisoners occupied, imparting an industry, and providing the needy with covering. She seeks to have employment ready for the liberated. Her work is unsalaried. She supports herself as a seamstress.

GOD'S MESSENGER IN THE JAIL-YARD

Her chief efforts now are directed to the separation of children from adult prisoners. "A child of six," she says, "committed for malicious mischief in the yard with hardened criminals, does not take long to become a criminal. The authorities have promised to turn young offenders, whose sins are not too serious, over to me as soon as I have a place for them. The ground has been secured, and I am seeking enough money to build upon it. When I have that home, I'm going to show what can be done with vagrant and delinquent children. I will make them acceptable wage-earners."

A flourishing kindergarten in New Orleans owes its existence to Mrs. Joseph. She saw its need among her people, urged that need upon her white friends, and with their aid secured its establishment and support.

A Monarch's Reproof

COL. JAMES G. HOLMES, of Charleston, S. C., sends to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an anecdote of Czar Nicholas I. of Russia, which is especially timely. Apropos of a recent article by Mr. W. T. Stead on Nicholas II., Col. Holmes writes:

Nicholas I., like his great-grandson, evidently possessed common sense, and likewise a decided opinion that all human beings, even serfs, had rights which their rulers were bound to observe, and were entitled to consideration. When the Hon. Henry Middleton, of Charleston, S. C. (during the Monroe administration), was minister of the United States to Russia, Nicholas I. was the Czar of all the Russias, and treated the American minister with great consideration and cordiality. The intercourse at that time between Russia and the outside world was not so free then as to-day, and the United States was comparatively an unknown social and political entity. Nicholas I. cultivated the society of the highly educated and cultured South Carolinian, who being a slave owner, and from a slave State—a lesser czar, as it were—could appreciate the great responsibilities and moral obligations of the ruler of all the Russias. The anecdote to follow was related to the writer by the late Mr. Williams Middleton, who served under his father, Hon. Henry Middleton, as United States secretary of legation (or, one of the secretaries). The United States minister, while walking on the quay one morning, was overtaken and passed by the Czarewitch and his English governor, they saluting courteously as they passed, but so absorbed were they in conversation that they failed to return the salute, or obeisance, of two Muscovite serfs, who halted, and holding on their tall conical hats, bowed almost to the pavement. Just then the United States minister heard rapid strides behind him (for Nicholas I. had a short body and peculiarly long legs), and found it was no less a personage than the Czar, who strode by, saluting as he went not only Mr. Middleton but also the Muscovites. Overtaking the Czarewitch and his governor, he slapped the cap from the head of the former, and grasping him by the hair of his head, led him back to the now trembling serfs, and bowed his son's head to the earth before the poor, alarmed creatures. He then turned upon the governor, and apparently gave him a severe lecture. Joining Mr. Middleton, the Czar said:

"I am glad the American minister has witnessed how a barbarian reproves his son and heir."

Then in more gentle speech, he went on to say, "In the providence of God, that boy will some day sit upon my throne, and rule all of my people, and if I do not teach him now that these poor slaves are human beings, and deserve consideration at the hands of their rulers, he will never learn it, for few will have the courage to tell him the truth when he becomes Czar."

Of course, in the above quotations no pretense is made to accuracy of mere words. The incident related goes to show that rulers of great countries are seldom as they are represented by writers, who rarely are permitted the privilege accorded to Mr. Stead, but use their imaginations for their ink-stands. The Hon. Henry Middleton brought back from St. Petersburg to his home in Charleston, S. C., a full length portrait in oil of Czar Nicholas I., a good picture and said to be a good likeness, and though it is not life-size, is large enough to portray the face and figure clearly. It shows markedly the peculiarity alluded to, of a short body and very long legs. It was while looking at this portrait in Mr. Williams Middleton's library, at his then temporary home on East Battery some years after the Civil War, that the anecdote was told, and Mr. Stead's delightful paper has revivified it. His account of the pleasant reception of Nicholas II., and his naturalness seems, in connection with the incidents noted above, again to show the sterling worth and manliness of the Czars of Russia through four generations at least, and that Nicholas II., when reading The Lady of the Lake with his English governor, after the passage describing King James riding down the steep descent at Stirling, and the people crying out, "Long live the commons' king, King James," should exclaim with sparkling eyes—as Mr. Stead recounts—"The commons' king! that's what I'd like to be," seems not unnatural. Not so long a step, after all, from Nicholas I. to Nicholas II.—noblesse oblige!

LINCOLN'S CHRISTIANITY PROVED

Conclusive Evidence that the Martyr-President was a Firm Believer in Christ, the Atonement, and an Inspired Bible

GEN. CHAS. H. T. COLLIS

IN a booklet entitled The Religion of Abraham Lincoln,* by General Charles H. T. Collis, new evidence is given of the martyr-President's Christian belief. The whole nation will be grateful to General Collis for printing these interesting facts, for they clear away doubt and should end further controversy concerning Mr. Lincoln's religious views. The author has gathered his testimony not only from the public records, but from an intimate acquaintance with Mr. Lincoln in Washington, in the army hospitals, and at the front during the days immediately preceding General Lee's surrender and the President's untimely taking off. The pages include correspondence between General Collis and the late Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, and interesting anecdotes by Major-General Daniel E. Sickles and Hon. Oliver S. Munsell.

In General Collis' first letter addressed to Colonel Ingersoll, dated on Lincoln's birthday, February 12, 1893, the writer says:

You say that Lincoln's religion was the religion of Voltaire and Tom Paine. I know not where you get your authority for this, but if the statement be true, Lincoln himself was untrue, for no man invoked "the gracious favor of Almighty God" in every effort of his life with more apparent fervor than did he, and this God was not the Deists' God, but the God whom he worshiped under the forms of the Christian church, of which he was a member.

In a letter dated Feb. 21, General Collis writes:

If I find that Mr. Lincoln professed Christianity, worshiped at a Christian church, admitted his belief in the divinity of Christ, and boldly asserted the doctrine of the inspiration of the Scriptures, I am compelled to deny that "his religion was the religion of Voltaire and Tom Paine," or to confess that he was an impostor. There is no middle course.

That Mr. Lincoln regularly attended a Christian church in Washington is a historical fact. Though not a "member," as we technically understand it, he was a constant attendant of Dr. Gurley's Presbyterian Church, near the corner of Fourteenth street and New York avenue. Dr. Gurley was his pastor, and was present at his deathbed. He also frequently attended Dr. Sutherland's church.

That he was a Christian at heart as well as in form, and believed in the efficacy of the prayers and support of Christian denominations let extracts from his addresses verify.

Leaving his home at Springfield with a full—a sorrowful—appreciation of the awful responsibility devolving upon him, surrounded by a Christian community with whom he had lived a quarter of a century, he thus addressed them: "I now leave, not knowing when or whether ever I may return, with a task before me greater than that which rested upon Washington. Without the assistance of that Divine Being who ever attended him I cannot succeed. With that assistance I cannot fail. Trusting in Him, who can go with me and remain with you, and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will yet be well. To His care commending you, as I hope in your prayers you will commend me, I bid you an affectionate farewell."

To the Presbyterians he said: "It has been my happiness to receive testimonies of a similar nature, from I believe, all denominations of Christians. This to me is most gratifying, because from the beginning I saw that the issues of the great struggle depended on the Divine interposition and favor. Relying as I do upon the Almighty power, and encouraged as I am by these resolutions which you have just read, with support which I receive from Christian men, I shall not hesitate to use all means to secure the termination of the rebellion, and will hope for success."

To the Methodists he said: "Nobly sustained as the Government has been by all the churches, I would utter nothing which might in the least appear invidious against any, yet, without this, it may fairly be said that the Methodist Episcopal Church, not less devoted than the best, is, by its greatest numbers, the most important of all. It is no fault of others that the Methodist Church sends more soldiers to the field, more nurses to the hospitals, and more prayers to heaven, than any other. God bless the Methodist Church, bless all the churches, and blessed be God, who in this our great trial giveth us the churches."

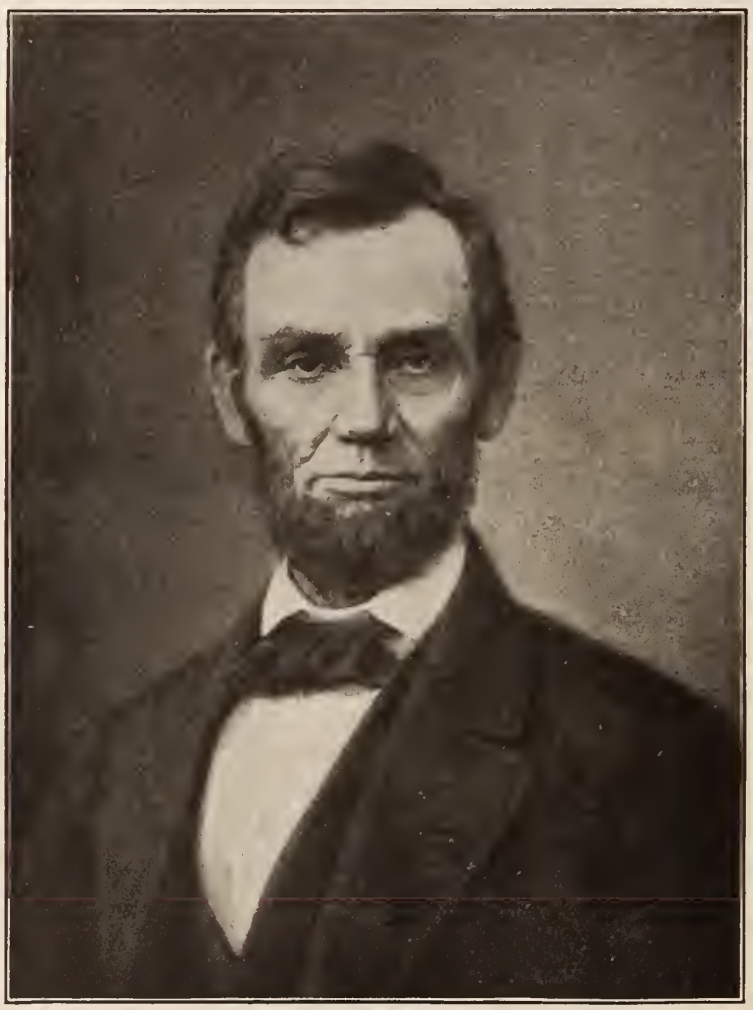
To Mrs. Gurney, the wife of an eminent Quaker preacher, he wrote: "I am much indebted to the Christian people of the country for their constant prayers and consolation, and to no one of them more than yourself."

When requested to preside at a meeting of the Christian Commission held in Washington on February 22, 1863, he replied: "The birthday of Washington and the Christian Sabbath coinciding this year, and suggesting together the highest interests of this life and of that to come, is most propitious for the meeting proposed."

He even went so far as to differ with those Christians who believe Sunday to have been instituted for the "ease of creation": Lincoln believed it was also "the Lord's day."

On November, 16, 1862, he promulgated the following military order: "The President, Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, desires and enjoins the orderly observance of the Sabbath by the officers and men in the military and naval service. The importance for man and beast of the prescribed weekly rest, the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors, a becoming deference to the best sentiment of a Christian people, and a due regard for the Divine will, demand that Sunday labor in the army and navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity. The discipline and character of the national forces should not suffer, nor the cause they defend be imperiled, by the profanation of the day or name of the Most High."

If on September 4, 1864, you had served him with notice that thirty years later you would claim him as a Voltarian because he disbelieved in the inspiration of the Bible and the divinity of Christ, he could not more emphatically have repudiated the honor than he did when he then said to the colored men of Baltimore who presented him with a Bible:



ABRAHAM LINCOLN

"In regard to the Great Book, I have only to say that it is the best gift which God has given to man. All the good of the Saviour of the world is communicated in this book." What an exquisite epitome of the inspiration of the Scriptures and the Atonement! And six months later in his second inaugural address, do you remember how he borrowed the words of the Son to illustrate the justice of the Father, "Woe unto the world because of offenses," etc.

Next follows General Sickles' own description of his memorable interview with Lincoln after the Battle of Gettysburg. Said General Sickles:

"Mr. Lincoln, we heard at Gettysburg that here at the Capital you were all so anxious about the result of the battle, that the Government officials packed up and got ready to leave at short notice with the official archives."

"Yes," he said, "some precautions were prudently taken, but, for my part, I was sure of our success at Gettysburg."

"Why," I asked, "were you so confident? The Army of the Potomac has suffered many reverses."

There was a pause. The President seemed in deep meditation. His pale face was lighted up by an expression I had not observed before. Turning to me he said:

"When Lee crossed the Potomac and entered Pennsylvania followed by our army, I felt that the crisis had come I knew that defeat in a great battle on Northern soil involved the loss of Washington, to be followed, perhaps, by the intervention of England and France in favor of the Southern Confederacy. I went to my room and got down on my knees in prayer. Never before had I prayed with so much earnestness. I wish I could repeat my prayer. I felt that I must put all my trust in Almighty God. He gave our people the best country ever given to man. He alone could save it from destruction. I had tried my best to do my duty, and found myself unequal to the task. The burden was more than I could bear. God had often been our Protector in other days. I prayed that he would not let the nation perish. I asked him to help us and give us victory now. I felt that my prayer was answered. I knew that God was on our side. I had no misgivings about the result at Gettysburg."

"How do you feel about Vicksburg, Mr. President?" I asked.

"Grant will pull through all right. I am sure of it," said Mr. Lincoln. "I have been despondent, but am so no longer, God is with us."

The book concludes with Mr. Munsell's account of his interview with the President, ending as follows:

"Mr. Lincoln, in our dear old Illinois, of which we have just been talking, we are anxious, very anxious, in regard to the issue of this terrible war. We have our opinions, our hopes, and our fears; and sometimes the suspense is terrible. The thought has come to me, as I have talked with you, that you see the whole field as no other man sees, or can see it: and it has awakened in me an intense desire to ask you, seeing as you thus do see it, will our country come through safe and live?"

Mr. Lincoln in the outset of our interview had seemed more worn and depressed than I had ever seen him under any circumstances. No sooner had he heard my question, than his face clouded with the heavy lines of anxious thought, and the shadows again fell around him.

He paused a moment before he made any reply, and when he did essay to speak he made two ineffectual efforts before he could command his voice, and with trembling lips and tears trickling down his furrowed cheeks, said:

"Mr. Muusell, I do not doubt—I never have doubted for a moment—that our country would finally come through safe and undivided. But do not misunderstand me; I do not know how it can be. I do not rely on the patriotism of our people, though no people have rallied round their king as ours have rallied around me. I do not trust in the bravery and devotion of the boys in blue; God bless them though! God never gave a prince or conqueror such an army as he has given to me. Nor yet do I rely on the loyalty and skill of our generals; though, I believe, we have the best generals in the world at the head of our armies. But the God of our fathers, who raised up this country to be the refuge and the asylum of the oppressed and downtrodden of all nations, will not let it perish now. I may not live to see it, and (he added after a moment's pause) I do not expect to live to see it, but God will bring us through safe."

I felt humbled in the presence of Mr. Lincoln's sublime faith in "the God of our fathers," not of Voltaire and Paine, which shamed my own doubts and fears; and from that hour my faith in the ultimate triumph of our country never again faltered, and I bade Mr. Lincoln, as it proved, a final farewell, thanking God, as I had never before thanked him, for such a leader in our country's deadly hour of peril.

LINCOLN'S FAVORITE HYMN

OH, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a fast-flitting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
He passeth from life to his rest in the grave.

The leaves of the oak and the willow shall fade,
Be scattered around and together be laid;
And the young and the old, and the low and the high,
Shall moulder to dust and together shall lie.

The child that a mother attended and loved,
The mother that infant's affection who proved,
The husband that mother and infant who blessed,
Each, all, are away to their dwellings of rest.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Bishop Potter's Arraignment

ALL decent citizens of New York and moral people in other cities must sympathize with the attitude taken by Bishop Potter in his letter to the Mayor of New York. The Bishop is not unreasonable in his demands, nor does he attempt to fix the blame for existing conditions on any political party. He simply cites the facts which have given the city the name of a "wide-open" town, and calls upon the Mayor to require of the proper officers that they do the duty which is clearly within their province. The police have no power to reform wrong-doers, nor can they suppress the abominable traffic which disgraces civilization, but they have the power under the law to prevent the shameless flaunting of vice on our thoroughfares and the open solicitation to evil which has been going on for three years past. It is this power which ought to be used, and the Bishop is right in demanding that it shall be used. There is ground for suspicion that the police have not overlooked the power thus given them by law, but have accepted money as the price of not enforcing the law. That is to say, it is alleged that they have taken with one hand public payment for executing the law and with the other hand payment from the law breakers for not executing it. This suspicion, which is prevalent in the city, does not affect the Bishop's position; he calls the Mayor's attention to the fact that the laws are not being enforced by the men whose duty it is to enforce them, and he leaves the method with the Mayor. It is a significant fact that the police have demonstrated, since the Bishop made his appeal, that they have the power to remove the evils of which he complains. Two of the worst precincts of the city have been so effectually "cleaned up," that there is no sign on the streets of the curse that, a few weeks ago, was manifest on every block. It remains now for the police to employ in other precincts the methods that have proved effective in these two. There is little doubt that this will be done if the authorities perceive that the moral sense of the city supports the Bishop in his demand. But the police alone cannot extirpate the evil. A community cannot be made moral by legal enactments or by force. The moral force of the present movement should extend beyond the authorities. The only real and abiding reform must come by impressing the individual conscience. Side by side with the suppression of the open and flagrant temptations to immorality, there should go a strong effort on the part of the clergy and all Christian people to win over to virtue not only the victims of vice, but the men who support and encourage vice. Only so can we hope for a permanent benefit from the indignation of the decent part of the community, to which the Bishop's letter has given expression:

This I say then, Walk in the spirit and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh (Gal. 5:16).

An Untimely Sleep

Citizens of Columbus, O., had occasion a few days ago, to complain of the inopportune drowsiness of a public official. He was stationed at Thurston, O., from which point the natural gas on which many of the Columbus people depend for warming their houses and cooking their food, is distributed. It was his duty on coming to the office in the early morning to relieve the night watchman, to turn on the supply of gas. On this particular morning he was very tired and sat down for a rest. He fell asleep, and being alone in the office slept on undisturbed and sublimely unconscious that he was keeping thousands of families from getting their breakfast. Soon the Columbus office of the gas company was stirred up by indignant complaints over the telephone. The employees called up the Thurston office, but elicited no response from the slumbering official. They then telephoned Pleasantville, and instructed the employees there to send a man on horseback as speedily as possible across country to Thurston to ascertain the cause of the trouble. This was done, and the sleeping man awakened and reminded of the duty he had neglected to perform. The mischief was soon remedied, and no great harm resulted. But so much cannot be said for Christians whose duty it is to give light to the world, but, sunk in sloth and lethargy, are recreant to their duty and suffer those about them to live in darkness.

Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven (Matt. 5:16).

An Ancient Altar Found

A press dispatch to the New York Herald from the City of Mexico, announces the discovery in that city of the altar of the deity Tezcatllpoca. It was found in the course of some excavations being made in the vicinity of Escalerillas Street. It stood on a base of stones, the height of which cannot be known until further excavations have been made. It is about six feet long, and nearly five feet wide. The hieroglyphs and frescoed pictures on the front of the altar show that it was used for human sacrifices, and some human bones have been found at its base. The method of sacrifice was to select a young man of fine form, without a blemish on his body. Tutors were appointed for him, he was arrayed in splendid clothing, and regaled with choice viands. For a year he was treated with royal honors, and being regarded as a representative of the deity, incense was burned before him, and hymns sung in his honor. Royalty and nobility did him reverence whenever he appeared on the streets, and four of the most beautiful girls in the empire were appointed to attend upon him. At the end of the year of preparation he was led to the temple, his royal robes stripped from him, and he was laid upon the altar. There a priest, armed with a knife of itzel, a volcanic substance harder than flint, stood ready to cut open the body. The heart was taken out and offered to the deity, and the body was afterwards served up in a ghastly feast. The hieroglyphs appear to indicate that thousands of such victims were thus slain. The light this discovery sheds on the awful religion of the Aztecs is saddening. It shows how grievously they had misunderstood the character of God in thinking he could be pleased with refined cruelty. We cannot but pity the poor victims who, after the short period of luxury and revelry, were thus sacrificed. We have learned better now, but even in our time there are such sacrifices. The record in the daily papers of the many suicides of the votaries of sinful pleasure shows how frequently a brief career of revelry ends in a violent death. People in our time who tempt others to begin such a career are far more cruel than the Aztec priests.

BISHOP POTTER PREACHING IN ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, NEW YORK

Thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God? (Rom. 2:3).

A Romance of the Antarctic

The members of the Belgian Antarctic Expedition are deeply interested in a marriage which was solemnized recently in Paris. An eminent scientist who was in the expedition was the bridegroom, and a young lady from Philadelphia, who was completing her musical education in Paris, was the bride. The two met for the first time only a year ago. But the professor says that this was not the beginning of his admiration. During the long winter, the party amused themselves by cutting from the magazines they had with them, all the pictures of women they could find and comparing them, that they might decide not only which face was the most beautiful, but which gave indications of the greatest sweetness and purity of character and the highest intellectuality. There was considerable difference of opinion, and each was required to give his reasons for his individual preference. The professor studied the face that seemed to him nearest to the ideal, and advocated with much enthusiasm its claims to the highest place. He grew attached to the face, and was firmly convinced that it belonged to a girl of most lovable disposition. On the return of the party to civilization they visited the Paris Exposition, and during their stay the professor happened to meet a lady whose face resembled the portrait he had so admired. A conversation with her and a comparison of dates proved that she was the original of the portrait. Further acquaintance convinced the professor that he was right in his opinion of the character indicated by the face. He proposed and was accepted, and the marriage has taken place. He declares that he had learned to love his wife during those long dark days before he met her. We can imagine such a thing being possible when a man loves beauty of character more than beauty of features. The Christian, of all men, knows the possibility of such love.

Whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice (I. Peter 1:8).

BRIEF NOTES

Mr. T. C. Ikehara, a young Japanese educated in this country, has been appointed general Sunday School secretary in Japan.

The Rev. J. W. Robinson, of North India Conference, has been elected general secretary of the Epworth League of Southern Asia.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey received an ovation on his visit to Birmingham recently. Large meetings were held in the Town Hall, the Lord Mayor presiding. A most cordial welcome was tendered him by clergy and laity.

The Rev. William Arthur, known throughout the religious world as the author of "Tongues of Fire," is in extremely feeble health. The Methodist Times of London says that critical news may be received concerning his condition at any time.

Next year is to witness an important movement in the direction of Christian temperance in England. The temperance societies of the Free Churches have united to make the first year of the twentieth century a year of earnest, aggressive work.

Our readers will be glad to learn that a cable message has been received at this office from Bombay, containing the welcome news that Rev. E. F. Frease, the Secretary of our Interdenominational Missionary Committee is making progress toward recovery from his critical illness.

The effort to establish a Young Men's Christian Association in St. Petersburg is succeeding. Already Mr. Franklin Gaylord, the secretary, has received more than five hundred applications for membership. In deference to the wishes of the government, which desires to avoid awakening the prejudices of the national church, the association is called a "Society for Promoting the Physical and Moral Development of Young Men."

The Business Man Evangelist, Mr. W. Phillips Hall, has invited the ministers of all denominations to a conference in New York, with the view of getting an organized movement inaugurated for pleading with God for a national revival of religion during the coming year. At the conference a committee was appointed to nominate a representative national committee to take steps for united action. Rev. S. V. Robinson was appointed secretary of the committee.

The death of Mr. Robert Arthington, the famous benefactor of missions, is announced. He was the son of a wealthy brewer, who left him an enormous fortune. He abandoned the business and devoted his wealth to the propagation of the Gospel. Wherever he could hear of a district in which the Gospel had not been preached he sought out a missionary society who would undertake the work, and provided the means out of his own pocket. He never married, and lived in the extremest penury, devoting all his income to the missionary cause. He lived at Leeds, England.

THE LIBRARY OPEN

TRAVELING LIBRARY STATION IN A RURAL DISTRICT

BOXED AND READY FOR ITS TRAVELS

FREE · TRAVELING · LIBRARIES · IN · THIRTY · STATES

THE sending of "traveling libraries" to villages and towns, which have no public library of their own, has proved a boon to hundreds of thousands of people throughout the United States. By the introduction of these itinerant collections of books, people in the remotest sections of the country are furnished with the best reading without individual cost. This system of helping rural populations in an educational way was started in New York in 1892.

In that year, Melvil Dewey, librarian of the New York State Library, secured an appropriation to inaugurate a new system of library extension, which was so simple and practical that it was immediately successful, and has since been followed in thirty States. Mr. Dewey bought a number of small libraries of one hundred volumes each. Stations for them were made in a number of villages. A library was sent to a station to remain six months, and, at the end of that period, it was returned to Albany, to be sent out to another station. Thus they became known as "traveling libraries." To secure the preservation and safe return of the books, Mr. Dewey demanded certain pledges. In communities having no public library or accredited school, he required a guarantee signed by twenty-five tax-payers. Each library was sent out in a chest. With it went a library-case, a charging outfit and a number of small, annotated catalogues.

Influenced by the traveling library system of New York, the State of Wisconsin appointed a free library commission with headquarters at the State capital and with the president of the State university, the State Superintendent of Education and the secretary of the State Historical Society as ex-officio members. Public-spirited individuals have purchased large collections of wholesome, readable books, and have divided them into small traveling libraries, each containing thirty volumes. Catalogues of the thirty books in each case are sent out with the library, together with printed rules, a record book and borrowers' blanks. For a fee of one dollar, this traveling library is sent from some central town in the country to a local library association, which employs a secretary for correspondence with the central management, and a librarian for the proper care and circulation of the books. They are usually placed in some farm-house, post-office, country store or railway station, always in somebody's charge.

Dunn county, Wis. in which free traveling libraries circulate, has a population of about 25,000, but most of the people live in scattered hamlets of 300 or 400 inhabitants each. Many are still living in log cabins. One large town, Menomonie, has 8,000 inhabitants, and a beautiful memorial library, of which Senator Stout is a trustee. He found by inquiry that the town library was of very little use to the country people on account of the difficulty of obtaining and returning books. Accordingly, with the aid of the Wisconsin Free Library Commission, he instituted the "Stout free traveling libraries" to be circulated from hamlet to hamlet. Mr. Stout's libraries were first put into circulation in May, 1896. The most active worker in this field at present in Wisconsin is Mr. Frank A. Hutchins, secretary of the Free Library Commission, who has kindly furnished THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with some of the facts and figures for this article.

In 1895, the Legislatures of Michigan and Iowa made appropriations for traveling libraries, to be purchased and managed by the librarians of the State libraries. In Michigan, an annual appropriation of $2,500 has been made. In Iowa, the annual appropriation is $2,000. In both States, the system was successful from the start. In 1896, the State Library of Ohio was placed under the charge of a State Library Commission, with authority to use such volumes as could be spared to make traveling libraries. These smaller libraries are made up to suit the needs of the special organizations sending for them, and when returned, the books are merged in the general library. In 1899 the Legislature of Minnesota established a State Library Commission, and gave it $5,000 annually for two years to pay for books for traveling libraries and to provide for their purchase, arrangement, and circulation. In the same year a library commission was established in Maine, and the Legislature appropriated $2,500 for its use in buying traveling libraries.

Traveling libraries in New Jersey were very recently authorized by the Legislature; and $1,500 was appropriated at the last session, 1899, for their maintenance. The movement was inaugurated by the State Federation of Women's Clubs. The new Library Commission will buy twenty or more libraries, of fifty books each. The State Librarian will control the entire system, and arrange to send the traveling libraries to communities which apply for them. Local trustees and local librarians will be responsible for the books lent, which may be retained for six months and then exchanged for another collection. An annual charge of $5 will be made by the Railroad at their city stations. Others will be placed in the offices of the Western Union and American District Telegraph Companies, in charge of one of the officers of the company, who will see that the books are cared for and distributed to the employees. Libraries are also being prepared to be sent to firemen. It is purposed, at the next session of the Legislature, to ask from the State an appropriation sufficient to enable the promoters to develop the system in Pennsylvania.

* * *

The ease with which the new plan of library extension may be adapted to meet various needs may be shown in a rapid summary of the work done by a few systems of traveling libraries. In New Jersey, they have used them to lighten the long winter days and evenings of the brave men who belong to the life-saving service, and that State has now taken up the traveling library as a definite part of the work of its State Library. Women in Salt Lake City send them regularly to remote valleys in Utah. A number of State federations of women's clubs use them to furnish books for study to isolated clubs. One woman in Georgia is devoting herself to the supervision of a system which reaches a number of small villages on the Seaboard Air Line, in five Southern States. An association in Washington, D. C., puts libraries on the canal boats which ply on the Washington and Potomac Canal in the summer, and "tie up" in small

THE TRAVELING LIBRARY IN A COUNTRY STORE

THE LIBRARY IN A FARM-HOUSE

The work in New York has been steadily growing, and last year the State library in Albany alone sent out nearly six hundred traveling libraries. There are now about five hundred different kinds of libraries for special students and study classes in many branches of literature, science and art, as well as for the general reader. A uniform fee of five dollars is charged for the use of a library of one hundred volumes. Smaller fees are charged for smaller libraries. Not only may any school or circle of readers have the use of a traveling library, but any citizen may have even a single book sent to him in the remotest corner of the State.

There are now about 2,500 traveling libraries, containing about 115,000 volumes, scattered in thirty States. About 1,100 of these were equipped and maintained by State aid. The remainder were purchased by private individuals or associations.

State; but the volumes must be lent by the community to individuals without any charge whatever, except fines for retention of books beyond the time allowed by the general regulations.

In Pennsylvania, the traveling system is an adjunct to the Free Library of Philadelphia, which consists of a central library and eight active branches. With the cooperation of the Civic Club, nearly 1,000 volumes have been purchased and are being prepared for immediate circulation. They will be placed in boxes holding twenty-five or fifty volumes apiece. Each collection has been chosen from the lists from the New York State traveling libraries. It is proposed to place three or four of these in the custody of the managers of the libraries established by the employees of the Pennsylvania hamlets in the Blue Ridge Mountains in the winter. The colored graduates of Hampton Institute carry libraries to the schools for their own people at the base of the Cumberland Mountains, while to the "mountain whites" libraries are sent by women's clubs in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama. In Idaho, California, Nebraska, Kansas, Illinois, Missouri, Minnesota, and many other States, women's clubs are doing the same work for miners, lumbermen, farmers, and sailors.

The traveling library instructs, inspires and amuses the old as well as the young, and its curriculum is so broad that it helps the housewife in the kitchen, the husbandman in the field, the mechanic in his shop, the teacher in her school, the invalid in the sick-room, the boy in his play, and the citizen in his civic duties. Above all, it leaves no room for bad literature.

Beside the Christmas Fire

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Family Altar

FORMERLY, in professed Christian families, the custom of daily worship was universal. In many homes, twice a day, in the morning and in the evening alike, parents and children gathered, and there was reading of the Bible, either by the father or by the family, a verse about, followed by prayer; often, too, a hymn was sung. The custom was sacred and beautiful, and connected the household as a unit with the Great Father's house above. In our day, it is to be feared that family prayers are falling out of fashion. Men who live according to a train schedule are hurried in one end of the day and wearied in the other. Young people growing up have numerous engagements, and chafe at the delay involved in waiting for family worship when their eyes are on the clock, and they want to be up and away on their personal errands. For one or another cause, prayers are postponed or interrupted and cease to be the rule, so that little children are not brought up in the habit of acknowledging God as the king and arbiter and friend of their lives. There is a letting down of the bars and a flooding in of evil in consequence.

Familiarity with the Scriptures, by the frequent repetition of psalms, proverbs and Gospels in the hearing of the ear is a very desirable thing. Children who heard Deuteronomy, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Malachi, read again and again in their youth, knew Moses and the prophets. A deplorable ignorance of the Word is a feature of our period, and it may be attributed to the lack of family religion, for when parents do not honor the Bible by its reading and study in the presence of the children, the latter will neglect it for other books.

When a child is far from home, a wanderer from the fold, or when on the enterprise of business, or at the mandate of duty, he has gone away from the old roof tree, the recollection of the daily prayer in the sitting-room at morning and at night, is like a soft yet strong hand holding him fast to the associations of youth, and keeping him in line with God. In many an hour of temptation, in many a storm of woe, in many a critical hour, that memory may be his salvation.

Five to seven minutes is all that is absolutely required for family worship. The service may be longer, but it need not be. A hymn may be sung, a chapter read, and a prayer offered in seven minutes. If the father cannot pray extemporaneously, there are little manuals of devotion which are helpful, or the family itself, with the parents, may recite "Our Father which art in heaven." The blessedness of family worship in the morning hallows the day; its sweetness at evening gives a new softness to the pillow at night.

Telling Domestic Grievances

Nobody with real self-respect relates family affairs of an unfortunate variety to anybody outside the family. A wife loses a great deal of dignity when she breathes a complaint of her husband into the ear of her most intimate friend. To do men justice they seldom sin in this way. As a rule a man bears his griefs in silence. But to some women speech seems almost a necessity, and in moods of depression or when the occasion has been very trying they break through the barriers of reserve and tell a third party secrets which should not pass their lips. This is always unwise and is usually regretted. It is also very embarrassing for the confidant. On her part it is safe not to give advice. Whatever she says she may be sorry for.

No Time to Read

With a genuine heart-hunger for books there are many women who never have time to read. I would say to such, take some of the time you spend on other things. Do not make so many pretty frocks for your little girls, nor so many rich pies for your dinner table. Take a half hour or an hour by daylight, and feed your mind. Let the boys, as well as the girls, help you in the housework. A boy will thank you ten years hence, and twenty years hence his wife may thank you for having taught him how to cook. No knowledge which is worth having ever comes amiss to anybody.

The End of the Century

Good-bye to you, wonderful nineteenth century. You have given us gas, and kerosene, and electricity, the ocean cable, and the telegraph, and telephone; you have given us the sewing machine, the power loom, the automobile, and the trolley. Steam never found out what it could do until you came along. Luxury hitherto undreamed of has been made our ordinary state, by means of your discoveries and appliances. Travel has become swift, safe, economical, and replete with comfort. Good-bye, dear busy century. As you join the shadowy ages you take our blessing with you.

THE POOR AT OUR GATES

Home Life of President McKinley

Our President and his wife are patterns of republican simplicity in their manner of life. Making allowance for the difference between residence in the White House (an exceedingly plain abode for the Chief Executive of this mighty nation) and the home at Canton, the housekeeping and service in the McKinley regime are most unostentatious. The President's breakfasts, luncheons and dinners are much like our own: the courses are neither multiplied nor elaborate, and there is no waste in the domestic economy. State dinners are formal and costly functions, they must be properly given, and they make a hole in the President's income. But Mr. McKinley does not invite guests to state dinners every day.

The sweet and gracious lady who is our President's wife, is an invalid, but she, nevertheless, performs her duties with winning and tactful urbanity, and it is evident to all that she holds the heart of her huband in lover-like fealty. He never forgets her, and she is associated with all his joys and cares.

Is Theft Growing Common?

The question was asked at a mothers' club the other day, and the majority answered it in the affirmative. If they were right the outlook is sad for our nation, unspeakably sad. Are we getting away from family religion? Is the fear of God taught as well as God's love? Are our boys and young men brought up in church-going ways? Does the Sunday newspaper not usurp the place formerly occupied by the pulpit? Are we training our sons in rigid honesty? An old fashioned man wants to know what the mothers—and the fathers—are going to do about it. ROBIN ADAIR.

—WILLIAM D. There is no rule about popping the question. Do so in the way you prefer.

—PUZZLED MAIDEN. The man is not worth a second thought. Let him carry his attentions elsewhere.

—EMMELINE. If in doubt about the use of any fork or spoon at a dinner table, observe your hostess and follow her example.

—MARGERIE. Answer a dinner invitation as soon as you can after you receive it. Having accepted it, you cannot break the engagement lightly.

—ROSEBUD. It is immaterial. Ask your friend to bring his sister to see you, if she is a school-girl visiting in the place, or go yourself and call on her.

—R. S. V. P. These letters mean "Answer, if you please." P. P. C. means to take leave, and is occasionallly, but very seldom, written on a visiting card by a person going abroad.

THE SIN OF OMISSION

IT isn't the thing you do, dear,
It's the thing you leave undone,
Which gives you a bit of a heartache
At the setting of the sun.
The flower you did not send, dear,
The letter you did not write,
The word you did not say, dear,
Are your haunting ghosts at night.

The stone you might have lifted
Out of a brother's way,
The bit of heartsome counsel
You were hurried too much to say.
The loving touch of the hand, dear,
And the gentle, winning tone,
You had no time nor thought for
With troubles enough of your own.

These little acts of kindness,
So easily out of mind,
These chances to be angels
Which we poor mortals find,
They come in night and silence
Each chill, reproachful wraith,
When hope is faint and flagging
And a blight has fallen in faith.

The Poor at Our Gates

OUR dear Lord never said a truer word in all his words of truth than that the poor ye have always with you. When the holiday mirth makes bright our homes, there is a special pathos in the thought that there are homeless men and women in the world, men and women who are cold and famished, who are out of work, and who know not where to turn for relief. The appeal of the wandering mother, holding her baby closely wrapped up in her loving arms, is not made in vain at the castle door. The little princess herself, cherished child of the house, with her ancestral beads around her neck and her favorite dog by her side, carries out a basin of warm broth for the weary wayfarer, and the housekeeper and nurse, who hovers in the doorway, utters a friendly and compassionate word. The mother and her child! They always successfully call on the heart of humanity. In any of our crowded street cars, for instance, rough men and polished alike, rise to give a seat to the woman who enters carrying a child, and the beggar soliciting alms is able to break down the most iron-clad conviction that charity should not be indiscriminate. We cannot refuse the plea of the child, and the mother, however poor and distressed, who has her babe in her arms, is always a madonna. There is a pretty illustration of this in Maurice Hewlett's Little Novels of Italy in which he shows a mother everywhere respected, everywhere civilly treated, because the people think her the Madonna of the Peach Tree. And yet she is only a peasant woman in sore distress, who appears in strange places, with the babe's round head peeping out under her cloak.

Mine and Thine in Home Life

In some homes all the property seems to be held in common as it was by the early Christians. Nothing is owned by anyone individually. Everything is ours. The plan has distinct disadvantages. If the daughters are privileged to make a raid on mother's bureau drawer whenever they are going out, how is mother going to have clean collars, handkerchiefs and ties of her own. If Mary helps herself to Jane's gloves and boots, how shall Jane present a creditable appearance when she takes her walks abroad? I do not approve of such indiscriminate management. It is far better that every child and every adult in the house shall possess personal belongings, and borrowing should be sparingly practiced. COUSIN MARIA.

A Prayer of Augustine

Thou, O Lord, who commandest me to ask, grant that I may receive. Thou hast put me upon seeking, let me be happy in finding. Thou hast bidden me knock; I pray thee open unto me. Be graciously pleased to direct and govern all my thoughts and actions, that, for the future, I may serve thee and entirely devote myself to obeying thee. Accept me, draw me to thyself, who am already all thine own.

AT THE SIGN OF THE BLUE TIGER

CHAPTER II. (Continued)

BEFORE he could reply the swinging door was pushed wide open and through it there entered three of the councilmen of the "wets," attended by a choice retinue of half a dozen selected retainers.

Their leader went straight up to the bar and addressed himself to Joe Travers with rough directness: "Look here, Joe, I've just heard something. It's mighty queer, and I 'spose there's some mistake, but if there isn't its got to be settled right away. Is it so that you haven't voted to-day?"

"Don't get excited, Jim. I heard that you'd voted early and often and——"

The other brought his fist down with an oath. "This is no joke," he shouted, "Answer my question, or I'll know why. Only a moment ago I heard that you had shown the white feather and hadn't——"

CHAPTER III.

"Hold on, Jim. Don't make a fool of yourself. Who put up the stuff to buy the boys in the factory? Who fixed the section gang? Who's worked night and day, tooth and nail, to get this election fixed so that we can't lose?"

"That's all very well for a bluff," replied the other, "but it don't go for an answer to my question. Have you voted to-day?"

"Keep a civil tongue in your head," said Joe, surlily. "I answer fool questions for no man, and you know it."

"Then it's true," cried the enraged man. "Do you hear that, boys! Sold out his vote to a Soda-water Bottle; he's tied to the apron strings of his precious——"

With a cry like that of an infuriated animal, Joe Travers sprang over the bar and seized his taunter by the throat. In the midst of the confused uproar he reached the entrance with his helpless prisoner, and pushing the doors wide open with a kick he flung the man out into the street as though he were a feather. As he did so the sudden fury of the crowd culminated, and a shot rang out. A puff of smoke passed before his eyes, and in the instant's daze of his sight a woman fell heavily at his feet in the doorway. Bending down through the faint mist of the blur, he looked into her face. Lying there, a tiny stream of blood trickling out of the bosom of her gown, the rain falling on her still, white features, lay—his mother.

He staggered for an instant; then he caught her up in his strong arms like a man demented, crying out, "Mother! mother! mother!" madly.

The crowd scattered like chaff before the wind.

"Bring her in here," said the voice of the kindly German woman next door, the first words of reason that any one thought to utter.

While messengers fled with all haste for physicians and surgeons, those who crowded into that little room never forgot the sight, nor was there one who was not melted by the utter prostration of Joe Travers.

As she lay like marble, majestic in her white silence, a low murmur greeted the arrival of one who cried in suppressed tones of excitement, "Where is she?" and then Joe Travers, raising his wild eyes, saw standing by him his father.

"Father! father!" he cried. "Oh, look at her! Oh, this is my work! No, don't look at me like that. I didn't do it. I don't know who did; but I'm to blame. Oh, can you forgive me? Can you forgive me?"

The face of the elder Travers was filled with an incredulous anguish as he looked at his wife, but as his eyes rested on his son, shaking in that palsy of repentance. He said brokenly, "I forgive you, but God only knows how I can bear this. I cannot give her up."

"Oh, is it too late? Mother! mother!"

The two men threw themselves sobbing into each other's arms and as they passionately uttered words of endearment to that voiceless figure, her eyes opened, looked surprisedly into the faces bent above her, and then, half inarticulately, came the words, "What—is—it? Joe—father—I—am—glad to—see you."

What followed within the next moment or two was indescribably pathetic. She did not seem to realize that anything had happened to her; she only knew that these two, long estranged, and so dear to her, were there together. She smiled and placed their hands together, saying only, "How nice of you to come home, Joe."

"THEY WENT OUT, ARM AND ARM, TO THE BALCONY"

"Will it take an eternity for any one to get here?" cried the husband. At this instant an authoritative figure pushed his way through the crowd and said brusquely, "This room must be cleared at once. All of you will leave except those whom I say may stay."

Silently waiting, in what tense feeling may not be told in words, Joe Travers and his father sat together in the little kitchen. Presently the door opened and the doctor came out. "She will live," he said; "it is not even dangerous. The ball passed out through her shoulder. It is only a flesh wound. She wishes to see you."

Half staggering in his reaction from agony to joy, Joe followed his father into the room. There he broke down once more, and, throwing himself on his knees by her, burst into tears.

"Never mind, my boy," said the mother, "I'm not hurt at all. The doctor says it's not much more than what a man shot in battle would call a scratch, and I was shot in battle; so, I'll call it a scratch, too. It's all right, just so you and father have made up, and you'll come home, won't you?"

Joe Travers sprang to his feet with another of those swift changes characteristic of him. "Come home! mother! Yes, I'll come home to-night, and I'll do more—I'll close my saloon forever. I'll do anything in the world if you will forgive me for all I have done."

"Forgive you, my boy—of course I forgive you. Don't you know, I have always loved you. Joe! Joe!—it seems too good to be true! I never was so happy in my life. Kiss me, my boy."

"Be careful, Diana," said Mr. Travers. "You must not excite yourself. Everything is all right now and you must rest. Perhaps you are elected," he suggested, smiling.

"Perhaps I am elected," replied Mrs. Travers, "or perhaps"—she paused and turned her eyes on Joe. Who was elected? Who, indeed?

His father drew out his watch and looked at it.

"It is half-past five," he said. "One of you has been elected mayor of Belle Centre."

Then Joe Travers spoke:

"Mother, I had not voted yet awhile ago when—when that happened, but I'm going to now. I'm going down to the polls to vote for you, and I only wish that my vote alone could elect you. It won't, but I'll do the best I can. If you're elected I'll work with you, and if I'm elected"—he paused—"I'll close the Blue Tiger forever and atone for this night's work if I can."

Silently, gazing at him with eyes that were filled with a dazzling joy, she reached up her arms and drew his head down to her face, breathing only: "O God! I thank thee for this hour——"

He raised himself, and stopping only to say, "I'll be back soon," he rushed out of the house. Running swiftly toward the square, he saw as he passed the open road leading southward out of the town a dark moving line approaching the village. Full well he knew what that dark line was—it was the men of the section gang, laborers on the railroad, who were compelled to go to their work before the polls opened, and now they had knocked off work half an hour earlier than usual and were on their way to cast a solid vote for him. Had he not "fixed" them?

His swiftly running feet had not taken three steps more before he turned sharply at right angles southward on the open road and ran faster than before to the railroad crossing, and thence down the track.

As he ran a powerful voice in the moving line advancing through the rain sung out the first line of "John Brown's Body." The refrain was instantly caught up by the steadily tramping men, forty odd, and thus they approached each other, the hatless, flying man and the dark, marching line, marked by the rhythm of the song, "Glory, glory, hallelujah! As we go marching on!"

"Stop!" he shouted; "stop a minute, boys! I've got something to say to you."

"Why, Joe," said the leader, stepping forward, "what's the matter?"

For answer he leaped onto a pile of ties and cried out:

"Listen to me. Less than an hour ago my mother was shot on the steps of my saloon while I was throwing out a coward who would have insulted her. She's not much hurt, but it might have killed her, and that's enough for me. Boys, you know me. I'm done now. I've quit—quit the business forever, and I want you to help me. I hadn't voted yet, but now I'm going to vote for my mother. I don't want your votes—they're no good to me now. What I want to ask you is this: Will any of you go to the polls with me and vote for my mother?"

From out the astonished silence of the crowd there arose a hoarse, indeterminate murmur. Then out stepped a man from the rest.

"Your mother's a lady and a Christian, Joe, and I'll vote for her for one. I'm with you, Joe."

"And so am I!"

"And so am I!"

"Turncoat!" shouted an angry voice.

"Turncoat or no turncoat," cried Joe Travers, fiercely, "I'll stand up for my mother. Is there any of you so lost to decency that he can see a woman, and that woman his own mother, shot down in cold blood and not resent it! Answer me, have any of the rest of you got mothers?"

He who had cried "turncoat" slunk away, grumbling, and was followed by two or three growling profanely in their throats of "treachery" and "babyism."

"Go ahead, Joe, we're ready," sung out the foreman.

"Then come on, quick; there's no time to lose. Start that song again and let 'em know we're coming."

"John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave—"

They tramped in a double-quick step up the track—

"As we go marching on—"

They reached the crossing and turned into the road—"Glory, glory, hallelu-jah—"

They gained the edge of the town, and were recruited by dozens—

"John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave—"

Surrounded by the cheering populace, they swept on to the square. In front, Joe Travers, hatless, striding determinedly—

"As we go marching on—"

They drew up at the poling place. As Joe Travers walked into the poling booth of the "drys" a mighty shout went up, and, amid wild cheering, the forty odd votes were quickly deposited. As the last man turned away, the clock struck six and the polls closed.

Three hours later Mrs. Travers, resting comfortably, lay on a lounge in her own home, surrounded by her family and friends, including all of her associates on the ticket of the "drys."

Up the street floated the sound of martial strains and the tramping of many feet. Nearer it came, and nearer—paused in front of the lawn—and there was loud shouting: "Three cheers for the Mayor!"

"It's you, mother; I know it is," said Joe.

"Give me your arm, my son," she replied, and thus, followed by her retinue, they went out, arm in arm, to the balcony, lit up by the flames of many torches.

"There she is," arose the cry. "There she is! Three cheers for the Mayor!"

Pale and weak, she gathered herself up, and cried in resonant tones: "I thank you, my friends. God bless you all. You must excuse me now."

She turned toward Joe. Another impulse struck the jubilant crowd.

"What's the matter with Joe Travers?"

And the torches flickered with the vibrations of the stentorian reply:

"He's—all—right."

As the procession, still cheering on general principles, passed the Blue Tiger, the torches showed distinctly a sign reading: "Closed—Joe Travers." Whereat they cheered again.

As to the mysterious shot, every one knew now that the responsibility could never be definitely fixed, but as three of the toughest characters of the village had secretly boarded the train three miles south of town with the information that they were "skipping the blasted town for good," it was generally understood that if they stayed skipped, the matter would be dropped.

It was one week later that Joe Travers stood on the platform of the largest church in Belle Centre. The Mayor sat with the pastors of the churches on the great platform, surrounded by the city council, the clerk and some distinguished invited guests from adjoining towns who were on hand to see "how it worked."

He had just finished his speech. "It was the happiest moment of my life when I cast that vote for my mother, and it is to her, and to the good women of this village, that I owe it all. I thank God for my mother's prayers, for her tears, for her undying love and persistence, for her unfaltering determination. And further, good people, I ask all of you to forgive me for the evil I have caused in this town. My father and mother have forgiven me, and I trust that Christ also has pardoned me, for by his help the rest of my life shall be devoted to his service. I have offered all that I have and am to the Lord, and if you will let me help you as well as I can, I will gladly be the humblest worker of you all in the making of our little city a model for others. Not for my sake, but for the sake of these —" he pointed to the women—"I ask you to think of me with as little harshness as you can, and let me show by the rest of my life that I mean what I say."

There could be but one outcome to such forces set in motion. In less than a year Belle Centre was practically another town, so far as the administration of its municipal affairs was concerned. The saloons were closed, despite the reckless threats made at first by the tough element, which did not propose to be downed by the "Mammas." Nor was Belle Centre injured by the fact that several who could not stand the changed order of things, got out, sans ceremony. The street paving and lighting were materially improved, and incidentally the manner in which public funds had been misappropriated came to light; a public park was laid out, the library enlarged, and a lecture course provided. When you want to hear these things well told you should hear them—as I did—told by a well-known citizen of Belle Centre, Mr. Joseph Travers, Jr., at what was once the sign of the Blue Tiger, but now the leading restaurant and coffee-house of the town.

GRATEFUL WORDS FROM INDIA

From Secretary Wm. C. Hannum of the American Presbyterian Mission in Western India, a cordial letter has been received enclosing the action of the Presbyterian Mission Board, as follows:

Extract from Minutes of American Presbyterian Mission in Western India, October 30th, 1900.

"The following resolution was adopted by a rising vote: That the Mission place on record its gratitude to Dr. Louis Klopsch, Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and to the Contributors to the HERALD'S Famine Fund, for the bountiful and timely aid given to the Mission in the relief of famine sufferers in this region, and our belief that much distress has been alleviated and MANY LIVES HAVE BEEN SAVED THROUGH THAT AID, and that IT IS BEING PROVIDENTIALLY USED IN TURNING THE HEARTS OF IDOLATERS TO THE TRUE GOD: and that the Secretary be directed to communicate this action to Dr. Klopsch."

GOSPEL LIGHT . . . IN CUBAN PRISONS

GOOD news comes from Jaruco, where a branch of "El Faro Cristiano" (Christian Lighthouse) Mission, of Aguacate, was recently established, as readers of this paper will remember. Arthur W. Dowe, Director of El Faro Cristiano, writes from Jaruco:

We have just held two public meetings in a crowded house. Doors, windows, court and street were filled with people anxious to hear about the "free religion" that is to accompany "free Cuba" in her future growth and progress. Not only the poor but the rich and those in authority, among whom are the "Alcalde" (Mayor) and his wife are to be found in the throng listening to the "buenas nuevas" (good news.) The demand for Spanish Protestant literature and Bibles is great. Mr. Arthur Pain and myself will soon start on our tour to open new stations. We have three good-sized cities in mind that have never heard a Protestant missionary. Thus far the treatment we have received has been universally courteous.

The officials have given us access to the prison and hospital here. Arthur Pain, of whose conversion at El Faro Cristiano I wrote an account a few weeks ago, has been specially helpful in the prison work. To-day we knelt on the stone floors of that institution, with three prisoners, who yielded their hearts to Jesus, and accepted him as their Saviour. This makes seven conversions in the prison, leaving only one prisoner, a very desperate and hard character, unconverted. We want him also. People are amazed at our methods and success. They say there must be something in a religion which sends its followers after the outcasts behind the bars, and which has power to change wicked men into useful, law-abiding citizens. El Faro Cristiano (the Christian Lighthouse) will endeavor to spread the light of the Gospel throughout all Cuba.

A few days after the reception of the above another letter came from Mr. Dowe. It read:

The last prisoner in the jail has been converted, making eight in all who have surrendered to God. Probably in the whole world there is not to be found a jail like this in Jaruco, where all the prisoners love and confess the Lord Jesus. Now we pray for the conversion of the guards and keepers of the institution.

Delighted With His Premium

This letter from a New York subscriber speaks for itself:

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of the premium—a Calendar and Masterpieces of American Eloquence, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I consider it the best premium I have ever received for the money, the book alone being worth more than the two dollars paid for the whole. To show my appreciation, I have solicited a few friends, and at least three will become subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for next year. Wishing for your exemplary Christian paper a large circulation. WM. CANN.

Learning About Jesus

A little reader in Middleboro, Mass., writes as follows:

Dear Editor:—You sent me a Red Letter Testament a year ago. I have read out of it every day. I know quite a lot about Jesus now. My uncle takes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We are so glad it does so much good. I will be twelve years old next July. This is my third year in school. I am in the sixth grade. The first Testament story I learned was the Prodigal Son. GEORGE PROVOST.

Cordial Appreciation

"The most delightful paper I ever read." A. G. D., Plymouth, Mass.

"We always feel cheerful when THE CHRISTIAN HERALD enters our humble home. Its pages carry a lesson to the mind and, still deeper, to the soul." Mrs. Mary S. B., Lansing, Mich.

PRAIRIE HOMES

For City Children

STAFF-CAPTAIN BENJAMIN

IT was a beautiful parlor in an elegant residence on a fashionable avenue in New York City. A broad stone stairway led up to the handsome entrance, where the door opened before the caller could ring, stately ladies, quietly but richly gowned, received the visitor, and passed him or her into the great drawing-rooms where many people sat in waiting. Soft music from piano and violins greeted the ear.

At one end of the long rooms—the same end with the piano and violins—were a group of men and women in blue and red uniforms. One of the women—tall, slender, distinguished-looking—wore a crest on her collar and five silver stars on her shoulder-strap. Beside her, robed in black silk, stood a lovely lady, whose gentle face was crowned with snowy hair. This lady, mistress of the beautiful home, was saying:

"Everywhere I went last summer I saw the Salvation Army at work; and its work was good. I think you will be interested to hear this afternoon of a new enterprise which that organization has undertaken for the children of our great cities, from its highest authority on the subject—Consul Booth-Tucker."

The Consul faced an audience of men and women who are taking the obligations imposed by wealth and culture seriously, and who had left business or pleasure, just to listen to the needs of children of the poor and to the Salvation Army's plan for the relief of those who by reason of orphanage, desertion, or parental surrender, become its wards. She told the story of her "Scheme for the Babies" from its inception to the present time; of the Army's crowded orphanages and nurseries, and particularly of the Cherry Tree Home for Waifs and Strays, which came into existence at Rutherford, N. J., some three years ago, and which is now entirely inadequate to meet the demands upon it, even though Colonel Higgins, the officer in charge of all Army work for children, is willing to have the whole floor space covered with little beds. Said the Consul:

"The mother of five children—the wife of a drunken husband—came to me with her story of destitution. 'It's agony to part with me little boys,' she said, 'but I've made up me mind to it. And if I give 'em up to the Army they'll grow up good men.' Think of it! We had no room, we could not take them. Soon after I journeyed to our Farm Colony in Colorado, and there I had a revelation. Why not transplant the Cherry Tree Home to these rolling prairies, where there's room for all the children we can bring, where health comes on every breeze, where work is plenty, where children will be removed from the evil associations of city life while the city is in some measure relieved of its teeming thousands?

"That revelation has borne fruit. We now have a stone building at our colony ready to receive one hundred. Mrs. Higgins and I will soon start West with them. Captain Benjamin will be Mother of the Home. Other buildings will go up as fast as means are provided. We hope to make the Home to a great extent self-supporting, once it is started. Boys and girls will be taught to work. There will be sewing, housework, chores, care of the farmyard, its cows, geese, chickens and dairy, to say nothing of orchards, vegetable gardens and the rolling acres ready for conversion into fields of waving grain at the magic touch of our older boys. Our children can grow up into farm owners."

CHERRY TREE HOME FOR WAIFS AND STRAYS, RUTHERFORD, N. J.

An officer held up to the Consul a pretty tot, white and soft as a snowball in her wool cloak. "This is a Cherry Tree baby," said the Consul. "We have taken her into our own home in the place of Evangeline, our little American-born baby who died."

At the close of the meeting, some cards with tiny pencils attached, were passed among the guests. Opposite her name one lady wrote "$1,000." Others subscribed generous sums. The rich people who take their wealth seriously were interested, too, to hear of the plans of the winter relief work of the Army; the Christmas basket-dinners for 15,000 persons: and the great Christmas dinner in Madison Sq. Garden for thousands more.

Soon after this meeting there was a great wedding in the Salvation Army Headquarters, when Col. Alice Lewis, next to the Consul the most prominent Army woman in America, was married to her aide, Capt. Johnson. A band of little Cherry Tree children, looking pretty and soft in their white woolen garments, furnished a part of the musical programme; and members of the large crowd who came to the wedding made it an occasion to remember the Prairie Home in contributions — which introduced the novelty of giving bridal presents to a good cause rather than to the happy pair. Commander Booth-Tucker performed the ceremony. The simple, solemn service is a lesson: the contracting parties pledge themselves to encourage each other in service to God and man; the vow not only binds each to each but consecrates two to God. The building was bright with flags, and merry with tinkle of bells, and music of flutes and violins.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

M. L. S., Omaha, Neb., writes:

God heard my prayer and helped my loved one.

Reader, Beemerville, N. J., writes:

In answer to prayer, God lifted my troubles far beyond my reach and sight. I am sure he will help all who have faith in him.

Mother, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

A loved one was being led astray. I prayed earnestly, and God has answered my prayer by placing him in a position where he will be under the best possible influences.

S. R. A., Gainesville, Tex., writes:

Having during the past week to give up an only daughter, I prayed our Heavenly Father, as her precious life ebbed away, to stop the great pain she was suffering, and then added, "Not my will, but thine be done." The prayer was heard; her life closed as if she were going into a sweet sleep.

A. B. S., Philadelphia, Pa., writes:

I was in great trouble and the outlook was dark indeed. I asked help from my Heavenly Father. He has answered my prayer, and now I give God praise from a grateful and believing heart.

B. D. J., Newark, N. J., writes:

Having read the answers to prayer in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I was encouraged to more faithful prayer for friends who were in great trouble. God has answered and they have found help.

C. W., London, Canada, writes:

Having seen so many beautiful answers to prayer in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (which has been a welcome visitor to our home for the past twelve years) I felt renewed in faith for my son. I believe in prayer, for the Lord has answered me many times, but I felt very anxious about my dear boy. He had wandered from the Shepherd's fold. After reading "Answered Prayers" I asked the dear Lord with new faith, to bring him back. After I was praying three days, he came and said: "Dear mother, I have decided to live for the Lord." A prayer for another child in trouble has been answered. "Ask, and it shall be given you."

Run Down

That is the condition of thousands of people who need the stimulus of pure blood—that's all.

They feel tired all the time and are easily exhausted.

Every task, every responsibility, has become hard to them, because they have not the strength to do nor the power to endure.

William Ross, Sarnia, Ont., who was without appetite and so nervous he could not sleep, and Leslie R. Swink, Dublin, Pa., who could not do any work without the greatest exertion, testify as many others have done to the wonderful building-up efficacy of

It purified their blood, gave them strength and vigor, restored their appetite and made their sleep refreshing.

It is the medicine for all debilitated conditions.

WALKED OUT.

On Food, After Being Given Up.

Lack of knowledge regarding the kind of food to give to people, particularly invalids, frequently causes much distress, whereas when one knows exactly the kind of food to give to quickly rebuild the brain and nerve centres, that knowledge can be made use of.

A young Chicago woman says: "Other instances of the wonderful qualities possessed by Grape-Nuts food are shown in my grandmother's and mother's cases. Grandmother's entire left side became totally paralyzed, from a ruptured capillary of the brain. The doctor said it would be impossible for her to live a week. She could not take ordinary food and we put her on Grape-Nuts, in an effort to do all for her we could.

"To the astonishment of the doctor and the delight of all of us, she slowly rallied and recovered. It was pronounced the first case of the kind on record. The doctor said nothing could have produced this result but food.

"We had been led to use Grape-Nuts because of the effect on mother. She has been troubled with a weak stomach all her life, and the last few years been gradually losing weight and strength. She has tried everything, almost, that has been recommended by good authority, and until she used Grape-Nuts food, nothing seemed to do her any good. Since taking up Grape-Nuts she has been constantly improving until now she is free from any of the stomach troubles, and is strong and well. Please do not publish my name." Name can be given by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Schools That Never Change

THEY ARE IN CHINA, AND THEY HAVE TAUGHT THE SAME SYSTEM FOR THOUSANDS OF YEARS

IT is quite safe to say that the antiquated educational system which prevails through the wide domains of the Emperor of China, is responsible for a large share of the present disturbances. No institution in the Middle Kingdom is more conservative in its tendency than the school. The Chinese have a profound veneration for the schoolmaster and for letters, the instrument of learning. So much is the latter the case that even in Hong Kong may be observed small boxes, like letter boxes, attached to the walls for the reception of every piece of waste paper having the sacred Chinese characters upon it, to prevent its being trampled under the foot of the passer-by. The Civil Service, from the highest to the lowest branches, is recruited from the ranks of the people by open competition. Any young man, not being a descendant within four generations of an actor, executioner, jailer, or woman of bad character, may rise to the highest posts in the realm if he can manage to pass, by fair means or foul, the requisite literary examinations. The candidate's ability is tried by giving him a text taken from "The Four Books," or "The Five Classics," and shutting him up in a cell for two or three days without books or notes. At the end of that time he produces a literary essay on stereotyped lines, and his position is determined by the relative merit of this one work.

The "Four Books" are the "Confucian Analytics," the "Great Learning," the "Golden Medium" and the "Sayings of Mercius." The "Five Classics" comprise the "Book of Changes," the "Book of History," the "Spring and Summer Annals," the "Book of Odes" and the "Book of Rites." These are the Alpha and Omega of Chinese scholarship. A man requires nothing more to be admitted to the highest social and political influences: he may have a supreme contempt for modern learning and may know absolutely nothing of the inventions and discoveries of the last 2000 years.

Education is stereotyped both in material and method. The mandarins, having risen to power and wealth by this system, are not likely to introduce innovations which would assuredly put an end to their regime by producing a better class of men to take their place. From an educationist's point of view, the method as well as the material in use in the Chinese school is sadly defective, and there is next to no hope of any reformation from within. The system develops the retentive faculties at the expense of the reflective and imaginative capacities. The school will have to be thoroughly revolutionized before there can be permanent peace in China.

The schools of the Berlin Missionary Society in the city and neighborhood of Canton have just issued their report for 1899–1900, which contains many interesting and encouraging features. These schools are divided into three classes—middle, station, and vernacular, and are distributed over the provinces of which Li Hung Chang has lately been viceroy. At the middle school in Luk Hang, besides religious instruction, the pupils are taught history, geography, arithmetic, physics, chemistry, natural history, and astronomy. This school has recently had the rare compliment paid to it of a visit from the mandarin. He expressed admiration for the work which was being done, and did the missionaries the honor of inviting them to visit his yamen.

The station schools are three in number and differ from the others in being boarding schools. These seminaries are primarily intended for the children of native Christians, though the children of non-Christians are heartily welcomed.

No less than 443 children have been enrolled during the year in the twenty-four vernacular schools, and nearly all of these were the children of non-Christians. These schools are conducted on modified and modernized Chinese lines, and it is interesting to learn that the ancient Socratic method is employed with conspicuous success in the best of these schools. There the Chinese schoolmaster teaches by questioning his pupils, criticizing their answers, and explaining the proper meaning of the question under consideration. Thus, after the lapse of 2,400 years, the system of Socrates, the founder of philosophy in Europe, is endorsed in the land of Confucius, the founder of philosophy in Asia, who lived about the same time, i.e. 500 B.C.

THE FRUITS
Of Coffee Drinking.

"The fruits or results, in my case, of coffee drinking, were sallow complexion, almost total loss of appetite, as well as sleeplessness and sluggish circulation.

"I was also very bilious and constipated most of the time for eight years, and became so nervous that I was unable to do any mental labor and was fast approaching a condition where there would have been no help for me.

"I am convinced that if I had continued using coffee much longer the result would have been a total mental and physical wreck.

"I sometimes think the all-wise providence looks after us in trouble; at any rate, when I was in despair a friend urged me to give up coffee entirely and use Postum, giving the reasons why. It was hard for me to believe that so common a beverage as coffee was the cause of my trouble, but I made the change, and from the first trial experienced a benefit and improvement, My complexion has improved, the nervousness gone, as well as the bilious trouble and sleeplessness, and I am completely relieved of sluggish circulation. In fact, I am well, and the return to health has been directly traced to leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. I recommend Postum to all coffee wrecks without a single reservation."—James D. Kimball, Isabella Street, Northampton, Mass.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Washington Escapes Prison*

SCENE — Room in Washington's Headquarters (afterward the Jumel Mansion), Harlem Heights, September 17, 1776.

Enter Washington, and Generals Putnam and Greene.

WASHINGTON—Gentlemen,
What punishment is due to him just Detected in an effort to poison
The General-in-Chief?

GREENE and PUTNAM—(In unison). To poison you?

WASHINGTON—This very day I was to have been a victim.
Providence has preserved my life; for what Ends I know not.

GREENE—The culprit has been captured?

WASHINGTON—Yes; one of my own guard!
And by me trusted—I may say, literally
Trusted—almost unto death.

PUTNAM—He should die at sunset—
And the whole army see the creature die!

WASHINGTON—His youth pleads against this punishment.
The enemy is the chief malefactor.
Why hang the deluded boy while the greater Criminal survives? It is more humane
To send him out of camp to the care of Those who used him.

PUTNAM—A merciful decree!

WASHINGTON—We shall be fortunate, if this
Be the last effort made to gain this end.
He who engages the savage will not Hesitate at assassination!
I face it as among the chances of war!

GREENE—The foe will never learn the lesson, taught
In the generosity of this decision.

WASHINGTON—I fear he will not.
But the fault be his, not mine. In the realms
Of kindness I should not limp because he Is lame.

The Surf Riders of Hawaii†

HOW long he slept he did not know, but when he awoke it was to find himself surrounded by a bevy of laughing damsels, profusely adorned with flowers and apparently enjoying themselves at his expense. They were a merry group, obviously from the better class of natives. One seemed superior to the rest and was the leader in their frolic. With well-rounded forms, clothed in the pau, the customary short skirt of the women of Hawaii. and some of them wearing bracelets on the wrists, they made a pretty picture as the youth gazed inquiringly into their faces and watched their graceful postures. Their hair was short above the forehead; long wavy locks fell over their shoulders, and there was a simplicity in their looks and actions which the life of high caste native women naturally produced. One or two might be the belles of the village. They were all of large frames, well proportioned. When they stood erect their figures had considerable style and beauty of outline. They were too large and plump for nymphs or fairies of civilized legends, but, judged by Hawaiian standards, were an attractive group. When then a few of the more timid made a movement towards the door the whole bevy rushed out, and Hookama, following, saw them fleeing to the beach.

A part seized their surf-boards, pushed them through the nearer breakers, and then, lying down upon them, rode back to the shore. These boards were made by stone axes from hard koa wood, slightly hollowed and polished, broad enough to carry the body and from six to eight feet in length. On these floats some even stood erect and balanced themselves as they were carried along by the smaller rollers. Their audacious struggles with the waves, their loud shouts when a big roller tumbled over them, and their comely shoulders rising from the sea, made the scene a lively one. The spray they tossed with their arms sparkled in the sunbeams, completing the beauty of the sight. A few of these water-sprites, more daring than the rest, swam out beyond the combing breakers and disported themselves in deeper water. Hookama, accustomed to the merry games of water nymphs at Waikiki, a village on one of the beaches of Oahu, needed no second impulse to run towards the group of mermaids and soon was among them battling with the breakers.

Father Taylor and Dickens*

CHARLES DICKENS thus vividly describes Father Taylor's way of presenting the truth:

The service commenced with a hymn, to which succeeded an extemporary prayer. It had the fault of frequent repetition, incidental to all such prayers; but it was plain and comprehensive in its doctrines, and breathed a tone of general sympathy and charity, which is not so commonly a characteristic of this form of address to the Deity as it might be. That done, he opened his discourse, taking for his text a passage from the Song of Solomon, laid upon the desk before the commencement of the service by some unknown member of the congregation: "Who is this coming up from the wilderness, leaning on the arm of her beloved!"

He handled the text in all kinds of ways and twisted it into all manner of shapes; but always ingeniously, and with a rude eloquence, well adapted to the comprehension of his hearers. Indeed, if I be not mistaken, he studied their sympathies and understandings much more than the display of his own powers. His imagery was all drawn from the sea, and from the incidents of a seaman's life, and was often remarkably good. He spoke of them of "that glorious man, Lord Nelson," and of Collingwood, and drew nothing in, as the saying is, by the head and shoulders, but brought it to bear upon his purpose, naturally, and with a sharp mind to its effect. Sometimes, when much excited with his subject, he had an odd way—compounded of John Bunyan and Balfour of Burleigh—of taking his great quarto-Bible under his arm, and pacing up and down the pulpit with it, looking steadily down, meantime, into the midst of the congregation. Such was Father Taylor in the Strangers' Sabbath Home in Boston, for such his church was. He preached to the homeless, but great minds of America and of other lands came to hear him. It was kindergarten preaching—it pictured truth, and made one feel that there was hope for all humanity, and that open and free was the way to the cross to wayfarers of all lands.

*From Washington, or the Revolution, by Col. Ethan Allen. An historical work, in blank verse, covering events from the Boston massacre to the inauguration of Washington as President. It gives a real personality to all the Revolutionary heroes. Twelve full page illustrations by Henry Kratzner. Pp. 500; price $2. Issued by the Library Americana, Room 403, Empire Building, 71 Broadway, New York City, to aid in establishing a University of the United States, an institution which originated with Washington and was one of his most cherished wishes. Colonel Allen has presented 2,000 copies of his drama to further the work for which Washington and his compatriots stood.

†From Kelea, the Surf Rider, a Romance of Pagan Hawaii, by Alex. Stevenson Twombly. The author has made the most of this virgin field, the story being laid in a time before the whites discovered and renamed the Sandwich Islands. A sight which has always aroused the wonder of travelers is the exhibition of skill and power in the water-sports of the natives especially the surf-riders. The author has made his heroine a descendant of many generations of surf-riders, a physically powerful, savagely passionate, but noble-minded young woman, inheriting all the skill of her ancestors. Pp. 402, illustrated, price $1.50. Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York, publishers.

*From Jack's Carrier Pigeons, a tale of the times of Father Taylor's Mariner's Home, by Hezekiah Butterworth. Father Taylor's influence through his kindness to birds is a well-known legend of the old North Square, Boston. Pp. 289, frontispiece. Price, $1.25. A. I. Bradley & Co., publishers.

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.
Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges: they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefitted by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

A Forward Look*

A Motto for the Beginning of the First Year of the New Century

ENTERING on a new year, and that year the first of a new century, even the least impressionable of mortals must be conscious of a feeling of solemnity. It is true the division of years and centuries is arbitrary, and that there is no special sanctity about the moment when we pass from one year to another. A man might be excused for regarding his birthday, when he turns another annual leaf in the book of his life, as more impressive than the first day of January in any year. But we are members of society, parts of the great community, and, therefore, the day which, by the common consent of the civilized world, is accepted as the turning-point of a period, has a common interest, in which we share with our fellows. True, it does not correctly count from the birth of Christ, but it serves the purpose of perpetuating recognition of the Christian era, and, so far, is an evidence of the public sense of the supreme importance of that event. The number of the year is changed on letters and documents, in the ledger and the calendar, and so we feel ourselves to be in a new period of time. It is a beginning, and has in it potentialities of good and evil, fortune and misfortune, life and death. As Joshua told the Israelites when they were preparing to enter the Promised Land: "Ye have not passed this way heretofore." So we go forward into this new period, solemnized by a sense of the mystery of new experiences, of unknown possibilities and of unfamiliar responsibilities. But we carry forward our own identity, and we have spent our past to little purpose, if we have not gained from it wisdom and experience to meet the duties of the future with improved equipment.

At such a time as this a new motto, as a rule of life, is welcome. It is the fashion to ridicule New Year's resolutions, but no one who is in earnest about life can take stock of his position without a desire to make the future better than the past. The resolution of the Apostle, which is associated with the topic, is a most excellent rule of life. It excludes pride and vanity, as well as useless regrets and is an inspiration to energy and consecration. "Forgetting those things which are behind." Ah, how difficult that is! There are some things that in one sense we do not wish to forget. There are false steps, mistakes, grievous faults of our own, which are burned into the memory and serve a useful purpose in warning us against similar evils in the future. But they are to be forgotten in the sense of weight and depression. If they tend to unnerve us, if we are disposed to brood over them and waste our strength in vain lamentatation over the irretrievable, they become hindrances which cannot be too soon laid aside. The gaze should be forward, not backward. The attainments that we may make, not those already made, nor the failures that have occurred, ought to absorb our attention. We have not reached the goal, no one is already perfect, therefore the demand is for new and better effort. There is a mark toward which we should press, and the prize to those who reach it is well worth the winning. We can imagine the figure that was in the Apostle's mind when he described this rule of life. The racer in the Olympian games is absorbed in this one struggle. His clothing is cast aside: everything which could impede his progress is discarded: he looks neither to the right hand nor to the left, nor behind him, to see what progress others are making; his eye is fixed on the goal and he is pressing toward the mark. He may have troubles, enmities, vexations, friendships, associations, as we all have, but they are all forgotten in this struggle. He is pressing on and is doing that one thing and that only.

What is the one thing before the Christian that Paul compares to the goal in the race? He wants to apprehend, or lay hold on, that for which Christ apprehended, or laid hold, on him. In other words, he wants to fulfil the purpose for which Christ called him. What is the purpose which Christ has in view in calling a Christian? It is worth while to give an hour to settle that question. Evidently the first purpose is to save him. That is to lift him out of the slime and sin and foulness of life and make him a new man. Anyone who has taken hold of a drunkard or a debauchee and tried to reform him knows what that means. He wants him to quit his wickedness and live a clean life. He tells him that he will be happier and better for doing so and may become a respectable citizen. But there are men who are not vicious or drunken, who have not attained the highest moral development of which they are capable. There are respectable sins, faults of thought and conduct which need to be overcome. The Christian must press on. Christ would save him from all evil. He is apprehended for that. The higher nature within him should rule absolutely and completely, and Christ would help him to this. In putting himself into Christ's hands, he has put himself on the lines of infinite development and there is nothing needed for him but to press forward toward the mark and Christ will help him at every step. Then he is apprehended, too, that he may help others. No man's personal salvation exhausts the purpose Christ had in view in saving him. The sweetness and purity of his life will, unconsciously to him, help others by the force of example and will recommend to the world the religion he professes; but there should also be conscious and intentional effort. He should seek out those who need to be saved and tell them the secret of power. There are few, even of the wickedest, who have not at times a longing for better things. To help them to attain their desire, would be to render a service to Christ and to them. By consecration and service it is possible to fulfil the purpose of Christ, to apprehend that for which we are apprehended, this is an aim worthy the new century.

YOUR LIFE-PLAN

CALL not yourself the sport of fate,
Nor curse the luck that kills;
There is no luck for him who prays
And does what wisdom wills.
Oh, long ago that law began,
A law forever true:
There's some life-plan for every man,
So there's a plan for you.

There is no height you may not reach—
No good to be denied,
If you but learn what truth will teach,
And go where truth will guide.
Grope not alone where darkness reigns,
No goalless path pursue;
God has a plan for every man,
And he has one for you.

There's never failure for the soul
Who consecrates his youth
To all that's worthy to control,
And grasps the arm of truth.
Then seek your highest destiny,
And clutch life's grandest clue;
Go forth, and true success shall be
In God's right plan for you.

The Noonday Praying Circle

Mr. Alex. Palmer, secretary of the National Union Noonday Praying Circle, Wilmington, Del., writes: "The notices of our union in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have brought a very large number of letters. Our work is growing fast. Your kindness has helped us to plant bright spots through the grace of united prayer throughout the country. Some, hearing of the union through others, ask, 'What shall we do to become members?' If they will write to me at 1318 Sixth street, this city, for membership cards, I will gladly give any information desired."

A Rescue Worker's Letter

Dear Editor:—I am sure many rescue workers feel very thankful to you that you give so very much for so little money. I have enjoyed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD immensely because of its splendid reports of mission work the world over. Being a mission worker among erring girls, I am glad of your cooperation. I pray God's blessing on Dr. Talmage, Dr. Klopsch, and everybody connected with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

HOW HE FOUND CHRIST

The Story of the Conversion of SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS

The founder of the Young Men's Christian Association

GEORGE WILLIAMS was born at Ashway Farmhouse, five miles from Dulverton, in Southern England, in the year 1821. His father was a prosperous farmer, but George Williams had a longing for a business life in the city. While he was in school one of his schoolmates was George Hitchcock, a young man who was destined to have much to do with his future work. In 1835, when in his fifteenth year, young Williams was apprenticed for six years by his father, to learn the business in a drapery establishment at Bridgewater. Up to this time there had been no marked religious impression made upon his heart. The family had been brought up in the Church of England, and had been accustomed to attend service in the parish church at Dulverton, but the young boy had never felt any personal impulse toward becoming a Christian. He was a thoughtless, active, capable young man, with a hasty temper and a warm heart.

SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS

Fortunately for the young man, upon his first going away from home, he was thrown into close association with two or three fellow-apprentices who were earnest and sincere Christians. These youths exercised a very great influence upon George Williams. He was won to Christ, not by sermons, or public religious services, but through the example, consecration, and loving faith of these earnest young friends. In company with them he began to pray and seek God. And thus it was that, in 1836, in his sixteenth year, George Williams' life of devotion and Christian service began. If those young men had only known the work they did for God and humanity they would have been filled with awe at the privilege God had given them. We never know how much we are doing when we win an undeveloped boy or girl to Christ.

Strength in Secret Prayer

In the drapery house at Bridgewater there was a little, dark room, where the wrapping paper was kept, into which, after his conversion, young Williams used to slip off alone, and pour out his soul in prayer to God. Instead of spending his Sunday afternoons in pleasure, as formerly, when the spiritual light came he began to go to Sunday School, and soon afterwards became a teacher. Finding that the life among the apprentices and clerks of the store was very largely immoral, Williams and the Christian young men who had been the means of his conversion, decided to hold prayer-meetings in their bedrooms, and to invite the other young men. These meetings, which were devoted to prayer, singing, and short readings of Scripture, had a wonderful influence on the young men of the establishment. In a short time twenty-seven became Christians, among them one of the proprietors. The influence of the meetings led the young women to hold meetings of the same kind, and many of them also were converted.

In 1840, when his apprenticeship was ended, young Williams went to London, and was employed in the store of his old school friend, George Hitchcock. Here, under the shadow of St. Paul's mighty dome, where for generations the restless stream of human life has ebbed and flowed from Ludgate Hill to Cheapside, young Williams began his real career. In the Hitchcock establishment at that time eighty young men were employed, having their lodging in the upper apartments. London was then, as now, full of deadly temptations for youth. Liquor shops, the opportunities for gambling, and the temptation to vice were on every side. On the other hand, there was no place open where a young man might go and read, or study, or find cheap and healthful entertainment.

Christian Companionship

It was into this discouraging atmosphere that George Williams came, a sincere Christian, with his heart burning with love and zeal for his Lord, and a great purpose to do something for him. He worked during the day with his fellow-clerks, and at night slept in a small bedroom in one of the upper floors of the establishment. The loneliness, temptation and irreligion of his surroundings led him to pour out his heart in prayer that he might find some one among his associates, who would sympathize with him in his desire for Christian service. A young man of about twenty-four, J. Christopher Smith, was employed in the establishment. To his great joy, Williams found him to be a devoted Christian and a student of the Bible. Christopher Smith became George Williams' room-mate. The intimate relation and Christian fellowship of these two young men at once made themselves felt in their own courage, and in their usefulness in influencing others. It was an illustration of the truth of the Scripture which says that "one shall chase a thousand, and two shall put ten thousand to flight." Through their efforts several young men in the store soon became Christians. Bedroom prayer meetings were established and led by Williams, generally in his own room, and soon after a Bible class was begun which was taught by Smith. A Missionary Society was founded among the clerks in the house, which raised every year a respectable sum of money for missions; also a literary society for mutual improvement. Meanwhile the young men in the house continued to seek Christ and were converted.

Winning Others to Christ

The new movement grew rapidly, and Williams decided to ask his old schoolmate, now his employer, Mr. George Hitchcock, for a larger room for the meetings. The latter was an energetic and successful business man, but had little or no interest in religion. Williams approached him with much hesitation; yet his heart was so full of his mission that his presentation of it went straight to the other man's heart. The room was granted, and Hitchcock himself was a little while after led to become a Christian. The conversion of George Hitchcock meant a great deal to George Williams' future work in the Young Men's Christian Association, for Hitchcock was a man of wealth and large business acquaintance, and gave the movement at the beginning a very important support.

Thus it was that the Young Men's Christian Association, which, like every other great movement that has blessed the world, was a growth—was born in that little room in Bridgewater, where those warm-hearted Christian apprentices led George Williams to Christ, in his sixteenth year. And it grew for nine years through the bedroom prayer-meetings, and the Bible class, and the literary society, until on June 6th, 1844, twelve young men, among whom George Williams was the leading spirit, founded the Young Men's Christian Association, which, like some giant banyan tree, has dropped its branches to the earth, and run its roots under the seas to come up in every land under the sun.

THE EVE OF A NEW CENTURY

(See illustration on first page of this issue)

OUR Old Year faileth fast—the measured tolling
From yonder church, dénotes departure near.
Pale lights are streaming thro' the snow-clogged casement,
The sexton in the little stone paved basement
Rings out the dying Year.

A winding sheet piles high in every corner,
As thickly falls the white continuous snow;
Each wall and hedgerow buries still more deeply,
On every sloping gable drifts curve steeply,
Winds come and go.

Good-by, Old Year, I shall not much deplore thee,
Thy days have held a mournful monotone;
And gladly will I hail the coming morrow,
And not a pang from out the past I'll borrow.
The future is mine own.

And yet, Old Year, I have no heart to blame thee,
Some joy hath touched the sorrow in thy hand.
So with a softened memory I'll name thee,
Teacher of austere lessons can I claim thee,
Things hard to understand.

One—two. How fast the Year is dying!
The people kneel as for a midnight prayer.
Without, the storm its close white shroud is wrapping,
And calls with quick, irregular, faint tapping,
On door and window there.

Eleven—twelve. The snow-hushed air above us,
Gives momentary pause—The Year is gone.
And now—the bells in solemn peal out-breaking,
Announce an unknown Century awaking
With veil undrawn.

Germantown, Pa. L. C. WOOD.

This will be the most important feature in the periodical press of the country in the first week in January. The brainiest men and women here discuss the great hopes of mankind in the next 100 years. Everybody should secure a copy for preservation—a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S first Twentieth Century Number.

A Missionary Victim of Cannibals

In the Solomon Islands, which were recently acquired—made British soil by treaty with Germany—still another Roman Catholic missionary has been made the subject of a cannibal feast. According to the report made by the commander of the British warship Torch, who has just visited all the islands of the group, hoisting the Queen's flag over each in turn, a Protestant missionary came very near sharing a fate like that of his Catholic brother. Both missionaries were stationed at Gaudal Candaur Island, where the Torch arrived just in time to save the Protestant. It seems that the death of the Catholic missionary aroused the savage instincts of the natives to such a pitch that they resolved to kill the Protestant, but found his house defended by twenty native converts with rifles. Though they dared not attack the force thus armed, the cannibals kept up the siege until, when found by the Torch, the missionary and his defenders were on the verge of starvation. After rescuing the Christians, the Torch burned the village.

A GOD-SEND TO ALL HUMANITY.

Remarkable Invention of an Ohioan that Promotes Health, Strength and Beauty to Every User, and Relieves without Drugs All Nervous Diseases, Rheumatism, La Grippe, Neuralgia, Blood and Kidney Troubles, Weakness, and the Most Obstinate Diseases, by Nature's Method of Steaming the Poisons Out of the System.

Ministers and Those Who Have Used It Declare It to Be the Most Remarkable Invigorant Ever Produced, Better than Any Treatment at Hot Springs, Sanitariums or Health Resorts.

A prominent business man of Cincinnati has invented a Vapor Bath Cabinet that has proven a blessing to every man, woman and child who has used it, and as many readers may not know of its real comfort and blessings, it is illustrated in this issue.

Recent investigation of this remarkable invention was so very satisfactory there is no hesitancy in indorsing the same as just what all readers need.

It is an air-tight inclosure, a rubber-walled room, in which one comfortably rests on a chair, and with only the head outside, enjoys at home, for 3 cents each, all the marvelous cleansing, curative and invigorating effects of the famous Turkish, Hot Vapor, Hot Air or Medicated Vapor Bath, with no possibility of taking cold afterwards, or in any way weakening the system.

Many well-known physicians have given up their practice to sell this Cabinet—such eminent men as Emerson McKay, Detroit, who has already sold over 700, and John C. Wright, Chicago, who sold 125 last month.

Thousands of remarkable letters have been written the makers from users, some of which, referring to

Rheumatism, La Grippe, Kidney Troubles,

will be interesting to those who suffer from these dread maladies. W. L. Brown, Oxford, O., writes: "My father was down in bed for months with rheumatism; this Cabinet did him more good than $50 worth of drugs. It relieved my brother of neuralgia and sleeplessness, with which he had long suffered, and his wife of la grippe in one night." G. M. Lafferty, Covington, Ky., writes: "Was compelled to quit business a year ago, being prostrated with rheumatism and kidney troubles, when your Cabinet came. Two weeks' use relieved me; I have never had a twinge since." Rev. George H. Hudson, Okemos, Mich, says: "I gave up my pastorate on account of nervous prostration and lung troubles; my editor so highly recommended your Cabinet, I tried it; from that day I have steadily grown better; am now well; nervousness gone; lungs strong; am a new man." Mr. Simon Tompkins, a retired capitalist of Columbus, O., 1031 Broad St., says: "I am satisfied it saved my life. I was taken down with a hard cold, which developed into a dangerous case of pneumonia. The first Bath relieved me and I quickly recovered. It is far superior to drugs for relieving la grippe, colds, inflammation and rheumatism." Hon. A. B. Strickland, of Bloomington, writes that the Cabinet did him more good than two years' doctoring, entirely rid him of catarrh, gravel, kidney trouble and dropsy, with which he had long been afflicted.

Hundreds of Ministers write, praising this Cabinet. Rev. H. C. Roernaes, Everett, Kan., says: "It is a blessing; made me full of life and vigor; should be in use in every family." Rev. J. C. Richardson, N. Fifth St., Roxbury, Mass., was greatly benefitted by its use, and recommends it highly, as also does Prof. R. E. P. Kline, of Ottawa University, who says: I find it a great benefit. No Christian should be without it." Hon. V. C. Hay, St. Joe, Mo., writes: "Physicians gave me up to die; was persuaded by friends to try this Cabinet, and it relieved me. I can not praise it enough." Rev. Baker Smith, D.D., Fairmount, N. J., says: Your Cabinet rids the body of aches and pain, and as cleanliness is next to godliness, it merits high recommendation."

Congressman John J. Lentz, Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, John T. Brown, Editor "Christian Guide"; Rev. C. M. Keith, Editor "Holiness Advocate," as well as hundreds of clergymen, bankers, governors, physicians and influential people recommend it highly.

Physicians are unanimous in claiming that colds, la grippe, fevers, smallpox, consumption, kidney trouble, Bright's disease, cancer—in fact, such has this Cabinet that no disease can gain a foothold in your body if you take these hot Thermal Baths weekly. Scientific reasons are brought out in a very instructive little book issued by the makers. To this Cabinet has marvelous power. Dr. Shepard, of Brooklyn, states that he has never failed to draw out the deadly poison of snake bites, hydrophobia, blood poison, etc., by this Vapor Bath, proving that it is the most wonderful blood purifier known. If people, instead of filling their system with more poisons by taking drugs and nostrums, would get into a Vapor Bath Cabinet and steam out these poisons, and assist nature to act, they would have pure blood, and a skin as clear and smooth as the most fastidious could desire.

Eradicate Blood and Skin Diseases

The Important Feature of this Cabinet is that it gives a hot vapor bath that opens the millions of pores all over the body, stimulating the sweat glands, drawing out all the impure salts, acids and effete matter, which, if retained, overwork the heart, kidneys, lungs, and cause disease, debility and sluggishness. Astonishing is the improvement in health, feeling and complexion. The first bath makes you feel like a new being; 10 years younger.

With the Cabinet, if desired, is a

Head and Complexion Steamer

in which the face, head and neck are given the same vapor treatment as the body, producing the most wonderful results: removes pimples, blackheads, skin eruptions; relieves Catarrh, Asthma and Bronchitis.

O. C. Smith, Mt. Healthy, O., writes: "Since using this Cabinet my Catarrh, Asthma and Hay Fever, with which I have been afflicted since childhood, has never returned. Worth $1000 to me. I have sold hundreds of these Cabinets. Every one was delighted. My wife finds it excellent for her ills."

Whatever

Will Hasten Perspiration

every one knows is beneficial, but other methods are crude and insignificant, when compared to the convenient and marvelous curative power of this Cabinet, known as the new 1903 style

Quaker Folding Thermal

Bath Cabinet. We find it to be a genuine Cabinet, with a real door, opening wide, as shown in cut. When closed it is air-tight; handsomely made of best, most durable, water-proof goods, rubber-lined. A heavy steel frame supports it, making it a strong and substantial bathroom within itself. It has top curtains; in fact, all the latest improvements.

The makers furnish an excellent stove with each Cabinet, also valuable recipes and formulas for medicated baths and ailments, as well as plain directions. It folds flat in 1 inch space, when not in use; easily carried; weighs but 10 pounds.

People don't need bathrooms, as this Cabinet may be used in any room, and bath tubs have been discarded since this invention, as it gives a far better bath for all cleansing purposes than soap and water. For the sick room its advantages are at once apparent.

After investigation it can be said the Quaker Cabinet made by the Cincinnati firm is the only practical article of its kind, and will last for years. It seems to satisfy and delight every user, and the

Makers Guarantee Results

They assert positively, and their statements are backed by a vast amount of testimony from persons of influence, that this Cabinet will relieve nervous troubles, Debility, Purify the Blood, Beautify the Skin and Relieve Rheumatism. (They offer $50.00 reward for a case not relieved.) Relieves the most obstinate cases of La Grippe, Sleeplessness, Neuralgia, Malaria, Headaches, Obesity, Gout, Sciatica, Eczema, Scrofula, Dropsy, Blood and Skin Diseases, Liver and Kidney Troubles. It will

Relieve the Worst Cold

with one bath, breaks up all symptoms of La Grippe, Fevers, Pneumonia, Asthma, and is really a household necessity. Gives the most known, and all those enjoying health should use it at least once or twice a week, for its great value is its marvelous power to draw out of the system all impurities that cause disease, and for this reason is truly a God-send to all humanity.

Cleansing and Refreshing Bath

HOW TO GET ONE.

All readers who want to enjoy perfect health, prevent disease, or are afflicted, should have one of these remarkable Cabinets. Space prevents a detailed description, but it will bear out the most exacting demand for durability and cleansing properties.

Write the only makers, The World Mfg. Co., 2482 World Building, Cincinnati, O., and ask them to send their valuable illustrated Book FREE, describing this invention and their remarkable Baths. The price of the Cabinet is wonderfully low, only $5.00, complete, with heater, directions and formulas. Head attachment, if desired, $1.00 extra, and it is indeed difficult to imagine where one could invest that amount of money in anything else that offers so much health, strength and vigor.
